The American cultural invasion of Paris will be further abetted by the inclusion of a number of American paintings in an exhibition of 200 contemporary works representative of Western culture assembled by James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art. A number of American poets and writers are also scheduled to address literary forums during the festival.

The Boston Daily Globe
FRIDAY, JAN. 4, 1952

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND EUROPE

In its 71st year of history-making, the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to make history. Next Spring it will play for the first time in Europe.

The occasion is special. Since 1914 our Western world has been forced to remember what in years of tranquil prosperity it is so easy to forget; that a civilization, if it leave any heritage at all, does so not in money and guns, but in the arts, sciences, philosophy, and religion. The content of these is spiritual, although the word more commonly used to designate them is culture. Thus it is the Congress for Cultural Freedom which has invited the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Paris in May for three, possibly four, concerts in a month of "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," designed to show specimens of vital creative achievement in all the arts by peoples not under stultifying interference by State control.

When we consider what an extinguisher cap has descended on the arts in Russia since her revolution went sour, this point need not be labored.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been chosen is striking but not startling. To begin with the most prosaic fact, the expenses of this trip, beyond what the orchestra itself earns in Paris and on tour in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Bordeaux, Strassbourg, and Zurich and by radio broadcast, are to be paid by the Cultural Congress without cost to our local supporters. A less prosaic fact is the repute for world eminence which the Boston orchestra has had, and, save for a short interval during and after the first World War, has maintained since the early years of this century.

This eminence is an historical process. It began in 1881 with imported European players and famous conductors; it continues now when at least half the players when they go to Paris will be seeing Europe for the first time. They go as a virtuoso orchestra, not indeed the first to be heard in Europe nor the only one in America, but the fact of the invitation speaks for itself. Most of the great European orchestras, especially those on the Continent, have been adjuncts of opera houses; the Boston orchestra has cultivated in its public an eager taste for music in its most advanced form, the symphony; and while distinguished soloists quite properly remain ornaments to many of its programs, it has nevertheless been a pioneer in the promulgation of pure symphonic performances.

The art of performance itself is today also in somewhat special case. For the past two decades the major works of musical literature, instrumental and choral, have had performances of grandeur never dreamed of by the composers who penned them during the past two and one-half centuries—an exemplification of the process by which artists, out of sheer inner necessity, create works beyond the immediate comprehension or capacities of most of their contemporaries, only to have them taken up by mankind in some later age as a challenge and triumphantly achieved. It behooves us, therefore, to speak tentatively of the works of contemporary composers which will be played in Paris and on tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with classics of the regular repertory.

Thus we send back to Europe something which originated there but which has achieved a distinctive excellence on American soil. We can scarcely be said to await a verdict, for that has been rendered decade after decade since the turn of the present century by eminent visiting European composers, conductors, and performers; but we do eagerly await the highly competent critical appraisals which its playing is certain to elicit.

As for cultural freedom, what better proof could we send to Europe? For without it the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not exist. Its very presence here and soon-to-be in Europe, is testimony that freedom is the life blood and vital breath of the creative spirit.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

[115]

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
APR 1 - 1952

K CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

he Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer, which a number of Hudsonians attend, will consist of concerts in the smaller auditorium urday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles nch will conduct and will draw his grams from early French music and m the works of Bach, Mozart and hubert. The concerts in the Music ed will be given Thursday and Satday evenings and Sunday afternoons three weeks, July 24, 26-27, July August 2, 3, and August 7, 9-10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 2 - 1952

MUSIC

ston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

he Boston Symphony Orchestra, rles Munch directing, presented the fifth and final concert of its rent Providence season last ht at the Veterans' Memorial ditorium. The evening was a sonal triumph for Dr. Munch, k on the podium after an exded absence.

he program:

egger ..... Symphony No. 3
I. Grave.
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro marcato
sel ..... "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Second Suite, Op. 43 INTERMISSION
hms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico e passionato

The Honegger Symphony, comted last year in Paris, was a ntroversial opening number. It difficult to comment on the work several reasons, including the t that about 100 late arrivals oped in after the first movent and completely disrupted the ntinuity of the work. We understand fully that parking in the ighborhood is a problem, but ter so long a time it would seem t a little planning would overme it. Obviously, the end of the ason is not the time to comment, t in this case the distraction s serious and damaging to the fect of a new and difficult work. Honegger ends each movement this symphony on the note "re." his device (only usually ending on ") was a favorite of the so-lled "atonal" composers of the irties, whose music wandered all er the place and who pleaded nity because everything came t all right in the end. Perhaps e use of the device gives a clue the work as a whole, because ere were several other ways in hich it looked backward—to the aturalist effects of the twenties—nd in places to rhythmic devices hich have been associated with ravinsky even earlier than the venties.

Even so, the work was acrid ough for the present and abstract ough to give even the sophisticated listeners in the audience many things over which to puzzle. here were some "boos" and hisses" mingled with the applause t the end, which we found encouraging. All too often the enemies of modern" music refuse to mingle with the friends of the same, but tay away and refuse to register eir reactions publicly. The effect last night was honest, and good to ear.

The Roussel work which followed was published in 1932. It is a brilliant score, and an exciting one, remendously advanced for 1932. In fact, some parts of it seemed more modern than anything in the Honegger Symphony, and in its lyric sections as well as in the brassy parts the idiom showed how a composer may often be in advance of his time and have to wait several years for audience experience to grow to accept the music. "Modern" in music is a relative term, and should be approached as such. The Roussel may have had a better reception than the Honegger, but it was not less difficult in idiom. The audience seemed to like it.

After these two works, which seemed very familiar, the playing was as excellent as ton Symphony performances is, Dr. Munch kept requ

CONN.
ER
52

uled For Tanglewood Opera Group

plicants to this summer's session of the Opera De-shire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in ...ne Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 P. M. An ...presen...

...'s tenth season will open at Tanglewood on June ...ust 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron ...ector.

...of the opera department in past seasons have in... Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," ...d Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

...ge to come to the auditions should, if possible, no... ...sic Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachu...

OHIO
OURNAL

For
isted

...ill hold final ...opera depart... ...ire Music Cen... ...Lenox, Mass., ...in the Cleve... ...sic. ...ictor of the ...e Opera Guild, ...n intermission ... Metropolitan ...aturday after...

...'s 10th season ...wood June 30 ...n under direc... ...ch, conductor ...phony Orches...

D, MASS.
CAN

OPERA
THURSDAY

...Meants to this ...the Opera De... ...shire Music Cen... ...l be held in New ... Recital Hall on ... p. m. An ac... ...ent. The Music ... will open at ...30 and run until ... ...director and ...ist on director. ... ...opera de... ...tor's ...ance in ... Britten's ...'s Idomeneo." ...Tschaikovsky's ... to come to the ...possible, notify ...ntic, Symphony

The New York Times
NOVEMBER 15, 1951.

U. S. FOUND LOSING IN 'CULTURAL WAR'

State Department Aide Notes Athletes, Artists and Dancers Sent Abroad by Soviet

The United States is losing a world-wide cultural war with the Soviet Union, which last year sent abroad 39,000 athletes, scientists, writers, artists, musicians and ballet dancers in a "gigantic propaganda offensive" against this country, a State Department official declared here yesterday.

The speaker was Edward W. Barrett, assistant Secretary of State for public affairs. At a conference arranged by the Institute of International Education in Town Hall he asserted that the Russian offensive was "intended to prove once and for all that the West, and particularly the United States, is without culture and that the Soviet Union is the very cradle of culture."

Addressing representatives of 100 national organizations, Mr. Barrett noted that while the Soviet Union lately had been well represented at various international festivals and contests in such fields as the motion picture, music and the dance, the United States has been represented "only occasionally or not at all." At the Milan Fair last year, he said, the sixteen Russian exhibits were "the largest and most artistically presented."

"Their presence," Mr. Barrett added, "made a favorable impression and the absence of American participation permitted the Soviets to say that Americans were too busy preparing for war and too materialistic to attend. We lost that contest without a struggle."

Propaganda Expenditure

The Soviet Union's expenditure for propaganda in France alone has been estimated conservatively at $150,000,000 a year, or "more than the United States Government is spending on its program of information and educational exchange around the world," according to Mr. Barrett.

Recounting the rebuffs of the State Department's efforts to establish a basis for cultural relations with the Soviet Union in recent years, the assistant secretary said that in 1948 and 1949 twenty-five official overtures were made for various types of cultural exchange but that in each case the Russians either turned down or ignored the proposals.

Mr. Barrett observed that cultural exchange was "a major tool of Soviet propaganda", and that the Communist party used the Russian education system as well as all cultural activities to further the policies of the Soviet Government.

On the other hand, he said, the object of the United States is to create mutual respect and understanding among nations.

Sharing Stressed

"We do not have anything to sell, but we have much to share," he continued. "It is not our desire to dominate; it is our desire to trade as equals on the common ground of friendship and trust."

Mr. Barrett urged private financial support for developing the arts and culture of this country and acting as sponsor throughout the world. He said that the United States Government was neither disposed nor equipped to handle such projects.

Kenneth Holland, president of the institute, declared that there was a great need for leaders and specialists to plan and administer the expanding international activities of the United States.

The New York Times
NOVEMBER 24, 1951.

ON THE CULTURAL FRONT

Assistant Secretary of State Barrett has properly called attention to an area of the propaganda war in which we are lagging: the cultural front. He points out that the Soviet Union sent abroad last year the impressive number of 39,000 scientists, writers, musicians and the like to prove that Russia is the cradle of culture, while the United States has no culture. At important foreign cultural events, such as the Milan Fair last year, we have been represented little, if at all, while Soviet exhibits and personnel have been overwhelming.

The reason for this disparity is easily understood. The Soviet Government regards such exhibits as of major propaganda importance and devotes huge funds to this purpose. For the most part, however, American cultural figures who go abroad to display their skills do so because foreigners are willing to pay to see them perform. The shortage of American dollars abroad is a powerful factor militating against such commercial appearances. It does not affect Soviet performers in the same degree, since their services are frequently available on a free or virtually free basis. Furthermore, some of our cultural products seen abroad—gangster films, for example—may actually have a negative impact in forming foreign opinion.

Mr. Barrett was wise, we believe, in disclaiming any intention or desire on the part of our Government to go into competition with the Soviet regime in an official program of cultural export. But this very fact deepens the responsibility of private American enterprise, the great philanthropic foundations and related groups in seeing to it that our present backwardness is ended. In every field of culture the United States has representatives who will bear comparison with those of other countries. Whether it be chess masters or piano virtuosi, there are Americans whom foreigners ought to be able to see in action.

The New York Times DECEMBER 4, 1951.

EXPORT OF CULTURE

The men in the Kremlin ceaselessly expound the propaganda theme of Russia's cultural superiority over the rest of the world. We in the United States do not usually think of culture as playing any part in the propaganda war. And yet when the Russians are represented in European festivals and the United States is not, the loss is ours. We can be proud of a vibrant and flourishing culture. But because of our foolish disregard of the immense importance of the "cultural offensive" we have, as Assistant Secretary Barrett said the other day, lost many an intellectual battle threughout the civilized world without a struggle.

Now we have a golden opportunity to recoup some of this loss if we will only take full advantage of it. In Paris five months from now the Congress of Cultural Freedom is planning a festival, of which the theme will be the intellectual and artistic achievements of the free world in the twentieth century. The festival will embrace music, the drama, the dance, painting, and various other art forms, as conceived not by an all-powerful state which tells its artist-servants what they can and cannot do but by individual creators exercising the priceless gifts of freedom and self-expression.

The United States will be represented in the Paris festival, but—thus far at least—only by virtue of private philanthropy. The American committee for the festival, a private group, is now raising funds to make sure that our country is properly represented. Present plans are to send to Paris the New York City Ballet, and Boston Symphony, and arrange for temporary "export" of modern masterpieces from public and private collections. It is a fine thing that some private individuals and foundations have been willing to meet the expenditures involved, but obviously more examples of America's impressive cultural life could be brought to Europe if more funds were available.

IN PARIS

Shaw's "Caesar and Cleo-ra," with Sir Laurence Olivier Vivien Leigh. series of afternoon forums, led noted writers and philosophers, anned. One of the forums will uss freedom of the press.

ORK
Tribune
20, 1952

y, City Ballet estival in May ing festival, it was said, is to bat the current Communist ty line in Europe which has insulting Western art and ure as "decadent."

r. Nabokov is director of the osition committee of the Cons and Julius Fleischmann, of cinnati, its American chairman.
ey Hook is chairman of the erican committee of the Cons and has conducted negotiawith the American partici-
.
he American cultural invasion
Paris will be further abetted he inclusion of a number of rican paintings in an exhibiof 200 contemporary works esentative of Western culture mbled by James Johnson eney, a former director of the um of Modern Art. A number merican poets and writers are scheduled to address literary ns during the festival.

mporaries, only to have them taken mankind in some later age as a chal-and triumphantly achieved. It bes us, therefore, to speak tentatively of orks of contemporary composers which e played in Paris and on tour by the n Symphony Orchestra along with s of the regular repertory.
us we send back to Europe something originated there but which has ed a distinctive excellence on Amer-il. We can scarcely be said to await ct, for that has been rendered decade decade since the turn of the present
y by eminent visiting European con-conductors, and performers, but we erly await the highly competent appraisals which its playing is cerelicit.
For cultural freedom, what better ould we send to Europe? For with-the Boston Symphony Orchestra ot exist. Its very presence here and be in Europe, is testimony that free-the life blood and vital breath of the spirit.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SIX CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

T... Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood summer which a number ... will consist of ... Shed auditorium, ... and Sunday afternoons ... 29-30. Concerts ... will open this ... with ... and ... Bach music and ... Mozart and ... the Music ... and Saturday ... Sunday afternoons ... 24, 26-27, July ... August 7, 9-10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

... Symphony Orchestra, ... conducting, presented ... of its ... season last ... the Veterans' Memorial ... The evening was a ... triumph for Dr. Munch, ... on the podium after an ex- ... absence.

The program:

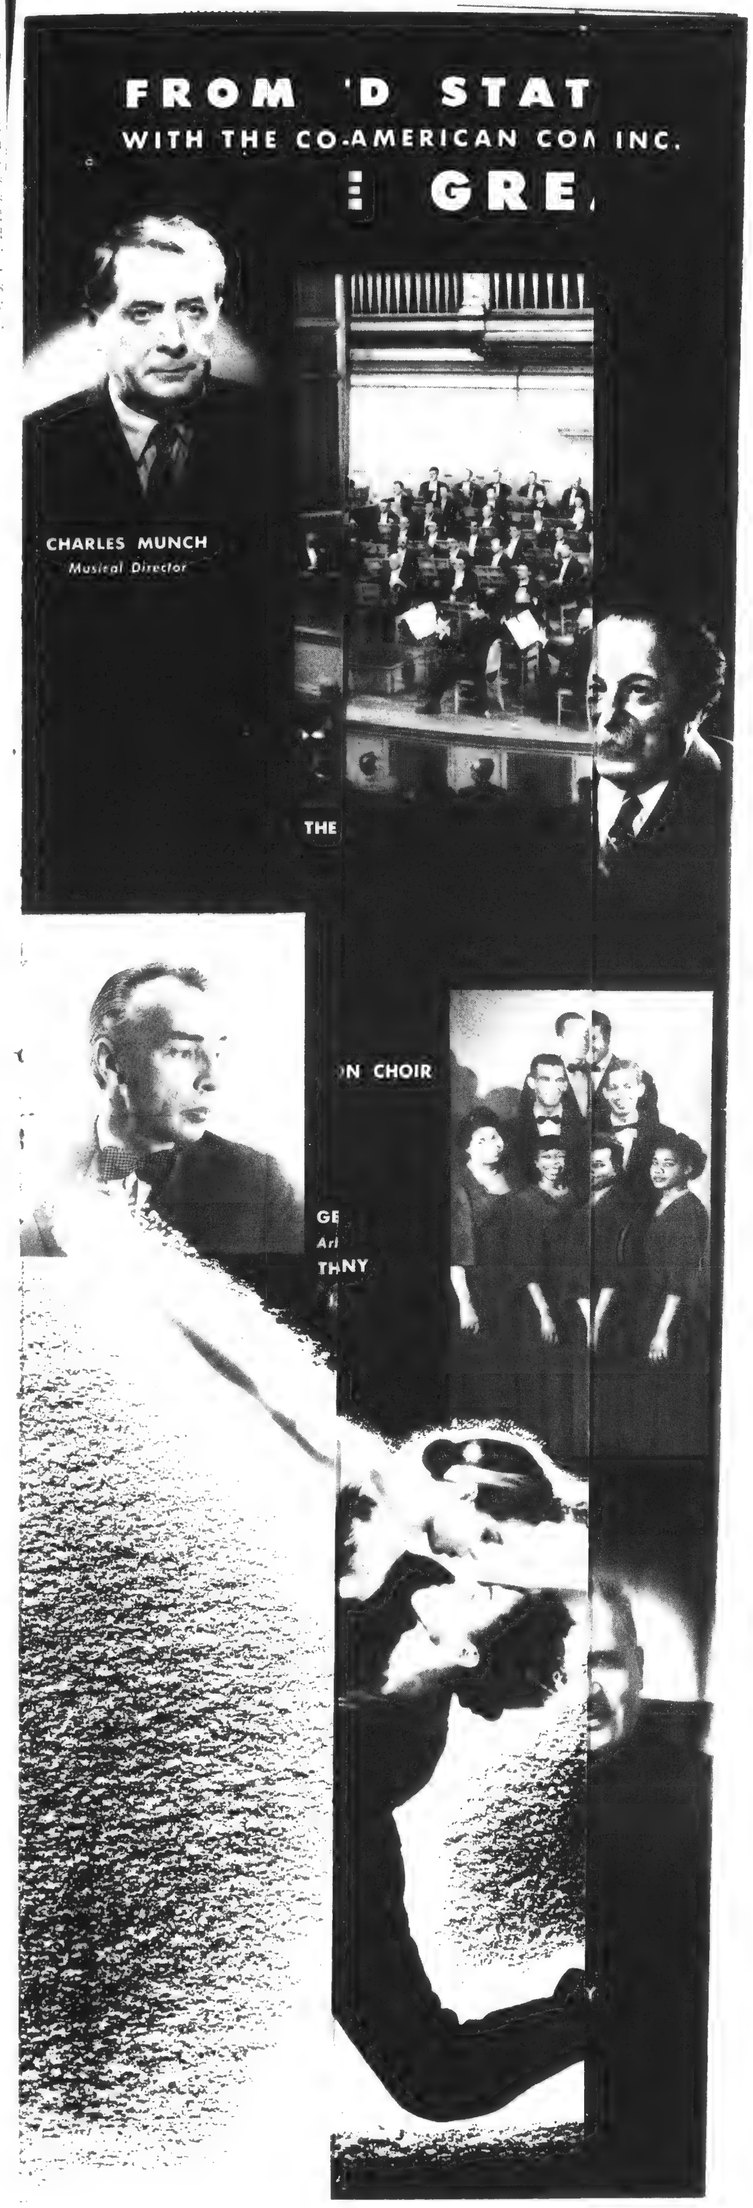
H... Symphony No. 5
...
...
B... Ballet
...
...
...
...
...
...
...
...

... Symphony, composed last year in Paris, was a ... seat opening number. It is difficult to comment on the work for several reasons, including the fact that about 100 late arrivals trooped in after the first movement and completely disrupted the continuity of the work. We understand fully that parking in the neighborhood is a problem, but after so long a time it would seem that a little planning would overcome it. Obviously, the end of the season is not the time to comment, but in this case the distraction was serious and damaging to the effect of a new and difficult work.

Honegger ends each movement of this symphony on the note "re." This device only usually ending on ... was a favorite of the so-called "atonal" composers of the ... whose music wandered all over the place and who pleaded sanity because everything came out all right in the end. Perhaps the use of the device gives a clue to the work as a whole, because ... several other ways in which it looked toward the ... of the twenties ... and ... devices ... it will ... even ... that it ...

... so, the work was acrid ... and abstract ... the sophisti- ... listeners in the audience ... "boos" and ... with the applause ... which we found encouraging. All too often the enemies of ... music ... to mangle ... the friends of the same, but ... and ... to ...

... Brahms ... While the ... as excellent as a Bos- ... performance always ... Munch kept requesting that members of the orchestra play more "from the heart," or with more warmth. The directing from memory, was brilliant in the extreme, and the audience response at the end was a real tribute to the magnificent leadership of Dr. Munch.



This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

APR 2 - 1952

In and About Town

By MAUD O'BRYAN

BASEBALL IN AUDUBON PARK TO OPEN

The 13th consecutive season of games by Audubon Baseball League will begin Sunday, April 6, with a big street parade, field ceremonies and a boubleheader at Audubon Park.

Larry Fischer Jr., 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence G. Fischer, will reign as king of the parade, and lovely little Cheryl Doyle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chris Doyle, will be queen. They will ride in two separate sections of the parade, one leaving the corner of Felicity and Magazine at 12:45 p. m.; the other from Louisiana ave. and Carondelet at the same time.

Commissioner Vic Schiro and Mayor William White of Gretna will take part in ceremonies at the park. The first game is called for 12:30 p. m., between Molenar Pals and Finley Plumbers, both 13 years old like the league.

SPOTLIGHT ON AFRICA

City Park will be the center of another kind of activity this Sunday. The Junior League will open its "Spotlight on Africa" art exhibit in connection with the Art Association of New Orleans, in the Delgado museum. There will be an opening reception from 4 to 5:30 p. m.

FOR PRACTICAL NURSES

Hilda C. Burnham, R. N. announces another extension course will be offered to all interested (currently licensed) practical nurses. Classes will begin at Hotel Dieu on April 15 at 6 p. m. Enrollment will be limited. Application should be made immediately at MAgnolia 7714. The course is sponsored by Jefferson Parish Trade school, under the auspices of Louisiana State Board of Practical Nurse Examiners.

RUMMAGE SALE, LUTHERAN

The St. John Lutheran school Ladies' Aid will hold a rummage sale Friday and Saturday at 1312 Dryades. All proceeds will be used for the purchase of church and school furnishings, according to Mrs. Art Burke.

Mrs. Richard Oster, general chairman, and her staff have secured some brand new table lamps and window curtains, in addition to wearing apparel for women, children and men.

'NOMTA' TALENT ON TV

New Orleans Music Teachers Association will present their second television program today at 4:45 p. m. Howard Voorhies opens the program with a special guest, Mrs. H. Lynwood O'Bannon, secretary of the organization.

Paul Kirst Jr., Sally Ann Templeman, Joan Trupiano, Jewel Kussman, Charles May and Myrtle Marcotte are to be presented in violin, accordion, piano and vocal solos, reports Mrs. Vernile Winn.

'SALON DU JAZZ' 'BUSTS LOOSE' IN PARIS

If you think your rafters are swaying, it may be reverberations from Paris. The second international "Salon du Jazz" is in full swing, March 29 through April 6, and all France is kicking up her heels.

It looks as if Western Europe is turning its face more and more to America, in a cultural sense. Besides adopting New Orleans jazz, Frenchmen are planning presentations of the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting; the New York City Ballet; the Philadelphia orchestra with Eugene Ormandy at the podium; Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" with Virgil Thomson as director; Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium—all from the United States, all scheduled for this summer.

"Texas Week on the Riviera" is the biggest gesture of all, to the biggest state. Whoop-de-do in the Texas manner will go on from Saturday, July 12 at Cannes, until Sunday night, July 20, in Grasse.

Texas will also be honored in Nice, Antibes, Juan-Les-Pins, Menton, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu and all the smaller Riviera resorts, the most spectacular event being the "Great Night of Texas" in Nice, Sunday, July 13, at 10 p. m. There will be a battle of flowers and a parade of flowered carriages occupied by young ladies from Texas in Texas costumes.

Cowboys in 10-gallon hats will set off the fireworks. And on Saturday, July 19, in Beaulieu (of all places) the casino will present a "Night Party in Dallas." (My, my, won't Houston be mad)

RED CYPRESS RUSTIC YARD FURNITURE?

Mrs. Luke Bordelon writes from Ville Platte: "Kindly repeat the name and address of the Florida firm that advertises red cypress rustic yard furniture."

This has us stumped, but we've sent Mrs. Bordelon names of some large furniture stores in New Orleans. Anybody know what ad the lady means?

SACRED MUSIC CONCERT

Dr. George Cooper, president, and Gustin Wright, conductor, of the Cesar Franck Society, invite you to a Holy Week concert Tuesday, April 8, at 8 p. m. in St. Joseph's church, 1802 Tulane ave. Chorus, soloists and orchestra will present music appropriate to the climax of Lent.

DR. JEKYLL, MR. HYDE

Mmes. J. W. McCants and J. H. Watts will discuss the zodiacal sign of Gemini in their astrological talk at 8 this evening, 635 Common st. Dowager Queen Mary of England is a Geminian whose chart will be delineated.

Dr. Jekyll (or Mr. Hyde), if a real person, would probably have been a Geminian or "twin"—in other words, a dual personality, says Mrs. McCants. That's the way Gemini affects those born under it. Wonder who Queen Mary's "alter ego" is? Queen Witch?

[116]

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SIX CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

members of the orchestra play more "from the heart," or with more warmth. The directing from memory, was brilliant in the extreme, and the audience response at the end was a real tribute to the magnificent leadership of Dr. Munch.

IN PARIS

Shaw's "Caesar and Cleo-ra," with Sir Laurence Olivier Vivien Leigh.
series of afternoon forums, led noted writers and philosophers, anned. One of the forums will uss freedom of the press.

ORK
Tribune
20, 1952

y, City Ballet estival in May ing festival, it was said, is to bat the current Communist ty line in Europe which has n insulting Western art and ure as "decadent."

r. Nabokov is director of the osition committee of the Con-s and Julius Fleischmann, of cinnati, its American chairman. ey Hook is chairman of the erican committee of the Con-s and has conducted negotia-s with the American partici-s. he American cultural invasion Paris will be further abetted the inclusion of a number of rican paintings in an exhibi- of 200 contemporary works esentative of Western culture mbled by James Johnson ney, a former director of the eum of Modern Art. A number merican poets and writers are scheduled to address literary ms during the festival.

mporaries, only to have them taken mankind in some later age as a chal- and triumphantly achieved. It be- s us, therefore, to speak tentatively of orks of contemporary composers which e played in Paris and on tour by the n Symphony Orchestra along with s of the regular repertory.
us we send back to Europe something originated there but which has ed a distinctive excellence on Amer- oil. We can scarcely be said to await ict, for that has been rendered decade decade since the turn of the present y by eminent visiting European con- conductors, and performers but we gerly await the highly competent appraisals which its playing is cer- elicit.
for cultural freedom, what better ould we send to Europe? For with- the Boston Symphony Orchestra ot exist. Its very presence here, and be in Europe, is testimony that free- he life blood and vital breath of the spirit.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

APR

In and About Town

By MAUD O'BRYAN

BASEBALL IN AUDUBON PARK TO OPEN

The 13th consecutive season of games by Audubon Baseball League will begin Sunday, April 6, with a big street parade, field ceremonies and a doubleheader at Audubon Park.

Larry Fischer Jr., 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence G. Fischer, will reign as king of the parade, and lovely little Cheryl Doyle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chris Doyle, will be queen. They will ride in two separate sections of the parade, one leaving the corner of Felicity and Magazine at 12:45 p. m.; the other from Louisiana ave. and Carondelet at the same time.

Commissioner Vic Schiro and Mayor William White of Gretna will take part in ceremonies at the park. The first game is called for 12:30 p. m., between Molenar Pals and Finley Plumbers, both 13 years old like the league.

SPOTLIGHT ON AFRICA

City Park will be the center of another kind of activity this Sunday. The Junior League will open its "Spotlight on Africa" art exhibit in connection with the Art Association of New Orleans, in the Delgado museum. There will be an opening reception from 4 to 5:30 p. m.

FOR PRACTICAL NURSES

Hilda C. Burnham, R. N. announces another extension course will be offered to all interested (currently licensed) practical nurses. Classes will begin at Hotel Dieu on April 15 at 6 p. m. Enrollment will be limited. Application should be made immediately at MAgnolia 7714. The course is sponsored by Jefferson Parish Trade school, under the auspices of Louisiana State Board of Practical Nurse Examiners.

RUMMAGE SALE, LUTHERAN

The St. John Lutheran school Ladies' Aid will hold a rummage sale Friday and Saturday at 1312 Dryades. All proceeds will be used for the purchase of church and school furnishings, according to Mrs. Art Burke.

Mrs. Richard Oster, general chairman, and her staff have secured some brand new table lamps and window curtains, in addition to wearing apparel for women, children and men.

'NOMTA' TALENT ON TV

New Orleans Music Teachers Association will present their second television program today at 4:45 p. m. Howard Voorhies opens the program with a special guest, Mrs. H. Lynwood O'Bannon, secretary of the organization.

Paul Kirst Jr., Sally Ann Templeman, Joan Trupiano, Jewel Kussman, Charles May and Myrtle Marcotte are to be presented in violin, accordion, piano and vocal solos, reports Mrs. Vernile Winn.

'SALON DU JAZZ' 'BUSTS LOOSE' IN PARIS

If you think your rafters are swaying, it may be reverberations from Paris. The second international "Salon du Jazz" is in full swing, March 29 through April 6, and all France is kicking up her heels.

It looks as if Western Europe is turning its face more and more to America, in a cultural sense. Besides adopting New Orleans jazz, Frenchmen are planning presentations of the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting; the New York City Ballet; the Philadelphia orchestra with Eugene Ormandy at the podium; Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" with Virgil Thomson as director; Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium—all from the United States, all scheduled for this summer.

"Texas Week on the Riviera" is the biggest gesture of all, to the biggest state. Whoop-de-do in the Texas manner will go on from Saturday, July 12 at Cannes, until Sunday night, July 20, in Grasse.

Texas will also be honored in Nice, Antibes, Juan-Les-Pins, Menton, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu and all the smaller Riviera resorts, the most spectacular event being the "Great Night of Texas" in Nice, Sunday, July 13, at 10 p. m. There will be a battle of flowers and a parade of flowered carriages occupied by young ladies from Texas in Texas costumes.

Cowboys in 10-gallon hats will set off the fireworks. And on Saturday, July 19, in Beaulieu (of all places) the casino will present a "Night Party in Dallas." (My, my, won't Houston be mad)

RED CYPRESS RUSTIC YARD FURNITURE?

Mrs. Luke Bordelon writes from Ville Platte: "Kindly repeat the name and address of the Florida firm that advertises red cypress rustic yard furniture."

This has us stumped, but we've sent Mrs. Bordelon names of some large furniture stores in New Orleans. Anybody know what ad the lady means?

SACRED MUSIC CONCERT

Dr. George Cooper, president, and Gustin Wright, conductor, of the Cesar Franck Society, invite you to a Holy Week concert Tuesday, April 8, at 8 p. m. in St. Joseph's church, 1802 Tulane ave. Chorus, soloists and orchestra will present music appropriate to the climax of Lent.

DR. JEKYLL, MR. HYDE

Mmes. J. W. McCants and J. H. Watts will discuss the zodiacal sign of Gemini in their astrological talk at 8 this evening, 635 Common st. Dowager Queen Mary of England is a Geminian whose chart will be delineated.

Dr. Jekyll (or Mr. Hyde), if a real person, would probably have been a Geminian or "twin"—in other words, a dual personality, says Mrs. McCants. That's the way Gemini affects those born under it. Wonder who Queen Mary's "alter ego" is? Queen Witch?

IN PARIS

Shaw's "Caesar and Cleo-ra," with Sir Laurence Olivier Vivien Leigh.

series of afternoon forums, led noted writers and philosophers, planned. One of the forums will cuss freedom of the press.

YORK
Tribune
y 20, 1952

ny, City Ballet Festival in May

oring festival, it was said, is to ombat the current Communist arty line in Europe which has een insulting Western art and ulture as "decadent."

Mr. Nabokov is director of the xposition committee of the Con-ress and Julius Fleischmann, of incinnati, its American chairman. idney Hook is chairman of the merican committee of the Con-ress and has conducted negotia-ons with the American partici-ants.

The American cultural invasion f Paris will be further abetted y the inclusion of a number of merican paintings in an exhibi-on of 200 contemporary works epresentative of Western culture ssembled by James Johnson weeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art. A number f American poets and writers are lso scheduled to address literary orums during the festival.

contemporaries, only to have them taken up by mankind in some later age as a challenge and triumphantly achieved. It behooves us, therefore, to speak tentatively of the works of contemporary composers which will be played in Paris and on tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with classics of the regular repertory.

Thus we send back to Europe something which originated there but which has achieved a distinctive excellence on American soil. We can scarcely be said to await a verdict, for that has been rendered decade after decade since the turn of the present century by eminent visiting European composers, conductors, and performers but we do eagerly await the highly competent critical appraisals which its playing is certain to elicit.

As for cultural freedom, what better proof could we send to Europe? For without it the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not exist. Its very presence here and soon-to-be in Europe, is testimony that freedom is the life blood and vital breath of the creative spirit.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SIX CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

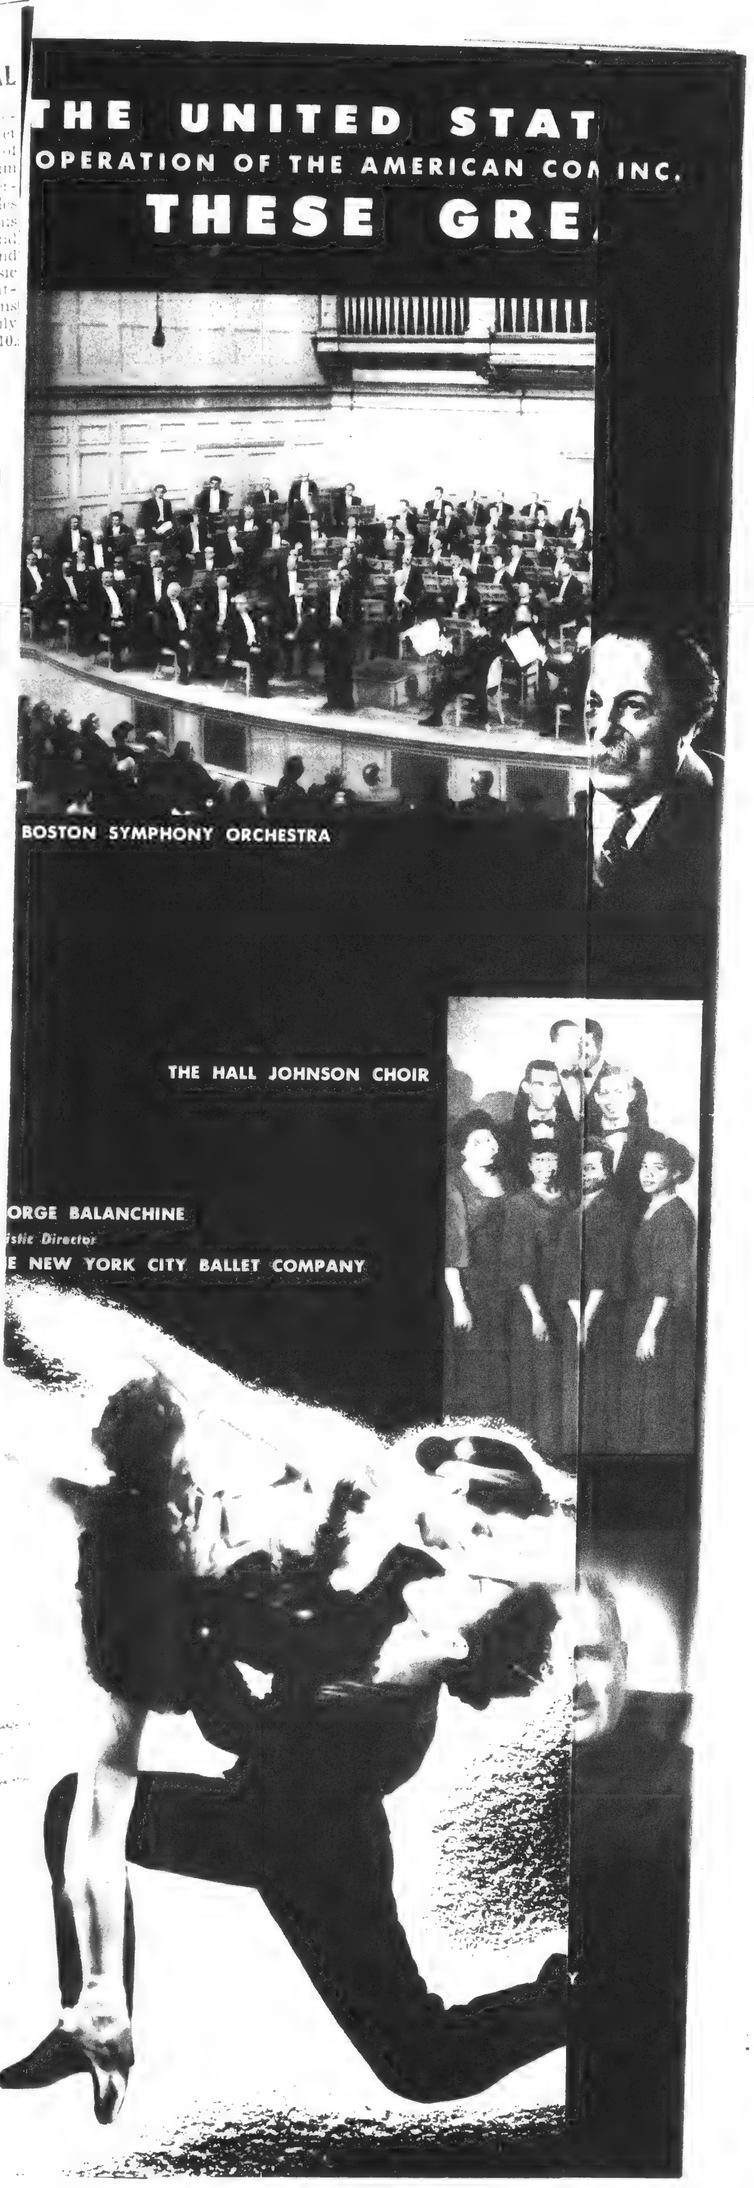
[illegible] 9-10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

BY WILLIAM DINNELLY



members of the orchestra play more "from the heart," or with more warmth. The directing, from memory, was brilliant in the extreme, and the audience response at the end was a real tribute to the magnificent leadership of Dr. Munch.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

APR

In and About Town

By MAUD O'BRYAN

BASEBALL IN AUDUBON PARK TO OPEN

The 13th consecutive season of games by Audubon Baseball League will begin Sunday, April 6, with a big street parade, field ceremonies and a doubleheader at Audubon Park.

Larry Fischer Jr., 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence G. Fischer, will reign as king of the parade, and lovely little Cheryl Doyle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chris Doyle, will be queen. They will ride in two separate sections of the parade, one leaving the corner of Felicity and Magazine at 12:45 p. m.; the other from Louisiana ave. and Carondelet at the same time.

Commissioner Vic Schiro and Mayor William White of Gretna will take part in ceremonies at the park. The first game is called for 12:30 p. m., between Molenar Pals and Finley Plumbers, both 13 years old like the league.

SPOTLIGHT ON AFRICA

City Park will be the center of another kind of activity this Sunday. The Junior League will open its "Spotlight on Africa" art exhibit in connection with the Art Association of New Orleans, in the Delgado museum. There will be an opening reception from 4 to 5:30 p. m.

FOR PRACTICAL NURSES

Hilda C. Burnham, R. N. announces another extension course will be offered to all interested (currently licensed) practical nurses. Classes will begin at Hotel Dieu on April 15 at 6 p. m. Enrollment will be limited. Application should be made immediately at MAgnolia 7714. The course is sponsored by Jefferson Parish Trade school, under the auspices of Louisiana State Board of Practical Nurse Examiners.

RUMMAGE SALE, LUTHERAN

The St. John Lutheran school Ladies' Aid will hold a rummage sale Friday and Saturday at 1312 Dryades. All proceeds will be used for the purchase of church and school furnishings, according to Mrs. Art Burke.

Mrs. Richard Oster, general chairman, and her staff have secured some brand new table lamps and window curtains, in addition to wearing apparel for women, children and men.

'NOMTA' TALENT ON TV

New Orleans Music Teachers Association will present their second television program today at 4:45 p. m. Howard Voorhies opens the program with a special guest, Mrs. H. Lynwood O'Bannon, secretary of the organization.

Paul Kirst Jr., Sally Ann Templeman, Joan Trupiano, Jewel Kussman, Charles May and Myrtle Marcotte are to be presented in violin, accordion, piano and vocal solos, reports Mrs. Vernile Winn.

'SALON DU JAZZ' 'BUSTS LOOSE' IN PARIS

If you think your rafters are swaying, it may be reverberations from Paris. The second international "Salon du Jazz" is in full swing, March 29 through April 6, and all France is kicking up her heels.

It looks as if Western Europe is turning its face more and more to America, in a cultural sense. Besides adopting New Orleans jazz, Frenchmen are planning presentations of the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting; the New York City Ballet; the Philadelphia orchestra with Eugene Ormandy at the podium; Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" with Virgil Thomson as director; Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Medium—all from the United States, all scheduled for this summer.

"Texas Week on the Riviera" is the biggest gesture of all, to the biggest state. Whoop-de-do in the Texas manner will go on from Saturday, July 12 at Cannes, until Sunday night, July 20, in Grasse.

Texas will also be honored in Nice, Antibes, Juan-Les-Pins, Menton, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu and all the smaller Riviera resorts, the most spectacular event being the "Great Night of Texas" in Nice, Sunday, July 13, at 10 p. m. There will be a battle of flowers and a parade of flowered carriages occupied by young ladies from Texas in Texas costumes.

Cowboys in 10-gallon hats will set off the fireworks. And on Saturday, July 19, in Beaulieu (of all places) the casino will present a "Night Party in Dallas." (My, my, won't Houston be mad)

RED CYPRESS RUSTIC YARD FURNITURE?

Mrs. Luke Bordelon writes from Ville Platte: "Kindly repeat the name and address of the Florida firm that advertises red cypress rustic yard furniture."

This has us stumped, but we've sent Mrs. Bordelon names of some large furniture stores in New Orleans. Anybody know what ad the lady means?

SACRED MUSIC CONCERT

Dr. George Cooper, president, and Gustin Wright, conductor, of the Cesar Franck Society, invite you to a Holy Week concert Tuesday, April 8, at 8 p. m. in St. Joseph's church, 1802 Tulane ave. Chorus, soloists and orchestra will present music appropriate to the climax of Lent.

DR. JEKYLL, MR. HYDE

Mmes. J. W. McCants and J. H. Watts will discuss the zodiacal sign of Gemini in their astrological talk at 8 this evening, 635 Common st. Dowager Queen Mary of England is a Geminian whose chart will be delineated.

Dr. Jekyll (or Mr. Hyde), if a real person, would probably have been a Geminian or "twin"—in other words, a dual personality, says Mrs. McCants. That's the way Gemini affects those born under it. Wonder who Queen Mary's "alter ego" is? Queen Witch?

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SIX CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

[illegible] Music
[illegible] Sat-
[illegible] Ceremonies
[illegible] 26-27, daily
[illegible] 9-10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

[illegible] Dr. Munch.

IN PARIS

[illegible] and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," with Sir Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh.

A series of afternoon forums, led by noted writers and philosophers, is planned. One of the forums will discuss freedom of the press.

YORK
Tribune
[illegible]uary 20, 1952

[illegible]ony, City Ballet Festival in May

[illegible] spring festival, it was said, is to combat the current Communist party line in Europe which has been insulting Western art and culture as "decadent."

Mr. Nabokov is director of the exposition committee of the Congress and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, its American chairman. Sidney Hook is chairman of the American committee of the Congress and has conducted negotiations with the American participants.

The American cultural invasion of Paris will be further abetted by the inclusion of a number of American paintings in an exhibition of 200 contemporary works representative of Western culture assembled by James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art. A number of American poets and writers are also scheduled to address literary forums during the festival.

[illegible] contemporaries, only to have them taken up by mankind in some later age as a challenge and triumphantly achieved. It behooves us, therefore, to speak tentatively of the works of contemporary composers which will be played in Paris and on tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with classics of the regular repertory.

Thus we send back to Europe something which originated there but which has achieved a distinctive excellence on American soil. We can scarcely be said to await a verdict, for that has been rendered decade after decade since the turn of the present century by eminent visiting European composers, conductors, and performers, but we do eagerly await the highly competent critical appraisals which its playing is certain to elicit.

As for cultural freedom, what better proof could we send to Europe? For without it the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not exist. Its very presence here and soon-to-be in Europe, is testimony that freedom is the life blood and vital breath of the creative spirit.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

[illegible] members of the orchestra play more "from the heart," or with more warmth. The directing, from memory, was brilliant in the extreme, and the audience response at the end was a real tribute to the magnificent leadership of Dr. Munch.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

APR [illegible]

In and About Town

By MAUD O'BRYAN

BASEBALL IN AUDUBON PARK TO OPEN

The 13th consecutive season of games by Audubon Baseball League will begin Sunday, April 6, with a big street parade, field ceremonies and a doubleheader at Audubon Park.

Larry Fischer Jr., 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence G. Fischer, will reign as king of the parade, and lovely little Cheryl Doyle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chris Doyle, will be queen. They will ride in two separate sections of the parade, one leaving the corner of Felicity and Magazine at 12:45 p. m.; the other from Louisiana ave. and Carondelet at the same time.

Commissioner Vic Schiro and Mayor William White of Gretna will take part in ceremonies at the park. The first game is called for 12:30 p. m., between Molenar Pals and Finley Plumbers, both 13 years old like the league.

SPOTLIGHT ON AFRICA

City Park will be the center of another kind of activity this Sunday. The Junior League will open its "Spotlight on Africa" art exhibit in connection with the Art Association of New Orleans, in the Delgado museum. There will be an opening reception from 4 to 5:30 p. m.

FOR PRACTICAL NURSES

Hilda C. Burnham, R. N. announces another extension course will be offered to all interested (currently licensed) practical nurses. Classes will begin at Hotel Dieu on April 15 at 6 p. m. Enrollment will be limited. Application should be made immediately at MAgnolia 7714. The course is sponsored by Jefferson Parish Trade school, under the auspices of Louisiana State Board of Practical Nurse Examiners.

RUMMAGE SALE, LUTHERAN

The St. John Lutheran school Ladies' Aid will hold a rummage sale Friday and Saturday at 1312 Dryades. All proceeds will be used for the purchase of church and school furnishings, according to Mrs. Art Burke.

Mrs. Richard Oster, general chairman, and her staff have secured some brand new table lamps and window curtains, in addition to wearing apparel for women, children and men.

'NOMTA' TALENT ON TV

New Orleans Music Teachers Association will present their second television program today at 4:15 p. m. Howard Voorhies opens the program with a special guest, Mrs. H. Lynwood O'Bannon, secretary of the organization.

Paul Kirst Jr., Sally Ann Templeman, Joan Trupiano, Jewel Kussman, Charles May and Myrtle Marcotte are to be presented in violin, accordion, piano and vocal solos, reports Mrs. Vernile Winn.

'SALON DU JAZZ' 'BUSTS LOOSE' IN PARIS

If you think your rafters are swaying, it may be reverberations from Paris. The second international "Salon du Jazz" is in full swing, March 29 through April 6, and all France is kicking up her heels.

It looks as if Western Europe is turning its face more and more to America, in a cultural sense. Besides adopting New Orleans jazz, Frenchmen are planning presentations of the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting; the New York City Ballet; the Philadelphia orchestra with Eugene Ormandy at the podium; Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" with Virgil Thomson as director; Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium—all from the United States, all scheduled for this summer.

"Texas Week on the Riviera" is the biggest gesture of all, to the biggest state. Whoop-de-do in the Texas manner will go on from Saturday, July 12 at Cannes, until Sunday night, July 20, in Grasse.

Texas will also be honored in Nice, Antibes, Juan-Les-Pins, Menton, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu and all the smaller Riviera resorts, the most spectacular event being the "Great Night of Texas" in Nice, Sunday, July 13, at 10 p. m. There will be a battle of flowers and a parade of flowered carriages occupied by young ladies from Texas in Texas costumes.

Cowboys in 10-gallon hats will set off the fireworks. And on Saturday, July 19, in Beaulieu (of all places) the casino will present a "Night Party in Dallas." (My, my, won't Houston be mad)

RED CYPRESS RUSTIC YARD FURNITURE?

Mrs. Luke Bordelon writes from Ville Platte: "Kindly repeat the name and address of the Florida firm that advertises red cypress rustic yard furniture."

This has us stumped, but we've sent Mrs. Bordelon names of some large furniture stores in New Orleans. Anybody know what ad the lady means?

SACRED MUSIC CONCERT

Dr. George Cooper, president, and Gustin Wright, conductor, of the Cesar Franck Society, invite you to a Holy Week concert Tuesday, April 8, at 8 p. m. in St. Joseph's church, 1802 Tulane ave. Chorus, soloists and orchestra will present music appropriate to the climax of Lent.

DR. JEKYLL, MR. HYDE

Mmes. J. W. McCants and J. H. Watts will discuss the zodiacal sign of Gemini in their astrological talk at 8 this evening, 635 Common st. Dowager Queen Mary of England is a Geminian whose chart will be delineated.

Dr. Jekyll (or Mr. Hyde), if a real person, would probably have been a Geminian or "twin"—in other words, a dual personality, says Mrs. McCants. That's the way Gemini affects those born under it. Wonder who Queen Mary's "alter ego" is? Queen Witch?

POPS
Europe
Europe
3
Europe

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
APR 1 1952

MASTERPIECES OF THE 20th CENTURY

SYMPHONY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. 104 Members, Charles Munch, Musical Director; Pierre Monteux, Associate Conductor. One of the world's great musical organizations, in its first visit to Europe.

THE HALLÉ ORCHESTRA, England; Sir John Barbirolli, conductor.

THE ORCHESTRA DELL'ACCADEMIA DELLA SANTA CECILIA, Rome.

L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Switzerland; Ernest Ansermet, conductor; Josef Szigeti, violinist.

L'ORCHESTRE NATIONAL DE LA RADIODIFFUSION FRANCAISE (The French National Radio Orchestra), Paris.

THE PARIS CONSERVATORY ORCHESTRA.

THE R.I.A.S. (Radio) ORCHESTRA, Berlin; Ferenc Fricsay, conductor; Geza Anda, pianist.

OPERA

"BILLY BUDD," Opera by Benjamin Britten. Libretto by E. M. Forster and Eric Crozier, adapted from Herman Melville's novel. The Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London production.

"WOZZECK," Opera by Alban Berg. The Salzburg Festival production by the Vienna State Opera.

"OEDIPUS REX," Opera-oratorio by Igor Stravinsky. Libretto by Jean Cocteau, after Sophocles. Igor Stravinsky to conduct the premiere.

THE PARIS OPERA productions of Debussy's "PELLEAS ET MELISANDE"; Richard Strauss' "ARIADNE AUF NAXOS"; Dukas' "BARBE BLEU"; Gian-Carlo Menotti's "THE MEDIUM."

CONCERT

IGOR STRAVINSKY leading a program of his own recent concert works.

BRUNO WALTER leading the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

3 CHURCH CONCERTS of Roman Catholic, Protestant, Jewish music.

CHAMBER MUSIC by internationally-known ensembles.

CHOIR

THE HALL JOHNSON CHOIR, distinguished U.S. Negro ensemble.

CHORALE ST. GUILLAUME, Strasbourg; Fritz Munch, director.

CHORUS DELL'ACCADEMIA DELLA SANTA CECILIA, Rome.

THE SHEFFIELD CHORUS

BALLET

THE NEW YORK CITY BALLET COMPANY, George Balanchine, Artistic Director. The celebrated young American dance troupe in its repertory of 20 ballets, for the first time in Paris, in six performances. Igor Stravinsky will conduct on two evenings ballets based on his scores.

"PLEIN FEU," a new ballet by Georges Auric, with decor by A. M. Cassandre (world premiere).

A new ballet by Henri Sauguet, with decor by Jacques Dupont (world premiere).

ART

A great exhibition of some 200 Twentieth Century paintings by European and American artists, from museums and private collections here and abroad, assembled by JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY, art critic and author, and former director of the Museum of Modern Art, New York.

LITERATURE, POETRY, PHILOSOPHY

Lectures and discussion forums by world-celebrated men of letters and philosophers.

(Program Subject to Change)

For Full Information Write

The American Committee for Cultural Freedom, Inc.

35 West 53rd Street • New York 19, N. Y.

a great cultural exposition of the Arts

SYMPHONY

OPERA

BALLET

CHORUS

DRAMA

ART

LITERATURE

PHILOSOPHY

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
APR 2 - 1952

In and About Town

By MAUD O'BRYAN

BASEBALL IN AUDUBON PARK TO OPEN

The 13th consecutive season of games by Audubon Baseball League will begin Sunday, April 6, with a big street parade, field ceremonies and a boubleheader at Audubon Park.

Larry Fischer Jr., 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence G. Fischer, will reign as king of the parade, and lovely little Cheryl Doyle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chris Doyle, will be queen. They will ride in two separate sections of the parade, one leaving the corner of Felicity and Magazine at 12:45 p. m.; the other from Louisiana ave. and Carondelet at the same time.

Commissioner Vic Schiro and Mayor William White of Gretna will take part in ceremonies at the park. The first game is called for 12:30 p. m., between Molenar Pals and Finley Plumbers, both 13 years old like the league.

SPOTLIGHT ON AFRICA

City Park will be the center of another kind of activity this Sunday. The Junior League will open its "Spotlight on Africa" art exhibit in connection with the Art Association of New Orleans, in the Delgado museum. There will be an opening reception from 4 to 5:30 p. m.

FOR PRACTICAL NURSES

Hilda C. Burnham, R. N. announces another extension course will be offered to all interested (currently licensed) practical nurses. Classes will begin at Hotel Dieu on April 15 at 6 p. m. Enrollment will be limited. Application should be made immediately at MAgnolia 7714. The course is sponsored by Jefferson Parish Trade school, under the auspices of Louisiana State Board of Practical Nurse Examiners.

RUMMAGE SALE, LUTHERAN

The St. John Lutheran school Ladies' Aid will hold a rummage sale Friday and Saturday at 1312 Dryades. All proceeds will be used for the purchase of church and school furnishings, according to Mrs. Art Burke.

Mrs. Richard Oster, general chairman, and her staff have secured some brand new table lamps and window curtains, in addition to wearing apparel for women, children and men.

'NOMTA' TALENT ON TV

New Orleans Music Teachers Association will present their second television program today at 4:45 p. m. Howard Voorhies opens the program with a special guest, Mrs. H. Lynwood O'Bannon, secretary of the organization.

Paul Kirst Jr., Sally Ann Templeman, Joan Trupiano, Jewel Kussman, Charles May and Myrtle Marcotte are to be presented in violin, accordion, piano and vocal solos, reports Mrs. Vernile Winn.

'SALON DU JAZZ'
'BUSTS LOOSE' IN PARIS

If you think your rafters are swaying, it may be reverberations from Paris. The second international "Salon du Jazz" is in full swing, March 29 through April 6, and all France is kicking up her heels.

It looks as if Western Europe is turning its face more and more to America, in a cultural sense. Besides adopting New Orleans jazz, Frenchmen are planning presentations of the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting; the New York City Ballet; the Philadelphia orchestra with Eugene Ormandy at the podium; Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" with Virgil Thomson as director; Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium—all from the United States, all scheduled for this summer.

"Texas Week on the Riviera" is the biggest gesture of all, to the biggest state. Whoop-de-do in the Texas manner will go on from Saturday, July 12 at Cannes, until Sunday night, July 20, in Grasse.

Texas will also be honored in Nice, Antibes, Juan-Les-Pins, Menton, Monte Carlo, Beaulieu and all the smaller Riviera resorts, the most spectacular event being the "Great Night of Texas" in Nice, Sunday, July 13, at 10 p. m. There will be a battle of flowers and a parade of flowered carriages occupied by young ladies from Texas in Texas costumes.

Cowboys in 10-gallon hats will set off the fireworks. And on Saturday, July 19, in Beaulieu (of all places) the casino will present a "Night Party in Dallas." (My, my, won't Houston be mad)

RED CYPRESS RUSTIC YARD FURNITURE?

Mrs. Luke Bordelon writes from Ville Platte: "Kindly repeat the name and address of the Florida firm that advertises red cypress rustic yard furniture."

This has us stumped, but we've sent Mrs. Bordelon names of some large furniture stores in New Orleans. Anybody know what ad the lady means?

SACRED MUSIC CONCERT

Dr. George Cooper, president, and Gustin Wright, conductor, of the Cesar Franck Society, invite you to a Holy Week concert Tuesday, April 8, at 8 p. m. in St. Joseph's church, 1802 Tulane ave. Chorus, soloists and orchestra will present music appropriate to the climax of Lent.

DR. JEKYLL, MR. HYDE

Mmes. J. W. McCants and J. H. Watts will discuss the zodiacal sign of Gemini in their astrological talk at 8 this evening, 635 Common st. Dowager Queen Mary of England is a Geminian whose chart will be delineated.

Dr. Jekyll (or Mr. Hyde), if a real person, would probably have been a Geminian or "twin"—in other words, a dual personality, says Mrs. McCants. That's the way Gemini affects those born under it. Wonder who Queen Mary's "alter ego" is? Queen Witch?

er may often be in advance of time and have to wait several rs for audience experience to w to accept the music. "Modern" music is a relative term, and ould be approached as such. The ussel may have had a better re-ption than the Honegger, but it s not less difficult in idiom. The dience seemed to like it!
After these two works, Brahms emed very familiar. While the ying was as excellent as a Bos-n Symphony performance always
Dr. Munch kept requesting that members of the orchestra play more "from the heart," or with more warmth. The directing from memory, was brilliant in the extreme, and the audience response at the end was a real tribute to the magnificent leadership of Dr. Munch.

[116]

This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD-DISPATCH
APR 4 - 1952

Shanet To Join Summer Faculty At Tanglewood

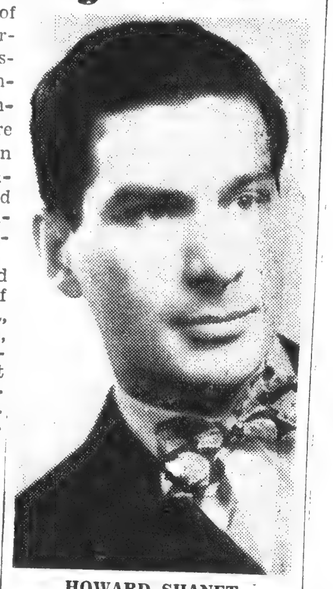
Howard Shanet, conductor of the Huntington Symphony Orchestra, has been invited to assist Conductor Leonard Bernstein in teaching orchestral conducting at the famed Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Massachusetts during the coming Summer, it was announced yesterday by Leonard H. Samworth, president of the Huntington Symphony Association.

The invitation was extended by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the request of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and the trustees of that organization. The Boston Symphony sponsors the world - famous festival and music center at Tanglewood.

Mr. Shanet, an alumnus of the center, had served on its faculty for several seasons as assistant to its founder and director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, until Dr. Koussevitzky's death last year.

Mr. Shanet said he has accepted the invitation.

The Tanglewood administration is to send to Huntington a movie about the Music Center and Festival, prepared by the State Department. The film, originally designed by the government for overseas distribution to show America's cultural achievements, has been seen only by a few audiences in the United States. Mr. Shanet said music lovers of the tri-state area would have an opportunity to see it as soon as it arrives.



HOWARD SHANET
Honored By Famous Center

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 4 - 1952

Symphony Players Depart April 27, 28 for European Tour

A contingent of Boston Symphony players will leave Logan Airport April 27 on a chartered Air France plane for Paris. The remainder of the orchestra will sail from New York on April 28 on the Ile de France.

The orchestra will participate, in Paris, in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, whose theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The exposition committee of the Congress' American affiliate, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing funds from private philanthropy to send the 104-member musical aggregation abroad.

Charles Munch, musical director, will lead the Symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera House. This event will be attended by President Vincent Auriol, state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders.

On May 17, the Boston Symphony will visit Strasbourg, Mr. Munch's birthplace. There the conductor served as violinist in the Strasbourg Orchestra, and taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory. The concert in that city will be at the Free Europe University in Exile, and will be broadcast by arrangement with Radio Free Europe, and through Voice of America facilities to Russia and its satellite countries.

Several performances are planned in Germany, for German civilians and United States troops stationed abroad.

The tour will conclude with the orchestra's first appearance in London, at the Festival Hall on May 26, following which the orchestra will sail for New York from Southampton aboard the Ile de France on May 27.

This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
ADVERTISER
APR 4 - 1952

Shanet Accepts Tanglewood Bid

Howard Shanet, conductor of the Huntington Symphony Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to assist Conductor Leonard Bernstein in teaching orchestral conducting at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer, it was announced by Leonard H. Samworth, president of the Huntington Symphony Association.

The invitation was extended by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the request of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and the trustees of that organization.

This Clipping From
OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
APR 5 - 1952

New Scholarships For Music Students At Tanglewood

A new and much enlarged scholarship policy is announced for the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school run by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Tuition grants will be made from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs.

BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
APR 4 - 1952

SYMPHONY MEN WILL FLY TO PARIS

A large contingent of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave Logan Airport April 27 on chartered Air France overseas planes for Paris, where the orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of Arts, sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, beginning May 6.

Burgin Conducts Tchaikovsky

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 5 - 1952

MUSIC

Burgin Conducts 21st Symphony Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin conducted the 21st Friday concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program consisted of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6, No. 10; the "Chout" Suite of Prokofieff, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps it was the warm, heavy air of sudden Spring, but this concert seemed on the lacklustre and soporific side. True, Handel's lovely piece for strings went nicely, with a satisfying richness and sweetness of tone, and clean execution. But there was little intensity in the first half of the program, and even Prokofieff's once horrendously violent music was relatively innocuous.

Things perked up a bit, however, with the advent of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony. While there was a certain amount of untidy detail here and there, including entrances which caught some of the orchestra a shade off the beat, Mr. Burgin made a good deal of Tchaikovsky's Slavic melancholy. His pace, however, was on the fast side throughout, and those little details where a nuance of tempo or expression makes all the difference between conventionality and a distinctive, emotionally compelling performance, went largely ignored.

Such things are very important to the reading of Tchaikovsky, whose music, broadly speaking, is not the sort that "plays itself." With his febrile temperament, and his piling on of emotional climaxes, he wrought a music that must be carefully planned, expressively, from beginning to end. Otherwise the continuity and the structure cannot appear at their finest.

In general, the slow movement went best of all, and the famous horn solo was splendidly phrased. In this movement, too, the orchestral detail (perhaps more lavish in this Symphony than in any other of the Tchaikovsky six) was most clearly brought out.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30. The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday to avoid Good Friday. Charles Munch then will present the "St. John" Passion of Bach, and will repeat it Saturday evening, April 12, and on Easter Sunday afternoon, April 13, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

Handel and Prokofiev Music At the Week-End Symphony

MONITOR

By Harold Rogers

Richard Burgin gave an inspired performance of the Tchaikovsky Fifth yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Earlier in the season during the Tuesday evening series he offered a reading of this work that merited high praise. Tchaikovsky is one of the finest things that Mr. Burgin does, but yesterday's reading with the Boston Symphony may well be the finest thing he has ever done.

It is to be expected that a conductor of Russian descent would have a special affinity for Russian music, and such proves to be the case with Mr. Burgin, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster and associate conductor. But yesterday he did more than reaffirm this affinity; he stirred the orchestra into vibrant and dynamic communication. It was as if he surveyed the broad cyclical architecture of this symphony as Tchaikovsky established it and then faithfully transformed it into living sound.

* * *

The Fifth, as we all know, abounds with magnificent musical ideas, strong dramatic statements from which the composer extracted the full degree of emotion and impact. Mr. Burgin gave his complete support to these ideas; not one was allowed to fall by the wayside unheard.

The portentous moods of the opening Andante; the impassioned song of the Andante cantabile; the exquisite lightness of the Valse's scherzo qualities; the final bold measures of the triumphant march —all passed before us in glorious display. Mr. Burgin has been true to Tchaikovsky—after Tchaikovsky's fashion.

His program also included the first hearing here in six years of Prokofiev's Opus 21, the ballet called "Chout," the performance yesterday consisting of seven sections of this suite that the young composer created for the Diaghilev company.

Emblazoned in gaudy primary colors, the ridiculous story, with the same Russian flavor expressed in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." If the suite as a whole does not have the cohesion of "Petrouchka," each section is nevertheless molded to express the concomitant stage action.

* * *

The music graphically recounts a grim practical joke played on one clown on several other clowns and the droll repercussions that ensue. The whole affair culminates in a wild dance that dazzles the ear as, when seen as a ballet, it must dazzle the eye.

For the opening selection Mr. Burgin provided a pleasant performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for String Orchestra. The able soloists were Alfred Krips, who is sitting Mr. Burgin in the concertmaster's chair; Clarence Knudson, second leader of the second violins, and Samuel Mayes, first cellist. Deserving of mention, too, was James Stagliano's orotund French horn solo in the second movement of the Tchaikovsky.

4/5/52 TI

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 21st program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10 ..... Handel
Suite from "Chout" ..... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 ..... Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was clearly Richard Burgin's day at the symphony yesterday afternoon. He has given us some splendid concerts in the past, of course, but he came into his own yesterday in notable fashion. . . .In the past few years Mr. Burgin has had the opportunity to gain additional experience and authority as conductor of the N. E. Philharmonic orchestra, a training body for advanced students that has achieved considerable stature under his direction. He has also become the conductor of the Portland Symphony, and between these duties and his more frequent conducting of the Boston Symphony this season, he has, if I may use the term, loosened up.

MASTERY OF ORCHESTRA

He always did have mastery of the orchestra; his technical capacities have long been noted. But that mastery has been constrained by a seeming reticence to let himself go;; he simply hadn't had the audience experience to allow him to really express himself physically, so to speak.

Hitherto his style on the conductor's stand has not been distinguished; one sensed a preoccupation—a very commendable preoccupation, you understand—to lead the orchestra rather than inspire it, to cue the entrances rather than to preside over the whole, to follow the composer's specific directions to the letter rather than intrude his own personality. This makes for impeccable performance and for unquestioned soundness, but it doesn't inflame the imagination or transport the audience.

It was quite a different matter yesterday. Mr. Burgin had fire: his movements were alive and vigorous and interesting. He used a score but seemed not to look at it at all, which further added to the impression of a sort of liberation in his approach. And there was an overall fluency and ease in his work combined, nonetheless, with urgency and conviction. As a result of all this he gave the Tchaikovsky all the tonal radiance, all the drive and brilliance, as well as all the tenderness and subtlety in the slow movement and the waltz, we have grown up with under Koussevitzky, whose special realm this music was. I thought Mr. Stagliani did beautifully with that fine French horn solo of the slow movement, too, while the orchestra responded to Mr. Burgin's every wish.

FULL STRING BAND

I was pleased the conductor used the full string band for the Handel. Many conductors apparently unaware that Handel himself would have used [illegible] if he'd had them available as in [illegible] like Mozart, wanted [illegible] sound, scale down the [illegible] those exquisite concertos as well as other works of the [illegible] was beautifully done [illegible] bodied yet sensitive [illegible] fine solo playing by Alfred [illegible] and Clarence Knudson [illegible] second violins, [illegible] Samuel Mayes [illegible] Prokofieff's [illegible] think the ballet [illegible] musical [illegible] the mockeries [illegible] score abounds [illegible] some incredibly [illegible] informed with the [illegible] tunes, crammed [illegible] of catchy and [illegible] and possessed [illegible] ergy of expression [illegible] its own as a ballet [illegible] a jewel. But now [illegible] to dismiss [illegible] sated with [illegible] to see a [illegible] more purely [illegible] the ballet—the [illegible] certainly on [illegible] takes around [illegible] this would [illegible] a delicious [illegible] it is just [illegible] feet contact.

Be that as it may, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra [illegible] than brilliantly [illegible] other well-rounded [illegible] concert. Mr. Munch [illegible] week to repeat Fauré's [illegible] According to [illegible] chorus and soloists [illegible] introduced here [illegible] ago with immense success. The same work will be given on Saturday, April 13, to benefit the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

This Clipping From
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT
APR 6 - 1952

[illegible]cording the [illegible]

[illegible]OVEN: Symphony No. 1 [illegible] 21, and HAYDN: Sym[illegible] 103 in E Flat ("Drum [illegible]yed by the Boston Sym[illegible]rchestra conducted by [illegible]unch.—Here on a new [illegible]CA Victor LP disc, are [illegible] written within six years [illegible]her, one the first sym[illegible]say by the turbulent [illegible]ethoven, the other next [illegible]t of the prolific output [illegible]nia and mellow "Papa" [illegible]Despite the surface simi[illegible]ween the two works, to [illegible]ning listener one is clear[illegible]nming up of a glorious [illegible] music while the other [illegible]e explosion into the 19th [illegible]f the furious, tempestu[illegible]ven. The performances [illegible] and the Bostonians are [illegible] and the recording is [illegible]A highly recommended [illegible](RCA Victor 1-12-inch [illegible]B: Symphony No. 4 in E [illegible] 98, Bruno Walter con[illegible]the Philharmonic-Sym[illegible]hestra of New York.—As [illegible]te symphonies summed [illegible]h Century, so the mag[illegible]urth of Brahms, written [illegible]imaxes the century that [illegible] Beethoven and marched [illegible]ert, Berlioz, Franck, and [illegible] to meet the man whose [illegible] symphonies epitomize [illegible]e outlook of his time. [illegible]rmance here, on a new [illegible]12-inch LP, by Bruno [illegible] wholly satisfying and [illegible] engineers have given [illegible]ph of recording. Another [illegible]ed disc.

[illegible]o team of Vronsky and [illegible]heard on another Colum[illegible] record in DEBUSSY'S [illegible]et Noir" and an arrange[illegible]Victor Babin of three [illegible] from STRAVINSKY'S [illegible]ouchka." The playing and [illegible]

[illegible] this season, which is not to [illegible] Prokofieff's "Chout" is any [illegible]superfluous. This is enter[illegible] music, even without the [illegible]nying action, and if it [illegible] heard in its proper setting [illegible]ed as it was yesterday, it [illegible]e entertaining, indeed. Our [illegible]n in regard to ballet music [illegible]anomalous one. We have [illegible] plenty at the Opera House [illegible] orchestra, numerically, if [illegible]erwise, represent various [illegible] of inadequacy. We hear [illegible] scores, notably those [illegible], Stravinsky and Prokofieff, [illegible] played at Symphony Hall, [illegible], there is nothing to watch.

TIGHT BINDING

aikovsky

VILS

kofiev Music
nd Symphony

Rogers

isplay. Mr. Burgin has been true Tchaikovsky — after Tchaikovky's fashion.

His program also included the rst hearing here in six years of rokofiev's Opus 21, the 1915 allet called "Chout." The perrmance yesterday consisted of even sections of this buffoonery hat the young composer concocted or the Diaghilev company.

Emblazoned in bold, primary olors, the ridiculous story unfolds ith the same Russian festivity xpressed in Stravinsky's "Pe-rouchka." If the suite as a whole oes not have the cohesion of "Pe-rouchka," each section is neatly olded to express the concurrent age action.

* * *

The music graphically illustrates grim practical joke, played by ne clown on seven other clowns, nd the droll repercussions that nsue. The whole affair winds up a wild dance that tickles the ar as, when seen as a ballet, it ust dazzle the eye.

For the opening selection Mr.
urgin provided a pleasant perrmance of Handel's Concerto rosso in D minor for String Orhestra. The able soloists were Alred Krips, who is spelling Mr.
urgin in the concertmaster's hair; Clarence Knudson, section eader of the second violins; and amuel Mayes, first cellist. De-erving of mention, too, was James tagliano's orotund French horn olo in the second movement of he Tchaikovsky.

FULL STRING BAND

I was pleased the conductor used the full string band for the Handel. Many conductors, apparently unaware that Handel himself would have used 500 strings if he'd had them available as he, like Mozart, wanted oceans of sound, scale down the strings for these exquisite concertos as well as other works of the genre. It was beautifully done in this full-bodied yet sensitive manner with fine solo playing by Alfred Kripps andClarence Knudson, first and second violins, respectively, and Samuel Mayes, cello.

Prokofieff's "Chout" needs, I think, the ballet to underline the musical witticisms, the wry jokes, the mockeries and caprices this score abounds in. Filled with some incredibly clever devices, informed with gay and amusing tunes, crammed with a variety of catchy and infectious rhythms and possessed of an overall energy of expression it stands on its own as a ballet suite up to a point. But presently it begins to diminish in interest; one is sated with ingenuity and begins to seek a more sustained and a more purely musical feeling. With the ballet—the story of which is certainly one of the more giddy tales around—I have no doubt this would prove an hilarious and a delicious experience. Without it it just doesn't quite make perfect contact.

Be that as it may, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra did it no less than brilliantly to make this another well-rounded and satisfying concert. Mr. Munch returns next week to repeat Bach's "Passion According to St. John" with chorus and soloists, a work he introduced here two seasons ago with immense success. The same work will be given on Sunday, April 13, to benefit the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STORY SMITH

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
APR 6 - 1952

'Juniors' Planning Gay Lafayette Ball

By ALICE WILLIAMS

ONE OF THE biggest and most colorful projects of the League of Catholic Women's Junior Committee is the planning of the annual Lafayette Ball. The committee...headed by Miss Mary Donahue of Jamaica Plain and Miss Mary Lynch of Dorchester . . . is now extremely busy concocting new and interesting events for the Ball, to be held Friday evening, April 18, in the Louis XIV Ballroom of Hotel Somerset.

This year, all proceeds of the gala occasion will be given to Nazareth . . . the new building now being erected for homeless children.

Miss Pauline Edgar . . . chairman of entertainment . . . has dreamed up a unique program, and the usual waltz contest will be one of the highlights of the evening.

The ticket committee includes Virginia Swett, Mary Rogan, Virginia Kuzan, Nancy O'Keefe, Rita Coyne. Members of the Sponsor committee are Barbara Sweeney, Lorraine Kiely, Shirley Borges, Anna Lynch, Nancy Cooney and Betty Gilmore. Mary Bride, Mary Lou Maguire and Mary Jane Commane are charming members of the all-important Reception Committee for this popular yearly happening.

CONCERT: A musical event of the Easter season will be the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Bach's Passion according to St. John. Charles Munch will conduct this great music at the symphony concert in Symphony Hall in the subscription concerts of Holy Week (Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening) and will repeat the performance on Easter Sunday afternoon , April 13, at 3 o'clock.

The choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, will assist. The Radcliffe Choral Society includes Dorothy Joan Redman, Arlington; Laura Hutchinson, Boston; Edith Millward, Braintree; Barbara Wheatland, Joanna Bailey, Adrianne M. Knight, Jean Williams Lunn.

This Clipping From
AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL
APR 6 - 1952

Civic Chorus Concert Features Knowles Duo

AKRON CIVIC CHORUS will feature a husband and wife singing duo, Paul and Adriana Knowles, at the annual Spring concert April 29 in Goodyear Theater.

William Albert Hughes will conduct the concert beginning at 8:30 p. m.

The attractive young couple met at the Berkshire Music Festival. Mrs. Knowles, the former Adriana La Zazzera, had been awarded a scholarship to the festival. She is a mezzo-soprano.

Knowles, a tenor, was singing in the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes." They were married after a courtship carried on between lessons, rehearsals and public performances.

Mrs. Knowles studied at the New England Conservatory in Boston and was a winner in the "Miss Television of New England" contest.

In New York she attended the Mannes Music School and was soloist with the Roxy Theater choral group. In television her big break came when she was chosen to be a regular member of the award-winning "Show of Shows" starring Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca.

* * *

ON THIS PROGRAM Adriana was featured in opera scenes with Marguerite Piazza and Robert Merrill of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

As a winner of the Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air Knowles has been awarded a Fulbright scholarship for foreign study. He is widely known as an oratorio and opera singer.

Knowles has sung with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Oratorio Society and the American Broadcasting Symphony. He has appeared with the Little Orchestra Society of New York three times in Town Hall.

The Knowles Duo in Akron will sing solos and duets. Their programs usually include scenes from several operas and solos and duets from comic operas, operettas and musical comedy.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 6 - 1952

Great Variety Is New England Vacation Lure

By Nathan Levenson

BOSTON — Whatever you are looking for in a summer vacation, you can find it in New England.

Within a day's drive, the vacationist can enjoy both the brisk tang of the sea and fresh sweetness of the country air, fishing in well stocked waters, hiking or climbing over mountain trails, swimming or relaxing at white sandy beaches from Maine to Connecticut, or yachting and cruising in these same waters.

* * *

Somewhere in almost every New England scene there is a mountain. In the north, at Acadia National park near famous Bar Harbor, Me., a pink granite road winds to the top of Cadillac mountain. You would have to travel as far as Rio de Janeiro to find as high a mountain peak rising directly from the sea. Hikers' trails marked with log cabins and other shelters for the night open up vast regions where the automobile cannot penetrate.

Massachusetts has its Berkshires, famous for charming resorts and summer homes and the setting for the famous Berkshire Music Festival of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Vermont's Green Mountains are the majestic "backbone" of the state. Up Mount Equinox near Manchester winds a toll road to the 3,816 feet summit.

In New Hampshire, the White mountains' sweep from the valley to the topmost crag is breath taking. Mount Washington, with its cog railway and trails leading to the summit house, is outstanding. At the top are sleeping and eating accommodations.

* * *

In Maine is the great Katahdin, highest point in the state, surrounded by miles of rugged woods.

Along the coasts of the New England states are beaches, fishing ports, villages, and yachting centers. Maine's famous beaches are in the south, Kennebunk, Old Orchard, York, and Ogunquit. New Hampshire's beaches are Rye and Hampton. Massachusetts has Salisbury, Nahant, Lynn, Revere, Nantasket, and its famous south shore and Cape Cod. Newport and Narragansett in Rhode Island and Ocean Beach in Connecticut are popular.

Lake Winnipesaukee, N. H., large enough for steamships, probably is the best known of the New England lakes. It has speed boats and cruising launches.

Recording the Records

Haydn and Beethoven Featured on Records

...Debussy is fine, much more ...spheric in concept and ...lan another recent perform... ...by the Iturbi's, but the Stray... ...music, despite a clever tran... ...scription, suffers in comparison ...an orchestral version of the ...work (Columbia 1-12" LP).

Andre Kostelanetz and his orchestra play a Gershwin program on a Columbia 12" Green Label LP which includes the "Cuban Overture" highlights from "Porgy and Bess" and the popular "Mine" and "Love Walked In." The trivial "Cuban" work, derivitive and artificial as it is, is well-enough played, but the reverse side is marred by the irritating Kostelanetz orchestral mannerisms, especially the overdone fiddle tones (Columbia 1-12" LP).

A new release on Columbia's low-priced White Label series includes a sparkling and delectable "Polka and Fugue" from "Schwanda, the Bagpipe Player" by WEINBERGER; the atmospheric "Dance of the Seven Veils" from RICHARD STRAUSS' "Salome," delightfully played by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Rubinstein

And finally, on a 12" RCA Victor LP record, Arthur Rubinstein is heard in a splendid performance of CHOPIN'S Polonaises, Vol. 1, Nos. 1 to 6. Nowhere is the maturity of concept, the perfection of technique of this magnificent pianist more apparent than in his playing of Chopin, a fact amply borne out in this beautifully recorded LP disc. A more delightful Chopin performance I can hardly imagine. Highly recommended. —CARL KRAFT.

* * *

Record of the Week—"I Ain't Lazy"-Swing and Sway with Sammy Kaye. For about the first inch of the record, you'd never believe this was Sammy's Hammies. First, somebody lights out with a tenor and then somebody else shoves a vigorous trombone into the scheme of things. Vocal, smooth and less iconoclastic, reverts to the familiar pattern. Record's Kaye's most radical since "Belmont Boogie."

Bunched in one LP album cover are eight of Columbia Records' best sellers under the banner, "Popular Favorites."

Tunes include "Because of You"-"Cold, Cold Heart"-Tony Bennett; "Jealousy"-Frankie Laine; "Down Yonder"-Champ Butler; "Cry"-Johnnie Ray; "Sin"-Sammy Kaye and "Charmaine"-"And So to Sleep Again"-Paul Weston. No need for further comment other than to remark on the startling contortions singers put their vocal chords through these days.

Ray

Other odds and ends:

Male vocal — "Feet of Clay"-Frank Sinatra (a hoked up gypsy narrative); "Ooh-Dahdily-Dah"-Louis Prima (supposed take off on "One o'Clock Jump" that would be improved greatly by more rehearsal.

H. REID.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL
APR 6 1952

Piano Concerto Wins Award for Composer

The Mark M. Horblit award, known as the "Boston Symphony Orchestra award," has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston symphony last November.

The annual award was established in 1946 for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
APR 6 - 1952

Piano Concerto Wins Symphony Award

Lukas Foss's 2nd piano concerto has won the 1951 Mark M. Horblit award. Mr. Foss introduced the work with the Boston Symphony last November, coming from Rome where he has been living on a Prix de Rome scholarship.

The award, known as "the Boston Symphony Merit Award" was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic work by a composer living in the United States.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 6 - 1952

TANGLEWOOD OPERA AUDITIONS AT BOSTON

Boston, April 5 - Boris Goldovsky will hold auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood on Wednesday at Symphony Hall, Boston from 2 to 4 p. m. An accompanist will be present.

The Music Center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 for a six-week session, Charles Munch, director with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame." Catalog and applications for admission may be obtained by addressing the Registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

[118]

Sunday Post. April 6.

Symphony Concert to Have Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus

BY ROSE WALSH

Almost the last chance to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra before it leaves on its great European trek will be afforded music lovers Easter Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock at Symphony Hall. Charles Munch, who will conduct the performance of Bach's Passion according to St. John in the subscription concerts of Holy Week (Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening), will repeat the performance on Sunday to augment the pension fund.

Mr. Munch grew up in the Bach tradition in his native Alsace, where his father, Ernest, and his uncle, Eugene, constantly performed the music of this master in close collaboration with the latter's pupil, Albert Schweitzer.

Thus Boston's noted conductor has established a custom of performing the St. Matthew Passion and the St. John Passion of Bach during Holy Week in alternate years. His performance of the St. John Passion here in his first season two years ago is still remembered.

Although the Thursday and Saturday concerts are fully subscribed, seats may be had for the Sunday pension fund performance.

After months of rehearsal under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth, the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will assist and the soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Mary Davenport, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, bass, and Edmond Murshell, bass.

Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society include Barbara Wheatland, Joanna Bailey, Adrianne M. Knight and Jean Williams Lunn of Cambridge; Anne C. Henry, Joanna Koehler, Jane St. Bride Moynahan and Nancy Megley of Milton; Lois Barth, and Emily Putnam of Brookline.

Also Dorothy Joan Redman of Arlington, Lura Hutchinson of Boston, Edith Millward of Braintree, Barbara Tulloch of Dedham, June Carol Robert of Newton Highlands, Marjorie MacIntosh of Watertown, Barbara Kagan of Winthrop, Noelle B. Blackmer of Andover and Jane Coolidge Whitehill of North Andover.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

APR 6 - 1952

Symphony Members Hit The Musical Highways

MEMBERS of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra will tune up for next season by stringing a musical bridge over the summer and across the country. It will be music as usual for many of the instrumentalists who have booked vacation jobs with other orchestras, concert tours and teaching assignments.

The Indianapolis Orchestra disbanded for the summer after concerts last month.

Ensembles which will benefit from the sharpness of Indianapolis musicians are the Chautauqua Symphony, Chautauqua, N.Y.; the North Carolina Symphony; the Boston Pops Orchestra; the Richmond (Va.) Symphony; the New Orleans Pops Orchestra and others.

THREE SYMPHONY players will teach in Butler University's Jordan College of Music. They are Harpist Mary Spalding, Violinist Mildred Lind and Trombonist Donald H. Holzhausen. Miss Spalding will suspend Indianapolis activities in June either to play at the Arlington Hotel in Hot Springs, Ark., or teach in San Diego (Cal.) State College.

Artist recitals have been scheduled by a number of the musicians. Violist Endel Kalam will spend a busy summer concertizing in Maine and Massachusetts, traveling in Canada and studying at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass.

'Cellist Dzidris Treimanis will join the Latvian Trio for a three-month, coast-to-coast tour. Viktors Ziedonis, Symphony violinist, is also a member of the Latvian Trio.

WILLIAM SHECTMAN, 'cellist, will play concerts in Philadelphia and New York before joining the Pier Orchestra for the Atlantic City (N.J.) Festival.

Indianapolis recruits for the summer Chautauqua Symphony include Violinist Olive Rhodes, who will also study with Mischa Mischakoff, and Trombonist George T. Rhodes, who will study at Jordan and teach at Ball State College until June.

EIGHT LOCAL muscians will be featured during April, May and June with the North Carolina Symphony. They are Norma Jean Olson, 'cello; Gale Bray and Jean Reicherts, double bass; Edamay McCully and Alexander Akacsos, violin; Harriet Peacock, flute; Alan Williams, English horn, and Betty Burnett, viola. After the North Carolina engagement Miss Bray and Miss Reicherts will join Chicago's Grant Park Symphony.

Summer members of the Boston Pops Orchestra will be Fred Heilman, bass, and Kirke Walker, violin. Jack Wulfe, 'cello, will play with the Richmond Symphony, and Robert Currier viola, will be heard with the New Orleans Pops.

Several musicians will change their musical pace for the summer. Trombonist Henry Kulik and Clarinetist Howard Johnson will sound off with the famous Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey Circus Band for 34 weeks. Violist Chris Kuzell will do musical work at the 20th Century-Fox Film Corporation in his native California.

BASS CLARINETIST Harald F. Hansen will direct his own concert ensemble at Marshall House, York Harbor, Me.

Also traveling will be John Burgess, flute, who will join the Baltimore (Md.) City Park band; Keith Harman, clarinetist, a Cincinnati Zoo Opera musician for the summer.

Charles Munch to Conduct Harvard-Radcliffe Choruses at Pension Fund Benefit Easter Day

One of the most widely anticipated concerts of the year will be the performance of J. S. Bach's Passion According to St. John by members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch will conduct the infrequently heard St. John Passion at Symphony Hall at 3 o'clock on Easter Sunday afternoon, and all proceeds will go to the orchestra's pension fund. The special Eastern concert comes a fortnight before the orchestra sails for Europe on April 28.

Bach is a family tradition for Munch, who grew up in Strasbourg, where his father and his uncle at the Conservatoire Nationale de Musique performed the works of Bach more than any other composer consistently.

Soloists for the pension fund benefit are to be Gladys Spector, soprano; Mary Davenport, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, baritone and Edmond Murshell, bass.

The regular weekly concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening as is the usual custom during Good Friday week.

Greater Boston students of Radcliffe who are among those rehearsing for the concert include Barbara Coolidge Whitehill of North Andover, Noelle B. Blackmer of Andover, Barbara [illegible] Anne C. Henry, Jane St. Bride Moynahan, Nancy Megley of Milton, Carroll Barth of Milton, Marjorie MacIntosh of Watertown, Barbara Kagan of Winthrop, Dorothy Joan Redman of Arlington, Lura Hutchinson of Boston, Edith Millward of Braintree and Emily Putnam of Brookline, Barbara Wheatland of Cambridge, Adrianne M. Knight and Jean Williams Lunn, also of Cambridge.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

APR 6 - 1952

Symphony Concert to Have Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus

BY ROSE WALSH

Almost the last chance to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra before it leaves on its great European trek will be afforded music lovers Easter Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock at Symphony Hall. Charles Munch, who will conduct the performance of Bach's Passion according to St. John in the subscription concerts of Holy Week (Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening), will repeat the performance on Sunday to augment the pension fund.

Mr. Munch grew up in the Bach tradition in his native Alsace, where his father, Ernest, and his uncle, Eugene, constantly performed the music of this master in close collaboration with the latter's pupil, Albert Schweitzer.

Thus Boston's noted conductor has established a custom of performing the St. Matthew Passion and the St. John Passion of Bach during Holy Week in alternate years. His performance of the St. John Passion here in his first season two years ago is still remembered.

Although the Thursday and Saturday concerts are fully subscribed, seats may be had for the Sunday pension fund performance.

After months of rehearsal under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth, the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will assist and the soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Mary Davenport, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, bass, and Edmond Murshell, bass.

Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society include Barbara Wheatland, Joanna Bailey, Adrianne M. Knight and Jean Williams Lunn of Cambridge; Anne C. Henry, Joanna Koehler, Jane St. Bride Moynahan and Nancy Megley of Milton; Lois Barth, and Emily Putnam of Brookline.

Also Dorothy Joan Redman of Arlington, Lura Hutchinson of Boston, Edith Millward of Braintree, Barbara Tulloch of Dedham, June Carol Robert of Newton Highlands, Marjorie MacIntosh of Watertown, Barbara Kagan of Winthrop, Noelle B. Blackmer of Andover and Jane Coolidge Whitehill of North Andover.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&T

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MASTERPIECES of the XXTH CENTURY

A Great Cultural Exposition of the Arts of the Free World

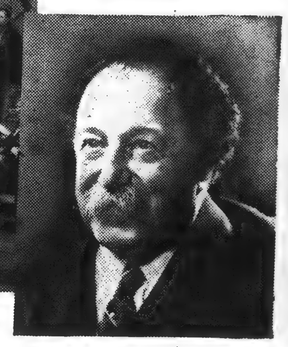
The Paris Exposition, sponsored by The Congress For Cultural Freedom, has for its theme the intellectual and artistic achievements of the free world in the 20th Century. The Exposition will embrace music, the drama, the dance, painting and other art forms as conceived by independent creators exercising the priceless gifts of freedom and self-expression. The Congress for Cultural Freedom is a world-wide organization of writers, philosophers, creative artists and scientists dedicated to the assertion and defense of freedom of thought, free inquiry, free expression and to the continuing expansion of intellectual freedom everywhere.

EXPOSITION COMMITTEE: Director—NICOLAS NABOKOV, New York, Secretary-General of the Congress. General Manager—HERVE DUGARDIN, Paris, Director of Le Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Assistant Manager—MADAME DENISE TUAL, Paris. Treasurer—PIERRE BOLOMEY, Paris. American Chairman—JULIUS FLEISCHMANN, Cincinnati.

PARIS APRIL 30 - JUNE 1, 1952

CHARLES MUNCH
Musical Director

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



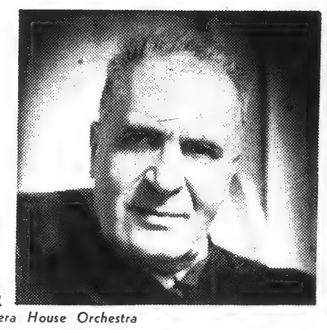
PIERRE MONTEUX
Associate Conductor

THE NEW YORK CITY BALLET COMPANY
GEORGE BALANCHINE
Artistic Director

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Conducts his ballet "Orpheus," [illegible] "Oedipus Rex," an [illegible]

VIRGIL THOMSON
Composer, Artistic Director, Conductor of the Opera

"FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS"



BRUNO WALTER
Conducts Paris Opera House Orchestra

PROGRAM

(SUBJECT TO CHANGE)

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30—at Eglise St. Roch, Paris
Inaugural concert, dedicated to the Memory of all Twentieth Century Victims of Oppression. ST. GUILLAUME CHORUS, Strasbourg, France; Conductor FRITZ MUNCH. LAMOUREUX CONCERTS ORCHESTRA, Paris. "Magnificat" by J. S. Bach. Soloists: RENEE DEFRAITEUR, Soprano; LUCIE RAUH, Contralto; ERNST HAEFLIEGER, Tenor; PIERRE MOLLET, Bass; CHARLES MULLER, Organist. "Stabat Mater" by FRANCIS POULENC. Soloist: GENEVIEVE MOISAN. (First performance in Paris.)

THURSDAY, MAY 1—(No program)

FRIDAY, MAY 2 and SATURDAY, MAY 3
VIENNA STATE OPERA and VIENNA PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA; Conductor KARL BOEHM. "WOZZECK", Opera in three acts by Alban Berg; Libretto by Georg Buechner; Decor by Caspar Neher; Produced by Oscar Fritz Schuh. (The [illegible] Salzburg Festival Production—First Performance in France. [illegible] includes JOSEF HERMANN, CHRISTL GOLTZ, HANS BEIRER, PETER KLEIN, KARL DOENCH, ELEANOR GIFFORD, HEINRICH BENSING.

SUNDAY, MAY 4—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 5
PARIS OPERA HOUSE ORCHESTRA; Conductor BRUNO WALTER. "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss. "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune" by Claude Debussy. "Das Lied von der Erde" by Gustav Mahler. Soloists: KATHLEEN FERRIER, Contralto; LORENZ FEHENBERGER, Tenor.

TUESDAY, MAY 6—at Paris Opera House
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor CHARLES MUNCH, Musical Director. (First Performance in Europe.) Overture, "The School For Scandal" by Samuel Barber. "Toccata" by Walter Piston. "Symphony For String Orchestra," No. 2 by Arthur Honegger. "La Mer" by Claude Debussy. "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2 by Maurice Ravel. Under the Patronage of [illegible] Vincent Auriol, President of France, and Mme. Auriol.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7 and FRIDAY, MAY 9
"DON PERLIMPLIN," Opera in one act by VITTORIO RIETI, Libretto by F. Garcia Lorca; Produced by Yves Robert; Decor by Antoni Clavé. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor PIERRE DERVAUX. (Cast to be announced.) (World Premiere). World Premiere of two ballets by the GRAND BALLET DU MARQUIS DE CUEVAS: "Cordelia," Music by HENRI SAUGUET; Choreography by John Taras; Decor by [illegible] Dupont. "Coup De Feu," Music by GEORGES AURIC; Choreography by Aurel Milloss; Decor by A. M. Cassandre. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor GUSTAVE CLOEZ, Musical Director.

THURSDAY, MAY 8
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor PIERRE MONTEUX. "Symphony No. 3" by William Pijper. "Protée," Suite No. 2 by Darius Milhaud. "Symphony No. 3" by William Schuman. "Le Sacre de Printemps" by Igor Stravinsky.

SATURDAY, MAY 10—at Paris Opera House
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Artistic Director, GEORGE BALANCHINE; Conductor: LEON BARZIN, Musical Director. (First Performance in Paris.) "Swan Lake," Music by Peter Tchaikowsky; Choreography by George Balanchine after Lev Ivanov; Scenery and Costumes by Cecil Beaton. "La Valse," Music by Maurice Ravel; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Karinska. "The Cage," Music by Igor Stravinsky ("Concerto in D for Strings"); Choreography by Jerome Robbins; Costumes by Ruth Sobotka. "Bourrée Fantasque," Music by Emmanuel Chabrier; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Karinska.

NOTE: All events, unless otherwise noted, are at the THEATRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES, 15 Avenue Montaigne, Paris VIII

SUNDAY, MAY 11
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Four Temperaments," Music by Paul Hindemith; Choreography by George Balanchine. "The Cage." "Firebird," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Marc Chagall. "La Valse."

MONDAY, MAY 12
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel," Music by Richard Strauss; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Esteben Frances. "Four Temperaments." "Lilac Garden," Music by Ernest Chausson; Choreography by Antony Tudor; Scenery by Horace Armistead; Costumes by Karinska. "Caracole," Music by W. A. Mozart; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Christian Bérard.

TUESDAY, MAY 13
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel." "Lilac Garden." "Firebird." "La Valse."

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductors LEON BARZIN and IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Prodigal Son," Music by Serge Prokofieff; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Georges Rouault. "The Pied Piper," Music by Aaron Copland; Choreography by Jerome Robbins. "Orphéus," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Isamu Noguchi; Conducted by IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Caracole."

THURSDAY, MAY 15
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "The Pied Piper." "Lilac Garden." "Orpheus." "Caracole."

FRIDAY, MAY 16
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva, Switzerland; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Symphony No. 5" by Arthur Honegger. "Nobilissima Visione" by Paul Hindemith. "Sonata di Camera for Violoncello and Orchestra" by Bohuslav Martinu; Soloist: HENRI HONEGGER, 'cellist. "Rhapsodie Espagnole" by Maurice Ravel.

SATURDAY, MAY 17
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Suite in F" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" by Frank Martin; Soloist: JOSEPH SZIGETI, Violinist. (First Performance in France.) "Trois Images" by Claude Debussy.

SUNDAY, MAY 18—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 19
FRENCH NATIONAL RADIO ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Scènes de Ballet" by Igor Stravinsky; and "OEDIPUS REX," Opera-Oratorio in two parts by IGOR STRAVINSKY. Text by Jean Cocteau, after the play by Sophocles, translated into medieval Latin by J. Danielou. Decor by Jean Cocteau. Staged by Jean Cocteau. Narration: JEAN COCTEAU. Soloists: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; LEOPOLD SIMONEAU, Tenor; 80-voice Male Chorus.

TUESDAY, MAY 20
FRENCH NATIONAL RADIO ORCHESTRA; Conductor HANS ROSBAUD. "Erwartung" by Arnold Schoenberg; Soloist: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; and "OEDIPUS REX," Narration: JEAN COCTEAU. Soloists: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; LEOPOLD SIMONEAU, Tenor; 80-Voice Male Chorus.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor CHARLES MUNCH, Musical Director. "Symphony No. 4" by Robert Schumann. "Bacchus et Ariane" by Albert Roussel. "Symphonie Fantastique" by Hector Berlioz.

THURSDAY, MAY 22
PARIS CONSERVATORY ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Symphony in C" by Igor Stravinsky. "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra" by Igor Stravinsky; Soloist: MONIQUE HAAS, Pianist. "Symphony in Three Movements" by Igor Stravinsky.

FRIDAY, MAY 23
R.I.A.S. (Radio in American Sector) SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin, Germany; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" by Béla Bartók. "Concerto No. 2 for Piano" by Béla Bartók; Soloist: GEZA ANDA, Pianist. "Roumanian Dances" by Béla Bartók.

SATURDAY, MAY 24
R.I.A.S. SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. Program devoted to works by contemporary Soviet composers which now are not performed in the U.S.S.R. and satellite nations, and by contemporary German composers which were banned by Nazi Germany. "Variations on a Theme by Paganini" by Boris Blacher. "Scythian Suite, Op. 20" by Serge Prokofieff. Concert Suite from "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," Opera by Dmitri Shostakovitch. "Metamorphosis" by Paul Hindemith.

SUNDAY, MAY 25—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 26 and TUESDAY, MAY 27
ROYAL OPERA HOUSE, COVENT GARDEN, London, England production of "BILLY BUDD," Opera in four acts; Music by Benjamin Britten; Libretto by E. M. Forster and Eric Crozier after the story by Herman Melville; Scenery and Costumes by John Piper; Produced by Basil Coleman. With singers, chorus and orchestra of The Covent Garden Opera Company. (In English.) Conducted by BENJAMIN BRITTEN. (First Performance in France.) Cast includes THEODOR UPPMAN, PETER PEARS, FREDERICK DALBERG, INIA TE WIATA, DAVID TROO.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome, Italy; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Paganiniana" by Alfred Cassella. "Canti di Prigionia" by Luigi Dallapiccola. Dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" by Manuel de Falla. "Les Choéphores" by Darius Milhaud. Finale, "Les Eumenides" by Darius Milhaud.

THURSDAY, MAY 29
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Turandot" Suite, Op. 41 by Ferruccio Busoni. "La Terra" by G. Francesco Malipiero. "Bacchus et Ariane" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Piano" by Maurice Ravel; Soloist: BENVENUTO MICHELANGELI, Pianist. "Psalmus Hungaricus" (55th Psalm), Op. 13 by Zoltán Kodaly.

FRIDAY, MAY 30 and SATURDAY, MAY 31
ETHEL LINDER REINER presents THE AMERICAN NATIONAL THEATRE AND ACADEMY production of "FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS," Opera in four acts. Music by Virgil Thomson; Words by Gertrude Stein; Artistic and Musical Direction, Virgil Thomson; Associate Conductor and Director of Choral Music, William Johnson; Scenery and Costumes by Paul Morrison, after original designs by Florine Stettheimer; Choreography by William Dollar; Direction of the Book by Maurice Grosser. (In English.) L'ORCHESTRA COLONNE; Conductor VIRGIL THOMSON (First Performance in France.) Cast includes INEZ MATTHEWS, EDWARD MATTHEWS, RAWN SPEARMAN, ELWOOD SMITH, ALTONELL HINES.

SUNDAY, JUNE 1—At the Theatre du Palais de Chaillot LAMOUREUX CONCERTS ORCHESTRA, Paris; Conductor, PIERRE MONTEUX. Soloist: NICOLE HENRIOT, Pianist. (Light classical program at popular prices, to be announced.)

Other Events

ART—at the Pavillon de New York, Musee de l'Art Moderne
A great exhibition of some 150 Twentieth Century paintings by European and American artists, from museums and private collections in Europe and the United States, assembled by JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY, art critic and author, and former director of the Museum of Modern Art, New York. Will include many paintings not seen in Paris for many years. Opens Monday, May 5.

OPERA—at Paris Opera House
FRIDAY, MAY 16—"ANTIGONE" and "JEANNE AU BUCHER," Operas by Arthur Honegger.
FRIDAY, MAY 23 and MONDAY, MAY 26—"SALOME," Opera by Richard Strauss.

OPERA—at Paris Opera-Comique
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, THURSDAY, MAY 8, and THURSDAY, MAY 22—"PELLEAS ET MELISANDE," Opera by Claude Debussy.
THURSDAY, MAY 15—"MADAME BOVARY," Opera by EMMANUEL BONDEVILLE
THURSDAY, MAY 29—Festival of Opera by MAURICE RAVEL.

CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS—5:30 p.m. at Comedie de Champs-Elysees
WEDNESDAY, MAY 7—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloists: GENEVIEVE JOY, Pianist; PIERRE BOULEZ and OLIVIER MESSIAEN, Duo-Pianists; YVON LE MARC'HADOUR, Tenor.
FRIDAY, MAY 9—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: YVONNE LORIOD, Pianist; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.
TUESDAY, MAY 13—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: GISELA FISCHER, Soprano; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.
THURSDAY, MAY 15—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloist: YVONNE LEFEBVRE, Pianist.
WEDNESDAY, MAY 21—DARIUS MILHAUD conducting "Socrates," Symphonie Drama in three parts by Erik Satie. Also HUBERT VARRON, 'Cellist; ROBERT CORNMAN, Pianist.
SATURDAY, MAY 24—BERLIN STRING QUARTET; Conductor ROBERT CROFT. Soloist: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano.
THURSDAY, MAY 29—NEDERLANDS KAMERKOOR; Conductor FELIX DE NOBEL. Soloist: YVON LE MARC'HADOUR, Tenor.

LITERATURE, PHILOSOPHY, POETRY—at the Sorbonne: THURSDAY, MAY 15, AND FRIDAY, MAY 30—at Le Centre des Relations Internationales: WEDNESDAY, MAY 21; FRIDAY, MAY 23; MONDAY, MAY 26; WEDNESDAY, MAY 28. Lectures and Discussion Forums by world-celebrated men of letters, including: WILLIAM FAULKNER, W. H. AUDEN, JAMES T. FARRELL, KATHERINE ANNE PORTER, GLENWAY WESCOTT, ALLEN TATE, ANDRE MALRAUX, IGNAZIO SILONE, STEPHEN SPENDER, SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA.

CHURCH CONCERTS of ROMAN CATHOLIC, PROTESTANT, JEWISH MUSIC.

TICKETS ARE NOW ON SALE

FOR FULL INFORMATION WRITE OR TELEPHONE

Congress For Cultural Freedom

EXPOSITION HEADQUARTERS
Théâtre des Champs-Elysées,
15 Avenue Montaigne, PARIS VIII • Telephone: ELysées 72-42

The American Committee for Cultural Freedom, Inc.
35 West 53rd Street, New York 20, N. Y. Telephone JUdson 6-1132

Tickets may be ordered through all offices in Europe and the United States of

AMERICAN EXPRESS

PARIS: 11, Rue Scribe, Paris VIII • Telephone: Opéra 42-90 || LONDON: 6 Haymarket, London, S.W.1. • Telephone WHitehall 44-11
NEW YORK: 65 Broadway, New York 6, N. Y. • Telephone: WHitehall 4-2000.
649 Fifth Ave., New York 22, N. Y. • Telephone: PLaza 9-7400.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MASTERPIECES of the XXth CENTURY

A Great Cultural Exposition of the Arts of the Free World

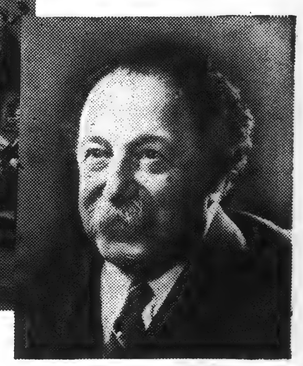
The Paris Exposition, sponsored by The Congress For Cultural Freedom, has for its theme the intellectual and artistic achievements of the free world in the 20th Century. The Exposition will embrace music, the drama, the dance, painting and other art forms as conceived by independent creators exercising the priceless gifts of freedom and self-expression. The Congress for Cultural Freedom is a world-wide organization of writers, philosophers, creative artists and scientists dedicated to the assertion and defense of freedom of thought, free inquiry, free expression and to the continuing expansion of intellectual freedom everywhere.

EXPOSITION COMMITTEE: Director—NICOLAS NABOKOV, New York, Secretary-General of the Congress. General Manager—HERVE DUGARDIN, Paris, Director of Le Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Assistant Manager—MADAME DENISE TUAL, Paris. Treasurer—PIERRE BOLOMEY, Paris. American Chairman—JULIUS FLEISCHMANN, Cincinnati.

PARIS APRIL 30 - JUNE 1, 1952

CHARLES MUNCH
Musical Director

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



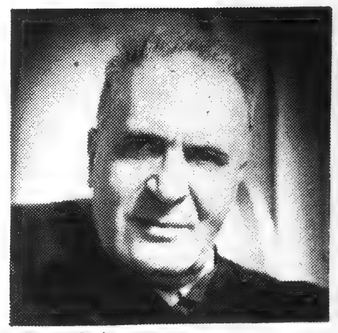
PIERRE MONTEUX
Associate Conductor

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Conducts his ballet "Orpheus," his oratorio "Oedipus Rex," an all-Stravinsky [illegible]

THE NEW YORK CITY BALLET COMPANY
GEORGE BALANCHINE
Artistic Director

VIRGIL THOMSON
Composer, Artistic Director, Conductor of the Opera

"FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS"



BRUNO WALTER
Conducts Paris Opera House Orchestra

PROGRAM
(SUBJECT TO CHANGE)

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30—at Eglise St. Roch, Paris
Inaugural concert, dedicated to the Memory of all Twentieth Century Victims of Oppression. ST. GUILLAUME CHORUS, Strasbourg, France; Conductor FRITZ MUNCH. LAMOUREUX CONCERTS ORCHESTRA, Paris. "Magnificat" by J. S. Bach. Soloists: RENEE DEFRAITEUR, Soprano; LUCIE RAUH, Contralto; ERNST HAEFLIEGER, Tenor; PIERRE MOLLET, Bass; CHARLES MULLER, Organist. "Stabat Mater" by FRANCIS POULENC. Soloist: GENEVIEVE MOISAN. (First performance in Paris.)

THURSDAY, MAY 1—(No program)

FRIDAY, MAY 2 and SATURDAY, MAY 3
VIENNA STATE OPERA and VIENNA PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA; Conductor KARL BOEHM. "WOZZECK", Opera in three acts by Alban Berg; Libretto by Georg Buechner; Decor by Caspar Neher; Produced by Oscar Fritz Schuh. (The 1951 Salzburg Festival Production—First Performance in France. Cast includes: JOSEF HERMANN, CHRISTL GOLTZ, HANS BEIRER, PETER KLEIN, KARL DOENCH, ELEANOR GIFFORD, HEINRICH BENSING.

SUNDAY, MAY 4—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 5
PARIS OPERA HOUSE ORCHESTRA; Conductor BRUNO WALTER. "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss. "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune" by Claude Debussy. "Das Lied von der Erde" by Gustav Mahler. Soloists: KATHLEEN FERRIER, Contralto; LORENZ FEHENBERGER, Tenor.

TUESDAY, MAY 6—at Paris Opera House
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor CHARLES MUNCH, Musical Director. (First Performance in Europe.) Overture, "The School For Scandal" by Samuel Barber. "Toccata" by Walter Piston. "Symphony For String Orchestra," No. 2 by Arthur Honegger. "La Mer" by Claude Debussy. "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2 by Maurice Ravel. Under the Patronage of Hon. Vincent Auriol, President of France, and Mme. Auriol.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7 and FRIDAY, MAY 9
"DON PERLIMPLIN," Opera in one act by VITTORIO RIETI; Libretto by F. Garcia Lorca; Produced by Yves Robert; Decor by Antoni Clavé. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor PIERRE DERVAUX. (Cast to be announced.) (World Premiere). World Premiere of two ballets by the GRAND BALLET DU MARQUIS DE CUEVAS: "Cordelia," Music by HENRI SAUGUET; Choreography by John Taras; Decor by Jacques Dupont. "Coup De Feu," Music by GEORGES AURIC; Choreography by Aurel Milloss; Decor by A. M. Cassandre. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor GUSTAVE CLOEZ, Musical Director.

NOTE: All events, unless otherwise noted, are at the THEATRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES, 15 Avenue Montaigne, Paris VIII

SUNDAY, MAY 11
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Four Temperaments," Music by Paul Hindemith; Choreography by George Balanchine. "The Cage." "Firebird," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Marc Chagall. "La Valse."

MONDAY, MAY 12
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel," Music by Richard Strauss; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Esteben Frances. "Four Temperaments." "Lilac Garden," Music by Ernest Chausson; Choreography by Antony Tudor; Scenery by Horace Armistead; Costumes by Karinska. "Caracole," Music by W. A. Mozart; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Christian Bérard.

TUESDAY, MAY 13
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel." "Lilac Garden." "Firebird." "La Valse."

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductors LEON BARZIN and IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Prodigal Son," Music by Serge Prokofieff; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Georges Rouault. "The Pied Piper," Music by Aaron Copland; Choreography by Jerome Robbins. "Orphéus," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Isamu Noguchi; Conducted by IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Caracole."

THURSDAY, MAY 15
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "The Pied Piper." "Lilac Garden." "Orpheus." "Caracole."

FRIDAY, MAY 16
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva, Switzerland; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Symphony No. 5" by Arthur Honegger. "Nobilissima Visione" by Paul Hindemith. "Sonata di Camera for Violoncello and Orchestra" by Bohuslav Martinu; Soloist: HENRI HONEGGER, 'cellist. "Rhapsodie Espagnole" by Maurice Ravel.

SATURDAY, MAY 17
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Suite in F" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" by Frank Martin; Soloist: JOSEPH SZIGETI, Violinist. (First Performance in France.) "Trois Images" by Claude Debussy.

SUNDAY, MAY 18—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 19
FRENCH NATIONAL RADIO ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Scènes de Ballet" by Igor Stravinsky; and "OEDIPUS REX," Opera-Oratorio in two parts by IGOR STRAVINSKY. Text by Jean Cocteau after the play by

THURSDAY, MAY 22
PARIS CONSERVATORY ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Symphony in C" by Igor Stravinsky. "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra" by Igor Stravinsky; Soloist: MONIQUE HAAS, Pianist. "Symphony in Three Movements" by Igor Stravinsky.

FRIDAY, MAY 23
R.I.A.S. (Radio in American Sector) SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin, Germany; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" by Béla Bartók. "Concerto No. 2 for Piano" by Béla Bartók; Soloist: GEZA ANDA, Pianist. "Roumanian Dances" by Béla Bartók.

SATURDAY, MAY 24
R.I.A.S. SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. Program devoted to works by contemporary Soviet composers which now are not performed in the U.S.S.R. and satellite nations, and by contemporary German composers which were banned by Nazi Germany. "Variations on a Theme by Paganini" by Boris Blacher. "Scythian Suite, Op. 20" by Serge Prokofieff. Concert Suite from "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," Opera by Dmitri Shostakovitch. "Metamorphosis" by Paul Hindemith.

SUNDAY, MAY 25—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 26 and TUESDAY, MAY 27
ROYAL OPERA HOUSE, COVENT GARDEN, London, England production of "BILLY BUDD," Opera in four acts; Music by Benjamin Britten; Libretto by E. M. Forster and Eric Crozier after the story by Herman Melville; Scenery and Costumes by John Piper; Produced by Basil Coleman. With singers, chorus and orchestra of The Covent Garden Opera Company. (In English.) Conducted by BENJAMIN BRITTEN. (First Performance in France.) Cast includes THEODOR UPPMAN, PETER PEARS, FREDERICK DALBERG, INIA TE WIATA, DAVID TROO.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome, Italy; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Paganiniana" by Alfred Casella. "Canti di Prigionia" by Luigi Dallapiccola. Dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" by Manuel de Falla. "Les Choéphores" by Darius Milhaud. Finale, "Les Eumenides" by Darius Milhaud.

THURSDAY, MAY 29
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Turandot" Suite, Op. 41 by Ferruccio Busoni. "La Terre" by G. Francesco Malipiero. "Bacchus et Ariane" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Piano" by Maurice Ravel; Soloist: BENVENUTO MICHELANGELI, Pianist. "Psalmus Hungaricus" (55th Psalm), Op. 13 by Zoltán Kodaly.

FRIDAY, MAY 30 and SATURDAY, MAY 31
ETHEL LINDER REINER presents THE AMERICAN

Other Events

ART—at the Pavillon de New York, Musee de l'Art Moderne
A great exhibition of some 150 Twentieth Century paintings by European and American artists, from museums and private collections in Europe and the United States, assembled by JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY, art critic and author, and former director of the Museum of Modern Art, New York. Will include many paintings not seen in Paris for many years. Opens Monday, May 5.

OPERA—at Paris Opera House
FRIDAY, MAY 16—"ANTIGONE" and "JEANNE AU BUCHER," Operas by Arthur Honegger.

FRIDAY, MAY 23 and MONDAY, MAY 26—"SALOME," Opera by Richard Strauss.

OPERA—at Paris Opera-Comique
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, THURSDAY, MAY 8, and THURSDAY, MAY 22—"PELLEAS ET MELISANDE," Opera by Claude Debussy.

THURSDAY, MAY 15—"MADAME BOVARY," Opera by EMMANUEL BONDEVILLE

THURSDAY, MAY 29—Festival of Opera by MAURICE RAVEL.

CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS—5:30 p.m. at Comedie de Champs-Elysees

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloists: GENEVIEVE JOY, Pianist; PIERRE BOULEZ and OLIVIER MESSIAEN, Duo-Pianists; YVON LE MARC'HADOUR, Tenor.

FRIDAY, MAY 9—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: YVONNE LORIOD, Pianist; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.

TUESDAY, MAY 13—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: GISELA FISCHER, Soprano; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.

THURSDAY, MAY 15—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloist: YVONNE LEFEBVRE, Pianist.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21—DARIUS MILHAUD conducting "Socrates," Symphonic Drama in three parts by Erik Satie. Also HUBERT VARRON, 'Cellist; ROBERT CORNMAN, Pianist.

SATURDAY, MAY 24—BERLIN STRING QUARTET; Conductor ROBERT CROFT. Soloist: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano.

THURSDAY, MAY 29—NEDERLANDS KAMERKOOR; Conductor FELIX DE NOBEL. Soloist: YVON LE MARC'HADOUR.

MASTERPIECES of the XXTH CENTURY

A Great Cultural Exposition of the Arts of the Free World

The Paris Exposition, sponsored by The Congress For Cultural Freedom, has for its theme the intellectual and artistic achievements of the free world in the 20th Century. The Exposition will embrace music, the drama, the dance, painting and other art forms as conceived by independent creators exercising the priceless gifts of freedom and self-expression. The Congress for Cultural Freedom is a world-wide organization of writers, philosophers, creative artists and scientists dedicated to the assertion and defense of freedom of thought, free inquiry, free expression and to the continuing expansion of intellectual freedom everywhere.

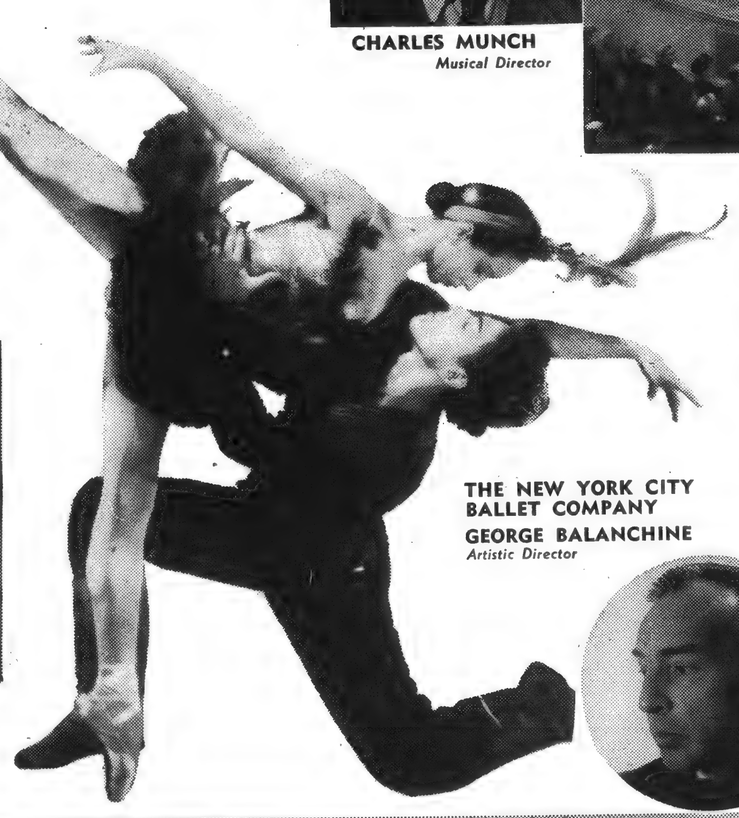
EXPOSITION COMMITTEE: Director—NICOLAS NABOKOV, New York, Secretary-General of the Congress. General Manager—HERVE DUGARDIN, Paris, Director of Le Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Assistant Manager—MADAME DENISE TUAL, Paris. Treasurer—PIERRE BOLOMEY, Paris. American Chairman—JULIUS FLEISCHMANN, Cincinnati.

PARIS APRIL 30 - JUNE 1, 1952

CHARLES MUNCH
Musical Director

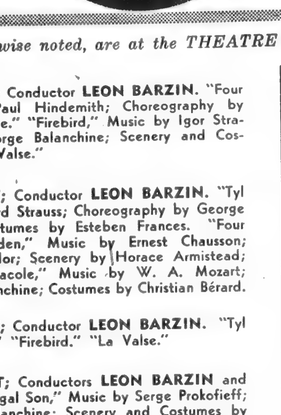
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX
Associate Conductor



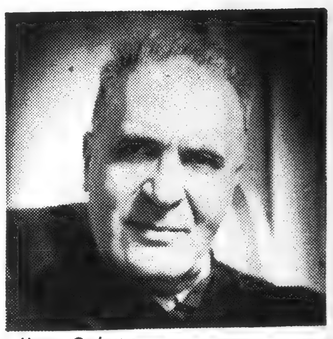
THE NEW YORK CITY BALLET COMPANY
GEORGE BALANCHINE
Artistic Director

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Conducts his ballet "Orpheus," his oratorio "Oedipus Rex," an all-Stravinsky concert



VIRGIL THOMSON
Composer, Artistic Director, Conductor of the Opera

"FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS"



BRUNO WALTER
Conducts Paris Opera House Orchestra

PROGRAM

(SUBJECT TO CHANGE)

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30—at Eglise St. Roch, Paris
Inaugural concert, dedicated to the Memory of all Twentieth Century Victims of Oppression. ST. GUILLAUME CHORUS, Strasbourg, France; Conductor FRITZ MUNCH. LAMOUREUX CONCERTS ORCHESTRA, Paris. "Magnificat" by J. S. Bach. Soloists: RENEE DEFRAITEUR, Soprano; LUCIE RAUH, Contralto; ERNST HAEFLIEGER, Tenor; PIERRE MOLLET, Bass; CHARLES MULLER, Organist. "Stabat Mater" by FRANCIS POULENC. Soloist: GENEVIEVE MOISAN. (First performance in Paris.)

THURSDAY, MAY 1—(No program)

FRIDAY, MAY 2 and SATURDAY, MAY 3
VIENNA STATE OPERA and VIENNA PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA; Conductor KARL BOEHM. "WOZZECK", Opera in three acts by Alban Berg; Libretto by Georg Buechner; Decor by Caspar Neher; Produced by Oscar Fritz Schuh. (The 1951 Salzburg Festival Production—First Performance in France. Cast includes JOSEF HERMANN, CHRISTL GOLTZ, HANS BEIRER, PETER KLEIN, KARL DOENCH, ELEANOR GIFFORD, HEINRICH BENSING.

SUNDAY, MAY 4—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 5
PARIS OPERA HOUSE ORCHESTRA; Conductor BRUNO WALTER. "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss. "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune" by Claude Debussy. "Das Lied von der Erde" by Gustav Mahler. Soloists: KATHLEEN FERRIER, Contralto; LORENZ FEHENBERGER, Tenor.

TUESDAY, MAY 6—at Paris Opera House
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor CHARLES MUNCH, Musical Director. (First Performance in Europe.) Overture, "The School For Scandal" by Samuel Barber. "Toccata" by Walter Piston. "Symphony For String Orchestra," No. 2 by Arthur Honegger. "La Mer" by Claude Debussy. "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2 by Maurice Ravel. Under the Patronage of Hon. Vincent Auriol, President of France, and Mme. Auriol.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7 and FRIDAY, MAY 9
"DON PERLIMPLIN," Opera in one act by VITTORIO RIETI; Libretto by F. Garcia Lorca; Produced by Yves Robert; Decor by Antoni Clavé. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor PIERRE DERVAUX. (Cast to be announced.) (World Premiere). World Premiere of two ballets by the GRAND BALLET DU MARQUIS DE CUEVAS: "Cordelia," Music by HENRI SAUGUET; Choreography by John Taras; Decor by Jacques Dupont. "Coup De Feu," Music by GEORGES AURIC; Choreography by Aurel Miloss; Decor by A. M. Cassandre. L'ORCHESTRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES; Conductor GUSTAVE CLOEZ, Musical Director.

THURSDAY, MAY 8
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor PIERRE MONTEUX. "Symphony No. 3" by William Piper. "Protée," Suite No. 2 by Darius Milhaud. "Symphony No. 3" by William Schuman. "Le Sacre de Printemps" by Igor Stravinsky.

SATURDAY, MAY 10—at Paris Opera House
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Artistic Director, GEORGE BALANCHINE; Conductor: LEON BARZIN, Musical Director. (First Performance in Paris.) "Swan Lake," Music by Peter Tchaikowsky; Choreography by George Balanchine after Lev Ivanov; Scenery and Costumes by Cecil Beaton. "La Valse," Music by Maurice Ravel; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Karinska. "The Cage," Music by Igor Stravinsky ("Concerto in D for Strings"); Choreography by Jerome Robbins; Costumes by Ruth Sobotka. "Bourrée Fantasque," Music by Emmanuel Chabrier; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Karinska.

NOTE: All events, unless otherwise noted, are at the THEATRE DES CHAMPS-ELYSEES, 15 Avenue Montaigne, Paris VIII

SUNDAY, MAY 11
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Four Temperaments," Music by Paul Hindemith; Choreography by George Balanchine. "The Cage." "Firebird," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Marc Chagall. "La Valse."

MONDAY, MAY 12
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel," Music by Richard Strauss; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Esteben Frances. "Four Temperaments." "Lilac Garden," Music by Ernest Chausson; Choreography by Antony Tudor; Scenery by Horace Armistead; Costumes by Karinska. "Caracole," Music by W. A. Mozart; Choreography by George Balanchine; Costumes by Christian Bérard.

TUESDAY, MAY 13
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "Tyl Ulenspiegel." "Lilac Garden." "Firebird." "La Valse."

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductors LEON BARZIN and IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Prodigal Son," Music by Serge Prokofieff; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Georges Rouault. "The Pied Piper," Music by Aaron Copland; Choreography by Jerome Robbins. "Orphéus," Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by George Balanchine; Scenery and Costumes by Isamu Noguchi; Conducted by IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Caracole."

THURSDAY, MAY 15
NEW YORK CITY BALLET; Conductor LEON BARZIN. "The Pied Piper." "Lilac Garden." "Orpheus." "Caracole."

FRIDAY, MAY 16
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva, Switzerland; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Symphony No. 5" by Arthur Honegger. "Nobilissima Visione" by Paul Hindemith. "Sonata di Camera for Violoncello and Orchestra" by Bohuslav Martinu; Soloist: HENRI HONEGGER, 'cellist. "Rhapsodie Espagnole" by Maurice Ravel.

SATURDAY, MAY 17
L'ORCHESTRE DE LA SUISSE ROMANDE, Geneva; Conductor ERNEST ANSERMET. "Suite in F" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" by Frank Martin; Soloist: JOSEPH SZIGETI, Violinist. (First Performance in France.) "Trois Images" by Claude Debussy.

SUNDAY, MAY 18—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 19
FRENCH NATIONAL RADIO ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Scènes de Ballet" by Igor Stravinsky; and "OEDIPUS REX," Opera-Oratorio in two parts by IGOR STRAVINSKY. Text by Jean Cocteau, after the play by Sophocles, translated into medieval Latin by J. Danielou. Decor by Jean Cocteau. Staged by Jean Cocteau. Narration: JEAN COCTEAU. Soloists: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; LEOPOLD SIMONEAU, Tenor; 80-voice Male Chorus.

TUESDAY, MAY 20
FRENCH NATIONAL RADIO ORCHESTRA; Conductor HANS ROSBAUD. "Erwartung" by Arnold Schoenberg; Soloist: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; and "OEDIPUS REX," Narration: JEAN COCTEAU. Soloists: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano; LEOPOLD SIMONEAU, Tenor; 80-Voice Male Chorus.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Conductor CHARLES MUNCH, Musical Director. "Symphony No. 4" by Robert Schumann. "Bacchus et Ariane" by Albert Roussel. "Symphonie Fantastique" by Hector Berlioz.

THURSDAY, MAY 22
PARIS CONSERVATORY ORCHESTRA; Conductor IGOR STRAVINSKY. "Symphony in C" by Igor Stravinsky. "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra" by Igor Stravinsky; Soloist: MONIQUE HAAS, Pianist. "Symphony in Three Movements" by Igor Stravinsky.

FRIDAY, MAY 23
R.I.A.S. (Radio in American Sector) SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin, Germany; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" by Béla Bartók. "Concerto No. 2 for Piano" by Béla Bartók; Soloist: GEZA ANDA, Pianist. "Roumanian Dances" by Béla Bartók.

SATURDAY, MAY 24
R.I.A.S. SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, West Berlin; Conductor FERENC FRICSAY. Program devoted to works by contemporary Soviet composers which now are not performed in the U.S.S.R. and satellite nations, and by contemporary German composers which were banned by Nazi Germany. "Variations on a Theme by Paganini" by Boris Blacher. "Scythian Suite, Op. 20" by Serge Prokofieff. Concert Suite from "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," Opera by Dmitri Shostakovitch. "Metamorphosis" by Paul Hindemith.

SUNDAY, MAY 25—(No program)

MONDAY, MAY 26 and TUESDAY, MAY 27
ROYAL OPERA HOUSE, COVENT GARDEN, London, England production of "BILLY BUDD," Opera in four acts; Music by Benjamin Britten; Libretto by E. M. Forster and Eric Crozier after the story by Herman Melville; Scenery and Costumes by John Piper; Produced by Basil Coleman. With singers, chorus and orchestra of The Covent Garden Opera Company. (In English.) Conducted by BENJAMIN BRITTEN. (First Performance in France.) Cast includes THEODOR UPPMAN, PETER PEARS, FREDERICK DALBERG, INIA TE WIATA, DAVID TROO.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome, Italy; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Paganiniana" by Alfred Casella. "Canti di Prigionia" by Luigi Dallapiccola. Dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" by Manuel de Falla. "Les Choéphores" by Darius Milhaud. Finale, "Les Eumenides" by Darius Milhaud.

THURSDAY, MAY 29
ORCHESTRA and CHORUS of ST. CECILIA ACADEMY, Rome; Conductor IGOR MARKEVITCH. "Turandot" Suite, Op. 41 by Ferruccio Busoni. "La Terra" by G. Francesco Malipiero. "Bacchus et Ariane" by Albert Roussel. "Concerto for Piano" by Maurice Ravel; Soloist: BENVENUTO MICHELANGELI, Pianist. "Psalmus Hungaricus" (55th Psalm), Op. 13 by Zoltán Kodaly.

FRIDAY, MAY 30 and SATURDAY, MAY 31
ETHEL LINDER REINER presents THE AMERICAN NATIONAL THEATRE AND ACADEMY production of "FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS," Opera in four acts. Music by Virgil Thomson; Words by Gertrude Stein; Artistic and Musical Direction, Virgil Thomson; Associate Conductor and Director of Choral Music, William Johnson; Scenery and Costumes by Paul Morrison, after original designs by Florine Stettheimer; Choreography by William Dollar; Direction of the Book by Maurice Grosser. (In English.) L'ORCHESTRA COLONNE; Conductor VIRGIL THOMSON (First Performance in France.) Cast includes INEZ MATTHEWS, EDWARD MATTHEWS, RAWN SPEARMAN, ELWOOD SMITH, ALTONELL HINES.

SUNDAY, JUNE 1—At the Theatre du Palais de Chaillot
LAMOUREUX CONCERTS ORCHESTRA, Paris; Conductor, PIERRE MONTEUX. Soloist: NICOLE HENRIOT, Pianist. (Light classical program at popular prices, to be announced.)

Other Events

ART—at the Pavillon de New York, Musee de l'Art Moderne
A great exhibition of some 150 Twentieth Century paintings by European and American artists, from museums and private collections in Europe and the United States, assembled by JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY, art critic and author, and former director of the Museum of Modern Art, New York. Will include many paintings not seen in Paris for many years. Opens Monday, May 5.

OPERA—at Paris Opera House
FRIDAY, MAY 16—"ANTIGONE" and "JEANNE AU BUCHER," Operas by Arthur Honegger.

FRIDAY, MAY 23 and MONDAY, MAY 26—"SALOME," Opera by Richard Strauss.

OPERA—at Paris Opera-Comique
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, THURSDAY, MAY 8, and THURSDAY, MAY 22—"PELLEAS ET MELISANDE," Opera by Claude Debussy.

THURSDAY, MAY 15—"MADAME BOVARY," Opera by EMMANUEL BONDEVILLE

THURSDAY, MAY 29—Festival of Opera by MAURICE RAVEL.

CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS—5:30 p.m. at Comedie de Champs-Elysees
WEDNESDAY, MAY 7—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloists: GENEVIEVE JOY, Pianist; PIERRE BOULEZ and OLIVIER MESSIAEN, Duo-Pianists; YVON LE MARC'HADOUR, Tenor.

FRIDAY, MAY 9—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: YVONNE LORIOD, Pianist; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.

TUESDAY, MAY 13—LOUIS DE FROMET CHAMBER ORCHESTRA. Soloists: GISELA FISCHER, Soprano; MARCEL DE LACOUR, Clavichord.

THURSDAY, MAY 15—PASCAL STRING QUARTET. Soloist: YVONNE LEFEBVRE, Pianist.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21—DARIUS MILHAUD conducting "Socrates," Symphonie Drama in three parts by Erik Satie. Also HUBERT VARRON, 'Cellist; ROBERT CORNMAN, Pianist.

SATURDAY, MAY 24—BERLIN STRING QUARTET; Conductor ROBERT CROFT. Soloist: PATRICIA NEWAY, Soprano.

THURSDAY, MAY 29—NEDERLANDS KAMERKOOR; Conductor FELIX DE NOBEL. Soloist: YVON LE MARC'HADOUR, Tenor.

LITERATURE. PHILOSOPHY, POETRY—at the Sorbonne: THURSDAY, MAY 15, AND FRIDAY, MAY 30—at Le Centre des Relations Internationales: WEDNESDAY, MAY 21; FRIDAY, MAY 23; MONDAY, MAY 26; WEDNESDAY, MAY 28. Lectures and Discussion Forums by world-celebrated men of letters, including: WILLIAM FAULKNER, W. H. AUDEN, JAMES T. FARRELL, KATHERINE ANNE PORTER, GLENWAY WESCOTT, ALLEN TATE, ANDRE MALRAUX, IGNAZIO SILONE, STEPHEN SPENDER, SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA.

CHURCH CONCERTS of ROMAN CATHOLIC, PROTESTANT, JEWISH MUSIC.

TICKETS ARE NOW ON SALE

FOR FULL INFORMATION WRITE OR TELEPHONE

Congress For Cultural Freedom

EXPOSITION HEADQUARTERS
Théâtre des Champs-Elysées,
15 Avenue Montaigne, PARIS VIII • Telephone: ELysées 72-42

The American Committee for Cultural Freedom, Inc.
35 West 53rd Street, New York 20, N. Y. Telephone JUdson 6-1132

Tickets may be ordered through all offices in Europe and the United States of

AMERICAN EXPRESS

PARIS: 11, Rue Scribe, Paris VIII • Telephone: Opéra 42-90 || LONDON: 6 Haymarket, London, S.W.1. • Telephone WHitehall 44-11
NEW YORK: 65 Broadway, New York 6, N. Y. • Telephone: WHitehall 4-2000.
649 Fifth Ave., New York 22, N. Y. • Telephone: PLaza 9-7400.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
APR 7- 1952

Berkshire Auditions

Boris Goldovsky will hold auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood this Wednesday, at Symphony Hall, from 2 to 4 P. M. Please use the Stage Door Entrance.

An accompanist will be present.

The Music Center's tenth season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 for a six-week session, Charles Munch, director with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Adriadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame." Catalogue and applications for admission may be obtained by addressing the Registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

MUSIC

Amil 8
Globe

Burgin Conducts 21st Symphony Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin conducted the 21st Friday concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program consisted of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6, No. 10; the "Chout" Suite of Prokofieff, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps it was the warm, heavy air of sudden Spring, but this concert seemed on the lacklustre and soporific side. True, Handel's lovely piece for strings went nicely, with a satisfying richness and sweetness of tone, and clean execution. But there was little intensity in the first half of the program, and even Prokofieff's once horrendously violent music was relatively innocuous.

Things perked up a bit, however, with the advent of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony. While there was a certain amount of untidy detail here and there, including entrances which caught some of the orchestra a shade off the beat, Mr. Burgin made a good deal of Tchaikovsky's Slavic melancholy. His pace, however, was on the fast side throughout, and those little details where a nuance of tempo or expression makes all the difference between conventionality and a distinctive, emotionally compelling performance, went largely ignored.

Such things are very important to the reading of Tchaikovsky, whose music, broadly speaking, is not the sort that "plays itself." With his febrile temperament, and his piling on of emotional climaxes, he wrought a music that must be carefully planned, expressively, from beginning to end. Otherwise the continuity and the structure cannot appear at their finest.

In general, the slow movement went best of all, and the famous horn solo was splendidly phrased. In this movement, too, the orchestral detail (perhaps more lavish in this Symphony than in any other of the Tchaikovsky six) was most clearly brought out.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30. The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday to avoid Good Friday. Charles Munch then will present the "St. John" Passion of Bach, and will repeat it Saturday evening, April 12, [illegible] on Easter Sunday afternoon, April 13, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 9- 1952

Chamber Music Program Changed For Festival Bach-Mozart Series

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Munch, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Taglewood this summer, will make a new departure in his programs for the concerts for chamber orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall opening the Festival July 5. These concerts in the auditorium have hitherto been devoted to the music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make these two composers the predominating ones, but he will also include contemporaries of both.

The first program on Saturday evening, July 5 will be all Bach but will include the fifth symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," to be conducted by Hugh Ross, the concerto for two violins (soloists, Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt) and the Third Suite. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi, and Lalande, including Lalande's choral "De Profundis."

On Saturday evening, July 12 Mr. Munch will present Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4 for strings the symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 solo string instruments, and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." On Sunday afternoon, July 13, Mr. Munch will present the final three symphonies of Mozart, in E flat, G minor, and C major ("Jupiter").

On Saturday evening, July 19, Mozart's "Litaniae" and a piano concerto will open the program, Lukas Foss appearing as piano soloist. Mr. Munch will conduct Schubert's Mass in G major on this program and repeat it on Sunday afternoon, July 20. To open this final program, he will present two symphonies of Haydn, No 99 in E flat and No. 86 in D major ("The Paris").

During the following three weeks the concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Pierre Monteux conducting one concert each in two week ends, Leonard Bernstein one in the last.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 10 1952

TO FEATURE BACH, MOZART

Tanglewood Chamber Concerts List Festival Program

The music of Bach and Mozart will be emphasized in the chamber orchestra concerts this summer by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Charles Munch, who will direct the entire series, which is part of the Berkshire Festival, also will include in these programs music by contemporaries of Bach and Mozart, as well as two modern composers.

The first program, on Saturday afternoon, July 6, will be all Bach. Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande will be represented on the program of Sunday afternoon, July 6. On Saturday evening, July 12, the composers will be Handel, Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss and Milhaud. The following afternoon will be devoted to three Mozart symphonies.

Two Mozart works and a Schubert mass will be played on Saturday evening, July 19. The final concert, on Sunday afternoon, July 20, will contain a repeat of the Schubert mass and two Haydn symphonies.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 8- 195[illegible]

SITTING IN

Amber---And the Concert

By TED ASHBY

NORMALLY EAGER to sow a paragraph or more about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its publicist, Laning Humphrey began talking about the Humphrey cat, Amber. Its name is misleading. Amber is a tomcat.

FURTHERMORE, AMBER is a tomcat of changing personality. It once had a high disregard for catnip. Once it sought the friendship of a mouse. The mouse, terrified, figured Amber had ulterior motives. Amber was depressed.

* * *

HE IS a short-haired cat, sort of orange-colored, with tiger stripes. Has white socks and a white shirt. If you touch that laundry, Amber will express his positive views on the matter by probing your wrist with his teeth.

* * *

THE HUMPHREYS haven't the remotest idea where Amber sleeps. He seemingly has a date every night. During the weird hours of the morning, he returns. Climbs an evergreen tree to the roof outside the bedroom window, scratches and thumps on the glass.

* * *

ADMITTED, HE goes downstairs at once. Generally food has been set out for him. If it has been forgotten, he stomps upstairs again and demands immediate action. Someone has to go down and feed him. After dining, he falls asleep on a step halfway up the stairs.

* * *

FOR A TIME Amber chased automobiles in the street. Whether he thought he saw someone he knew isn't known. However, he abruptly quit it. Took to chasing dogs. He'll chase a dog until the pursued rebels and turns on him. At this juncture, Amber will wheel and high-tail for home.

* * *

A METHODICAL fellow, Amber has about the same type of breakfast every morning. First, he has to have his coffee. With the beverage, there must be a portion of a doughnut. It varies only when the Humphreys have some left-over peas. Then it's two teaspoonfuls of peas to top off the meal.

* * *

SUDDENLY MR. HUMPHREY became the publicist. "What I really came in for," he said, "was to tell you about the annual Spring concert at Symphony Hall for the orchestra's pension fund. Bach's 'Passion According to St. John,' a composition for full orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, plus mixed choruses and soloists.

* * *

"THE CHORAL groups will come from Radcliffe and Harvard. The concerts will be held his week at 2:15 p. m., Thursday, and 8:30 p. m., Saturday. It will be repeated for the pension fund Sunday afternoon. There will be 100 choral voices. Soon thereafter, the orchestra leaves for Europe."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
APR 9- 1952

Symphony To Europe

Charles Munch outlined to a group of music critics at a conference yesterday in Symphony Hall plans for the pending European trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra will be honored by famous guests on its first visit abroad next month. Vincent Auriol, President of France, and Mme. Auriol have accepted the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom for a concert in Paris, where the orchestra will open its tour on May 6.

General Eisenhower is expected at the Paris concerts. The King of Belgium will be a royal guest a' the concert in Brussels on May 12. Charles Munch will conduct this concert as well as the concert in the Hague on May 10 when Princess Juliana of Holland will attend.

The itinerary as outlined is: May 6, Paris (Charles Munch); May 8, Paris (Pierre Monteux); May 10, Le Havre (Munch); May 11, Amsterdam (Monteux); May 12, Brussels (Munch); May 13, Frankfort (Monteux); May 14, Frankfort (Munch); May 15, Berlin (Monteux); May 17, Strasbourg (Munch); May 19, Lyons (Monteux); May 21, Paris (Munch); May 23, Bordeaux (Monteux); May 24, Bordeaux (Munch); May 26, London (Munch).

[12].

CHRISTIAN SCIENTIST April 11

Charles Munch Conducts Bach's St. John Passion

By Harold Rogers

[illegible] July cele- [illegible] season this [illegible] performances of [illegible] Passion, [illegible] as [illegible] Sebastian [illegible] was yesterday [illegible] second will [illegible] and the third [illegible] Fund concert—will [illegible] afternoon. Since the [illegible] Fund concert is not included in the subscription series, [illegible] available to the general public at the Symphony Hall box [illegible]

[illegible] has amassed an array of forces that performed, save for minor exceptions, in excellence. There is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of course. There is the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained to near perfection by their conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. There is Daniel Pinkham's instant support at the harpsichord, Alfred Zighera's eloquent solo work on the viola da gamba, and E. Power Bigg's unobtrusive and sensitive handling of the organ.

David Lloyd, whose dramatic, ringing tenor is as welcome as it is familiar to Boston audiences, was heard in the part of the Evangelist, a role he sang here two seasons ago for Mr. Munch's presentation of the Johannes Passion. Edmond Hurshell also recreated the basso roles that he sang here two seasons ago—those of Peter and Pilate. His voice has strengthened and has taken on a rather dark, dramatic richness.

* * *

In the role of Jesus we heard Mack Harrell, a baritone of great refinement, strength, and musicianly insight. His aria, "Haste, ye deeply wounded spirits," was presented with artistic expression as the chorus interjected its querulous "Wohin? wohin? wohin?" Here we are given one of the most inspired pieces of choral writing in the entire work, and the Harvard-Radcliffe singers were especially notable for their light touch, their incisive attack.

The soprano and contralto solos were carried respectively by Gladys Spector (who has been heard before in Boston in the New England Opera Theater's production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni") and by Mary Davenport. Miss Davenport provided a competent performance in a good full voice. Miss Spector, whose soprano has a lush beauty, sang the aria, "Dissolve, O my heart, into torrents of weeping," without much insight as to the meaning of the words.

* * *

Gems of choral singing were displayed in the many chorales that are scattered through the work. The effortless production, the blend of the choral tone, the floating pianissimos—all combined to produce an aura of contemplative devotion.

Mr. Munch drew the many threads of this vast masterpiece into an embroidery of painstaking and intricate design. We are indeed indebted to him and to his musicians for giving us this remarkable Easter commemoration.

Why, incidentally, was the text not given in the program? It was printed when Mr. Munch produced the St. John Passion two years ago.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Bach "St. John" Passion

By CYRUS DURGIN

[illegible] at Easter, Charles [illegible] at the Boston Sym- [illegible] conducts either [illegible] the "St. John" [illegible] Passion, [illegible] and revered [illegible] Symphony [illegible] afternoon. Although [illegible] score was sung on [illegible] last season, this week [illegible] reverted to the old- [illegible] shifting the afternoon [illegible] Thursday. The "St. John" [illegible] be heard again on [illegible] and on Sunday [illegible] of the orchestra's [illegible]

[illegible] yesterday was [illegible] occasions when all [illegible] of a complex musical exe- [illegible] to coalesce about per- [illegible] Mostly devoted but [illegible] choral reading showed [illegible] in the interpre- [illegible] Mr. Woodworth's [illegible] Radcliffe singers must [illegible] full and rich [illegible] clean [illegible] just and [illegible] portant, they [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] form [illegible]

[illegible] Pinkham [illegible] the [illegible] commendably [illegible] St. John's [illegible] declamation of [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] Biggs' [illegible] Zighera during the aria "Es [illegible] beauti-

[illegible] suggestion: Why not sing the Passions in English?

GLADYS SPECTOR will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in Bach's St. John Passion in Symphony Hall tomorrow night, and for the Pension Fund concert Sunday afternoon.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 11 1952

Tanglewood July Programs Announced

The Boston Symphony Concert Hall program under the direction of Charles Munch at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. will be devoted this July to the compositions not only of Bach Haydn and Mozart but of other composers, old and modern, as well.

The concerts will be presented Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons on the weekends of July 5-6, 12-13 and 19-20.

* * *

THE PROGRAMS will be as follows:

Saturday evening, July 5: Carl Phillip Emanuel Bach's Symphony No. 5 in B Minor, and the Cantata No. 140, Concerto for Two Violins and the Suite No. 3 by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Sunday afternoon, July 6: the Suit from "Dardanus" by Rameau, Concert Dans le Gout Theatrical by Couperin, Purcell's Fantasia in A for Strings, Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Opus 3, No. 1, and Lalande's "De Profundis" for chorus and orchestra.

Saturday evening, July 12: Handel's Concerto Grosso in A Minor for strings, Opus 6, No. 4, Ditersdorf's Symphony in C Major, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for stringed instruments, and "La Creation du Monde" by Darius Milhaud.

* * *

SUNDAY afternoon, July 13: the three last symphonies of Mozart, No. 39 in E Flat, No. 40 in G Minor and No. 41 in C Major, the "Jupiter".

Saturday evening, July 19: Mozart's "Litaniae" for chorus and orchestra, a Mozart piano concerto with Lukas Foss as soloist, and Schubert's Mass in G Major.

Sunday afternoon, July 20: two Haydn symphonies, No. 99 in E Flat and No. 86 in D Major, and again Schubert's Mass in G Major.

The chorus will be under the direction of Hugh Ross of New York's Schola Cantorum.

[100]

Boston Herald - April 11

Symphony Notes Omit St. John Text

The Gospel of St. John was "edited out" of the program for yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of Bach's "The Passion According to St. John."

This became known last night after concert-goers had protested that the program had omitted the translation into English, in the biblical wording of the Book of St. John, of the German sung by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

It has for many years been the custom of the Symphony to play one of Bach's great choral works every year during Easter Week. Until yesterday, the translation, with the German and English side by side, had been printed in the program for the audience to follow the meaning of the words sung in German.

In yesterday's program, the space which in other years had been devoted to the translation was filled with articles on "The Procurator of Judea" and "A Passion Performance at Leipzig."

John N. Burk, editor of the program notes, declined to discuss the omisison except to say, "It was not according to my judgment."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

APR 11 1952

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

APR 11 1952

SNACK FOR THE MAESTRO—After strenuously rehearsing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, looking and feeling very fit after his long illness, has lunch in the Symphony Hall lunchroom. Secretary Jean Fraser serves him.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 22d program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was given over to Bach's St. John Passion. Soloists were David Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, baritone; Gladys Spector, soprano; Mary Davenport, contralto, and Edmond Hurshell, bass. Assisting artists were Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord; E. Power Biggs, organ; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; and the choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I AM RELUCTANT to put it in terms of It Is Good For Us, but the fact remains that hearing of Bach's Passion According to St. John every two years is one of the most salutary innovations Charles Munch has achieved.

We all know and love both the St. Matthew Passion and the B minor Mass because we've heard them often enough to begin to hear what goes on in them. The St. John Passion, however, is still new to this audience and while it is a far more dramatic and even violent piece than the St. Matthew, its arias—which after all are what makes contact to the average musical ear—are neither so numerous nor so well established as those in the later work.

As a matter of fact, the St. John Passion is more than any other of the Gospels the story of the arrest and the actual trial of Jesus. In it Bach portrays the increasingly violent attitudes of the mobs howling for Jesus' death with all the stark realism of the police reporter. Contrasted with these great choral scenes as the crowd all but forces its verdict upon the neutral Pilate, is the marvelous serenity of Christ Himself (who is never characterized as He is in St. Matthew) and the mingled awe, reverence and tenderness of the Evangelist as he tells us of the action.

Yet it takes a special ear to hear the unending beauties of this narration; the ceaseless invention, the expressivity revealed in this accompanied recitative is, for the initiate, no less wondrous and no less telling than the chorales, the choruses and the arias themselves. I must say, however, that a truly shocking thing stepped between the audience and the performance yesterday in the unforgivable omission of the text in the program.

Amazed by this omission, I inquired the reason and learned, to my stupefaction, that the Gospel According to St. John had been censored. Far be it from me to get involved in any dispute on this particular point, but I do hope the group that censored the New Testament will realize the far reaching implication of its action and withdraw its censorship immediately.

BE THAT AS it may, the performance yesterday afternoon was especially beautiful for the fact it offered the finest quintet of soloists assembled for one of these performances in many years. David Lloyd, as he did two years ago, traversed the very taxing role of the Evangelist superbly, lending it all the dramatic and emotional emphasis he has gained in his operatic career. Mack Harrell's Jesus was beautifully conceived and sung, while Edmond Hurshell as Peter and as Pilate gave the roles authority and vocal quality. Gladys Spector and Mary Davenport were also first rate, though I thought Miss Davenport might have given a little more force to the middle section of the "Es ist Vollbracht" (in which, incidentally, Alfred Zighera played the viola da gamba with extraordinary beauty).

The chorus, as always these days, was superb throughout, achieving lovely quality in every dynamic level including the softest possible pianissimos, which is the real test of its ability. The orchestra, too, was in top form. It may be said that Mr. Munch observed a number of cuts in the performance, and that the use of the violas pizzicato to simulate the sound of the lute in the arioso didn't quite work. The harpsichord should, I think, be used in the absence of the specified instrument as the violin textures cover the plucked violas and destroy the atmosphere of this indescribably beautiful number.

Pierre Monteux returns next week to give us a preview of his European program. It includes Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, Pijper's Third Symphony, a suite from Milhaud's "Protee" and William Schumann's Third Symphony. The St. John Passion will be repeated tomorrow night and will be given Sunday afternoon in a Pension Fund concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Charles Munch is making a practice of performing in Holy Week and in alternating Bach's Passions according to St. John and St. Matthew. This year it is the former's turn, but though a performance on Good Friday was considered appropriate two years ago, and last year in the case of the St. Matthew, this year has been a reversion to the old custom of giving the Holy Week matinee on Thursday.

It was Dr. Koussevitzky who introduced to Symphony Hall the "Johannespassion," as it is known in Germany, in 1935, but he never repeated it, so the present performances are but the third by the Boston Symphony. In addition to that of yesterday afternoon, there will be two more, the regular repetition tomorrow evening and a special performance Sunday afternoon in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

It is perfectly safe to say that the St. Matthew Passion is the greater and grander of the two, but the St. John has its special virtues. It is more intimate and less dramatic and full of musical beauty. Because of this very intimacy it suits Mr. Munch better than does its companion work, and the performance yesterday was an admirable one in every respect. The chorus was that of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and these combined groups never sang more expressively. Solo singers at Symphony concerts do not always measure up. This year there is an excellent quintet in the persons of David Lloyd, Mack Harrell, Gladys Spector, Mary Davenport and Edmond Hurshell. The chief burden falls upon Mr. Lloyd, as the Evangelist and solo tenor, and Mr. Harrell as the voice of Jesus and the solo bass. Yesterday the two were equal to every occasion. Among the other singers, Miss Davenport was particularly effective in her "Est ist vollbracht" (It is finished), with its viola da gamba obbligato affectingly played by Alfred Zighera.

Again this reviewer feels called upon to protest Mr. Munch's use in these Passions of the original German text. The excuse made for him is that it sounds best to him that way. So far, so good; but how about his audiences? The core of the Passions is the Gospel narrative. Bach's congregations expected to hear the words in a language they understood and why should we not have the same privilege? This year, as it happens, the use of German is doubly unfortunate, since pressure was brought upon Symphony Hall to keep the printed text out of the program book. Granting that many listeners are content to receive even these Passions as so much vocal and instrumental tone, or as so much music per se, not everyone feels that way about it: Bach himself, I believe, would have been the first to object, to feel that the conductor was doing him a disservice.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
APR 12 19

Cathedral Organ Recit

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

ERNEST WHITE, who gives a recital on the new Baird Memorial organ in St. Paul's Cathedral Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, is widely known in musical circles for his extensive performances in the fields of concert, radio and recording. Music director of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin in New York, an English Catholic church with a long history of outstanding music performances, he also is consultant on tonal design and reseach for the M. P. Moeller Organ Company. Dr. White was formerly on the faculties of the Pius X School of Liturgical Music, Bard College and Swarthmore College.

His program will be:

Concerto in G	Vivaldi-Bach
Prelude, Fugue and Chaconne	Pachelbel
Aria con variazioni	Martini
Herzlich thut mich verlangen	Kirnberger
Flute solo	Arne
Allen Gott in der Hoh' sei Ehr	Armstorff
Chorale in B minor	Franck
Cortege et Litanie	Messiaen
Weihnachten 1914	Reger
Carillon de Westminster	Vierne

Munch to Extend Scope Of Chamber Music Concerts

CHARLES MUNCH, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this Summer, will make a departure in his programs for the pre-festival chamber music concerts which will take place on July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20.

Hitherto, these concerts in the intimate auditorium of the Theater-Concert Hall have been devoted to music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make these composers the principal ones, but also will include some of their contemporaries and extend the repertoire into music of our own day.

The July 5 program will be all-Bach, but will include the Fifth Symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Phillip Emanuel Bach. The elder Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140 (Wachet auf), Concerto for two Violins and Third Suite. The next afternoon the program will be devoted to music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande ("De Profundis.")

On Saturday evening, July 12, will be heard Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4; Symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 solo string instruments and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." On the afternoon of July 13 in the final three symphonies of Mozart—E flat, G minor and C major (Jupiter).

Mozart "Litaniae" and a piano concerto (Lukas Foss, soloist) and Schubert's Mass in G major make up the program for July 19. The mass, and Haydn's Symphonies Nos. 99 and 86, will be heard July 20.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 13 1952

Munch Widens Program For Tanglewood Series

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced an expanded program policy for the six chamber orchestra concerts which he will conduct during the first three week ends of this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20. The repertory for this series, previously limited to Bach, Mozart and Haydn, will range from seventeenth century to contemporary music.

The first program, July 5, will be devoted to Johann Sebastian Bach and Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. Works of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande will be heard July 6. The concert of July 12 will be divided between the eighteenth and twentieth centuries, with works by Handel and Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphosen" and Darius Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." A Mozart program is set for July 13; choral works by Mozart and Schubert and a Mozart piano concerto will be heard July 19 and two Haydn symphonies and Schubert's mass in G major July 20.

These concerts will be held in Tanglewood's Theater - Concert Hall. As already announced, nine concerts by the complete Boston Symphony will follow in Tanglewood's Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternons, July 24, 26, 27, 31; Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10. Six of these will be conducted by Mr. Munch, two by Pierre Monteux and one by Leonard Bernstein. Full information can be obtained from the Berkshire Festival office at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
APR 2 1952

Tanglewood Tryouts Set For Cleveland

Ralph Berkowitz, Dean and William Kroll, associate head of the chamber music department will hold final instrumental auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center on Saturday, April 19 in Cleveland at Severance Chamber Music Hall from 1 to 4 p. m.

The Berkshire Music Center is the music school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in connection with the Berkshire Festival. The Music center's 10th session will be held from June 30 to August 10 with Charles Munch as director and Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty includes the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All students accepted for the student orchestra will receive grants for tuition from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund. Pianists and string players will also be accepted for chamber music only.

Applicants planning to attend these auditions should, if possible, notify the registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

GUY LOMBARDO and his Royal Canadians will play the "Sweetest Concert this Side of Heaven" in Memorial Hall at 8:30 p. m. today. The show is being sponsored for the benefit of the Franklin County Society for Crippled Children.

WILLIAM PRIMROSE, the man who has popularized the viola as a solo instrument in this country, will appear in recital on the Ohio Wesleyan University Artists' series at 8:15 p. m. Friday, April 18, in Gray Chapel, Delaware.

LEON MANDRAKE, magician in the two nightly floor shows in the Town and Country room of the Neil House, for more than a month was one of the feature attractions in Ken Murray's "Blackouts."

FOR ITS LATE SHOWS tonight, the RKO Palace will feature "Jack and the Beanstalk" with Abbott and Costello, and "Rodeo" starring Jane Nigh and John Archer.

THE RKO GRAND will have for its late shows "The Big Trees" starring Kirk Douglas and Patrice Wymore, and "Corporal Dolan Goes AWOL" with Eddie Alben and Fay Marlowe. Last complete show begins at 11 p. m.

TO SECURE TICKETS for the "Biggest Show of '52" persons are requested to send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to the Deshler Wallick Hotel's box office. This relieves the strain on the telephone wires during the current strike. The "Biggest Show of '52" comes to Memorial Hall on Tuesday, April 29, for two performances, at 7:30 and 10 p. m. Starring on the show are Frankie Laine and Patti Page.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 13 19

Munch to Extend Repertory for Summer Tanglewood Chamber Orchestra Concerts

Charles Munch, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood next Summer, will make a new departure in his programs for the concerts for chamber orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall opening the Festival on July 5.

These concerts in the intimate auditorium hitherto have been devoted to the music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make these two composers the predominating ones, but he will also include contemporaries of both, and even extend his repertory into the music of our own day.

The first program, Saturday evening, July 5, will be all Bach, but will include the Fifth Symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," to be conducted by Hugh Ross, the Concerto for Two Violins (soloists, Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt) and the Third Suite. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande, including Lalande's chorale, "De Profundis."

Saturday evening, July 12, Mr. Munch will present Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4 for Strings, the Symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 solo string instruments, and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." On Sunday afternoon, July 13, Mr. Munch will present the final three symphonies of Mozart, in E-flat, G minor, and C major ("Jupiter").

Saturday evening, July 19, Mozart's "Litaniae" and a piano concerto will open the program, Lukas Foss appearing as soloist. Mr. Munch will conduct Schubert's Mass in G major at this concert, and repeat it on Sunday afternoon, July 20. To open this final program, he will present two symphonies of Haydn, No. 99 in E-flat and No. 86 in D major ("The Paris").

During the following three weeks the concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Pierre Monteux conducting one concert each in two week-ends, Leonard Bernstein one in the last.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 13 1952

NEW DEPARTURE IN EARLY WEEKS AT TANGLEWOOD

Works of Many Composers Besides Bach, Mozart to Be Heard

Boston, April 12—Charles Munch, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will make a new departure in his progress for the concerts for chamber orchestra in the Theater-Concert Hall opening the festival on July 5. These concerts in the intimate auditorium have hitherto been devoted to the music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make these two composers the predominating one, but he will also include contemporaries of both and even extend his repertoire into the music of our own day.

All-Bach Opener

The first program Saturday evening, July 5, will be all Bach out will include the Fifth Symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," to be conducted by Hugh Ross, the Concerto for Two Violins (soloists, Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt) and the Third Suite. Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande, including Lalande's choral "De Profundis."

Saturday evening, July 12, Mr. Munch will present Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4 for Strings, the symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 solo string instruments, and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." Sunday afternoon, July 13, Mr. Munch will present the final three symphonies of Mozart, in E flat, G minor, and C major ("Jupiter").

Saturday evening, July 19, Mozart's "Litaniae" and a piano concerto will open the program, Lukas Foss appearing as piano soloist. Mr. Munch will conduct Schubert's Mass in G major on this program and repeat it on Sunday afternoon, July 20. To open this final program, he will present two symphonies of Haydn, No. 99 in E flat and No. 86 in D major ("The Paris").

During the following three weeks the concerts by the full orchestra in the shed will be given on Thursday evenings. Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Pierre Monteux conducting one concert each in two week ends, Leonard Bernstein in one in the last.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 13 1952

Munch Announces Fete's Chamber Music

Charles Munch, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will make a new departure in his programs for the concerts for chamber orchestra in the Theater-Concert Hall opening the Festival on July 5. These concerts in the intimate auditorium have hitherto been devoted to the music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make these two composers the predominating ones, but he will also include contemporaries of both and even extend his repertoire into the music of our own day.

The first program on Saturday evening, July 5, will be all Bach, but will include the Fifth Symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," to be conducted by Hugh Ross, the Concerto for Two Violins (soloists, Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt) and the Third Suite. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi, and Lalande, including Lalande's choral "De Profundis."

On Saturday evening, July 12, Mr. Munch will present Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4 for Strings, the Symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 Solo String Instruments, and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde." On Sunday afternoon, July 13, Mr. Munch will present the final three Symphonies of Mozart, in E flat, G minor, and C major ("Jupiter").

On Saturday evening, July 19, Mozart's "Litaniae" and a piano concerto will open the program, Lukas Foss appearing as piano soloist. Mr. Munch will conduct Schubert's Mass in G major on this program and repeat it on Sunday afternoon, July 20. To open this final program, he will present two Symphonies of Haydn, No. 99 in E flat and No. 86 in D major ("The Paris").

During the following three weeks the concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Pierre Monteux conducting one concert each in two weekends, Leonard Bernstein one in the last.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 13 1952

Tanglewood Center Schedules Auditions

Auditions for instrumental applicants to this Summer's session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will take place at the Baldwin Piano Company, 20 East 54th Street, New York, on Saturday, April 17 from 1 to 4 P. M. Pianists will also be auditioned at this time.

The Berkshire Music Center, maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with the Berkshire Festival, will hold its tenth session this Summer from June 30 to August 10 under the direction of Charles Munch with Aaron Copland as assistant director.

Applicants planning to attend these auditions should, if possible, notify the Registra, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

[123]

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

ACTION OF SYMPHONY UNDER FIRE

Minister Hits Ban on English Text of Passion

[illegible] the trustees [illegible] orchestra for [illegible] the deletion of the English text from the programs for the Thursday performance of the St. John Passion at Symphony Hall, the Rev. Dr. Frederick M. Meek, minister of Old South Church, yesterday called their action "shameful and cowardly."

Continued on Page 4—Fourth Col.

ACTION OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RAPPED

Continued From First Page

[illegible] explained that usually [illegible] of the crucifixion [illegible] gospel is carried in [illegible] that listeners may [illegible] what the music is [illegible] instrument and voice. [illegible] is sung in German [illegible] understand what is [illegible] without the English [illegible] the listener is con- [illegible] the man.

[illegible] of the orchestra board [illegible] said that the board had [illegible] make the deletion after [illegible] were received from re- [illegible] groups asking that this [illegible] He denied, however, that [illegible] pressure was exerted.

Chief Concern

[illegible] was put upon the trus- [illegible] the orchestra to omit the [illegible] the program, on the part [illegible] who found the English text [illegible] gospel story of the cruci- [illegible] be objectionable." Dr. [illegible] asserted.

"The tragic thing is that the [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] yielded to that kind of [illegible] and no text was printed [illegible] gram. It was both a [illegible] cowardly thing to do. [illegible] what is the difference [illegible] kind of censorship and the burning of books which Hitler did not want the people to read? And what of those who permit the burning and the censorship? But this is neither the time nor the opportunity to expand such a comparison. Our concern is that the crucifixion story was deleted under pressure. For the majority of listeners, the German in which the Passion was sung, is an unknown tongue.

Must Face Story

"Of course our society and our civilization in their practice would be content with keeping the story obscured because they do not want His sovereignty in life. But you and I and our world are compelled to face the story of the crucifixion in our own language; and if any of us in this church think that we can evade or obscure the experience of the crucifixion, and then claim the Easter gift of eternal life that came out of the crucifixion, we sadly misunderstand the Christian faith, and what God has said to us through the gospel and in Easter.

Munch Announces Chamber Program For Tanglewood

Charles Munch, who is to conduct the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will make a new departure in his programs for the concerts for chamber orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall [illegible] the Festival on July 5. These concerts in the intimate auditorium have hitherto been devoted to the music of Mozart and Bach. Mr. Munch will make the [illegible] two composers the predominating ones, but he will also include contemporaries of both and [illegible] extend his repertoire into music of our own day.

The first program on Saturday evening, July 5 will be all Bach but will include the Fifth Symphony in D minor by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf," ruft uns die Stimme," to be conducted by Herbert Ross, the Concert Choir of Men's Voices, soloists, the Berkshire Quartet and Boyd Possell and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Ralph Vaughan Williams, including "De Pro-

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
APR 14 1952

A Helpful Export

The United States has been accused of exporting a lot of things of an undesirable nature—gangster films, be-bop music, loud-mouthed tourists, playboys, and visiting congressmen — but there ought to be no quarrel with a package being wrapped up for delivery in Europe in May.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, second to none in the United States and as fine as any in Europe, has scheduled concerts in Germany, Belgium, France, the Netherlands and England, under the batons of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux.

In the interest of prestige in an area of accomplishment which Europeans understand and appreciate, no happier arrangement could be conceived. The Boston Symphony will do us honor and, in the long run, may be the equivalent of a considerable appropriation for public relations purposes.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
APR

Berkshire Music Center

Ralph Berkowitz, Dean and William Kroll, Associate Heads of the Chamber Music Department will hold final instrumental auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center on Saturday, April 19 in Cleveland at Severance Chamber Music Hall from 1 to 4 p. m.

TRUSTEES SAY 'NO COMMENT'

Ignore Charges Made by Hub Pastor

POST
4 15

The charges that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were "shameful and cowardly" in ordering the deletion of the English text from the programs for the Holy Week performance of the St. John Passion at Symphony Hall were ignored last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

The Rev. Dr. Frederick M. Meek, pastor of Old South Church, made the charges in voicing the statement that "pressure was put upon the orchestra to omit the text from the program" because of some groups who found it objectionable.

Mr. Cabot, reached at his vacation retreat in Walpole, N. H., steadfastly refused to make a statement on the controversy last night. He merely stated, "I have no comment to make." It is understood, however, that he voted for the deletion of the text and attended the concert last Thursday.

Mr. Judd, contacted at Symphony Hall, remarked that lyrics were printed in German and that "people have a wonderful time at the opera" without an English translation of the lyrics. He said that it wasn't planned to have the words printed in English on the program.

Twenty-Six

The Boston Daily Globe

Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St., Boston 7, Mass.
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)

TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1952

Power Plant

Symphony Hall has become one of the main cultural power stations of this community. By community is meant first, the city of Boston itself, whose repute it has spread far and wide in a manner redounding to our credit; then the Metropolitan area, and after that New England.

This power keeps growing. In recent years "the Hall" has taken over the Esplanade concerts, free to the public; has made Tanglewood, the festival and its music school, nationally and internationally famous; and, in this past season made available its Thursday rehearsals for students, and put its regular Friday and Saturday concerts on the air.

Despite the difficulties of this past season, its concerts are ending under Mr. Munch's direction with more than their usual brilliancy, and, as the season closes here, the orchestra leaves for its first European tour while it is still at the peak of its virtuosity.

Although "Symphony Hall" has become a metonym for the orchestra, it is also a public institution, being the only suitable auditorium of its size and type available for the multiform civic convocations of a big city. Considering the vast services to the community which center in it and radiate from it, some recognition of its unique status as primarily an educational institution seems indicated.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 17 1952

Exhilarating Performance by Boston Symphony

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — The Passion According to St. John by Bach was given a truly exhilarating performance by the Boston Symphony conducted by Charles Munch.

Joining with the orchestra in the Easter music were the Harvard and Radcliffe singers who are directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, and a group of soloists including David Lloyd, Mack Harrell, Gladys Spector, Mary Davenport, Edmond Hurshell and harpsichordist Daniel Pinkham, organist E. Power Biggs, and Alfred Zighera at the viola da gamba.

* * *

IT WAS a reverential presentation by Mr. Munch and the glee clubs from Cambridge sang powerfully and with both richness of tone and technical precision. The solo singers were all excellent with Messrs. Lloyd and Harrell employing their superior voices in dramatic operatic delivery. Mr. Hurshell, whose part was comparatively short, gave many fine musical moments, nevertheless.

Listening to the "St. John" Passion is, in itself, a musical experience. However, even though Bach's music is the greatest of its kind, one can not help wondering why we are so satisfied to keep these dramas in the original German. The popular notion that people can not appreciate the Passions in their own tongue is something that apparently caught on a long time ago before America could produce any librettists capable of competent translations. What a wealth of enjoyment we are denying ourselves!

* * *

THE WILBUR Theater is showing a cute little comedy in "To Be Continued," which stars Neil Hamilton and Dorothy Stickney and a number of other good actors too. It is written, for the most part very well, by William Marchant. About the only real criticism this reporter would dare make is that the show seems to carry about a little deadweight; numerous trivialities receive too much emphasis.

The plot concerns, briefly, a man who has a mistress in Greenwich Village, in whose studio apartment he lives from Monday to Friday, and his wife who sees him an weekends in Fairfield, Conn.

* * *

HE RATIONALIZES that all is well—that he has done the best thing for all three people concerned, and as the story progresses, it seems that he has, indeed, done just that. However, the complications of such an arrangement, no matter how ideal, are inevitable in present day society, and there are some amusing results.

—F. S.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 17 1952

Symphony Hall Still Accepting Orders for Festival

For the convenience of previous subscribers to the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood concerts their payments for the seats they occupied last season will be accepted for the next few days, although the final date was set as April 15. Those who failed to send their checks before yesterday, if they wish to retain their previous seat locations, are urged to send payments to Symphony Hall, Boston, so that the seats may not be reassigned to new subscribers.

The subscription period for new and former patrons will continue through May, when tickets for individual concerts will be on sale. The advantages of series tickets are a reduced price and a better choice of seats.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
APR 18 1952

Hub Symphony Has Role in Paris Festival

PARIS (AP)—On the last day of this month, in the historic Church of St. Roch—named after the pious Frenchman who dedicated his life to alleviate human suffering—the throbbing melody of a new composition by Francisci Poulenc will honor the memory of the 20th century's victims of tyranny.

The composition is "Stabat Mater". Its singing by the chorus of Saint-Guillaime of Strasbourg, under the direction of the celebrated conductor, Fritz Munch, will open a month-long program of music, theatre, art and literature entitled "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century."

THEME IS FREEDOM

The great artistic festival, one of the most ambitious projects undertaken in half a century, is sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom. The congress is a collection of Western intellectuals, headed by such brilliant names as John Dewey, Benedetto Croce, Karl Jaspers, Jacques Maritain, Salvador de Madariga, and Bertrand Russell, who conceived the idea of the festival in 1950.

Its theme is freedom, and it will feature the great works of art which have been produced in an atmosphere free from the strictures of Communism.

STRAVINSKY TO APPEAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its conductor, Charles Munch, will come to Europe for the first time in its 71-year history to participate in it. The famed ex-patriate Russian composer Igor Stravinsky will make his first Paris appearance in 13 years for the event.

The R. I. A. S. Orchestra of Western Berlin, conducted by Ferenc Fricsay, will devote an entire program to the works of Soviet composers banned in Russia and in the Soviet satellites.

There will be an exhibition of rarely-seen paintings of the twentieth century.

On the literary side, there will be a series of six lectures and debates by eminent authors and critics. A notable theater program is to be presented at the same time.

On May 8 Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" at the Theater Des Champs Elysee.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 19 1952

MUSIC

Monteux Directs Modern Scores at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux again is a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, a fact most pleasant to relate. His visit serves the double purpose of spelling Mr. Munch between the arduous labors of last week's "St. John" Passion and next week's final concerts, and of providing opportunity to work up some of the modern scores which Mr. Monteux will conduct on the orchestra's European tour next month.

That is why three out of the four pieces which make the program of yesterday afternoon and tonight are modern music. They are the Third Symphony by Willem Pijper, new to Boston; the Second Suite from Milhaud's score for the "Protee" of Paul Claudel, and the Third Symphony by William Schuman. The list begins with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. This is indeed a heavy concentration of relatively new music, and the conservatives could be heard grumbling in the Symphony Hall corridors a minute after yesterday's concert had ended.

But to my way of thinking each of the three scores is attractive and substantial, and not least among them is the Schuman Symphony, whose rousing final chords drew some hardy cries of "Bravo." As time goes on, you can hear Schuman's work in better perspective, and the effect is altogether favorable to the work. Probably it is too long, and a little pretentious and academic in its formal layout. But the piece has melodic invention, and rhythmic liveliness; the harmonic texture and the scoring are those of a man whose learning, while considerable, does not stifle emotion.

How much water has gone over the musical dam in 30 years! It seems incredible that Milhaud's waggish but cleverly contrived pieces for the satirical play of Claudel started a scandalous uproar in Paris in 1920. Today the idiom seems even a little tame, certainly nothing to get excited about. Compared to some of Milhaud's later music, the "Protee" score is gaily innocuous. To my ears it makes notably relaxed and enjoyable listening.

There is a quality of flippancy about the Third Symphony of Willem Pijper, a Hollander who died in 1947 at the age of 53. Probably that derived from the period in which it was written: 1926. But Pijper himself appears to have been what today is called a "character," strong-minded, perhaps a touch eccentric musically. His quotation on the score, from the Aeneid, and translated as "if I cannot influence the powers above, I will move the powers of Hades," suggests that Mr. Pijper did artistically as he pleased. Or, as my companion observed: "There's a touch of nose-thumbing in that symphony."

Nonetheless, Pijper was a resourceful composer who knew his craft. The proportions are good, even if he does end with two rythmically dangling crisp chords. The dissonance is not too fierce, and all the way through there is an excellent sense of progress and inner motion. The orchestration is that of an expert.

Well, there you have it. Next month it will be interesting to observe how these pieces are received by European audiences. Whether or not they like the music, they are bound to be impressed by the superlative performance by Mr. Monteux and his orchestra.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 20 1952

Monteux in Boston 'Warming Up' for Trip Abroad With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux this week is giving Bostonians a preview of some of the music he will conduct in Europe next month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The distinguished French musician, who just last week said farewell to the San Francisco Symphony, which he had led for 17 years, is back here as guest conductor. On April 28 he will sail with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will share with Charles Munch the conducting of the European concerts which the Boston Symphony will play under auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

That is why the program at Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday is arranged as it is," said the amiable and urbane musician after rehearsal yesterday morning. "It is not exactly the sort of program one would choose for the ordinary run of concert giving. But it will give Bostonians an idea of part of the repertory which their orchestra will play abroad.

"The Third Symphony of Willem Pijper, moreover, has never been played in Boston before. It was written in 1926 and dedicated to me. I gave the first performance of it in Amsterdam that year. Pijper was a very gifted composer, and he died much too young, at the age of 53, in 1947.

"I remember when I first went to Amsterdam, I inquired who were the contemporary Netherland composers at that time. They told me of so-and-so and so-and-so, and those names impressed me as well-known conservatives. Then someone said, 'And of course there's a crazy young man in Amsterdam named Pijper.' 'Good,' I said, 'he is just the man I want to meet.'

"Of course he was not at all crazy, but the Amsterdam musicians of that time had not yet come to recognize his genius. The same thing happened to Debussy in Paris in his time.

PIERRE MONTEUX

"William Schuman's Third Symphony is one of the important American scores, a big work and very well written. That man studied well; he knows how to orchestrate beautifully. O, yes, you would know that to be an American score just from hearing it, even though you didn't know the name of the composer."

The other two numbers of this preview list are Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and the Second Suite from Milhaud's music to the "Protee" of Paul Claudel.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
APR 19 1952

Berkshire Center Auditions Set Next Saturday

Ralph Kerkowitz, dean, and William Kroll, associate head of the Chamber Music Department, will hold final auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center next Saturday in Cincinnati at the Baldwin Piano Co., 1801 Gilbert Avenue.

The Berkshire Music Center is the music school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in connection with the Berkshire Festival. The Music Center's tenth session will be held from June 30 to Aug. 10, with Charles Munch as director and Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty includes the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All students accepted for the student orchestra will receive grants for suition from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund. Pianists and string players will be accepted for chamber music only. A new department, the Tanglewood Study Group, will accept students for two, four or six weeks.

Applicants planning to attend these auditions and interviews, should, if possible, notify the registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass. Applications and catalogues may be obtained at time of audition or interview.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 19 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 23d concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Symphony in C (K.551) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 3 ..... Pijper
Suite No. 2 from "Protee" ..... Milhaud
Symphony No. 3 ..... William Schuman

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Pierre Monteux returned yesterday to give us a preview of one of his programs for the forthcoming tour and all I can say is that if the intention is to establish a musical beach head with sheer noise, the Boston Symphony is going to swarm ashore in triumph. All I hope is that somebody, for the sake of international relations, will warn the good people of Europe that they're about to be invaded with some of the loudest music they ever heard.

It would be nice to say that it is also some of the best music they ever heard, but this, I fear, is far from the truth. Indeed, if the three modern works on yesterday's program are supposed to represent the cream of the contemporary crop, these are sourer times in the musical dairy than I suspected.

Happily, only one of the three can be blamed on an American; the others were written by a Frenchman and a Dutchman. And any one of them, taken by itself alone, is all right. Thrown together one, two, three, however, they contrive to build up the towering suspicion that they were all entirely pre-fabricated out of technique and the overwhelmingly hollow desire to display, to impress, to dazzle, to stun with virtuosity and volume.

Of the three I was most taken with Pijper's Third Symphony, which proves to be a sort of Dutch Rhapsody in Blue. Its fragmentary melodies are fresh and grateful, its rhythms very often suggestive of American and South American jazz idioms, its instrumentation clever, unexpected and ingenious throughout. For the first half all this maintains the interest and even amuses, but then this Dutch composer begins to bear down with more and more pressure until 110 men (not to mention one little girl playing two harps at once if you can grasp such a scene) are busy trying to make the walls come tumblin' down.

Milhaud's piece also has its fine moments, but here again, as in that furious fugue for the brasses, the composer's intent, which is to shock, startle and dismay, seems anything but commendable. It may be argued that Stravinsky attempts the same thing in the Sacre, and that Bach does it in the savage choral outbursts in the St. John Passion, but not only is the purpose more honestly conceived but the means more truly artistic.

AS for Mr. Schuman's Third, it is unquestionably a splendid symphony, though a work squeezed out by the usual formal odor that makes new music a mausoleum of the performing arts. There are passages no living musician can play, but there were passages in Beethoven that couldn't be played in his day either. Yet this does have a sort of dry, astringent beauty that comes to the fore especially in the climax. After this, however, Mr. Schuman sets how many notes he can cram into a bar to come to a conclusion that for sheer racket remains unequalled in the literature.

How European audiences which have the disarming capacity to boo loud enough to drown out Mr. Schuman's own finale, are going to feel about all this I simply cannot imagine. But they cannot fail to agree on 1. that the Boston Symphony can play loud and 2. that the men of the orchestra are wizards of technical virtuosity. In the middle of all this it must be remarked, stood Pierre Monteux, as solid, as calm, as unruffled as a poodle being judged for Best in the Show.

For the final concert of the season next week Mr. Munch will give us a preview of his European program with works of Barber, Piston, Honegger, Debussy and Ravel.

This Clipping Fr
BOSTON, MAS
POST
APR 19 19

YMPHONY CONC
Y WARREN STOREY S

Pierre Monteux, who will ny the Boston Sym to Euro conducting t its scheduled 15 concert heim in Boston this we ting a program that is h eview of one that he w ct in Paris on May 8. Imm on winding up his 17-ye
San Francisco, Mr. Monte
Boston to take over rsals for this week's c e program in question
Mozart's "Jupiter" Sy
Third Symphony of H
lem Pijper, the Secon
m Milhaud's music to the Third Symphony"
n Schuman. (In Paris
's "Rite of Spring," will Mozart Symphony.)
he Pijper symphony w d to Mr. Monteux and ted its initial perform sterdam in 1926. If t ny had been written erican one might racteristic of certain dencies in this country considerable reliance idiom, syncopations
t, and much of the mus described as impudent.
asant enough to listen t ingle hearing a good d med to go in one ear other.
far more distinctive Milhaud Suite t
nteux himself introduc 1921. In those days th ght well have seemed conventional. Today, in tain riotous touches,
opening section of th
red entirely for v uments, the music is hodox. The Pastorale a rne have an almost cl aint. In the finale one riguing resemblance tual Fire Dance from ove, the Socerer." It is t this highly entertaini uld have been so long its second Boston perfo at of yesterday was bri extreme.
The Boston Symphony i ee American pieces to Schuman Third, Barbe
e to "The School for S d Piston's Toccata, a nch will conduct the t med at next week's clos rt. Indeed, that entire the one with which the will open its Europe
May 6. The Schuman Sy

[125]

...nteux in Program of Contemporary Music

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
APR 19 1952

Hasty Censorship

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently performed Bach's "Passion According to St. John," the German text and its accompanying English translation were omitted from the program notes. A minority group had, it appeared, objected to the printing of the text—drawn largely from the Gospel of John.

Here is one more example of a tendency among minority groups of all descriptions to exercise an unofficial censorship over the activities of their fellow Americans. Roman Catholics succeed in having "The Miracle" banned. Jewish organizations keep "Oliver Twist" from being shown in the United States for two years. Southern communities ban "Pinkie" and other films dealing with black-white relations. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People attempts to suppress "The Birth of a Nation" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Legionnaires try to prevent the showing of "Death of a Salesman" because the author is listed in "Red Channels."

This is no question of minority groups defending their constitutional rights or merely protesting against publications and performances which they believe to be misrepresentative of their character and prejudicial to their interests. It is a question of their using the threat of boycott or similar coercive pressure to deny the majority of Americans the right to see these things and judge for themselves.

Moreover, it shows an unhealthy sensitiveness on the part of the minorities. If a film-maker today dares to portray a villain as anything but a white Protestant American of Anglo-Saxon descent he is likely to run into difficulties. The words of the New Testament are regarded as prejudicial to the countrymen of Jesus of Nazareth. Yet censorship based on all such hypersensitiveness is self-defeating and sharpens the very antagonisms it is intended to remove.

What is needed in this day of high tensions is a more relaxed faith in the common humanity of all groups and a more vigorous faith in the free interplay of ideas through every avenue of communication.

Pijper, Milhaud, Schuman For Symphony Hall Concerts

By Harold Rogers

A week ago Pierre Monteux conducted the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in its final concerts of the season, bringing to an end his 17-year tenure as its musical director. But the noted Frenchman is in no sense retired. He flew at once to Boston where he began rehearsals for the programs by the Boston Symphony that he will conduct in May at the Congress of Cultural Freedom in Paris.

The concerts this week end at Symphony Hall, under Mr. Monteux's baton, feature three works that he will conduct in Paris on May 8 at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. These works are Pijper's Symphony No. 3, Milhaud's Suite No. 2 from the Music to Claudel's "Protée," and William Schuman's Symphony No. 3.

Mr. Monteux opened the Symphony Hall program yesterday with a finished reading of Mozart's final symphony, the "Jupiter" in C major. On the Paris program, however, the Mozart will be replaced by Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," the masterpiece that Monteux introduced to the world in Paris in 1913 at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées.

* * *

Mr. Monteux told members of the press this week that he wouldn't ordinarily build a program like this, but that he had to in preparation for the European concerts. We asked him about William Pijper (which Mr. Monteux pronounces as "Payper"), and he told us that Pijper was a leading Dutch composer who passed on in 1947.

He said that after becoming the regular conductor of the Amsterdam Conzertgebouw in 1925 (a post he held 10 years), he asked his Dutch colleagues who their leading composers were. They gave him the names of several who were of an older generation.

"But don't you have any younger men?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, there's that crazy man Pijper," they replied.

"Ah!" exclaimed Mr. Monteux. "That's the man I want to meet!"

The resulting friendship must have proved valuable, for Pijper's Third, composed in 1926, is dedicated to Mr. Monteux. He played it first in America in 1928 with the Philadelphia Orchestra; the performances this week end are the first for Boston.

* * *

While it is a rather slight work, it is thoroughly entertaining, very theatrical, and often gives the impression that the composer may have been something of a Dutch Gershwin. Perhaps this effect is provided by the occasional soupçon of a dance rhythm—a fox-trot in the Allegro, a tango in the Molto adagio, and the sharply blazing rhythms of the final Molto allegro.

Certain dance-band elements are included in the scoring—a tenor saxophone, tambourine, castanets, mandolin, and piano four hands. Pijper makes much use of polytonality and gains his last stimulating climax by piling up a great mountain of rhythmic and melodic figures. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux held the reins taut for electric effect.

The Milhaud "Protée" Suite has much color, provided mostly by splashy areas of brass. Not only were his lyrical melodies captivating; his rhythms, too, were constantly intriguing—the three-three-two beat of the Pastorale, and the five beat of the Nocturne.

* * *

But the audience reaction to the "Protée" was rather cool. The Schuman Third won a salvo of bravos from the gallery, however, though it appears to be even less accessible than the Milhaud. It's a potent piece of writing, bound extremely tight. A good combination of scholarship, emotion, and a true American style. It took the first award of the Critics' Circle of New York for 1942. It had been written a year earlier and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky.

Here again Mr. Monteux demonstrates his amazing ability to conduct contemporary works, and it is heartening to know that he will present this major American symphony when the orchestra goes to Europe. It carries an emotional impact that will surely grow stronger as the public becomes educated to Schuman's acerb idiom.

Schuman, who is the president of the Juilliard School of Music in New York City, constructed his Third in two parts, each of which has two movements. The first part is made up of a Passacaglia and Fugue; the second of a Chorale and Toccata.

Unusual sonorities are gained, as well as mounting climaxes, by the successive statements of the passacaglia theme on ascending half steps. Schuman not only offers some brilliant fugal writing in the Fugue section; he again employs a rippling fugato treatment for the Toccata, the rhythm for which is established in unusual manner first by the snare drum. This finale mounts to a dizzy race that is something of a gallop, a battle, and a song of victory. Mr. Monteux brings it into the home stretch with flags flying.

Marcus Blechman

Blanche Thebom will sing the role of Amneris in Verdi's "Aïda," coming to the Boston Opera House Monday night to open the engagement of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

...Monteux, who will accompany the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Europe, conducting there six of the entitled 15 concerts on the Boston ... were presented a ... of the ... to sell con... Boston ... gle his 17-year term ... It is ... Mr. Monteux flew ... to take over the re... for this week's concerts. ... question consists ... "Jupiter" Symphony, ... Symphony of Holland's ... Second Suite ... music to "Protee" ... Symphony of Wil... in Paris Stravin... Spectre" will replace ... Symphony. ... Monteux ... to con... ... performance on ... If the sym... written by an ... English ... certain classical ... There ... not all ... ... all ... ... It all ... ... to listen to ... a good deal of it ... one can sing out ... to stick to that for the moment, ... an excellent choice. It is an ... dual and powerful work, a ... on the academic side, with its ... Passacaglia, Chorale, Fugue and ... Toccata, but its scholarship is not ... pressive. The performance of ... yesterday struck me as an ex... tremely satisfactory one. In fact, I ... ready to proclaim Mr. Mon... an ideal interpreter of modern ... He does not inject into it ... false emotionalism and senti... mentality; his rhythmic sense is ... as is his feeling for struc... and for contemporary orches... In short, he keeps modern ... distinctly in its own frame. ... showed us last season and ... early part of this and again ... Mozart symphony yesterday, ... Monteux is no less master of ... classic style. Nor do the roman... clude him. A good conductor ... when he was here from 1919-'24, he ... has developed into a great one.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 20 1952

Pops Concerts Start on May 1

The 67th season of Pop Concerts will open May 1. The Pops will be given as usual in May and June under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Although the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be abroad through the month of May, an orchestra has been assembled from various parts of the country as well as Boston to perform in their absence, until June 1. The season will open on Thursday night, May 1 and concerts will be given Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday of each week in May and every night in June. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
APR 20 1952

In answer to several letters on the subject, the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be held starting July 5 under direction of Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Detailed programs can be obtained by writing Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
APR 20 1952

Boston Symphony To Give Berlin Concert

The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to give concerts in Germany on May 13th and May 15th. The appearance will be part of the Boston Symphony's European tour this Spring. Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteaux, head of the San Francisco Symphony for 17 years, will conduct.

The ensemble will be flown to Frankfurt from Brussels by the U. S. Air Force on May 13th and will perform that evening in the Grosse Haus, Frankfurt. On May 15th, the orchestra will give a concert at Titania Palast in Berlin.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 20 1952

Pops Open May 1

The 67th season of Pop Concerts will open May 1. The Pops will be given as usual in May and June under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Although the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be abroad through the month of May, an orchestra has been assembled from various parts of the country as well as Boston to perform in their absence, until June 1.

The season will open on Thursday night, May 1 and concerts will be given Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday of each week in May and every night in June. Refreshments will be served as usual at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC
APR 20 1952

New Programs To Be Played At Berkshire

BOSTON, April 19—Chamber orchestra works at this year's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., will break the Mozart-Bach traditions.

The chamber concerts, which open in the theater-concert hall July 5, will feature these two great composers. Conductor Charles Munch also has added music written by contemporaries of both and will extend the concert repertoire to today's chamber music.

The first program will be all Bach, but also includes the "Fifth Symphony in D Minor" by Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel.

The second program July 6 will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi, and Lalande.

On July 12 Munch will present a program which will feature music by Handel, Dittersdorf, Richard Strauss, and Milhaud. Mozart's final three symphonies will be performed July 13.

Mozart, Schubert, and a piano concerto will be played July 19. The final program on July 20 will feature two Haydn symphonies and a repeat performance of Schubert's "Mass in G Major."

Following the chamber concerts the full orchestra will give concerts in the Shed Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three weeks. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each during two weekends, and Leonard Bernstein will be conductor during the last weekend.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

APR 20 1952

Boston Symphony

Orchestra in Paris Life Dream of Russian-Born Compo

By RUTH LANGDON

PARIS—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been a legend in France for several decades. This legend will become a reality for Parisians in May thanks to the unflagging efforts of Russian-born, United States composer Nicolas Nabokov who feels that Americans have not only produced "skyscrapers, jazz and refrigerators but one of the world's finest playing instruments"—namely, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nabokov, one-time friend of Prokoflev and Shostakovitch, is director of the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" festival to be held this Spring in Paris. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, will give three concerts here as a major American contribution to this month-long festival of ballet, drama, art, literature, philosophy and music which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the last 50 years.

★ ★ ★

When I visited Nabokov at his "Congress for Cultural Freedome" office off the Champs-Elysees the other day, he confessed that having the Boston orchestra come to Europe had been a lifetime dream but that the practical arrangements for the voyage have been giving him a large headache.

★ ★ ★

"Quite frankly, I am exhausted," the 49-year-old composer told me running a hand through his steel-grey hair and over his Slavic features. "You see, we had to be sure that all 104 members of the orchestra really wanted to come to Europe. Nothing is ever done by decree in the organization, only by consent. The Boston Board wouldn't budge until it was sure there was real interest here."

PREPARING FOR THE "MASTERPIECES"—Left to right, George E. Judd, Boston Symphony Orchestra manager, confers with Arthur Honegger and Nicolas Nabokov, director of "Masterpieces."

The problem of transportation is a ticklish one. Nabokov explained. The members of the Orchestra will not travel by air. The French luxury liner, the "Ile de France," will take care of this problem by carrying the musicians across the Atlantic but the herculean 21-day tour of Europe which has been planned for them after they land on May 5 will have to be by train.

Nabokov reeled off the orchestra's back-breaking three-week itinerary with some show of uneasiness—"three concerts in Paris, two in Holland, three or four in Germany for United States troops, one in Italy's industrial Turin, possibly one in a French provincial city like Lille, possibly one in Dublin and one in London."

It is only natural that Paris should be the Boston orchestra's first stop. The strong musical ties between Boston and France are obvious to those interested in the career of the great Orchestra.

Charles Munch, its present conductor, was born in Strasbourg. Serge Koussevitzky once had French nationality, Pierre Monteux, its conductor from 1919 to 1924 was born in Paris and Frenchman Henri Rabaud conducted the orchestra for one year before Monteux's time. Twenty members of the orchestra today, now United States citizens, were originally French.

For sentimental reasons perhaps, Monteux, present conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, will conduct the Boston group in an interpretation of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in its second Paris concert on May 8 at the Champs-Elysees Theatre.

★ ★ ★

Exactly 39 years ago to the day, Monteux conducted the Stravinsky classic for the first time at the same theatre. It caused a riot then. For some curious reason 50 members of the audience stripped their clothes from their backs during the performance. No one predicts that it will have a similarly electrifying effect this Spring.

★ ★ ★

In coming to Europe, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be a trump card in what is expected to be a trenchant Western propaganda program.

Nabokov, who winces at the word "propaganda," expresses it this way:

"We want to show the world that Western culture has been rich and vital and meaningful as a sort of challenge to the criticism that our arts are a symbol of a decadent society."

The composer is careful not to mention any specific country in connection with this criticism but one gets a rather shrewd idea that he is referring to Russia.

A much-quoted remark made by Nabokov in Berlin recently where he attended a meeting of the R. I. A. S. (Radio in American Sector). Orchestra crystallizes the composer's feeling towards his native land.

At the conference he met some British, American and Russian stay at the house while we're gone.

"He's quite a character," Armstrong admitted.

journalists, and cr... said.

★ ★ ★

"America will be ... country after the ... Said Nabokov: "... so will Russia."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD

APR 20 1952

MAJOR AND MINOR

Fine Examples of Conductor's Art Given By Eugene Ormandy in Visits to Capital

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

WASHINGTON'S major symphony season ends with Tuesday's concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, in Constitution Hall.

The seven programs by this celebrated group heard during the past seven months have represented the highest levels of the art whenever Ormandy has been on the podium. Standards have declined only when he has sent a guest conductor. More will be reported about these visitors presently.

It must first be noted, however, that the three concerts of the Boston Symphony also were distinguished as examples of great orchestral art. Charles Munch conducted but one of the concerts by the Bostonians. His vicars were Monteux and Ansermet with the latter making the most convincing address.

♫

THE news is that the Bostonians will play four engagements in Washington next season, while the Philadelphians will not extend the number of their visits beyond the customary eight. Since these series are always sold out early by subscription, lovers of great symphonic art are advised to renew seat holdings promptly.

There will be twenty concerts by the resident National Symphony, or so it is assumed. No announcement has been received from the symphony management except the statement that Howard Mitchell's engagement as conductor has been extended for three years. Interest of the public in the concerts of the National Symphony has been less than in those of the visitors from the north. Mitchell's group has sold out Constitution Hall only twice during its series—once with Leopold Stokowski as guest conductor, and again with Artur Rubinstein as soloist.

The reasons for the superiority of the orchestras from Boston and Philadelphia over the New York Philharmonic—Symphony—who visited us once—or over the resident group, are concerned not merely with the genius of their famous conductors or the outstanding talents of their personnel.

They go back to the history of the symphony orchestra. There are at present two types of symphony orchestra—the ancient seventeenth - eighteenth century orchestra and the twentieth century orchestra.

♫

THE symphony orchestra originated in the orchestra pit of the Venice opera house served by Monteverdi and Vivaldi during the seventeenth century. It was developing simultaneously in the drawing rooms of the nobility, where the players naturally were placed as they were accustomed to be seated in the pit of Monteverdi's, or, later, Mozart's theater. When this seventeenth-eighteenth century orchestra climbed onto the stage the players still were seated according to the ancient plan.

No composer or conductor was completely happy with this ancient orchestra. Wagner, keeping it in the pit, added many brass and wind instruments. Berlioz expanded the ranks of the strings while increasing the numbers of players in all categories. Strauss put the Wagnerian orchestra on the concert stage. Still the conductor with discriminating ears was unhappy. The strings were relatively feeble. More string players were engaged. Still the balance was poor and the precision of the strings difficult to establish and maintain.

Finally in the twentieth century the solution to orchestral acoustics was discovered by Leopold Stokowski. He placed all the violins together on the conductor's left, put the 'cellos and violas on his right, thus liberating the tone of the second violins and solidifying the tone of the entire violin choir.

♫

THIS improvement was immediately adopted by all conductors with sensitive ears—by Stock in Chicago, Koussevitzky in Boston, Munch in Paris, Ansermet in Geneva, Beecham and Harty in London, but not by such elderly men as Walter, Mitropoulos, or Monteux, and not by Mitchell tho he had grown up in a modern orchestra under the late Hans Kindler. If he just wanted to be different, he succeeded.

That brings us to two of the season's guest conductors—de Sabata with the Philadelphians and Monteux with the Bostonians. Both restored the eighteenth century orchestra and the public regretted it. For de Sabata the marvelous Philadelphia violins were a tonal and expressive unit no longer. For Monteux the Boston violins who played so miraculously for Ansermet, were divided not merely by distance on the stage but were separated tonally and rhythmically.

The notable novelties of the symphony season belong to Ormandy. One of these was American—William Schuman's Symphony No. 4. The other was Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, a work of still greater originality and dramatic content. Among the older masters Mendelssohn fared best with his A major Symphony as presented by Ansermet. These were performances illuminated by interpretative genius.

Remembered with pleasure also was one novelty in the repertoire of the National Symphony. This was Benjamin Britten's Concerto for violin and orchestra with Werner Lywen playing the solo part.

[D 27]

WORCEST...
TEL...

APR 2...

Music

HUB ... REAL

By RAYMO...

At a confere... other day at Sy... closed several p...

To convey the i... conductor relied ... press releases that ... uted, and on the ve... of George E. Jud... the orchestra.

Mr. Munch is s... answer questions ... it. He was asked ... group and there fo... undertone confere... Judd.

At last Mr. Judd ... plained—"Mr. Mu... me to say that he ... speech for 1952."

Laudatory ...

The manager ... with laudatory rem... orchestra, forthco... in Europe, Tangle... rest. Most of the ... say. At the concl... Judd's remarks, Mr... his oration of the oc... sisted of:

"You forgot to ... conductor!"

From our vantag... ly across from M... were able to observ... to talk freely with ... he knows him we... stance it was an e... from a Boston ne... subjects of conver... from Spanish cooki... ous quotations, and... as yet from a Latin-... chestra that he co... time ago.

It is, of course, k... Munch was forced t... ibbean holiday fo... from which he rece... There has been muc... as to how fit he is fo... ous schedule ahead i... at Tanglewood.

Looks Pretty ...

I would say that h... ty well.

Judging from his ... apparently punctuate... stories that were t... Munch still retains ... of humor. His appe... and he doesn't objec... to being served by a... ress.

But when it come... making, especially ... —well, that's not fo...

Band Wago...

A program that ... uncover a bounty ... young talent will ... North High audito... night, starting at 8.

I attended a sho... the Teen-age Band ... strel show and was ... the talent that has be... through the good eff... J. Kressler and ... Gray, co-chairmen, ... Jack Williams.

The revue will fe... list of specialty a... Perry will be the h... chanteuse of swing ... accompanies herself ... and tap dances in th... Goslow Trio cons... young brothers and ... sister who do a haz... dance with the confi... fessionals.

Salvatore Stellato ... ing voice that give... to his songs. Carol ... a lithe and nifty ro... Perry Sisters have ... good vocal ensemb... are attractive.

In a class by th... the Goodwin Siste... noisseurs of the hil... toire whose dulcet ... very large and thro...

I don't promise t... uplifted by this sho... be mighty entertain...

Harvard Glee ...

If previous appea... Harvard Glee Club ... er Concert series in ... Hall prove to be ... some people will be ... Sunday night, May ...

Conductor G. W... worth has again crea... piece of programm... with Gounod's "Do...

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Music

HUB CONDUCTOR REALLY TACITURN

By RAYMOND MORIN

At a conference-luncheon for a group of music critics, the other day at Symphony Hall in Boston, Charles Munch disclosed several plans for the Boston Symphony.

To convey the information, the maestro relied on prepared press releases that were distributed, and on the verbal assistance of George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

Mr. Munch is shy and doesn't answer questions if he can avoid it. He was asked to address the group and then followed a hasty, whispered conference with Mr. Judd.

At last Mr. Judd rose and explained that Mr. Munch has asked him to say that he has given his speech for 1952."

Laudatory Remarks

The manager then followed with laudatory remarks about the orchestra, forthcoming concerts in Europe, Tanglewood, and the rest. Most of the rest, I should say. At the conclusion of Mr. Judd's remarks, Mr. Munch gave his version of the occasion. It consisted of:

"You forgot to mention the conductor."

From our vantage point directly across from Mr. Munch, we were able to observe that he likes to talk freely with one person if he knows him well. In this instance it was an editorial writer from a Boston newspaper. The subjects of conversation darted from Spanish cooking to humorous quotations, and no payment as yet from a Latin-American orchestra that he conducted some time ago.

It is, of course, known that Mr. Munch was forced to take a Caribbean holiday for his health from which he recently returned. There has been much speculation as to how fit he is for the strenuous schedule ahead in Europe and at Tanglewood.

Looks Pretty Well

I would say that he looks pretty well.

Judging from his laughs that apparently punctuated some good stories that were told him, Mr. Munch still retains a lively sense of humor. His appetite is good and he doesn't object in the least to being served by a pretty waitress.

But when it comes to speech-making, especially for the press — well, that's not for him.

Band Wagoners

A program that promises to uncover a bounty of new and young talent will be given at North High auditorium Friday night, starting at 8.

I attended a short preview of the Teen-age Bandwagon variety show and was astonished at the talent that has been assembled through the good efforts of [illegible] J. Kressler and Nancy [illegible] Gray, co-chairmen, and [illegible] Jack Williams.

The revue will feature a long list of specialty acts. Fran[illegible] Percy will be the heavily-voiced chanteuse of swing songs who accompanies herself at the piano and tap dances in the process. The Glow Trio consists of two young brothers and their young sister who do a hazardous adagio dance with the confidence of professionals.

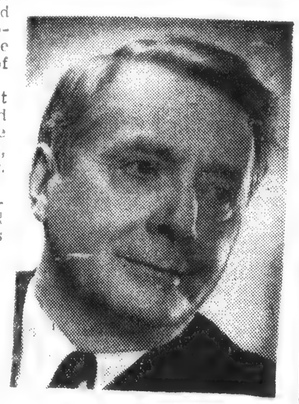
Salvatore Stellato has a pleasing voice that gives personality to his songs. Carol Zannotti does a lithe and nifty rope dance. The Percy Sisters have developed a good vocal ensemble and their [illegible] are attractive.

In a class by themselves are the Goodwin Sisters, two connoisseurs of the hill-billy repertoire whose duet tones grow more large and throaty.

I don't promise that you'll be in the mood by this show—but you'll be right entertained.

Harvard Glee Club

If previous appearances of the Harvard Glee Club on the Boston concert series in Horticultural Hall prove to be a precedent, standing room only people will be turned away Sunday night. They go on at 8 p.m. Conductor G. Wallace Woodworth has again created a [illegible] of programming. Opening [illegible] Gounod's "Domine Salvam



LIKES SILENCE

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who doesn't like to make speeches.

Fac," the program will explore such divers fields as represented by Vaughan Williams, Palestrina, Bach, Aaron Copland, Byrd, Mozart, ending with Handel's "Let Their Celestrial Concerts All Unite."

There is also one work of special interest—"The Last Words of David" written by Randall Thompson in honor of the late Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Tonight's concert by the combined glee clubs of Becker and Worcester Tech, directed by Clifford F. Green, and the Harvard Glee Club program are the last two events in this series.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 20 19[illegible]

Conductor Muench Making Changes In Chamber Orchestra Program

Concerts Will Not Be Restricted to Mozart and Bach As Heretofore; Music of Present Day Included

Berkshire Hills, April 19—Conductor Charles Muench of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which features the Berkshire music festival program at Tanglewood in Lenox during the summer season, is to make several change in his program for the concerts for the chamber orchestra in the theater-concert hall opening the festival on July 5. The concerts heretofore have been devoted chiefly to the music of Mozart and Bach, but this year Conductor Muench is to offer a little more variety. He will make the two composers the predominating ones, but will also include contemporaries of both, and will include music of the present day.

The first program slated for Saturday night, July 5, will be strictly Bach, both Johann Sebastian and his son, Carl Philip Emanuel. The score will be the Fifth Symphony in D minor. Johann Sebastian Bach will be represented by his Cantata No. 140, "Wachet Auf, Ruft Uns die Stimme" to be conducted by Hugh Ross; the Concerto for Two violins, (soloists Richard Burgin, and Ruth Posselt) and the Third Suite. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the program will be devoted to the music of Rameau, Couperin, Purcell, Vivaldi and Lalande, including the latter's choral, "De Profundis."

Mr. Muench will present Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 4 for strings; the Symphony in C major, Dittersdorf; Richard Strauss' "Metamorphoses" for 23 solo string instruments, and Milhaud's "La Creation du Monde," as his program for Saturday night, July 12.

On Sunday afternoon, July 13, Mr. Muench will present the final three symphonies of Mozart, in E flat, G minor, and C-major . ("Jupiter"). On Saturday night, July 19, Mozart's "Litaninae" and a piano concerto will open the program, Lukas Foss appearing as soloist. Mr. Muench will conduct Schubert's Mass in G major on this program and repeat it on Sunday afternoon, July 20. On his final program he will ipen with the presentation of two symphonies of Haydn, No. 99 in E Flat, and No. 86, in D Major, ("The Paris").

Music Shed Concerts

During the following three weeks concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed, will be given on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, the usual schedule followed by the ochestra for the summer festival series. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each, in two week ends, and Leonard Bernstein will conduct one in the last.

In another week or two the Berkshires will be invaded by metropolitan visitors who will take a drive out to the country to enjoy the spring scenery. Because Berkshire Hills have so much to offer, they are the favorite spots of thousands of visitors from Connecticut and New York state cities.

The area is full with beautiful vistas from the tip of Mt. Greylock in North Adams to the pinacle of Mount Everett at the other end of the county. In Mt. Washington, one of the favorite drives and view-spots is the Shadowbrook scene on the Lenox-Richmond road, a few hundred yards above the entrance to Shadowbrook grounds. It is exactly two miles from Lenox center, and about a half-mile from the Tanglewood music center. To make the visitor's view of the countryside more interesting a large bronze plaque has been placed on a boulder nearby, and inscribed on the plaque are the names, and heights of many of the interesting points seen from that vantage spot. The geographical information is of great interest.

The inscription reads, "Stockbridge Bowl, (Lake Mah-Keenac) altitude, 925 ft.; Warner Mountain, South East of Great Barringotn, altitude, 2112 ft.; Monument Mountain, Great Barrington, altitude, 1750 ft.; Tyringham Cobble, near Appalachian Trail; altitude, 1310 ft.; Mount Everett, The Dome, altitude, 2602 ft.; Jacob's Ladder, altitude, 174 ft.; West Stockbridge Mountain, altitude, 1828 ft."

"Go forth under the open sky And listen to Nature's teachings."
—Bryant.

Erected by the Stockbridge Bowl Association, as a tribute to its founder, Anson Phelps Stokes."

"The Heart of the Berkshires."
Tanglewood and Shadowbrook.
This marker on the Lenox-Richmond road At 1200 Feet."

Spots of particular interest to visit

Personal Items

Mrs. William N. Bullard has returned to her home, "Highwood," Lenox, after spending the winter in Tryon, N. C.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. D. Stokes and children, Hueston and Sylvia, of Lenox, are vacationing in Bermuda.

Miss Rosamond Sherwood of "The Cottage," Stockbridge, has been entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Emmett of New York City.

Mrs. George O. Forbes of Rockford, Ill., and North Egremont, has opened her country home in North Egemont.

Mrs. Aubrey T. Barnes of North Egremont has returned after visiting her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Blodgett of Darien, Conn.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S. Morse and children, Jeffrey and Kate, of New York City, have returned to their home after spending several days with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Darwin S. Morse in Richmond.

Mr. and Mrs. Kimball Spahr and daughter, Carolyn, of North Egremont, have returned from a month's visit in Ojai, Cal.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Rossell have returned to their home in Sheffield, after spending three months in the South.

The Great Barrington Kennel Club will hold a match show Sunday afternoon at Egremont Tavern, with the judging beginning at 1. Mrs. Forrest C. Dowe of Chestnut Hill will judge the best in the show. Lloyd Case of Torrington, Conn., will judge the sporting, hounds, working group and best puppy, and Forrest C. Dowe will judge the beagles, non-sporting and children's handling class. Several top dogs in New England are to compete in the event. The Great Barrington Kennel Club is headed by Mrs. Darwin S. Morse of Richmond.

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 23 1952

U.S. Share Big in Huge Paris Expo; Most of $450,000 Outlay From Here

By ARTHUR BRONSON

Biggest international show of the year takes place next month in Paris—with credit for its consummation being due chiefly to U. S. enterprise. Event is the month-long Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom.

Show is world's largest in names and scope, embracing legit, opera, choral and symphonic groups from all over Europe and America. The U. S. is sending the Boston Symphony Orchestra, N. Y. City Ballet and Broadway's "Four Saints in Three Acts" production, plus six prominent authors to lecture.

Cost of the venture will run from $400,000 to $450,000, with 85% of the entire financing raised in the U. S. Festival isn't American, but international. And although the aim of the Exposition is to counteract totalitarian propaganda by showing the effect of liberty on artistic creation, it's entirely private; there is no state control or participation. Neither the U. S. Government nor any of its agencies are in it.

Financial success of the undertaking has been largely due to one man, Julius Fleischman. Co-producer of "Moon Is Blue," chief angel of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, and large legit investor, Fleischmann is chairman of the Expo's finance committee in the U. S. He raised 85% of the budget from private individuals, foundations and trusts here.

First U. S. En Masse

Expo, which starts next Wednesday (30) with a dedicatory concert at St. Roch Church, has some very unusual angles. It marks the first time for U. S. participation en masse in a European festival. Festival won't be just for the rich, or tourists, but all-embracive, with 250 seats set aside for every event for students and labor groups at nominal prices or for free. Events will also be broadcast behind the Iron Curtain by Radio Free Europe.

Probably the Expo's most important event is the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first European appearance. Orch is making a five-week trip, with three weeks for concerts. Tab for the BSO, including roundtrip fares, will run from $150,000 to $175,000, although some coin will be earned back from ticket sales and recordings. The N. Y. City Ballet is on a five-month European trek currently, and is giving one week of its Paris stay to the Expo, on a guarantee.

Expo is paying for roundtrip transportation of the "Four Saints" production, plus expenses for a week in Paris, tab being estimated at 25G. Opera will play a second week in Paris on its own, and may stay even longer there, with possibilities of further presentations in Germany, Italy and Scandinavia. Ethel Linder Reiner, who is associated with ANTA in presentation of "Four Saints" currently on Broadway, is underwriting balance of the "Four Saints" European stay, after the Expo week.

U. S. authors participating include William Faulkner, W. H. Auden, James T. Farrell, Glenway Westcott, Katherine Anne Porter and Allen Tate. The U. S. is also sending some paintings to join an international art exhibit.

European groups participating—to show the Expo's international flavor—include the Vienna State Opera; Vienna Philharmonic; Paris Opera Orchestra, under Bruno Walter; Geneva Orchestra, under Ernest Ansermet; French National Radio Orchestra, under Igor Stravinsky; Paris Conservatory Orchestra; Berlin RIAS Orchestra; Lamoureux Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux; Strasbourg Chorus; St. Cecilia Acadamy of Rome orch and chorus; and London's Covent Garden Opera (in toto) with Benjamin Britten's opera, "Billy Budd."

[128]

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
APR 23 1952

Relaxed Faith Needed Amid High Tensions

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently performed Bach's "Passion According to St. John," the German text and its accompanying English translation were omitted from the program notes. A minority group had, it appeared, objected to the printing of the text—drawn largely from the Gospel of John.

Here is one more example of a tendency among minority groups of all descriptions to exercise an unofficial censorship over the activities of their fellow Americans. Roman Catholics succeed in having "The Miracle" banned. Jewish organizations keep "Oliver Twist" from being shown in the United States for two years. Southern communities ban "Pinkie" and other films dealing with black-white relations. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People attempts to suppress "The Birth of a Nation" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Legionnaires try to prevent the showing of "Death of a Salesman" because the author is listed in "Red Channels."

This is no question of minority groups defending their constitutional rights or merely protesting against publications and performances which they believe to be misrepresentative of their character and prejudicial to their interests. It is a question of their using the threat of boycott or similar coercive pressure to deny the majority of Americans the right to see these things and judge for themselves.

What is needed in this day of high tensions is a more relaxed faith in the common humanity of all groups and a more vigorous faith in the free interplay of ideas through every avenue of communication.—Christian Science Monitor.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
APR 22 1952

BERKSHIRE MUSIC AUDITIONS

Final instrumental auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center, the music school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass., will be held from 1 to 4 p.m. Thursday at Forsyth House, Washington University. Opera auditions will be held there from 2 to 4 p.m. Sunday.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
APR 24 1952

Paris: Symphony of Freedom

French Government Tourist Office: Associated Press

Paris Awaits Arrival of Charles Munch

Boston Orchestra Maps New Conquest

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

It has taken 71 years for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to follow its fame to Europe. More than once it has contemplated a European tour, only to find the high costs involved prohibitive.

But the Boston Symphony's visit this spring to France, Holland, Belgium, Germany, and England is facilitated by the American Committee of the Congress of Cultural Freedom. Thus the orchestra will have its share in the Exposition of the Arts to be held in Paris from April 30 to June 1. The aim of this exposition, originated and financed by private citizens, is to combat Communist cultural propaganda by demonstrating the validity and vitality of free men during the first half of the 20th century.

After the Boston Symphony's 71st season is concluded April 26, at Symphony Hall, several members will board a chartered Air France plane at Boston's Logan International Airport the following evening, to arrive at the Paris port of Orly at 2 p.m. the following day. The remainder of the 104 musicians will sail from New York aboard the Ile de France on April 28, and will arrive at Le Havre on May 4.

Auriol to Attend

On the morning of May 5 the orchestra will be settled in the Hotel Paris in the French capital. At noon the next day the orchestra will rehearse with its director, Charles Munch, who that evening will conduct it at the Paris Opera in its first concert for the congress. Distinguished members of the audience will include French President Auriol and possibly Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The program will betoken the modern musical culture of free nations. At the same time, it will present various facets of the tone and technique which are the distinctions of this orchestra. The composers whose music will be played are among those identified particularly with the Boston Symphony and with important phases of Munch's interpretative art.

Two present-day American composers will be heard at this initial concert—Samuel Barber whose Overture, "School for Scandal," will open it; and Walter Piston, whose Toccata will begin the second half of the program. The Second Symphony of Arthur Honegger will follow the Barber; Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloé Suite will conclude the program. The two Americans and Honegger have conducted the orchestra in Boston in their own works, and the latter has taught at the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, Mass.

Williams Fantasia

Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's director from 1919 to 1924, will conduct the second concert May 8, at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. He will play Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Milhaud's Suite No. 2 from the Music to Claudel's "Protée," and the Third Symphony of the American, William Schuman.

His concluding selection will be of extraordinary historical interest. It will be Stravinsky's epoch-making "Rite of Spring," of which Mr. Monteux conducted the two world premières—as a ballet on May 29, 1913, and in concert form on Aug. 5 a year later in the same theater. The Stravinsky and Milhaud both have been guest conductors of the orchestra, and the latter has taught at Tanglewood.

Proceeding to the Netherlands, the orchestra will play at The Hague under Munch on May 10 and the next day at Amsterdam under Monteux, who has conducted the Concertgebouw Orchestra there many times. In Brussels, Munch takes over on May 12, after which the United States Army will fly the orchestra to Germany.

At Frankfort on May 13 Monteux leads, and Munch on the following night in a free concert there for the Army Services.

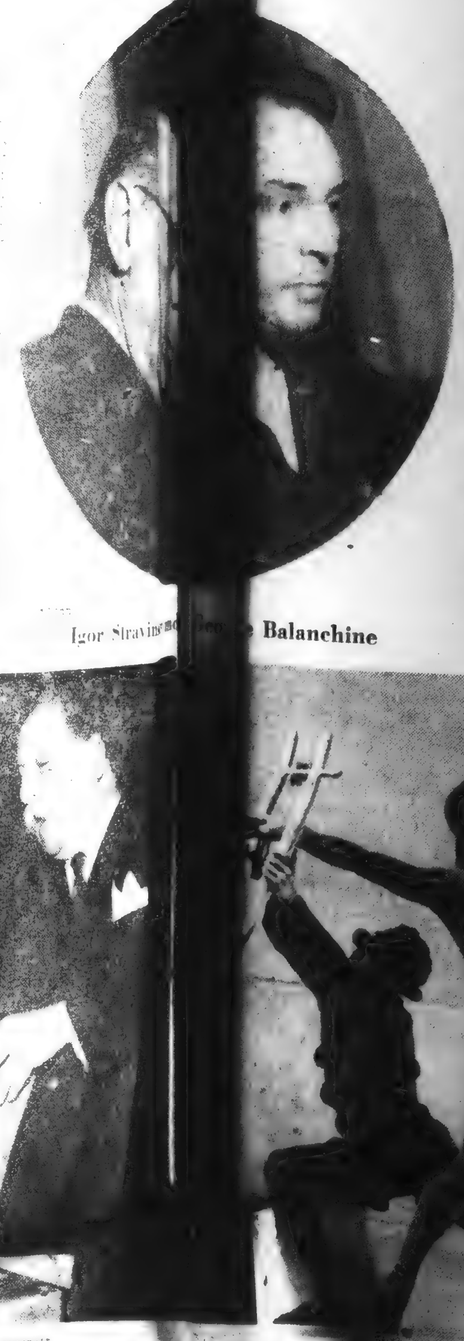
In Berlin on May 15 Munch resumes the baton, as he will in his native Strasbourg on May 17 and at Metz the next evening. At Lyons on May 19 Monteux leads, followed by Munch back in Paris at the Champs Elysées on May 21, to be spelled by Monteux at Bordeaux on May 25. Munch takes a second concert there next day and the concluding concert of the series in London on May 26.

Launched by Higginson

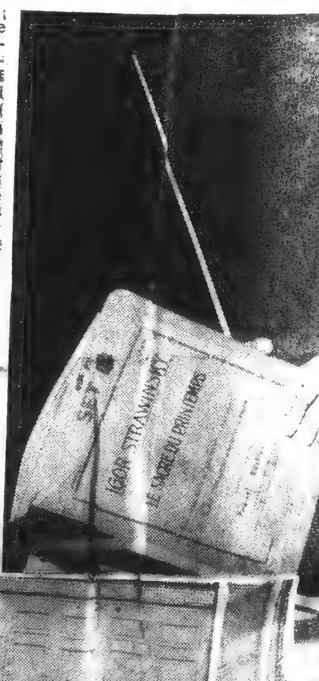
Besides the music already mentioned, the various programs will include works of Berlioz, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Roussel, and Hindemith.

The history of the Boston Symphony affords many points of merit for its selection as a major participant in the Congress for Cultural Freedom. It was established, and for 37 years maintained, as a cultural benefaction to the public by a distinguished American citizen Henry L. Higginson.

Since his retirement in 1917, a board of trustees comprised of private citizens has carried on in the same spirit. L. H.



Igor Stravinsky



George Balanchine

Lenscraft

Pierre Monteux

Stravinsky's 'Orpheus'—New

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch Conducting

Virgil Thomson, Composer

Freedom to Combat Communist Cacophony

Festival of 20th-Century Masterpieces To Spotlight Art of Unfettered Peoples

12 Orchestras . . .

By Harold Rogers

Monteux Premières

Pierre Monteux has conducted the first performances of many scores that have since been acknowledged as masterpieces of the 20th century. In Paris he presented the première of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" in 1912. In May, 1913, he directed the initial tumultuous performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" at the Theatre des Champs-Elysées, and it is interesting to note that on May 8, almost 39 years later, Monteux will conduct the same score in the same theater for the Paris Congress of Cultural Freedom.

... is Opera House and ... at the Théâtre des ...sées from May 11 ... 15. Ballets by George ..., Jerome Robbins, and ... will be danced to ... Ravel, Stravinsky, ... Chausson, Richard ... Hindemith, Prokofiev, ... and Tchaikovsky.

... Grand Ballet du Marquis ... will present the world ... of two ballets—"Cor-..." Henri Sauget (choreog-... by John Taras) and "Coup ... by Georges Auric (cho-... by Aurel Miloss).

Munch to Conduct

The Boston Symphony Orches-... —invited expressly by the congress to play concerts on May 6, 8, and 21—will make its first trip to Europe. The concerts by the Boston Symphony in Paris and for its European tour will be conducted by Charles Munch, its regular conductor, and by Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the orchestra and guest conductor. Both men are French-born.

A detailed report of the Boston Symphony's European tour appears in another article on this page.

Of the 12 orchestras, six will be ... Here they are, together ... their programs:

Lamoureux Concerts Orchestra. This ensemble will play the inaugural concert on April 30 at Eglise St. Roch. "Dedicated to the memory of all 20th-century victims of oppression," the program will be conducted by Fritz Munch, a brother of Charles Munch, and will include Bach's Magnificat and Francis Poulenc's Stabat Mater. Pierre Monteux will lead this orchestra at the Théâtre du Palais de Chaillot in the closing concert of the exposition June 1, for which Nicole Henriot will be piano soloist.

'Oedipus Rex'

The French National Radio Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky will conduct his opera-oratoria, "Oedipus Rex," composed to a text by Jean Cocteau, on May 19 at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Hans Rosbaud will conduct another performance of this work with this orchestra on May 20.

The Paris Conservatory Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky will conduct a performance of his own works at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysees on May 22. He will play the Symphony in C, Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, and Symphony in Three Movements. Monique Haas will be piano soloist.

The Paris Opera House Orchestra, Bruno Walter will conduct this group in a program on May 5 at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées that will include Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," Debussy's "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune," and Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde." Kathleen Ferrier will be contralto soloist for the Mahler.

L'Orchestre Colonne. This orchestra will provide the accompaniment for Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts," the opera that he composed to a text by Gertrude Stein. Mr. Thomson will conduct an all-Negro cast in this work at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 30 and 31.

New York City Ballet

The Champs-Elysées Theater Orchestra, Leon Barzin will conduct this ensemble for the performances of the New York City Ballet Company at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées from May 10 through 15. It also will provide the accompaniment for Vittorio Rietis new opera, "Don Perlimplin,' which will be produced on the same program with the world première of two ballets by the Grand Ballet du Marquis de Cuevas. Pierre Dervaux will conduct the Opera, Gustav Cloez the ballets.

Here are the five non-French orchestras—in addition to the Boston Symphony — and their programs:

L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande from Geneva. Ernest Ansermet, founder of this orchestra, will conduct two concerts (May 16 and 17) of works by Honegger, Hindemith, Martinů, Ravel, Roussel, Frank Martin, and Debussy. Henri Honegger, cellist, will be soloist for the first concert; Joseph Szigeti, violinist, for the second.

Soviet Compositions

The RIAS (Radio in American Sector) Symphony Orchestra of West Berlin. This orchestra will be heard in two concerts (May 23 and 24) under the direction of Ferenc Fricsay. The first will be devoted to works by Béla Bartók. The second will present compositions by Soviet composers which are not now performed in the U.S.S.R. and satellite nations, and works by contemporary German composers that were banned by the Nazis. The composers represented are Boris Blacher, Prokofiev, Shostakovitch, and Hindemith. These concerts will be held at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées.

The Orchestra and Chorus of St. Cecilia Academy in Rome. Igor Markevitch will conduct these forces in two concerts (May 28 and 29) at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. The first will consist of works by Cassella, Dallapiccola, Falla, and Milhaud; the second of works by Busoni, Malipiero, Roussel, Ravel, and Kodaly.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. This orchestra will be in the pit of the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées for the first performance in France of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck," to be conducted by Karl Boehm on May 2 and 3.

The Covent Garden Orchestra of London. Conducted by Benjamin Britten, this orchestra will accompany Britten's opera, "Billy Budd," in two performances (May 26 and 27) at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées.

An art exhibition of 150 20th century paintings will open May 5 at the Pavillon de New York, Musée de l'Art Moderne.

Lectures on literature, philosophy, and art will be given at the Sorbonne and at Le Centre des Relations Internationales by such authors as William Faulkner, W. H. Auden, James T. Farrell, Katherine Anne Porter, Glenway Westcott, Allen Tate, André Malraux, Ignazio Silone, Stephen Spender, and Salvador de Madariaga.

Composers Listed

... of the ... represented ... Nabokov ... Barber, ... Charles Ives, ... Edgar Va-...

...uest

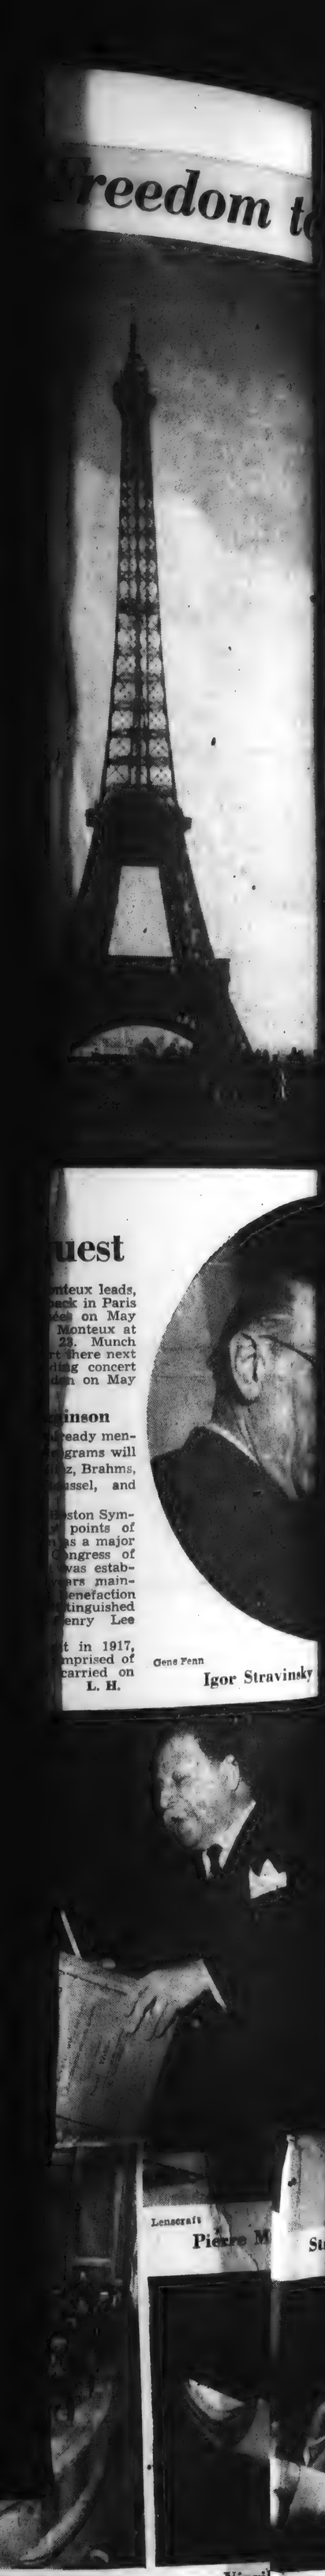
...nteux leads, ...back in Paris ...éâtre on May ... Monteux at ... 23. Munch ...rt there next ...ding concert ...den on May

...inson

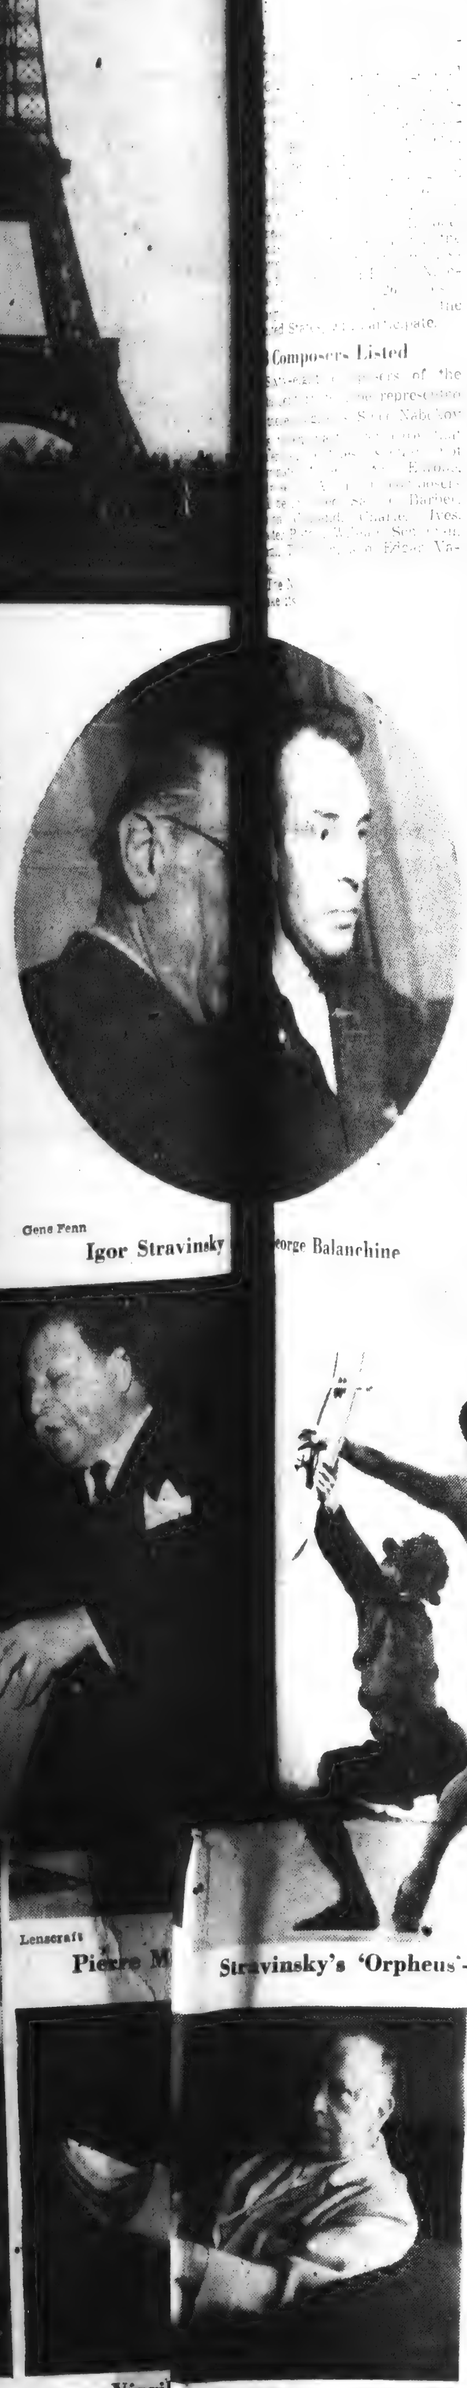
...ready men-...grams will ...z, Brahms, ...ussel, and

...ston Sym-... points of ...as a major ...ongress of ...was estab-...ears main-...benefaction ...tinguished ...enry Lee

...t in 1917, ...mprised of ...carried on L. H.



Igor Stravinsky

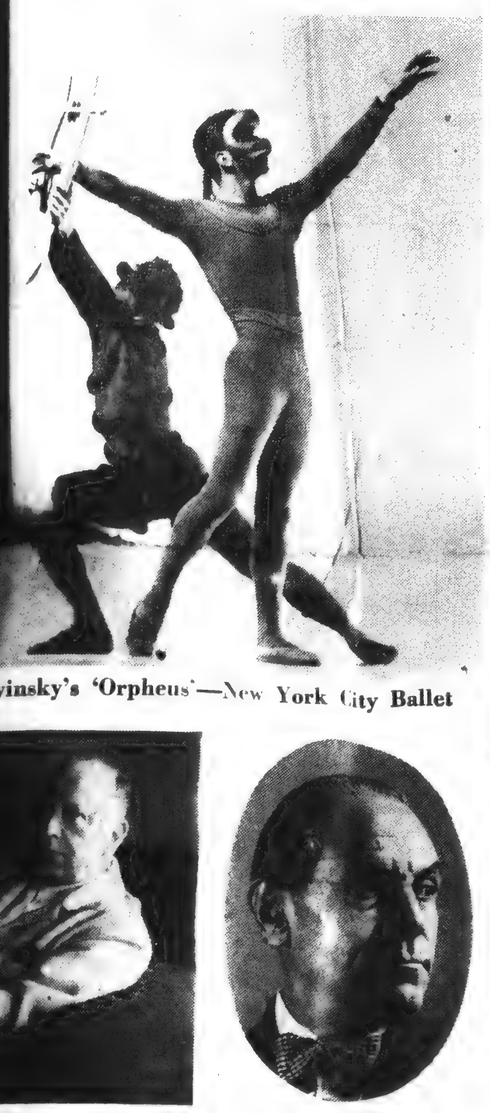


...orge Balanchine

Gene Fenn

...cting

Lenscraft



Pierre M...

Stravinsky's 'Orpheus'—New York City Ballet

Virgil ...

...itic and Composer

Vittorio Rieti

Bruno Walter

Ferenc Fricsay

French Government Tourist Office

Théâtre des Champs-Elysées

KELLEHER TRUSTEE OF ORCHESTRA

Fire Commissioner Named for Board of Symphony

MICHAEL T. KELLEHER
Hub fire commissioner, who has been named a Boston Symphony Orchestra trustee.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., announced yesterday the election of Michael T. Kelleher as a trustee of the orchestra. With Mr. Kelleher the board is increased to 16 members including former Governor Fuller, John Nicholas Brown of Providence, C. D. Jackson and N. Penrose Hallowell of New York.

MICHAEL KELLEHER SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

Continued From First Page

Boston members include Philip R. Allen, Theodore P. Ferris, Francis W. Hatch, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Jacob J. Kaplan, Richard C. Paine, Lewis Perry, Edward A. Taft, Raymond S. Wilkins and Oliver Wolcott.

Mr. Kelleher, fire commissioner of Boston, holds an honorary degree of M.A. from Tufts College and papal decorations, including the Grand Cross, Knights of the Holy Sepulchre and Knight of Malta.

Commissioner Kelleher is prominent in the social and civic life of Greater Boston. He was formerly president of the Clover Club, chairman of Cambridge Chapter, American Red Cross and commander of Middlesex County American Legion.

Defense Leader

Mr. Kelleher has just been elected chairman of the national executive committee of the United Defense Fund, Inc., and in 1945 was chairman of the Greater Boston United War Fund.

Mr. Kelleher's many business affiliations include directorship of the State Street Trust Co., Filene's, Boston Mutual Life Insurance Co., Union Freight Railroad, Sheraton Plaza Hotel and West End House. His clubs include the Algonquin, Cambridge, Downtown, Commercial and Merchants.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 25 1952

CITY FLAG to accompany Boston Symphony Orchestra on its forthcoming European tour being presented by Mayor Hynes to Conductor Charles Munch, extreme right, at final orchestra rehearsal of the season yesterday. Munch also received a gold-gripped baton from the Mayor. Watching are two trustees, Henry B. Cabot, extreme left, board president, and Supreme Court Justice Raymond S. Wilkins, second from right.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 25 1952

Kelleher Says Symphony Great Asset to Boston

"Wherever I have been in Europe, when people hear that I am from Boston, the question most frequently asked concerns the Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Michael T. Kelleher, Boston businessman and fire commissioner, who was yesterday made a trustee of the orchestra.

Election to that board of trustees is one of the most-prized recognitions of public service accorded Boston citizens.

"I think Boston people generally recognize the eminence of the orchestra, and its value to the city," said Mr. Kelleher. "But I wonder if businessmen of Boston realize what an actual asset the orchestra is.

"Many of them go to its concerts, or their wives do. But I would like sometime to see the Chamber of Commerce and the Associated Industries, as organizations, have closer contact with the orchestra so that they might realize how important is community-wide support of the orchestra.

"We don't want to have happen here what happened in Detroit. There the orchestra was allowed to fade out. It had depended almost entirely on the support of the individual. When that was withdrawn, it died.

"The Detroit business community discovered too late that the city had lost a very practical property."

Kelleher Named To Symphony Board

Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher, long active in the social and civic life of Greater Boston, has been elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra corporation.

Kelleher becomes the 16th member of the board, which includes former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, John Nicholas Brown of Providence, C. D. Jackson and N. Penrose Hallowell, both of New York; and the following Bostonians—Philip R. Allen, the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, Francis W. Hatch, M. A. Dewolfe Howe, Jacob J. Kaplan, Richard C. Paine, Lewis Perry, Edward A. Taft, Raymond S. Wilkins and Oliver Wolcott.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
APR 25 1952

Flag for Trip To Orchestra

The blue and buff official flag of the city of Boston yesterday was presented by Mayor Hynes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be carried overseas when the orchestra sails for Europe April 28.

The European concert tour, first in the organization's 71-year history, will be an anti-Red demonstration of the vitality of cultural achievements of the free western world. It is under sponsorship of the American Committee of Congress of Cultural Freedom.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 25 1952

CITY FLAG FOR ORCHESTRA

In the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Conductor Charles Munch, right, accepts from Mayor Hynes the flag of the city of Boston, to accompany the orchestra on its forthcoming first European tour. The Mayor also presented a gold-gripped baton to Mr. Munch. Left to right, at the ceremony: Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees; Mayor Hynes; Justice Raymond S. Wilkins of the State Supreme Court, a trustee, and Mr. Munch.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 25 1952

Orchestra Adds Trustee

BOSTON, April 25 (UP)—The number of Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees was increased to 16 with the election of Boston Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher to the board.

Kelleher whose election was announced last night long has been prominent in this city's social and civic affairs.

Michael T. Kelleher Elected Trustee of Symphony Orchestra

Michael T. Kelleher, Boston Fire Commissioner, has been elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., it was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, corporation presi ent.

With Kelleher's election, the board has been increased to 16 members. Others include former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, John Nicholas Brown of Providence, C. D. Jackson and N. Penrose Hallowell of New York.

KELLEHER . Page 9

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 25 1952

SYMPHONY TO START TOUR

Boston Orchestra Will Leave for European Visit Tomorrow

The 104-man Boston Symphony Orhcestra will leave for its first tour of Europe after the concert tomrrow ending its seventy-first season at Symphony Hall, Boston. Under the direction of Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, former musical director, the orchestra will play fifteen European concerts, the first in Paris on May 6, the last in London, May 26.

Mr. Munch, accompanied by the orchestra's manager, George E. Judd, will fly to Paris Sunday afternoon. The same day, a chartered Air France plane will leave from Boston with forty-four members of the orchestra, relatives, friends and music critics of Boston newspapers.

Mr. Monteux, his family and the remaining members of the orchestra will sail for Paris on the Ile de France Monday afternoon.

MICHAEL T. KELLEHER

KELLEHER

Continued from the First Page

Boston members include Philip R. Allen, Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, Francis W. Hatch, M. A., DeWolfe Howe, Jacob J. Kaplan, Richard C. Paine, Lewis Perry, Edward A. Taft, Raymond S. Wilkins and Oliver Wolcott.

Kelleher, long prominent in social and civic affairs, is a former president of the Clover Club, chairman of Cambridge Chapter, American Red Cross, and commander of Middlesex County American Legion.

A United Defense Fund Executive

He recently was elected chairman of the National Executive Committee of the United Defense Fund, Inc., and he was chairman of the Greater Boston United War Fund in 1945.

Kelleher holds an honorary M.A. degree from Tufts College and Papal decorations, including the Grand Cross, Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. He also is a Knight of Malta.

His business affiliations include directorships in the State Street Trust Company, Wm Filene's Sons Co., Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company, Union Freight Railroad, Sheraton Plaza Hotel and West End House.

His clubs include the Algonquin, Cambridge, Downtown, Commercial and Merchants.

Shoe production of the United States runs about 35 million pairs a month, or about 40 percent of the world's supply.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

Michael T. Kelleher Elected Trustee of Symphony Orchestra

Michael T. Kelleher, Boston Fire Commissioner, has been elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., it was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, corporation presi ent.

With Kelleher's election, the board has been increased to 16 members. Others include former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, John Nicholas Brown of Providence, C. D. Jackson and N. Penrose Hallowell of New York.

Boston members include Philip R. Allen, Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, Francis W. Hatch, M. A., DeWolfe Howe, Jacob J. Kaplan, Richard C. Paine, Lewis Perry, Edward A. Taft, Raymond S. Wilkins and Oliver Wolcott.

Kelleher, long prominent in social and civic affairs, is a former president of the Clover Club, chairman of Cambridge Chapter, American Red Cross, and commander of Middlesex County American Legion.

A United Defense Fund Executive

He recently was elected chairman of the National Executive Committee of the United Defense Fund, Inc., and he was chairman of the Greater Boston United War Fund in 1945.

Kelleher holds an honorary M.A. degree from Tufts College and Papal decorations, including the Grand Cross, Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. He also is a Knight of Malta.

His business affiliations include directorships in the State Street Trust Company, Wm Filene's Sons Co., Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company, Union Freight Railroad, Sheraton Plaza Hotel and West End House.

His clubs include the Algonquin, Cambridge, Downtown, Commercial and Merchants.

[141]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Brings Season To Close

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—This week brought the 26th season of [illegible] Symphony concerts, Paul Cherkassky at Jordan Hall concert, [illegible] Knox as piano soloist, [illegible] doubt the best of the [illegible]

[illegible] Symphony No. 93, [illegible] not been performed [illegible] many years, was an arrangement for Mr. Cherkassky [illegible] capable orchestra. This [illegible] work lacks some of [illegible] richness of Haydn's other [illegible] symphonies, but there are finer [illegible] with its charm the [illegible] listener—articulate craftsmanship and delicate lines which Mr. Cherkassky turned with good [illegible]

MISS KNOX had her troubles [illegible] keyboard however, in [illegible] Concerto in A major, K. [illegible] Her little-performed [illegible] with a Mozartean technical [illegible] But it seemed especially [illegible] because Miss [illegible] played a fine technical [illegible] precious Boston approval [illegible] first as a student and [illegible] as a matured musician. The orchestra itself did not respond fluently in accompaniment.

The concert, which also included Beethovens Leonore Overture No. 3, closed with a brilliant show of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture.

The program opened with Beethoven's Trio in G major which was published in 1798—a charming, often exciting piece of music. Mozart's Divertimento in E flat, K. 563 was expressively clothed in rich, yet not merely sentimental emotions. Paul Hindesmith's String Trio Op. 24, which was written in 1924, is a compelling and forceful piece—drive with a proper impetus and sonority.—F. S.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 26 1952

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was noteworthy for three reasons: It was the final concert of the 1951-52 season; it marked the first appearance of the New England Conservatory Chorus with the Symphony; and the program is to be repeated as the initial performance at the Paris Opera on May 6, to open the first European tour in the 71-year history of our world-famous orchestra. After tonight's repeat performance, the 104 musicians will leave by plane and boat to participate under the auspices of the American Committee of the Congress of Cultural Freedom in the Exposition of Arts to be held in Paris from April 30 to June 1.

The program includes two works by contemporary composers, Samuel Barber and Walter Piston. The former's overture, "The School for Scandal," a pleasant enough composition, in which the brasses, not to mention the woodwinds, are tempered to refined Gallic sensibilities. Mr. Piston's "Toccata," dedicated incidentally to Mr. Munch, a finely wrought essay in the baroque manner, will undoubtedly delight the cultural capital of Europe as it evidently has the cultural Hub of the universe. But if these are intended as our musical representatives at a kind of assembly of the nations, their flawless cosmopolitanism is to be deplored; for while they are smooth, well-mannered, and comme il faut, they do not speak with a distinctly American accent.

The remainder of the program lists works by three 20th century French composers: Honegger, Debussy and Ravel. Symphony No. 2 by Honegger, for string orchestra with trumpet obligato, is an appealing work in three movements. Composed during the occupation, the first movement expresses the mood of frustration and despair, the second movement becomes meditative, while the third expresses the renascence of faith in existence, culminating in a solemn chorale for trumpet and strings at the end.

Mr. Munch read Debussy's "La Mer" in the familiar manner, with a great deal of underplaying until the end, which becomes brassy and a trifle hectic. Undoubtedly his countrymen will like it.

Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." Suite No. 2, was brilliantly interpreted. The orchestral coloring was exquisite, every line and every shade of expression clear as glass. The version we heard yesterday was that which used the optional chorus; usually the choral parts are presented instrumentally. And there is only one adjective for the New England Conservatory Chorus rendering of these generally omitted parts—stunning. Expertly trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, the chorus dealt capably with the odd intervals and very impressively with a crescendo comparable to an orchestral fortissimo. On the wordless sound "Yah" this chorus achieved one of the most beautiful effects ever heard in Symphony Hall. The collaborating orchestra and chorus should not wait another 71 years to be heard in concert.

Bon Voyage to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TUCKER KEISER.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 26 1952

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Ends 71st Season Brilliantly

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch conducted the last Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday. The program, like that conducted by Pierre Monteux as guest a week ago, was a preview of some of the music the orchestra will play in Europe next month. It began with Samuel Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal," and included Honegger's Symphony No. 2, for strings; Walter Piston's Toccata; "La Mer," by Debussy, and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

With the repetition of this program tonight, the 71st season of this orchestra will have come to an end—the Boston part of it, that is. Musically and otherwise, this has been an eventful season. Some glorious music-making has been heard, from Mr. Munch and other great men of the baton.

The season has seen Mr. Munch afflicted by an unfortunate illness that kept him from the conductor's stand for three-quarters of the concerts. It has seen his recovery and return, for which thanks are devoutly given. And now the season concludes with the momentous departure of the Boston Symphony for its first visit to European countries. New vistas are opening for this musical glory of the United States, and a new chapter in its history is about to be written.

The orchestra leaves Boston at the peak of its form. You could not imagine any of the pieces of this program better played than they were yesterday. The tonal richness, the fire of Mr. Munch's propulsive conducting, the technical finesse, all were breathtaking. Honegger's Symphony, which expressively is concerned with the dark days of the Nazi occupation of Paris, is a finely-wrought and substantial work, ending with a trumpet chorale which affirms faith in eventual freedom. It requires a highly-disciplined string body to perform it well. Yesterday the Boston strings were a marvel of grace, precision and clarity.

Mr. Piston's bright and expertly-written Toccata is unpretentious but very satisfying music. Composed for the 1948 American tour of the French National Orchestra, it was first performed here by that ensemble under Mr. Munch. But until yesterday it had not been done by the Boston Symphony. Mr. Piston received cordial applause, which he acknowledged from his place in the audience.

I was especially interested in Mr. Munch's reading of "La Mer." His version had seemed unaccountably dry two years ago. But this time the music was lush as well as gorgeously-colored. Furthermore, it was subtle in detail and spectacular in its over-all effect as a mood picture of the sea.

Mr. Munch used in the "Dephnis et Chloe" music the optional wordless chorus, sung by the New England Conservatory chorus. I had never heard Ravel's suite done that way before, and it must be said that the voices contribute a mysterious, other-worldly shimmer of sound that instruments alone cannot produce. "Daphnis et Chloe" has been recognized as one of the Munch recreative masterpieces, with its splendor of colors and its power of rhythm. So it went again yesterday. At the end, the conductor singled out that fabulous master of the flute, Georges Laurent, for special attention in the farewell applause from the Friday audience.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
APR 26 1952

Pops Set for May Opening

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on the high seas this week for its first tour of Europe, the Pops will undertake their 67th season, nevertheless, with next Thursday, opening night.

Arthur Fiedler, renowned conductor of the Pops, has made this possible by gathering a new orchestra from far and wide. The 80 players of the Pops have been drawn not only from local talent but from orchestras of Western cities whose seasons have ended.

Fritz Siegal, the concert master at Grant Park in Chicago and otherwise prominent in that city will likewise take the first desk as concert master of the Boston Pops.

Adopting a custom prevalent in other cities but not in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has chosen his personnel strictly on merit with the result that there will be 10 women players in the orchestra.

The soloist each night of the opening week will be Eugene List, the internationally known pianist.

[132]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 26 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch [illegible] gave the 24th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The assisting chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, Lorna Cooke de Varon, director. The program:

Overture, School for Scandal.....Barber
Symphony No. 2 for strings.....Honegger Toccata.....Piston
"La Mer".....Debussy
"Daphnis and Chloe," 2d suite.....Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The final symphony concert of the season was, as it should be, as attractive, as beautifully done and as satisfying as anyone could wish.

It was especially interesting, too, for the fact that this program is the one the orchestra will make its European debut in in Paris on the night of May 6 at the Opera House. No one can of course predict the reactions of the French public in this sort of thing, but it seems to me to contain all the elements to insure a very favorable reaction both as to the orchestral performance and the music itself.

The theme of the first concert is music of the 20th century and his program contains two exceptionally fine American works, as well as established favorites by Debussy and Ravel (who are heard less often in France than might be expected) and a superb work for string orchestra by Honegger, that, because of its triumphant assertion that occupied France would one day be free again, surely touches the French heart more than ours.

Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," has long since entered the repertoire as an altogether infectious little piece filled with bustle, energy and high spirits. Its second theme is especially grateful to hear, but the whole is informed with wit and wry merriment and it is a technical whirlwind all the way through.

Much the same might be said of Walter Piston's "Toccata," receiving its first performance at these concerts (it was composed for and first performed by the Orchestra National de France). Its thematic material is a little drier, a little less forward than that in the Barber, but its textures are cleaner, its mood is more serious, its character less pictorial, its textures leaner and more spare. It is, in fine, a splendid piece that goes right to its goal in a sure and telling fashion.

For myself, were I in charge of anything, I think I'd omit either the Barber or the Piston in this program and do Copland's Appalachian Suite instead. The Barber and the Piston have much in common, a little too much for the sake of real balance, while Copland's suite, certainly one of the most beautiful works ever composed by an American, is in sharp contrast. Perhaps it is too long, but no program is too long if the music is there.

Both "La Mer" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite are familiar fare at these concerts, and Mr. Munch's way with them is persuasive to the point of being electrifying. The Ravel was especially interesting for the use in it of the New England Conservatory chorus, which supplied the wordless melodic commentary on the scene. Its part in the work is very brief, for it appears only in the first and the final scene, and Ravel does not insist on its use for practical reasons. Yet it is plain to be seen that he knew exactly what he was doing in employing the human voice. It heightens the atmosphere, conveys a wholly new color and, in the closing moments, lends additional force and power to this stunning climax. A brief word at this point for Georges Laurent's performance of the extended flute solo in this work: it was exquisite, but then it always is.

So ends another season, a season of ups and downs but filled, nonetheless, with treasurable musical memories. And we can only say, as the orchestra leaves for its European adventure on Monday, bon voyage!

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 26 1952

Tanglewood Applications Up

The number of advanced students of music applying for summer enrollment at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., is greater than at this time a year ago. An attraction is the recent announcement that all advanced students will receive grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund. An Egyptian from Cairo will study composition, and another young composer has been accepted from Tel Aviv, Israel.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS
APR 24 1952

REUNION IN BOSTON—Conductor Victor Alessandro, seated, of the San Antonio Symphony, pays a surprise visit to Boston Symphony Hall for a chat with members of the San Antonio orchestra who will be playing Boston "Pops" concerts this summer. They are, standing left to right, Leland Lincoln, oboe; Leland Munger, clarinet; Richard Mackey, horn; John Hicks, flute, and Eugene Lacritz, clarinet. Alessandro returned Tuesday night from an auditioning trip to New York, Chicago and Boston in time to conduct rehearsals for the Queen's Coronation Thursday night.

The Atlanta Journal
★ AND ★ AMUSEMEN
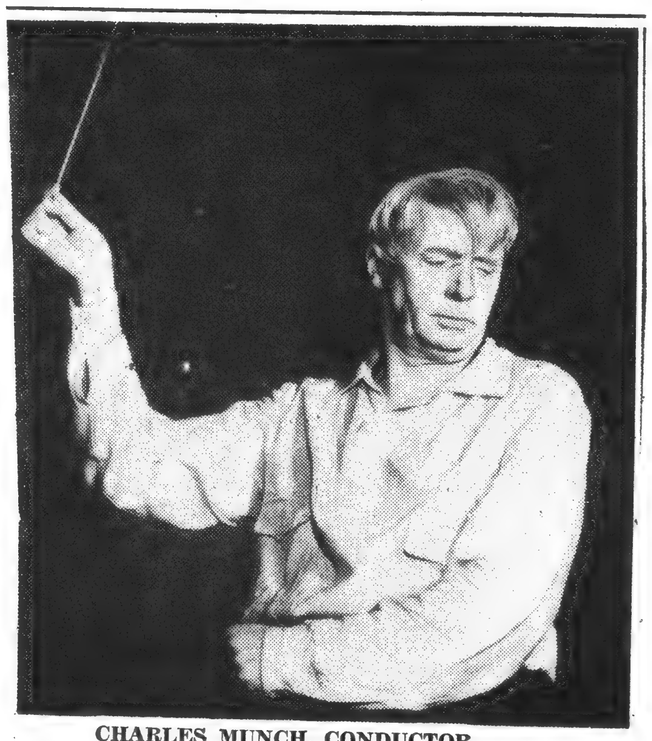
TION
• Theaters



CHARLES MUNCH, CONDUCTOR
Boston Symphony Orchestra

TIGHT BINDING

Getting Boston Symphony to Paris Big Job of Packing

Jack-of-All-Trades Harvey Genereux Faced With All Sorts of Problems—Seven Tons of Equipment Least Trouble

GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

[illegible] just come in by mail. The orchestra has a way of getting [illegible]. It has always worked pretty well in the past. It probably will for [illegible].

[illegible] is planning transportation [illegible] right at present, so far as [illegible] to Europe is concerned, [illegible] much he can do about [illegible] Manager George Judd [illegible] with the details of the [illegible] Paris is all set. What comes [illegible] nobody knows right now, [illegible] Mr. Judd is in Europe.

The way the orchestra moves, to hear Tod Perry tell it, is pretty simple. And "Generous" Harvey, [illegible] whittling out batons with a [illegible] knife for his many customers, [illegible] his spare time back stage, smilingly agreed.

The trip to Europe will be done, according to Messrs. Perry and Harvey, exactly the same as the [illegible] concert tour of the orchestra, which at this writing is a little whirl through New London, Conn., New York and Philadelphia.

The orchestra carries about seven tons of equipment, plus 110 men who play, three baggage men, two librarians, the conductor, and usually Symphony instruments waiting for transportation as orchestra goes on tour. A harpist prepares to pack his harp.

A group of double bass cases await Harvey Genereux and his handy truck. On the truck is one of the 100 or more personal trunks of the Symphony players.

Manager Judd and Assistant Manager Perry.

Between cities, it takes two day coaches for daytime travel and five sleepers at night, plus one 70-foot baggage car. With the smaller European railroad equipment, Mr. Perry doesn't know just how much of a train he will have to assemble, or how many baggage cars it will require to convey that seven tons of equipment.

If jumps are made by bus, as short ones such as Providence, R. I., usually are, it takes three buses and a king-size trailer truck. Bus travel may be used in Europe. That's just another detail that Mr. Judd is to bring back to Boston with him.

Incidentally, when the orchestra travels by day coach, one car is for smokers, the other for non-smokers.

Take Families

Members of the orchestra take care of the details of lodging and food individually while on tour in this country, for which they receive added reimbursement. The same plan will be followed during the European tour, according to Mr. Perry. Incidentally, quite a few of the symphony musicians are planning to take their families along but that, according to the management, will be strictly on a Dutch treat basis.

As many of the men will want to practice on the way over, arrangements will be made to have available luggage placements aboard ship so that they can get get at their instruments.

On tour each man has a trunk of his own, in which the smaller instruments, such as violins, flutes and lesser horns are carried along with their necessary wardrobe.

Breaking down that seven-ton load of equipment, Mr. Harvey obligingly pointed out some of the heavier pieces, resting peacefully between trips in the basement of Symphony Hall. The lot includes about 135 pieces, ranging from small crates containing the 60 folding metal music stands, to the gigantic cases especially built for the timpani, or kettle drums, which weigh in the neighborhood of 400 pounds apiece. The double bass cases rank next in size, with the harp cases a close third.

Among the various special items are cases for the stools for the bass viol players and the timpani men; the canvas case for the podium; 'cello cases, each about the proportions of a good-sized dog house; cases for the big brass horns; a music trunk; a case for the special 'cellist chairs, they have to be higher; one big prop case in which goes anything "generous" that can't manage to fit in anywhere else and special cases, yet to be built by Mr. Genereux for the chimes and the bell set owned by the orchestra.

Pops nobody seems to know. More details to be supplied by Mr. Judd.

Costs involved are also being discovered by Mr. Judd in Europe, and Mr. Perry is going to have a busy [illegible]ime figuring when he gets back, [illegible]or he is the man with the checkbook when the band is on tour.

Oh yes, "Generous" Harvey is [illegible]rrying his beloved complete sets of tools abroad with him, a hammer, a screw driver and a pair of pliers. He's kept the orchestra going so far with them, he says, and he thinks they might come in handy in Europe.

Home Town

There is a possibility, according to Mr. Perry, that some of the larger instruments may be left behind and others, just as good supplied in Europe. Even the much travelled metal music racks may be given a furlough for the duration of the European tour. More details to be decided when Mr. Judd comes back and tells exactly what he has been able to arrange.

Paris is the only known destination of the proposed tour at present. There will be a series of concerts there. The rest of the tour which will comprise about 15 concerts in all, according to present plans, will include possible stops at Strasbourg, Zurich, Switzerland; Frankfort and Munich, in western Germany, Bordeaux, France, and possibly, London if there is time. Strasbourg is Conductor Charles Munch's home town, so that's a must.

The tour will start as soon as possible after the closing concert of the regular season, on Saturday night, April 26, and will last through the month of May.

What's going to happen to the [134]

Seventy-First Boston Symphony Season Closes

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 27 1952

Boston Symphony Leaving for European Tour

A group of Boston Symphony Orchestra members, some of whom will be accompanied by their wives, will board a specially-chartered Air France Constellation at Boston airport tomorrow for a fight to Paris and the orchestra's first European appearance on May 6.

The flying musicians — flight time is scheduled for 12 noon (EDT)—will be joined abroad by the remainder of the orchestra's personnel, sailing from New York tomorrow aboard the French Lines' Ile de France.

The orchestra concluded its 71st Boston season last night.

SERIES OF CONCERTS

The world-renowned Boston organization will play a series of concerts in 13 cities and six countries during their first tour of the Continent. Sharing the conducting honors will be Charles Munch —back with the Boston Symphony following a long illness—and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Several Paris appearances will provide a major contribution from this country to the month-long Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by The Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The theme of the exposition will focus attention on the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The exposition committee of the Congress' American affiliate, headed by Julius Fleischman of Cincinnati, is providing the funds from private philanthropy to send the 104-piece Boston Symphony abroad.

PRE-FLIGHT PARTY

Thrty-five members of the orchestra will be on hand for the takeoff tomorrow. They will be pre-flight guests of the American Federation of Musicians at a bon voyage cocktail party at the airport. Later, they will dine aboard the plane, cutting up a cake made in the shape of a violin and prepared by Air France's New York chef.

Mr. Munch, Alsacian-born conductor who became director of the Boston orchestra in 1949, will lead the symphony in its initial appearance at the Paris Opera House on May 6. On this occasion, President Vincent Auriol of France and the National Guard of Honor of France will be among those in the audience.

This, and a second concert to be conducted by Mr. Monteux at Paris' Theatre des Champs-Elysees on May 8, will be devoted to the 20th century, European and American music.

Mr. Monteux' program will take the form of a historical recreation of a performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," almost 39 years after he introduced the work in the same theater.

The symphony will go by train the The Hague where Mr. Munch will conduct on May 10. Mr. Monteux will direct in an Amsterdam appearance the following day.

MUNCH'S BIRTHPLACE

The orchestra will visit Mr. Munch's birthplace on May 17, performing in Strasbourg where the conductor once served as a violinist in the Strasbourg orchestra and taught at the conservatory. The consert will be at the Free Europe University in Exile and will be broadcast by arrangement with Radio Free Europe and through Voice of America facilities to Russia and the satellite countries.

Several performances are planned in Germany for Germans and American troops stationed near Frankfort. Other visits will be made to Brussels, Turin, Italy; and Lille, France.

Munch Features Music To Be Played in Paris

By Harold Rogers

The seventy-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to a close tonight with the twenty-fourth pair of concerts in the week-end series. Since the program is identical with the first one to be played by the orchestra at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris (on May 6 at the Opera House) it does not include such traditional season-closers as the Beethoven Fifth or Ninth, or the Brahms First.

It was devoted instead to twentieth-century music in keeping with the aims of the Paris exposition—to demonstrate that the past 50 years have produced a vital and valid list of artistic achievements in the free countries of the world.

* * *

Charles Munch has therefore chosen Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Honegger's Symphony No. 2, for String Orchestra; Piston's Toccata; Debussy's "La Mer"; and Ravel's Suite No. 2 from "Daphnis et Chloé." In the last number Ravel's auxiliary choral parts were included, sung by the New England Conservatory Chorus as prepared by their conductor, Lorna Cooke deVaron.

The Barber overture (1932), last performed at these concerts in 1950, again revealed itself as a brilliant piece of writing, witty and amiable, often explosively apropos. It will not only provide an exciting opening to the Paris concert, it will also offer much in the way of American scholarship and style.

* * *

In the Honegger Second we find the many threads of gripping tension that become so tightly drawn in the Fifth. First heard in America when Mr. Munch made his own debut with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 27, 1946, the Second is apparently Honegger's impression of occupied Paris in 1941, the year of its composition.

Whatever the composer's intentions, one can clearly sense the mood of unrest throughout—the suspenseful waiting and portentous agitation of the opening Molto moderato, the sighing and yearning of the Adagio mesto, the struggle and aspiration of the final Vivace non troppo, at the conclusion of which the trumpet sounds a chorale of spiritual triumph.

Like the rays of the sun streaming to earth through a parting of storm clouds, the chorale sings eloquently of faith and victory. Here is another example of Honegger's mature period and further evidence that he is, along with three or four others, one of the great composers of today.

* * *

Though Piston's Toccata was given 41 performances when Mr. Munch took the Orchestre National de France on its American tour in 1948, it was heard at these concerts for the first time yesterday. Here again we witness the composer's talent for trenchant statement, unity of form, and an original style set forth in contemporary colors.

The lively toccata theme is developed by means of an intriguing fugato. It is relieved by a slower, lyrical section that soon waxes boldly rhapsodic. The toccata theme then returns for a snowballing climax. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Piston will be represented at the Pops concerts next season.

Debussy's "La Mer" of course was heard earlier this season when Ernest Ansermet was guest conductor, yet its iridescent colors always beckon the imaginative anew. Mr. Munch evoked seascapes and moods with shimmering lights in the "Jeux de vagues" and the "Dialogue du vent et de la mer" swirled gustily.

The optional choral parts in Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" consisting of vocalise on the syllable "ah," add immensely to the effectiveness of the score. Though they are never missed when not included, Mr. Munch has used this version last summer at the Berkshire Music Festival. It is even more exciting when the within four walls where the voices can sing to better effect. Mr. Munch whipped the ballet ramb into a fleecy of dramatic motion—a stirring climax, certainly, to a season.

Bon voyage à Paris, Messrs.

Arthur Fiedler will open the spring season of the Boston Pops Orchestra Thursday evening in Symphony Hall.

Boston Pops Open Thursday

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on the high seas this week for its first tour of Europe, the Pops will undertake their 67th season with Thursday as opening night. Arthur Fiedler, noted conductor of the Pops, has made this possible by gathering a new orchestra from far and wide. The 80 players of the Pops have been drawn not only from local talent but from orchestras of western cities whose seasons have ended.

Fritz Siegal, concert master at Grant Park in Chicago and otherwise prominent in that city, will likewise take the first desk as concert master of the Boston Pops. Adopting a custom prevalent in other cities but not in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has chosen his personnel strictly on merit with the result that there will be 10 women in the orchestra. Musicians from orchestras in the following cities will be represented: Chicago, Cleveland, Dallas, Detroit, Hartford, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, and San Antonio.

* * *

Refreshments will be served at the tables throughout the concert and in the balconies during intermission. The Pops will be given each night from Thursday through Sunday.

The broadcasts over Symphony Hall's station WGBH will be continued with broadcasts of the Saturday programs complete.

The soloist each night of the opening week will be Eugene List, pianist, and for the second week Jesús María Sanromá, a long-standing Pops favorite.

Snow Organ Recital

Francis W. Snow, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, will present a Bach recital in this church on Sunday afternoon at 4:30. He will be assisted by his daughter, Frances Snow Drinker, flutist. The program, to which the public is invited, will include the Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, the Largo from Sonata No. 5, the Fugue in G, and Aria.

THE CONCERTS

Sunday Post 4/27

Even though the Boston Symphony will be on the high seas, headed for Europe, the Pops will go on through May. Thursday through Sunday. Arthur Fiedler has recruited an orchestra of 80, drawing upon local talent and on the orchestras of Chicago, Cleveland, Dallas, Detroit, Hartford, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and San Antonio. The program for the Thursday through Saturday concerts appears elsewhere on this page. Sunday night will be M. I. T. night, with a somewhat different list.

SYMPHONY HALL
CO 6-1492
67th Season
Opens
Thurs., May 1
at 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR
Every Thur.-Fri.-Sat. & Sun.
During May
Table Seats $2.50
1st Balcony $1, $1.50
ADMISSION 50c

Sunday Post
April 27

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Boston Symphony Will Open Series Here In October

As it has in many years past, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the 1952-53 Bushnell Symphony Series the date now definitely set as Monday, October 20, it has been announced by William H. Mortensen, Bushnell Memorial managing director. The Boston ensemble, long a favorite with Hartford music lovers, will be followed a month later by the Danish State Symphony Orchestra under the baton of F[illegible] and in subsequent years by the Cleveland, Pittsburgh and New York Philharmonic orchestras.

Subscriptions are now being received at Bushnell Memorial for the Boston Symphony concerts. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will lead the symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera House. The event will be honored by the presence of President Vincent Auriol of France, state, diplomatic, civic and military officials, and the world's most distinguished audience. A crowd much as [illegible] will be present a few months. Completing its [illegible] ton season last night, it will leave for Paris tomorrow and [illegible] for the first of a series of European concerts on May 6. It will travel to The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Strasbourg, Turin, Bordeaux and Lille for concerts during May, returning to this country at the end of the month.

Charles Munch will [illegible] musicians to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood where he will open his first season as director of the center, which has become widely known throughout the East.

[135]

...on Closes

Arthur Fiedler will open th... spring season of the Boston Po... Orchestra Thursday evening ... Symphony Hall.

...resented at the Paris exposit... by this work: yet one cannot h... feeling that one of his symphon... would show American music ... better advantage—his Third, ... instance.

* * *

Debussy's "La Mer," of cour... was heard earlier this sea... when Ernest Ansermet was gu... conductor, yet its iridescent col... always beckon the imaginati... anew. Mr. Munch evoked seasca... moods with shimmering lights ... in the "Jeux de vagues," and ... "Dialogue du vent et de la m... swirled gustily.

The optional choral parts ... Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," c... sisting of vocalization on the s... lable "ah," add immensely to ... effectiveness of the score, thou... they are never missed when ... included. Mr. Munch first gave ... this version last summer at ... Berkshire Music Festival. It ... even more exciting when he... within four walls where ... voices can ring to better effe... Mr. Munch whipped the dit... ramb into a frenzy of drama... motion—a stimulating clim... certainly, to a season.

Bon voyage à Paris, Messieu...

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 27 1952

...on Symphony
...Open Series
...e In October

...has in many years past, ...ton Symphony Orchestra ... the 1952-53 Bushnell Sym... ...eries, the date now defi... ...t as Monday, October 20, ...en announced by William ...ersen, Bushnell Memorial ...g director. The Boston en... ...long a favorite with Hart... ...ic lovers, will be followed ... later by the Danish State ...y Orchestra under the ... Eric Tuxen, and in the ...nt winter months by the ...t, Philadelphia and New ...ilharmonic-Symphony or...

...iptions for the 1952-53 sor... ...now being accepted at the ... Memorial.

... Munch, conductor of the ... Orchestra since he was ... succeed the late Serge ...zky, will conduct the ... concert.

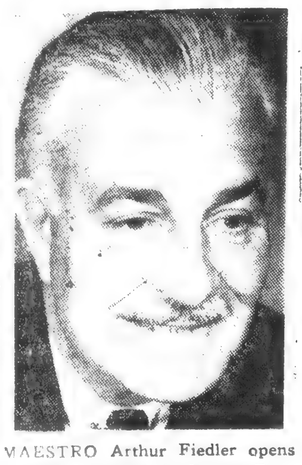
...ted Boston organization, ...d one of the greatest of ...'s symphonic groups, will ...ch activity into the next ...ths. Completing its Bos... ...n last night, it will sail ... tomorrow and play there ... of a series of European ...on May 6. It will travel ...ague, Amsterdam, Brus... ...kfort, Berlin, Strasbourg, ...rdeaux and London for ...during May, returning to ...try at the end of the ...

...Munch will then take his ... to the Berkshire Music ... Tanglewood where he ... his first season as di... ... the center, which has ...idely known throughout

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 27, 1952

Pops Begin 67th Season Thursday -

Fiedler Opens 67th Season of Boston Pops Thursday Night



MAESTRO Arthur Fiedler opens the 67th season of the Boston Pops in Symphony Hall Thursday night.

...will be the same with the ... exceptions. On Saturday ... Radcliffe College Glee Club will ... Sheila Post's direction ... of the performance of the ... Doll's Suite. Sunday ... Klaus Liepmann will conduct ... M.I.T. Glee Club at the same ... in the program.

Saturday and Sunday programs ...

AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON (CONCERTS)

ANNOUNCEMENTS for 1952 and 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

EUROPEAN TOUR Spring 1952
France, Holland, Belgium, Germany, England
Conductors, CHARLES MUNCH and PIERRE MONTEUX

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL Summer 1952
Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 5-Aug. 10
Conductors, CHARLES MUNCH, PIERRE MONTEUX, LEONARD BERNSTEIN

SUBSCRIPTION SERIES Season 1952/53
Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Brooklyn, New York, Washington
Conductors, CHARLES MUNCH, PIERRE MONTEUX and GUIDO CANTELLI

TRANSCONTINENTAL TOUR Spring 1953
Conductors, CHARLES MUNCH and PIERRE MONTEUX
Address inquiries to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

R.C.A. Victor Records

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 27, 1952

Boston Symphony Flies Today for France

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6.

Yesterday the orchestra completed its Boston season ... and a large contingent will leave Logan Airport by ... chartered Air France Lockheed Constellation for ... Paris. The remainder of the group will sail ... the Ile de France.

... leaders, with the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. This and a second exposition concert which Pierre Monteux will conduct at Paris' Theatre des Champs-Elysees on May 8 will be devoted to 20th Century European and American music.

Mr Monteux's program will witness a historical recreation: a performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring) almost 39 years after he introduced this epoch-making work in the same theatre.

The next day the orchestra entrains for The Hague, Holland, where Mr. Munch will conduct on May 10. On May 11, under Mr. Monteux, who often has led the celebrated Amsterdam Concertgebouw, it will perform in Amsterdam.

The Boston Symphony will visit Strasbourg, Mr. Munch's birthplace, May 17. There the conductor served as violinist in the Strasbourg Orchestra, and taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory. The concert in that city will be at the Free Europe University in Exile, and will be broadcast by arrangement with Radio Free Europe, and through Voice of America facilities to Russia and its satellite countries.

Several performances are planned in Germany, for German civilians and United States troops stationed near Frankfort, Brussels, Belgium; Turin, Italy, and Lille, France, are also included.

The tour will conclude with the orchestra's first appearance in London, at the Festival Hall on May 26, following which the orchestra will sail for New York from Southampton aboard the Ile de France on May 27.

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, APRIL 27, 1952

Boston Symphony Leaving for European Tour

A group of Boston Symphony Orchestra members, some of whom will be accompanied by their wives, will board a specially-chartered Air France Constellation at Boston airport tomorrow for a flight to Paris and the orchestra's first European appearance on May 6.

The flying musicians — flight time is scheduled for 12 noon (EDT)—will be joined abroad by the remainder of the orchestra's personnel, sailing from New York tomorrow aboard the French Lines' Ile de France.

The orchestra concluded its 71st Boston season last night.

SERIES OF CONCERTS

The world-renowned Boston organization will play a series of concerts in 13 cities and six countries during their first tour of the Continent. Sharing the conducting honors will be Charles Munch—back with the Boston Symphony following a long illness—and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Several Paris appearances will provide a major contribution from this country to the month-long Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by The Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The theme of the exposition will focus attention on the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The exposition committee of the Congress' American affiliate, headed by Julius Fleischman of Cincinnati, is providing the funds from private philanthropy to send the 104-piece Boston Symphony abroad.

PRE-FLIGHT PARTY

Thrty-five members of the orchestra will be on hand for the takeoff tomorrow. They will be pre-flight guests of the American Federation of Musicians at a bon voyage cocktail party at the airport. Later, they will dine aboard the plane, cutting up a cake made in the shape of a violin and prepared by Air France's New York chef.

Mr. Munch, Alsacian-born conductor who became director of the Boston orchestra in 1949, will lead the symphony in its initial appearance at the Paris Opera House on May 6. On this occasion, President Vincent Auriol of France and the National Guard of Honor of France will be among those in the audience.

This, and a second concert to be conducted by Mr. Monteux at Paris' Theatre des Champs-Elysees on May 8, will be devoted to the 20th century, European and American music.

Mr. Monteux' program will take the form of a historical recreation of a performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," almost 39 years after he introduced the work in the same theater.

The symphony will go by train the The Hague where Mr. Munch will conduct on May 10. Mr. Monteux will direct in an Amsterdam appearance the following day.

MUNCH'S BIRTHPLACE

The orchestra will visit Mr. Munch's birthplace on May 17, performing in Strasbourg where the conductor once served as a violinist in the Strasbourg orchestra and taught at the conservatory. The consert will be at the Free Europe University in Exile and will be broadcast by arrangement with Radio Free Europe and through Voice of America facilities to Russia and the satellite countries.

Several performances are planned in Germany for Germans and American troops stationed near Frankfort. Other visits will be made to Brussels, Turin, Italy, and Lille, France.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 27 1952

SET FOR EUROPEAN TOUR—Charles Munch, Boston Symphony conductor, is visited by French Consul Henri Charles-Roux who examines revised programs which the orchestra will play on its first European tour starting May 6 in Paris. Munch flies to Paris from Logan Airport tonight.

APRIL 27, 1952

BOSTON SUNDAY POST

SYMPHONY MEN GOING TO EUROPE

Orchestra Will Open Tour in Paris on May 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Having completed its 71st season last evening, the Boston Symphony is about to depart for Europe. Charles Munch and George E. Judd, the orchestra's conductor and its manager, will fly on a Pan-American plane at 7:50 p. m., today, while 23 members of the orchestra leave at 7, via Air France, all concerned departing from the Logan International Airport.

SAIL FOR LE HAVRE

The remainder of the 104 members, some of whom will be accompanied by their wives, will leave for New York on the 8 o'clock train tomorrow morning and board the Isle de France for a 4 o'clock sailing, bound for Le Havre. T. D. Perry, assistant manager, will also sail on that ship. At 2 o'clock officials of the French Line will give a reception for the members of the orchestra on board.

Special cases, along the lines of airplane luggage, have been made for the purpose of transporting the instruments, the players' baggage and the music. Immediately after last night's concert this luggage was taken to New York by truck. In Europe it will be transported by train or bus.

The members of the Symphony have it in their contract that they will not be obliged to fly to any destination. As it happens, the orchestra must go from Frankfort, where it plays on May 13 and 14, to Berlin by plane (the Berlin concert takes place on May 15, with Pierre Monteux conducting). Some four of the players are averse to flying, and in Berlin the orchestra must get along without them.

The tour opens in Paris on May 6 and ends in London on May 26. The Paris concerts, two in number, are under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which was responsible for the orchestra's going to Europe in the first place. The burden of conducting will be divided between Mr. Munch and Mr. Monteux, and other cities to be visited include The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Strasbourg, Lyons, Metz and Bordeaux. There will be 15 concerts in all. Sailing back on the Isle de France, the members of the orchestra, or most of them will take part in the Pop Concerts, which will be carried on through May by an orchestra specially recruited for the purpose and under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. This novel series of Pops begins next Thursday.

[1/16]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 28 1952

U.S., Overseas Students Seek Berkshire Music Center Tuition

The number of advanced students who have applied for enrollment at the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, is greater than at this time a year ago.

Attracted by an announcement that all students in the advanced, active divisions will receive grants for tuition from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund, young musicians from nearly every state and some foreign countries have asked for auditions, which are being held in centers throughout the United States by members of the faculty. Nearly 50 percent of the applicants are former students, some returning for the third season.

Those eligible for scholarship grants include members of student orchestra and chamber music groups, chorus leaders, students of orchestral or choral conducting, students of composition with Aaron Copland and with Luigi Dallapiccola of Italy, and those studying actively in the opera department. They will be required to pay only living expenses in the school dormitories or in guest houses or private homes in Lenox, Stockbridge and surrounding towns.

High interest is being shown in the Tanglewood Study Group, in which amateur musicians and music educators may enroll for two, four or six weeks at regular tuition rates.

The feature project of the opera department this season will be Mozart's seldom performed Opera Seria, "La Clemenza di Tito."

Applications for admission to the school and inquiries should be sent to Symphony Hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

Pops 67th Season Opening Thursday

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on the high seas this week for its first tour of Europe, the Pops will undertake their 67th season, nevertheless, with next Thursday, May 1 as opening night. Arthur Fiedler, renowned conductor of the Pops, has made this possible by gathering a new orchestra from far and wide. The 80 players of the Pops have been drawn not only from local talent but from orchestras of western cities whose seasons have ended.

Fritz Siegal, the concert master at Grant Park in Chicago and otherwise prominent in that city, will take the first desk as concert master of the Boston Pops. Adopting a custom prevalent in other cities but not in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has chosen his personnel stricktly on merit with the result that there will be 10 woman-players in the orchestra. Orchestras in the following cities will be represented: Chicago, Cleveland, Dallas, Detroit, Hartford, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, and San Antonio.

Refreshments will be served at the tables throughout the concert and in the balconies during the intermission. The Pops will be given each night from Thursday through Sunday.

The broadcasts over Symphony Hall's station WGBH will be continued with broadcasts of the Saturday programs complete.

The soloist each night of the opening week will be Eugene List, the internationally known pianist, and for the second week Jesus Maria Sanroma, the long-standing Pops favorite.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
APR 29 1952

Munch Flies for Paris

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left Idlewild Airport last night for Paris. The orchestra will make a European tour.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 29 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFF FOR EUROPE

BOSTON, April 29 (UP) —Some $213,000 worth of musical instruments and 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Europe-bound for the ensemble's first continental concert tour in history.

Twenty-two members and their wives—and $15,000 worth of instruments—flew late yesterday via Air France. The rest sailed on the Ile de France from New York.

The group will assemble in Paris May 6 for the first of 13 concerts under direction of Conductor Charles Munch. They will return early in June.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 29 1952

SYMPHONY GOES ABROAD

Boston—(UP)—Some $213,000 worth of musical instruments and 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were Europe-bound today for the ensemble's first continental concert tour in history. Twenty-two members and their wives flew late yesterday via Air France. The rest sailed on the Ile De France from New York. The group will assemble in Paris May 6 for the first of 13 concerts under direction of Conductor Charles Munch. They will return early in June.

Munch Leaves For Europe Tour

By the Associated Press

New York

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left by plane tonight for Paris and a tour of Europe.

Munch said the other members of the orchestra are going to Europe by ship and added that this is the first European tour for the group.

The conductor said he is looking forward to a concert in Strasbourg, France, his birthplace, on May 17. His brother, Fritz, is director of the conservatory there.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 29 1952

SENDOFF FOR SYMPHONY ARTIST—Eve, 6, left, and Amy, 5, kiss their father, Albert Yves Bernard, of West Newton, at Logan Airport as they and Mrs. Bernard see him off. Bernard and 20 other members of Boston Symphony Orchestra left by air for European concert tour.

[137]

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
APR 29 1952

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Off to Europe

Exclusive to The Chronicle
From the New York Herald Tribune

NEW YORK, April 28—Eighty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra left on the Ile de France yesterday, afternoon for Europe where the group will play for the first time. It will give 16 concerts in 21 days in 11 cities.

Other members of the orchestra went by air, including its musical director, Charles Munch. The associate conductor, however, Pierre Monteux, accompanied the musicians aboard the ship.

The orchestra will be the major American orchestral representative at the month-long artistic festival, "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," which opened yesterday at Paris.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 29 1952

Boston Symphony Enroute to Europe

Boston — (UP) — Some $213,000 worth of musical instruments and 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were Europe-bound today for the ensemble's first Continental concert tour in history.

Twenty-two members and their wives — and $15,000 worth of instrumentsflew late yesterday via Air France. The rest sailed on the Ile de France from New York.

The group will assemble in Paris May 6 for the first of 13 concerts under direction of conductor Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 29 1952

SYMPHONY GROUP OFF TO EUROPE

Playing in 13 Cities in Foreign Debut Next Month

Given a hilarious sendoff at Logan International Airport late yesterday afternoon, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many accompanied by their wives, last night were en route across the North Atlantic on a chartered Air France Constellation bound for Paris, where the orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6.

Continued on Page 4—Seventh Col.

Symphony Group Off for European Debut

BOSTON ENSIGN TO PARIS
Some of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shown with flag presented them by Mayor Hynes and which they are taking to Paris aboard an Air France Constellation for their European debut. Kneeling in front is Roger Voison and holding the other end of the Boston emblem is Rosario Mazzeo. The lady is Stewardess Solange Arnold.

Continued From First Page

While overseas the orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

Visits are also planned to 13 cities in six different countries and the orchestra will share the leadership of its director, Charles Munch, and his friend and colleague, Pierre Monteaux, who conducted the symphony in the seasons 1919-1924.

To Play For Troops

The orchestra will perform at The Hague and at Amsterdam as well as at Strasbourg. Several performances are planned in Germany for German civilians and for United States occupation troops stationed near Frankfort, Brussels, Belgium; Turin, Italy; and Lille, Metz, Lyons and Bordeaux, France, and Amsterdam and The Hague, Holland.

The tour will conclude with the orchestra's first appearance in London at the Festival Hall on May 26, following which it will sail for New York aboard the French Lines liner Ile de France on May 27.

Fortune in Instruments

When the symphony players left yesterday, they took with them musical instruments valued at many thousands of dollars.

The most expensive instrument aboard the plane was a violin manufactured in 1760 and valued at $8000. It is owned by Alfred Krips of 19 Garrison rd., Brookline, associate concert master for the symphony.

NEW YORK, April 28 (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left by plane tonight for Paris and a tour of Europe.

The conductor said he is looking forward to a concert in Strasbourg, his birthplace, on May 17. His brother, Fritz, is director of the conservatory there.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 2 9 1952

Symphony Sails

NEW YORK, April 28 (NYHT). Eighty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra left Sunday on the Ile de France for Europe where the group will play for the first time giving 16 concerts in 21 days in 11 cities.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SYMPHONY ABROAD

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Munch, Musicians Arrive in Paris;

Paris—(UP)—French conductor Charles Munch and 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived here yesterday aboard the liner Ile De France May 5.

The rest of the 104-member orchestra will arrive in France aboard a chartered Air France plane.

The orchestra will give three concerts in the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" Festival here under the direction of Munch and Pierre Monteux, French-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphonic Orchestra.

oup Off an Debut

PARIS
ony Orchestra shown with which they are taking to for their European debut.
cling the other end of the dy is Stewardess Solange

Symphony Orchestra, left tonight for Paris and a
Europe.
onductor said he is looking to a concert in Strashis birthplace, on May 17.
ther, Fritz, is director of nservatory there.

This Clipping From
ASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 29 1952

hony Sails
V YORK, April 28 (NYHT). members of the Boston hony Orchestra left Sun-the Ile de France for e where the group will or the first time giving 16
rts in 21 days in 11 cities.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 30 1952

SYMPHONY ABROAD
the time the 22 members of
Boston Symphony Orchestra
rn to the United States the places of the 18 cities in the different countries they play isit will have a better idea of t the name Boston means re can be no doubt but that the reption of the average American closely associated abroad with der and more boisterous tour-American movies have not ed to change the impression n the Boston Symphony Orstra the city has an institution which it may well be proud, a anization which can be comed favorably with any of its kind where in the United States. It d, any of its kind anywhere in world. Along with the fine sic it will bring to Europe it will o bring the best in those intanle assets which mark the world the finest of goodwill ambasdors.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 30 1952

Munch, Musicians
rrive in Paris;
Paris—(UP)—French conduc-
Charles Munch and 22 mem-s of the Boston Symphony Orstra arrived here yesterday ard the liner Ile De France
y 5.
The rest of the 104-member orstra will arrive in France
ard a chartered Air France
ne.
The orchestra will give three ncerts in the "Masterpieces of 20th Century" Festival here der the direction of Munch
Pierre Monteux, French-born ector of the San Francisco mphonic Orchestra.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LEAVES FOR EUROPE BY PLANE, BOAT

(Photos on Page 26)

Symphony Orchestra ... Ile de France, and will re-... here for the June 3 Pops ...

Hundreds of persons crowded ... new airport's international ... to see the 43-passenger ... flight by Air France Con-... take off. The trip had ... delayed a day by bad ...

... $198,000 worth of instru-... were Europe-bound on the ... France and another $16,000 ... with the Boston group.

(Herald Staff Photos by Maynard White)

BOUND FOR EUROPE—22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 21 relatives left Boston Airport late yesterday on an Air France plane for Paris, where they will begin a concert tour of 13 European cities. Albert Bernard, violinist, (in photo at left) kisses his daughters, Eve, 6, and Amy, 4, and Mrs. Bernard, goodbye at a waiting room gate as he leaves to board the plane. On a lounge bench (center photo), Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, has a last minute chat with his wife, Ruth Posselt, violinist. And (photo at right) Mrs. Ralph Gumberg, one of the lucky wives who made the flight, joins her oboist husband in warning their daughter, Stephanie Ellen, 18 months old, to be a good girl while they are away.

... knowns, was hammered down by ... and 3.

l Pipeline Workers Strike

orld's Day

... three Yugoslav pilots who changed course and landed their airliner in Switzerland claiming political asylum last October.

Conductor Charles Munch and 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Paris aboard a chartered Air France plane. The rest of the 104-member orchestra is to arrive in France aboard the liner Ile de France May 5.

Boston: Bus Line Pickets Try to Block Autos

The 50-day-old strike of Eastern Massachusetts Street Railway bus drivers almost broke into violence for the second successive day at Quincy, Mass., when a group of AFL pickets tried to prevent five automobiles from entering the company's Quincy yard, according to the United Press.

General Eisenhower scored more write-ins in Boston for the Massachusetts primary than did all other candidates of both parties combined. He led Senator Robert A. Taft by 2½ to 1 and nearly tied Senator Estes Kefauver in the popularity contest among the Democrats. [Page 2.]

More than 9,000 New England steel workers joined the national steel strike, which finds its largest center in this region at Worcester, Mass. [Page 2.]

Africa: Tunisian Police Quiz Daughter of Bey

Tunisian police say they are interrogating the younger daughter of the Bey of Tunis whom they suspect of supplying funds to "a secret terrorist organization" discovered April 27.

Weather Predictions: Sunny, Warmer (Details Page 2)

WOMEN MEMBERS OF NEW BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA with Arthur Fiedler at Symphony Hall last night. Left to right, standing, Frances Kessler, Nell Novak, Olivia Toubman, Mildred Shaw, Dorothea Jump, Lois Schaefer, Dorothy Alpert, Hannah Shaw, Front, Anne de Guichard, Fiedler, Ariel Hall.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1952

SOCIETY: Grenfell Sponsors Again Sell Out

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

First-night patrons of Boston's old and famous Pops have come more and more to be one with New England Grenfell Association supporters, for this group has for 10 years helped to open the Pops season here.

Last night, the start of the 71st season filled Symphony Hall with the familiar collection of little green tables and enthusiastic Pops listeners of all ages. And even as Arthur Fiedler raised his baton, Grenfell sponsors were surveying the sold-out house with pleasure.

Proceeds from this very successful evening mean a substantial sum for the life-saving work done by the four Grenfell hospitals, five nursing stations, three schools, a children's home and two hospital ships which serve a thousand miles of the Newfoundland and Labrador coast.

Congratulations were in order for members of the hard-working committee headed by Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard. Pretty blond Jane Kennard was in charge of the flower girls whose heaped trays of fragrant wares make a Spring-time touch.

Committee members included Gertrude Peabody, vice chairman of the benefit; Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. A. K. Billings, Mrs. Ludlow Griscom, Mrs. Theodore A. Greene, Mrs. Eldon MacLeod, Mrs. Robert G. Stone, Mrs. Charles F. Toppan, Mrs. George S. Fuller, Mrs. William R. Bullard, Mrs. Theodore L. Badger, Mrs. James T. Baldwin, Mrs. Lea S. Luquer and Mrs. Wyman B. Shaw (Rosamond Grenfell).

GOOD MUSIC is as attractive the year round as it is during the Winter concert season, and the Community Chorus will demonstrate this with its May performance.

The concert program, scheduled for the Wayland High School Auditorium Sunday evening at 8 will be by Bach, Handel and Brahms, as well as early madrigals and contemporary music.

The concerts, which are free, are supported by chorus members in Wayland, Weston and Sudbury. William Burt Jr., has just been elected president of the organization, which boasts 75 voices. Officers who have sponsored performances of Handel's "The Messiah" and Christmas concerts this season include John O. Post, Walter Stockmayer, Theodore Chandler and Edward Bassett.

FROM ARGYLLSHIRE, SCOTLAND, comes the announcement by Mr. and Mrs. James S. Hardie of Balgownie, Blairmore, of the engagement of their daughter, Marion Evelyn Stewart, to Rev. George Lewis Blackman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Blackman of Brookline.

Miss Hardie is a granddaughter of the late Sir James Watson Stewart and Lady Stewart of Balgownie, and of the late Mr. and Mrs. Henry David Hardie of Glasgow. She studied at West Heath School, Scotland, and graduated from Froebel Educational Institute.

Blackman, a grandson of Mrs. George H. Lewis of Brookline and Mrs. Arthur W. Blackman of Cambridge, prepared at Noble and Greenough School for Harvard. He graduated in 1948 from the Episcopal Theological School and is now a fellow in history at Cambridge University, England. A July wedding is planned.

VISITING NURSES will be out in force May 16. They and hundreds of friends of the Visiting Nurse Association of Boston will be at Boston Garden at a gala Circus Night. The full resources of Ringling Brothers, Barnum and Bailey will be at their command, and all the best seats in the house will be sold to help put the association in the black again.

The Gardiner Fiskes are taking a number of young guests to the circus. Others who have reserved boxes include Mr. and Mrs. Quincy A. Shaw Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Alexander C. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Pyemont, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ehrlich, Martha Chase, Mrs. Eldon MacLeod, Mr. and Mrs. Barclay Warburton, Gertrude Peabody, George C. Greener, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic A. Webster, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Harry E. Draper, Mrs. C. Adrian Rubel, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Simonds, Maj Gen and Mrs. Courtland Parker, and Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Loring.

Also interested are Mr. and Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley, Mrs. Eben Doolittle, Mr. and Mrs. Alan C. Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Harriet Robeson, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph B. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. John G. Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. Francis C. Gray, Mrs. Edith E. Chamberlain, Mr. and Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Barbara S. Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Augustin H. Parker Jr., Mr. and Mrs. William T. Snow, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre and Mr. and Mrs. Willis P. Beal.

THEATRE PARTIES by the dozen are being planned during the engagement of G. B. Shaw's "Heartbreak House" at the Brattle Theatre, for which the Institute of Contemporary Art is a co-sponsor.

Among those to entertain will be the Frederick A. Archibald Jrs., who will have Mr. and Mrs. Richard M. Grandin and Mr. and Mrs. William C. Haskins as their guests, and Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. Francis, who will entertain the Edmund Wrights and the Richard Lymans. The Frederick S. Wight's party will include the Edward Sawyers and the Fairman Cowans.

FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1952

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Pops Opening

At Symphony Hall last evening, the Pops began their 67th season, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the orchestra in the followin sprogram:

Washington Post ..... Sousa
Overture to "La Graza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Fantasia on "Greensleeves" ..... Vaughan Williams
Finlandia ..... Sibelius
"Pineapple Poll" Ballet Suite ..... Sullivan-MacKerras
Concerto in E flat ..... Liszt
Eugene List, Soloist
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesca
Selections from "The King and I" ..... Rodgers
Ranch House Party ..... Gillis
Blue Tango ..... Anderson
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet

By ELINOR HUGHES

It wouldn't be spring without the Pops, and it wouldn't seem like the Pops without Arthur Fiedler on the conductor's stand, so when Symphony Hall doors opened last evening for the start of the 67th season it was pleasant to find everything, including the debonair Mr. Fiedler, looking just the same. If the orchestra didn't sound quite as usual—a bit less assured in manner and less vivacious in manner, that was not altogether surprising: it wasn't, as you probably heard, the usual orchestra.

With the Boston Symphony in Europe for a month's tour, Mr. Fiedler has engaged capable musicians from all around the country—San Antonio, Chicago, Detroit, Washington, Pittsburgh, Hartford, Cleveland and Minneapolis—10 of them women. The ladies wore a neat approximation of the dinner jacket, with black skirts substituted for black trousers, and they lurked rather modestly behind their male associates, looking rather outnumbered but eminently competent.

The program, with the exception of a Richard Rogers medley from "The King and I," an inexcapable Enesco rhapsody and the farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," seemed soberer and less Pops-like than usual, though the audience whistled cheerily through Mr. Rodgers "I Whistle a Merry Tune" and demanded an encore of it, too. Eugene List was soloist for the occasion, as he will be through the remainder of the week ending Sunday night, and he gave a capable, careful and energetic performance of Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra.

A suite of tunes from "Pineapple Poll," the Gilbert and Sullivan ballet introduced a few weeks ago by the Sadler's Wells Theater Ballet, made its first, and very welcome appearance at these concerts, and another charming work was Vaughan Williams' fantasia on "Greensleeves." For the rest, there was a mingling of Sousa, Rossini, Sibelius, Gillis and Anderson, with the familar obbligatto of popping corks.

For this month only, Mr. Fiedler is planning a departure from the usual policy of nighly program changes. The same program, for instance, that opens Monday night will continue through the following Sunday, and the same soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will be the soloist at each concert. When educational and charitable organizations have taken blocks of seats, there will sometimes be additional groups of songs.

POPS PROGRAM

Eugene List is again the piano soloist as the Boston Pops orchestra presents the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

"Washington Post" March ..... Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Fantasia on "Greensleeves" ..... Williams
Tone poem, "Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
"Pineapple Poll" Suite ..... Sullivan Mackerras
Concerto in E Flat ..... Lizst
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
Selections from "The King and I" ..... Rodgers
Ranch House Party ..... Gillis
Blue Tango ..... Anderson
Farandole from "L'Arlessienne" ..... Bizet

8:30 P. M.

Fiedler's '9-Hour-Old Baby'

Pops Starts 67th Year With a Lot of New Faces

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Things weren't quite like old times at the opening of the Boston Pops 67th season in Symphony Hall last night.

You've probably heard that the Boston Symphony is on the high seas, en route to Europe, and that Arthur Fiedler, Pops maestro these many years, has a new band playing for him. Quite a band, too.

There's a reason. The players are drawn from the best of available Boston musicians, as well as personnel from other American symphony orchestras. Eighty strong including 10 women, they play with brightness and flexibility.

Program Innovations

"My nine-hour-old baby," Mr. Fiedler called his orchestra, since time had permitted only three rehearsals of three hours each. "And they're darn good," he added.

Mr. Fiedler was being conservative; its tone is brilliant. And it plays with a lightness which suits Pops.

At least a third of the members are Bostonians. Many are former Boston Symphony players, some retired, some who have transferred to other orchestras around the country. There's a college professor among them, a well-known string quartet player, several dance band musicians, a radio station musical director and arranger, a native of China and, of course, the 10 women who bring their own particular charms to Symphony Hall. There are also two husband and wife teams, Victor (violin) and Dorothea (violin) Alpert, Raymond (oboe) and Olivia (cello) Toubman.

Programs for the month of May will be played Thursday through Sunday nights and will be repeated for each night, with the addition of occasional Glee Club guests.

Last night we had Samuel Barber's Vaughan William's and Sibelius in the first third. The middle third offered Mackerras' Pineapple Poll ballet suite, composed of tunes by Arthur Sullivan. Eugene List played, with flair and fervor the Liszt E Flat Piano Concerto. The orchestra finally showed its mettle, both as ensemble and soloists, in Enesco's First Romanian Rhapsody.

Boo-Hoo Ray

The final section of the program was the lighter one beginning with Rodgers. The King and I's "Ranch House Party" and Gillis' "Blue Tango" with a pair of maracas, Anderson's "Plink, Plank, Plunk," which takes all the percussion in the orchestra, and (

"Finlandia" certain people rather than piece is not purple cloth [illegible] tions of Tchaikovsky's Symphony, "We [illegible] Baby and "Oh [illegible] Peter Boyce, a member of the Pops Orchestra, [illegible] ment, and when [illegible] he made the [illegible] ture. He did [illegible] handkerchief.

Things may not [illegible] Symphony Hall [illegible] refreshing and [illegible] Early in June [illegible] members return [illegible] familiar p[illegible]

...and Hollywood–Pops Season Opens–M...

Lively New Orchestra Conducted by Fiedler

By Harold Rogers

The new Pops orchestra, organized by Arthur Fiedler for the month while the Boston Symphony musicians are touring Europe, is every bit as good as the regular Pops orchestra, if not louder. Last night, when the sixty-seventh season opened in Symphony Hall, the new ensemble played with unexpected verve, precision, and fortitude.

If the audience seemed unduly reserved on this festive occasion, Symphony Hall itself was decked out in its spring attire—the apple-green walls, cabaret tables, and pretty girls selling gardenias and roses. The orchestra, responding accurately to Mr. Fiedler's energetic baton, blossomed with macrocosmic magnificence. No doubt was left on this opening day of May and this opening night of the Pops that Spring Is Here.

While the "face" of this orchestra looks different from the one that we're used to, it was heartening to discern, on closer scrutiny, the faces of many of Boston's younger artists—Ma Si Hon, violinist, Lois Schaefer, flutist, Lionel Casimiro, trombonist, and Everett Firth, timpanist, among others. The ten women in the orchestra include Dorothy Alpert, violinist (wife of Victor Alpert of the violas), and Olivia Toubman, cellist (wife of Raymond Toubman of the oboes).

♪ ♪ ♪

Among Mr. Fiedler's triple-forte offerings were Sousa's "Washington Post" March, Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Sibelius's "Finlandia," and Sir Arthur Sullivan's tunes from the ballet suite, "Pineapple Poll." As arranged by Mackerras, they have lost their authentic Savoy flavor and have assumed an Offenbach veneer. A welcome change in timbre was observed in Mr. Fiedler's sensitive performance of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on "Greensleeves" and of Leroy Anderson's pizzicato "Plink! Plank! Plunk!"

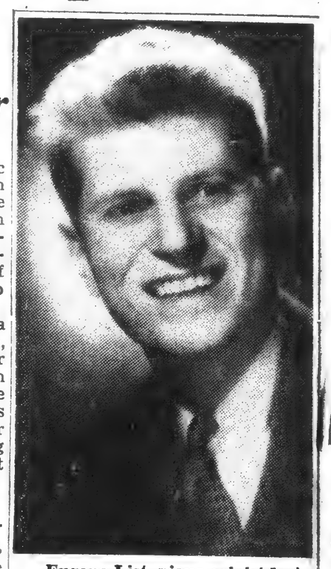
Eugene List, who is becoming a perennial Pops favorite in Boston, has returned to be the soloist for the four concerts this week. In the Liszt E-flat Piano Concert he may have felt impelled to key his instrument dynamically higher than the orchestra, an imposing feat that he successfully brought off.

♪ ♪ ♪

He was unexpectedly heavy-handed in the opening movement, though he gained some measure of delicacy in the slow section and great lightness and brilliance in the finale. The triangle apparently was also caught in this vortex, for it twanged rather than tinkled. Yet it was evident from the roar of applause afterwards that the listeners loved hearing Mr. List play Liszt.

Mr. Fiedler's program also included a selection from Richard Rodgers' "The King and I," Gillis's "Ranch House Party," and the current juke-box favorite, Leroy Anderson's "Blue Tango." A novelty arrangement of the popular tune "Cry" employed quotations from "Dry Those Tears," "Weep No More, My Ladies," and the Chopin Funeral March, together with various humorous and realistically sobbing instrumental and percussive effects.

There's no question about it—the Pops got off to a roaring start!



Eugene List, piano soloist last night with the Boston Pops Orchestra, will also play for its performances tonight, Saturday, and Sunday.

Tonight at the Pops

"Washington Post" March ..... Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Fantasia on "Greensleeves" ..... Vaughan Williams
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
"Pineapple Poll," Suite from the Ballet ..... Sullivan-Mackerras
Concerto in E-flat for piano and Orchestra ..... Liszt
Soloist: Eugene List
Romanian Rhapsody No 1 ..... Enesco
Selection from "The King and I" ..... Rodgers
Ranch House Party ..... Gillis
Blue Tango ..... Anderson
Farandole from "L'Arlésienne" ..... Bizet
Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1952

Many Family Groups Attend Opening of Pops Season

By ALISON ARNOLD

The tulips are in bloom in the Public Garden and the Pops opened at Symphony Hall last night. So spring has come to Boston and no mistake. Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone to Europe for a month this spring, the 67th season of these famous popular concerts opened last night, for Arthur Fiedler has brought together an orchestra of symphony players from all over the country for the May Pops, among them ten women.

The familiar salmon colored gladioli were massed at the center of the stage and the audience sat at small tables on the floor or leaned with rapt attention from the balconies. Pops punch served in tall pitchers was the favorite beverage, although the music was frequently punctuated by champagne corks.

Eugene List was the piano soloist for Liszt's Concerto in E flat, and the varied program included "Pineapple Poll," danced here recently by the Saddler's Wells Theater Ballet; the rousing "Washington Post" march; "Finlandia"; and a medley from "The King and I," during which the orchestra whistled while it played. "Blue Tango" all but had the audience dancing in the aisles, and "Ranch House Party" was also a favorite.

For the tenth consecutive year, the New England Grenfell Association took half the floor and some of the balcony seats on the opening night to aid the work of the Grenfell Mission in Labrador. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard was again chairman of the benefit committee, with Gertrude Peabody as vice-chairman. Pretty flower vendors selling fragrant corsages for the cause were headed by Jane Kennard and included Elizabeth Crocker, Judith Cabot, Gretchen Winkler, Alice Lee Bradlee, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Angelica Griswold, Marcia Sue Black, Sylvia Newbury, Hester and Judith Howland and Gretchen Winkler.

There were many family groups present. With Mr. and Mrs. Charles Colby Hewitt were their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Powell Robinson, Jr., and their son, Graves Hewitt. Mrs. Margaret Lane, who seldom misses a Pops opening, was accompanied by her son, Thomas Lane, and her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John Q. Landers. Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hawes came down from Andover to occupy the same seats they have each year.

A mother and daughter attending the Pops, but not together, were Mrs. Sanders Wells and her pretty daughter, Anna Devereux Wells, home from Miss Hall's School in Pittsfield. Anna, who will be one of the most attractive of the 1952-53 debutantes, wore a sheer white blouse with a satin skirt and had one of the modish little evening veils on her blonde hair.

Dr. Theodore C. Badger, new president of the New England Grenfell Association, escorted Mrs. Badger, and among the many others in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. J. Brooks Fenno, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John Perrin, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Cummings, Mr. and Mrs. John Alles, Mr. and Mrs. C. Lloyd Thomas, Mrs. Atherton Loring, Jr., Mrs. Sidney Wirt, Miss Dorothy Rackemann, Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Mrs. A. W. K. Billings, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. Francis G. Shaw, Lispenard Phister, Mr. and Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Jerome Augustine, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, Mrs. Harris Nelson, Mr. and Mrs. Henderson Inches, Jr., the Rev. Peter Blynn, Mr. and Mrs Lea Luquer, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Bowditch, Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Winkler, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Harborne Stuart and Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Kendall.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
1952

67th Pops Season In Debut

The Pops, proving its indestructibility, last night at Symphony Hall initiated its 67th season with an orchestra of nationally recruited pinch-hitters carrying on in the absence of the Boston Symphony in Europe.

The usual number of "symphony faces" stood out like the proverbial sore thumbs, looking "daggers" at the pops "regulars."

Sousa's Washington Post March opened the program, followed by "Finlandia," by Sibelius; the "Pineapple Poll" suite from the Sullivan-Mackerras ballet; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat with Eugene List as soloist; Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2 and Rodgers' "The King and I" score. Gillis' Ranch House Party, Anderson's Blue Tango and Bizet's Farandole from "L'Arlesienne made up the latter half of the bill.

OPEN NEW CYCLE OF HUB POPS

Unique Orchestra to Play Four Nights Each Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

...called the ...at Sym... With all ...ston Sym... ...on the ...go on.

...PICK ORCHESTRA

...cruited for ...orchestra. ...orres. ...of the ...musicians ...members of ...conservatory ...at American ...of whom ...their home. ...on one of whom ...the first flute. ...of the or... ...linist, Ma Si Hon, ...at the conservatory. ...me Mr. Fiedler has ...group playing with ad... ...nimity and precision. ...not quite the richness of ...of the regular Pops or... ...but that may come in ... And one member of the audience suggested that the brass didn't know its own strength.

In other respects the new Pops are different from the customary ones. They do not take place throughout the week. Monday through Wednesday evenings the hall is dark. Moreover, the same program will be heard four times running, save for the fact that Saturday evening the Regis College Glee Club and Sunday evening the M. I. T. Glee Club will have a part in the concert and their songs will take the place of the ... the ballet "Pineapple ..." ... Gilbert and Sullivan ...elange, heard last night for the first time at the Pops (the ballet was recently given at the Opera House).

Typical Program

This program is a typical Pops list, running to light classics, musical comedy and light music. It begins with the "Washington Post" March of Sousa and continues with Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra." Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on "Greensleeves" and Sibelius' "Finlandia." The soloist is Eddie Eugene List and his piece that Pops staple, the Liszt E-flat Concerto for piano and orchestra. Completing the second group is the First Roumanian Rhapsody of Enesco, and the final division comprises a selection from "The King and I." Gillis' "Ranch House Party," Anderson's "Blue Tango" and the "Farandole" of Bizet.

The composition of the orchestra aside, the Pops are just the same. The familiar decor is once more in evidence. Eatables and drinkables are served at the tables and last evening the customary informal spirit prevailed. Not every seat was ... it should be when it ... the Pops. Symphony or no Symphony, are subscribers to the Pops that we know ... and in spite of imitations, ... quely Bostonian.

[140]

TIGHT BINDING

POPS CONCERT

Later in the evening I dropped by Symphony Hall to discover for myself that the new Pops Orchestra may not have the depth and richness of the Symphony players, but that the difference is so small as to be infinitesimal.

FRIDAY, MAY 9, 1952

Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein were in the audience to hear the orchestra play selections from their "King And I," followed by a sprightly encore of "Whistle A Happy Tune," which both the deskmen and the audience traversed with pursed lips. The Messrs. R. & H. were accorded a torrent of applause and in return directed the rivulet of their own clapping toward the orchestra for its arrangement of their music.

In the most taxing part of the program, Jesus Maria Sanroma was the piano soloist in the Mendelssohn Concerto in G Minor. As a matter of fact this lyrical composition will not really knot anyone's brow and Mr. Sanroma's playing compassed all its poetic fancies except in the slow section when he went a trifle fast for my taste.

There were several other favorites on the program but the liquid arrangement of "Cry," will serve to characterize them all—an arrangement that had a unique humor and flavor that you won't find anywhere else except in the carefree atmosphere of the Pops.

R. S. T.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"POPS"

In Richard Strauss' dictum, "There are no great orchestras, just great conductors," as in most ex cathedra pronouncements, the ratio of truth to falsehood is small, but Arthur Fiedler demonstrated last night that musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (now touring in Europe) are not essential to his production of an eminently musical evening. For, indeed, Mr. Fiedler has done a remarkable job in training his new orchestra. While listening to the precision, the balance, the tone, and sheer virtuosity of this new group, it is difficult to remember that before last week these 90 musicians had never played together.

This week's program (last night's program will be repeated through Sunday) contains many old favorites: "Pomp and Circumstance," Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Overture to "Die Fledermaus," Walter's Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," and several potpourris of musical comedy tunes. The featured work is Mendelssohn's G minor Piano Concerto with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Mr. Sanroma, no stranger to Boston audiences, performed this concerto with gusto in the first movement, sensitivity in the second, and brilliance in the third. This work is the real meat of the program; the audience gave its undivided attention to the soloist and the orchestra, and not even a champagne bottle "pop" is heard

MUSIC

Sanroma, Composers Make Pops Festive

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops were a gala occasion in Symphony Hall last night. He had Jesus Maria Sanroma, former staff pianist of the Boston Symphony, on hand as soloist in the Mendelssohn G Minor Piano Concerto. And Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d, guests in town for festivities at Boston University, visited the Pops the hear a medley of tunes from their latest hit musical, "The King and I."

Otherwise, Pops were normal, with clinking glasses, remembered music and Spring lightness in the air.

Mr. Fiedler and his new and brilliant orchestra played Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," the Prize Song from Wagner's "Mesitersinger," the Overture to Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," Gade's "Jealousy" and the famed "Prayer of Thanksgiving" by Valerius.

A select place on the program was given to Robert McBride's "Mexican Rhapsody," a sort of popular companion to Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico." Mr. Copland drew his material from authentic folk sources. Mr. McBride's piece sounds as though he had heard his tunes on the Latin American radio.

Mr. Sanroma gave a skilled and determined performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto and was roundly applauded. Messrs. Rodgers and Hammerstein bowed to a thunderous ovation, when the large audience finally realized who they were.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, MAY 9

MUSIC

JORDAN HALL

Conservatory Chorus

The Conservatory Chorus, under Lorna Cooke de Varon, gave ... Jordan Hall last night. ... "Regina Coeli," Chaconne ... Prigioni," Dallapiccola; ... Truth," Williams; Three ... Songs Williams; Four ... tok; "Lark," and ... Copland.

There is still hope for the twelve-tone system. At least Luigi Dallapiccola's "Songs of Imprisonment," which the New England Conservatory Chorus sang in Jordan Hall for the first time locally last night, indicates there is more to it than a musician's private Erector set, as we have suspected in times past.

To be sure, Dallapiccola's style is a fusion of the twelve-tone row with the concepts of tonality. The graft has been an encouraging sprout. This set of songs, for me at least, has a warmth and a power which simple abstraction seems to lack. Arranged for a chorus of mixed voices and "alcuni strumenti" it weaves its basic theme of the Dies Irae chant through a startling and sometimes shattering structure of instrumental and vocal effect culminating in the "Release of Savonarola." The latter comes as a release, too, a surcease after anguish, the restoration of balance.

The work, incidentally, will be sung at Tanglewood this summer and it was given a fine reading by Lorna Cooke DeVaron whose singers were in fettle technically and emotionally.

POPS CONCERT

Later in the evening I dropped by Symphony Hall to discover for myself that the new Pops Orchestra may not have the depth and richness of the Symphony

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

—Sanroma at Pops

Pianist Plays Mendelssohn For Symphony Hall Audience

By Rod Nordell

It's a hard man who could find nothing to his taste at the Pops last night.

The program began majestically with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" and came to a dignified close with Valerius's "Prayer of Thanksgiving." In between, entertainment ranged from an eloquent cuckoo call to a fine piano performance.

An audience nearly filling Symphony Hall seemed as responsive to the music as the players did to Arthur Fiedler's baton.

Jesús María Sanromá displayed his keyboard artistry in Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra. Mr. Sanromá played with an apparent effortlessness in keeping with the occasion. His melting phrases in the Andante were a delight.

* * *

Recordings by the regular Pops orchestra have made familiar most of the evening's musical arrangements. The present players discovered a good deal of the merriment in Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," the Oriental flavor of Saint-Saëns' Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," the romance and frivolity in Strauss's Overture to "Die Fledermaus," and the smooth, sensuous rhythmic flow of Gade's Gypsy Tango, "Jealousy."

McBride's medley, "Mexican Rhapsody," gave the opportunity for some solid brass-section work and let the drummers loose with castanets, claves, maracas, and some less readily identifiable noise-makers. Walther's Prize Song from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" provided ballast for the first section of the program.

* * *

As usual, lettered placards popped up from time to time out of the depths of the trumpets, and the audience settled back for unscheduled delicacies such as Bolzoni's spun-sugar "Minuet," Massenet's evocatively Spanish "Aragonaise" from "The Cid," and the orchestra's humorously lachrymose version of the popular song "Cry," which, incidentally, in its more serious moments revealed a pleasant melody hardly suspected from the exaggerated style of the vocal record most often heard.

A fillip to the festivity occurred when two visitors in the audience, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, were brought to their feet by Mr. Fiedler after the playing of selections from their "The King and I." They and the orchestra had to take bow after bow.

It seemed only right.

Associated Press Newsphoto

Pierre Monteux and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrive in Paris.

Monteux Acclaimed in Paris

By the United Press

Paris

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night.

They performed Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which touched off a riot at its première under the same conductor in the same theater 39 years ago.

The flashback found the Russian-American composer in the audience, just as he was on that May night in 1913 when some 50 persons were arrested in the fracas fomented by the composition. Critics said it was too modernistic and vulgar.

This time there was no riot. The audience of Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty an ovation as it received Tuesday when it opened its first European tour here.

* * *

Besides the Stravinsky composition, works of three others were on the program. William Schuman's Third Symphony, Vaughan Williams' Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Darius Milhaud's Second Suite from "Protée" also were heard.

An especially warm welcome went to Monteux, who retired last month after 17 seasons as leader of the San Francisco Symphony. He is acting as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony on its tour under Charles Munch. Monteux headed it in the years 1919-24.

* * *

After taking about a dozen bows, Monteux succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come to the stage. They hugged each other, and the audience gave them a tremendous ovation.

"It has been 39 years since I was here," Monteux said. "Let's have another rendezvous in 39 more years."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 4 - 1952

THE WORLD

By ROSS PARMENTER

DOUBLE - TAKE: The Boston Pops Orchestra in past years has always been the Boston Symphony playing under another name. Thus when it was announced that the Boston Symphony was going to Europe in April there was doubt if there would be a "Pops" season. But last week the symphony was on the high seas and the "Pops" concerts began for the sixty-seventh season notwithstanding. The explanation is that Arthur Fiedler gathered a new orchestra for the concerts. Not only did he get musicians from the Boston area, but he got musicians from other cities, whose orchestras had

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 7 - 1952

LOU SWAPS BAT FOR BATON

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, [illegible] equipment with Manager Lou Boudreau of the Red Sox, [illegible] Kelleher, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and [illegible] looks on. Fiedler has just told Boudreau that he too has some sensational rookies in his orchestra.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, co[illegible] the Boston Pops, now in [illegible] week of their 67th annu[illegible] at Symphony Hall.

Program Announ[illegible] For Third Pops W[illegible]

Fritz Siegal, the conduc[illegible] of the new Pops Orchestr[illegible] phony hall will be the s[illegible] four concerts of the wee[illegible] on Thursday through Su[illegible] nings. Mr. Siegal, conce[illegible] of the Grant Park Orc[illegible] Chicago and prominent [illegible] that city, will be heard fo[illegible] time as a soloist here [illegible] Concerto in G minor. Ar[illegible] ler will take his newly [illegible] and already much prais[illegible] tra through standard P[illegible] ites, also reviving a li[illegible] waltz from Vienna's pas[illegible] Strauss and a selection [illegible] ites in this country whos[illegible] ity never dies.

THE POPS

On Thursday the "[illegible] enter their third week [illegible] gram for the four succes[illegible] features the concert ma[illegible] Siegal, in the G minor [illegible] certo of Bruch. Wagner[illegible] to Act III of "Lohen[illegible] "Oberon" Overture of [illegible] bussy's "Clair de Lune," [illegible] music from Massenet's [illegible] Tchaikovsky's "Marche [illegible] lighter numbers make th[illegible]

Progress of the Pops

ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the Boston Pops, now in the third week of their 67th annual season at Symphony Hall.

Program Announced For Third Pops Week

Fritz Siegal, the concert [illegible] of the new Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall, will be the soloist in the four concerts of the week to come on Thursday through Sunday evening. Mr. Siegal, concert master of the Grant Park Orchestra in Chicago and prominent violinist in that city, will be heard for the first time as a soloist here in Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Arthur Fiedler will take his newly acquired and already tried orchestra through standard Pops favorites, also reviving a little-known waltz from Vienna's past by Josef Strauss and a selection of favorites in this country whose popularity never dies.

THE POPS

[illegible] Pops [illegible] The program [illegible] nights [illegible] Fritz [illegible] Violin Concerto [illegible] Prelude [illegible] again," the [illegible] Weber, Debussy's Clair de Lune, Massenet's "The Cid" ballet, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave" and a medley of numbers made the last.

Siegal Listed as Soloist In Bruch's Violin Concerto

For the third week of concerts by the new Symphony Hall Pops Orchestra, to be presented each evening next week from Thursday through Sunday, its concert master Fritz Siegal will be the soloist. Mr. Siegal is also the concert master of the Grant Park Orchestra in Chicago. He will be heard in Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor.

Arthur Fiedler will take his newly acquired orchestra through standard Pops favorites and will revive a little-known waltz from Vienna's past by Josef Strauss.

The program of these four concerts includes the following selections:

Wagner's Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin," Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Debussy's "Clair de lune," Massenet's Suite from "The Cid" Ballet, Bruch's Violin Concerto No. 1, and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave."

The program also includes a medley arranged by Mason, "Many Happy Returns," which consists of "Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered," "Singin' in the Rain," "Charmaine," and "Alexander's Ragtime Band." Other selections are Anderson's "Plink, Plank, Plunk" and "Blue Tango," as well as Coates' "Knightsbridge" March.

Sanromá for Worcester

Jesús María Sanromá, soloist at the Symphony Hall Pops this week, will also appear as guest soloist at the première concert by the newly organized Worcester Symphony Orchestra. This concert will be held Monday evening at 8:15 in the Worcester Auditorium.

Francis Findlay, conductor, will play Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major for Piano and Orchestra, and Strauss's "Tales From the Vienna Woods." Tickets will be on sale at the auditorium box office.

Jesús María Sanromá, piano soloist at the week-end concerts of the Symphony Hall Pops. He also will appear with the Worcester Symphony Monday evening in the Worcester Auditorium.

Boston Sunday Globe

DAUGHTER OF THE VINE

The marriage of May and music was just so surely made in heaven as that of pork and beans or corned beef and cabbage. April may bring to an end the performances of the great choral works with orchestra which have been in preparation through the Winter, yet no sooner has Walpurga's Night, April 30, yielded to May Day than we are off to a round of music festivals, big and little, public and private. School bands, student recitals, house concerts, free public concerts, a steady succession, for Spring is in the air and so is the festal spirit. Does the Boston Symphony Orchestra walk out on us for the month of May and go touring Europe? The resourceful Mr. Arthur Fiedler recruits a Pops orchestra from numerous others, resumes as usual at Symphony Hall, and May remains the month of music.

There is a celebrated passage in a letter from the young and lovely Bettina von Brentano to the aging Goethe about her extraordinary first encounter with Beethoven in which she quotes him as having said,

"Music is a higher revelation than all wisdom and philosophy, the wine which inspires one to new generative processes, and I am the Bacchus who presses out this glorious wine for mankind and makes them spiritually drunken."

Whether he actually said it, it is what he should have said, and no revel could be more innocent than this wine of sound. Yearly in May we might sing, with Omar Khayyam,

"You know, my Friends, with what a brave Carouse
"I made a second marriage in my house;
"Divorced old barren Reason from my Bed,
"And took the Daughter of the Vine to Spouse."

Concert Master Fritz Siegal Will Be Pops Soloist This Week

Fritz Siegal, the Concert Master of the new Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall, will be the soloist in the four concerts of the week to come on Thursday through Sunday evening. Mr. Siegal, Concert Master of the Grant Park Orchestra in Chicago and prominent violinist in that city, will be heard for the first time as a soloist here in Bruch's Concerto in G minor.

Arthur Fiedler will take his new orchestra through standard Pops favorites, also reviving a little-known waltz from Vienna's past by Josef Strauss and a selection of favorites in this country whose popularity never dies.

The program for May 15, 16, 17 and 18 is as follows: Wagner: Prelude to Act III, "Lohengrin"; Weber: Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, Clair de Lune; Massenet, Suite from "The Cid" Ballet; Bruch, Concerto No. 1 in G minor for Violin and Orchestra; Tchaikovsky, Marche Slave; a medley "Many Happy Returns" which includes "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered," "Singin' in the Rain," "Charmaine," "Alexander's Ragtime Band"; Anderson, "Plink, Plank, Plunk," and "Blue Tango," Coates; "Knightsbridge" March.

Tonight's program will feature Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in Mendelssohn's G Minor Piano Concerto. Music of Elgar, Nicolai, Wagner, Strauss and others will be played. The Simmons College Glee Club will sing a group of songs.

[142]

(Traveler Staff Photo by Anthony Cabral)

FAMILY HARMONY!—Two family musical "teams" are playing with the Boston Pops Orchestra this season. Left to right: Victor Alpert, who plays the viola, and his violinist wife, Dorothy, and Mrs. Olivia Toutman, cellist, with her oboe-playing husband, Raymond.

Let's Make Beautiful Music Together --- Two Couples Doing It with Boston Pops

By VIRGINIA BOHLIN

For the first time in the 67-year-old history of Boston Pops there is a double-header departure from tradition this spring — two husband and wife combines are playing in the orchestra.

NEVER BEFORE has there been a Mr. and Mrs. making music with the Pops orchestra at the same time, but this spring there are two twosomes.

They are Victor Alpert of 321 Summit avenue, Brighton, who plays the viola, and wife, Dorothy, violinist; Raymond Toubman, 35 Arlington street, Cambrdge, oboe player, and wife Olivia, cellist.

The four, all in their early 30s, are not strangers, for they met in music 13 years ago when they were students, and have been playing together, off and on, through the years.

THIS SPRING is an especially happy one for the quartet "because we are all together as we were before the war, playing again under Arthur Fiedler," Alpert said.

The four first played under Fiedler back in 1939 when they were students and all members of the N. Y. A. Symphony Orchestra. Alpert and Dorothy were studying at the New England Conservatory of Music. Toubman was at Boston University and Olivia at the Longy School of Music in Cambridge. Neither of the couples was married at that time.

THEY CONTINUED with the N. Y. A. orchestra until 1941 and the following year both couples wed and set out on their separate ways.

The Toubmans found jobs playing in the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra and the Alperts in the Minneapolis Symphony. Their lives still paralleled, they all returned to Boston three years ago.

"We got together to play for fun after we were back in Boston and we decided to organize the Boston Chamber Music Society to utilize strings and wind instruments in various combinations, and to play music that is not commonly heard," Alpert said.

LAST SEASON the socety, which includes in its membership other Boston Pops players, gave more than a dozen concerts throughout New England.

Both the Toubmans and the Alperts have studios in their homes where they teach when they aren't rehearsing or playing in one of their concerts.

Now with three three-hour rehearsals for the four weekly Pops concerts, along with time out for the rehearsing for the fall chamber music series, their schedules are crowded.

"But lots of fun," added Mrs. Alpert.

AND IT MEANS that there has to be a husband and wife combine for the cooking and cleaning, just as on the music stage.

"Victor and I work together on the household chores," Mrs. Alpert said. "He's a good cook and an excellent dishwasher."

"Raymond helps with the dishes, too, and all around the house whenever he can," chimed in Mrs. Toubman. "He makes a terrific clam chowder."

THE TOUBMANS have two other responsibilities, as they have a daughter, aged 8, and a son, aged 5.

"Both children are in school all day. They have their lunches there, and we're home by the time they return. In the evening, my father is at the house, so he's the baby-sitter when we're playing in the concerts," Olivia said.

The two husbands look with pride on the fact that their wives are among the select circle of only 10 women in the 80-member Pops orchestra.

"This is the first year they are using women violinists and they find them as capable as men . . . or better," Alpert said.

THE FOUR, who get together to read new music whenever they find time for fun in their busy schedules, admit they do have moments of disagreement.

"But they are always musical," said Mrs. Toubman. "We may be working on chamber music. One of us has an idea that a passage should go a certain way. There's bound to be a discussion, but we always agree in the end."

Alpert added:

"In the orchestra, we are four musicians. No personalities or marital status enters into it."

Theatre Talk

Need a Real Good Cry? Visit the Met in 2 Months

By JOHN WM. RILEY

"Now I've seen everything, says one fellow. And another declared it would be absurd if it weren't true. But it's a fact that a fellow named Johnnie Ray makes a living crying. Living? He's getting rich.

Maybe you've heard about it. He was a West Coast night spot pianist who occasionally sang a tune for the edification of the customers. He went through a treadmill of jobs until he finally landed on the nitery circuit. And there he hoped for the big break which every denizen of Hollywood lives for. It didn't come because agents didn't think much of a fellow who cried for a living.

But then he made a record called "Cry," and the hurricane began. His act is described as an agony of lamentation. He quavers with anguish; he weeps buckets; the word lachrymose really means something when applied to Johnnie Ray as Boston will see when "Mr. Emotion," as they will bill him, opens a week's engagement at the Metropolitan Theatre, July 18.

In the past six months Ray has broken theatre and night clubs records right and left. Right now the Copacabana in New York finds difficulty counting all the money, it flows in so fast. They say Johnnie Ray is a bobby sox attraction. But the youngsters don't go to the Copa—they can't afford it.

It is "Cry" which has given the Boston Pops its funniest encore for this season. All Pete Bodge, Yankee Network music director and a member of the new Pops Orchestra, needed was to hear "Cry." He put together some snatches of "Oh Dry Those Tears," Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and a few other things, and came up with a neat bit of musical satire. Pops audiences have been howling at it. Johnnie Ray should hear it.

Notes of Music

Monday night next the Popular Music Department of the New England Conservatory of Music will present an extended program in Jordan Hall under the direction of G. Wright Briggs. Admission free. . . . George Wein's Storyville continues operations in the Hotel Buckminster through June 1 with Ella Fitzgerald as the less attraction. On June 2 Storyville transfers its affairs to the Hawthorne Inn, East Gloucester, for the Summer. . . . The Westminster Recording Company has added the famed Curtis String Quartet to its roster of stars.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Pops: Bruch Concerto

At Symphony Hall last evening, Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops orchestra in a concert which featured Bruch's Concerto in G minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 26. The complete program was as follows:

Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin" Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" Weber
Clair de Lune Debussy
Waltz: "My Life is Love and Pleasure" Josef Strauss
Suite from "The Cid" Ballet Massenet
Concerto No. 1 in G minor Bruch
Soloist: Fritz Siegal
March Slave Tchaikovsky
"Many Happy Returns" Arr. by Mason
Plink, Plank, Plonk; Blue Tango Anderson
"Knightsbridge" March Coates

By ELINOR HUGHES

The feature of the new Pops program which began its four-day engagement at Symphony Hall last evening was the performance of Max Bruch's Concerto No. 1 in G minor for violin and orchestra, Op. 26, with Fritz Siegal, concert master of the present orchestra, as soloist. This durable work, musicianly, melodious and easy to listen to, was excellently performed by Mr. Siegal, a violinist of obvious intelligence and skill, capable of producing a rich and lovely tune without sentimentalizing passages that could easily be milked for their sweet sounds by a less conscientious performer. The orchestral portion of the work was played in capable fashion, and the audience was most enthusiastic. Bruch's music is excellent for a concert of this sort where listeners want something to get their teeth into but nothing too startling. This prolific composer of songs, opera and choral music was no innovator, but within the limits of the classical tradition he wrote many admirable works.

It is encouraging to observe how rapidly the current Pops orchestra is finding its musical feet. The musicians play with increasing assurance and style, and the improvement in their musical good spirits is noticeable with each Marche Slave,' with particular verve last night and had their listeners in stitches with the highly amusing Bodge arrangement of "Cry."

The current program continues through Sunday night, and on Thursday, May 22, a new one, featuring Leo Litwin in an arrangement for piano and orchestra of Morton Gould's "Interplay," will be presented for four evenings as the last in the series by the present orchestra.

Music

SYMPHONY HALL
CO 6-1492
TONIGHT at 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR
Soloist—Fritz Siegal
Every Thurs., Fri., Sat. & Sun. During May
Tickets .50, $1, $1.50, $2.50

PLAN POPS— [illegible] members of Guild of Infant Savior discuss at Hotel Puritan [illegible] Blossom Time Pops Concert, to be held at Symphony Hall Saturday [illegible] John F. Spence, Rockland; Miss Frances Dillon, Lowell, presi- [illegible] Healy, West Roxbury, and Mrs. William T. Curley of Wakefield.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 8 - 1952

Theatre Talk

BACK BAY LEDGER

Siegal, Violinist, Soloist at "Pops" Thurs. to Sunday

Fritz Siegal, the Concert Master of the new Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall will be the soloist in the four concerts of the week to come on Thursday through Sunday evenings. Mr. Siegal, Concert Master of the Grant Park Orchestra in Chicago and prominent violinist in that city, will be heard for the first time as a soloist here in Bruch's Concerto in G minor.

Arthur Fiedler will take his newly acquired and already much praised orchestra through standard Pops favorites, also reviving a little-known waltz from Vienna's past by Josef Strauss and a selection of favorites in this country whose popularity never dies.

The program for May 15, 16, 17 and 18 is as follows: Wagner's Prelude to Act III, "Lohengrin," Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Debussy's Clair de Lune, Massenet's Suite from "The Cid" Ruffer [illegible] Concerto no. 1 in G minor for Violin and Orchestra, Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave and a [illegible] arranged by Mason, "Many Happy Returns" which includes Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered — Singin' in the Rain — Charmaine — Alexander's Ragtime Band, Anderson's Plunk, Plank, Plunk and Blue Tango as well as Coates' "Knightsbridge" March complete the program.

Continued on Page Five

Soloist at "Pops"

Continued from Page One

524 Solos With Symphony Chalked Up by Sanroma

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Jesus Maria Sanroma was talking with Francis Findlay when I walked into Room A in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

"That will be 524 appearances with symphony orchestras," he was saying, a fact which a pianist may take in his stride. But it makes a listener's ears pick up.

Findlay, the new conductor of the Worcester Symphony Orchestra and Sanroma, for many years the Boston Symphony's staff pianist, now a world-famed soloist, will join in a performance of the Liszt E-Flat Piano Concerto in the Worcester Auditorium next Monday night. Hence the 524th orchestral appearance.

"Not piano parts," he cautioned, meaning such works as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" which calls for a piano as an orchestral, not a solo, instrument. Such parts Sanroma does not include.

He's been keeping book on himself these many years. He has played with 85 orchestras under 97 conductors (Findlay will be the 97th) in eight countries. In these appearances, all exclusive of solo recitals, he has performed 56 different works for piano and orchestra.

"I like figures," he said, "and it comes in handy at income tax time."

The Worcester is one of several in this part of the country. Last week Sanroma played with the Rochester Symphony. Beginning tonight he will be the soloist with the Boston Pops and Arthur Fiedler in the Mendelssohn G Minor Piano Concerto.

Sanroma left the Boston Symphony in 1942. He had so many solo engagements he could no longer keep up a schedule in Boston. Last August he moved his wife and four daughters to Puerto Rico, whence he had come to Boston more than 30 years ago to study piano.

Now he flies back to the continent for his concert tours. "With planes you can live anywhere. At least I can. It is only five hours to New York. Takes that long to get from Boston to New York by train. And now they are building the biggest airfield in the world in Puerto Rico to take the jets. New York will be even closer."

Why did he go back to Puerto Rico. (He had lived in Newton for years. His brother John Sanroma, camera technician at M. I. T., still lives there.) "Well, it is my home," he said. "And I am back among my own people."

"Besides, I don't like the cold" and he shivered as he looked out the window to the gray skies. "I had it here for 34 years."

Josh White at Storyville

Art is not an exclusive thing, as the snobs would have you believe. It does not belong solely to the rich, nor to the talented, nor to those who can be only serious about it. Art is as much a popular thing (history proves this) as it is esoteric. Thus, art is not exclusive with the longhairs, either. Folksongs are art, and they grew out of the people. That's why the popular art of Josh White, the famed folk singer appearing at Storyville, is great. Its roots are deep, its tradition ancient. And there is no better known interpreter before the public today.

I sometimes feel, in listening to White, that his singing is compounded of more artfulness than is necessary. He is neither artificial, nor arty; but something else again. And I wonder if the studied pauses, the self-conscious changes of tone color and tempo, are really appropriate to the interpretation of so direct and unpretentious a musical art as folksong.

However, White is one of the leading authorities in his field, a fact he will demonstrate in both song and lecture at Boston University this afternoon at 1:15. He will speak on "A People's Voice: Folk Music," room 313, 725 Commonwealth av.

Christian Science Monitor May 12, 1952

Ma Si Hon Meets West With Violin

By Harold Rogers

Visitors to the Symphony Hall Pops this month will surely notice the young Chinese violinist sitting in the first violin section. He is Ma Si Hon of Shanghai, China. Next season he will join the first violins of the Cleveland Symphony. Since Chinese musicians seldom become members of Western orchestras, it is interesting to learn something of Mr. Ma's transition from the Orient to the Occident.

It was an easy change and a logical one—geographically and musically. Although Mr. Ma had heard a great deal of Chinese music prior to his coming to the United States in 1948, he was not steeped in either its theories or esthetics and had nothing to unlearn. He was a Western musician from the outset.

Mr. Ma received his early violin lessons and most of his training in China from his older brother, Ma Si Tson. This brother had gone to Paris some years earlier to go to school, and while there decided to study the violin at the Conservatoire, from which he graduated.

* * *

Under his brother's tutelage Mr. Ma progressed rapidly and became a member and soloist of the Shanghai Municipal Orchestra. While in Shanghai he was also concertmaster of the Chinese Philharmonic.

Wishing to travel and to perfect his art, Mr. Ma secured entrance to the New England Conservatory of Music. Here he was granted his master's degree two years ago and will be awarded his artist's diploma in June.

While in Boston he has been very active in music circles. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the New England Philharmonic and with the Tanglewood Orchestra. In the spring of 1950 he was soloist with the Boston Pops in Symphony Hall and on the Esplanade.

Mr. Ma and Miss Tung Kwong-Kwong, pianist, have appeared in sonata recitals in Boston, thus continuing a collaboration that began while both were students in Shanghai. Miss Tung is now studying with Leonard Shure in Cleveland. Thus the two will be able to go on concertizing together when Mr. Ma joins the Cleveland Symphony in the autumn.

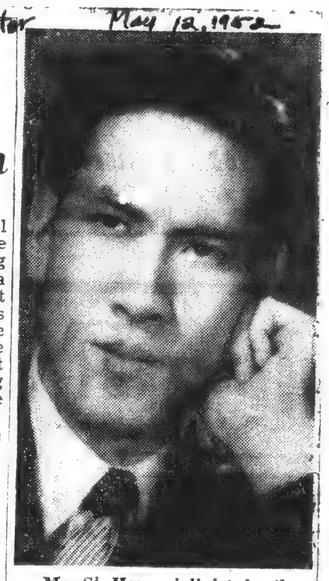
* * *

Mr. Ma is one of eight children —four boys and four girls—all of whom have the first name of Si.

"Si means 'think,'" Mr. Ma explained. "And Hon also means something. It means 'great.' My brother's name, Si Tson, means 'clever thinker,' and my eldest brother, Si Tsi, has a name that means 'even' or 'level thinker.' Ma also has a meaning. It means 'horse.'"

Thus Ma Si Hon's name includes a remarkable combination of attributes.

Tonight at 8:30 over WGBH-FM Mr. Ma will be heard in recital.



Ma Si Hon, violinist in the Symphony Hall Pops Orchestra, will join the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra next season.

1952 Art—Music—Theater 11

Progress of the Pops

Litwin is Soloist On Next Pops Bill

The new Pops Orchestra which has made such a fine impression at Symphony Hall will complete its next-to-last stay next Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings under the direction of Arthur Fiedler pending the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Europe to provide the Pops performances through the month of June. The soloist for the coming week will be Leo Litwin and the program will be as follows:

Hungarian March "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
First Movement from the "Unfinished" Symphony
Allegro moderato	Schubert
Little Fugue in G minor	Bach-Cailliet
Ballet Suite from "Faust"	Gounod
Three Hungarian Dances (Nos. 19, 20 and 21)	Brahms
"Interplay," American Concertette for Piano and Orchestra	Gould
Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra	Addinsell
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
Selections from "South Pacific"	Rodgers
The Classical Juke Box	Anderson
March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever"	Sousa

LEO LITWIN, piano soloist with the new Pops Orchestra, Symphony Hall on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, in "Interplay," and American concertette by Morton Gould.

Leo Litwin Piano Soloist In Four Programs Next Week

The new Symphony Hall Pops Orchestra, assembled by Arthur Fiedler for May while the Boston Symphony musicians are touring Europe, will present its next to last Thursday - through - Sunday series of concerts next week.

Leo Litwin, for many seasons a Pops favorite, will be the piano soloist in all four programs. He will be heard in Addinsell's popular "Warsaw" Concerto and in Morton Gould's "Interplay." The program for each evening will also include the "Rakoczy" March by Berlioz, the first movement from Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the Cailliet transcription of Bach's "Little" Fugue in G minor, and Gounod's ballet suite from "Faust."

Also scheduled are three of the Brahms Hungarian Dances, Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," selections from "South Pacific," Leroy Anderson's "Classical Juke Box," and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

* * *

John Brook

Fritz Siegal, soloist at the Pops this week in Bruch's Violin Concerto.

THE CONCERTS

Fourth Week by Pops Orchestra

The new Pops orchestra enters its fourth week this Thursday evening. Under Arthur Fiedler's direction it will present, through next Sunday evening, Berlioz' "Rakoczy" March, the first movement of Shubert's "Unfinished," a Bach-Cailliet Fugue, the Ballet Music from "Faust," three Hungarian Dances of Brahms, the "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner and lighter numbers. Leo Litwin will be the solo pianist in Addinsell's "Warsaw" Concerto and Gould's "Interplay."

* * *

Globe – May 18

Pianist Leo Litwin Will Be the Pops Soloist This Week

The new Pops Orchestra will continue its happy stay in Symphony Hall with concerts Thursday through Sunday nights this week. Arthur Fiedler will be at the helm of the orchestra and pianist Leo ARTHUR FIEDLER will have pianist Leo Litwin as soloist with the Boston Pops this week, Thursday through Sunday nights.

Litwin will be the soloist in Morton Gould's "Interplay" and Addinsell's "Warsaw" Concerto.

The program: Hungarian March, "Rakoczy", Berlioz; First Movement from the "Unfinished" Symphony, Schubert; Little Fugue in G minor, Bach-Cailliet; Ballet Suite from "Faust," Gounod; Three Hungarian Dances (Nos. 19, 20 and 21), Brahms, "Interplay," American Concertette for Piano and Orchestra, Gould; Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Addinsell; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg", Wagner; Selections from "South Pacific", Rodgers; The Classical Juke Box, Anderson; March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Tonight's concert will be the final one this week. The program: Wagner; Prelude to Act III, "Lohengrin"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, Clair de Lune; Massenet, Suite from "The Cid" Ballet; Bruch, Concerto No. 1 in G minor for Violin and Orchestra (soloist: Fritz Seigal); Techaikovsky, Marche Slave; a medley "Many Happy Returns," which includes "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered." Singin' in the Rain," Charmaine," "Alexander's Ragtime Band"; Anderson, "Plink, Plank, Plunk," and "Blue Tango," Coates; "Knightsbridge" March.

MUSIC

Pops Concert

The May Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler gave the intial concert of its next-to-last series in Symphony Hall last night.

To paraphrase the motto of another institution póles removed from Symphony Hall, there's always something doing at the Pops from 8:30 P. M. to 11 P. M.

Last night it was the presentation to Arthur Fiedler for his orchestral efforts on behalf of the old Dutch tune "Prayer of Thanksgiving." During a pause between numbers, William S. Brewster, tenth-generation descendant of Elder William Brewster, awarded Mr. Fiedler with the embossed document. As the conductor accepted it, 40 girls in Pilgrim coifs and shawls rose in the second balcony and sang the hym. As it turned out, they were from Plymouth High School; the orchestra joined in, and once again the granite-veined melody rang over Symphony Hall—where it probably will still be heard when the tenth-generation descendants of Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Brewster undertake a similar ceremony.

The main musical feature last night was Morton Gould's "Interplay," an American concertette for piano and orchestra. It is 98 proof Gershwin, two percent Gould and mainly negligible. Leo Litwin played it in first-rate blues style however.

R. S. T.

Post – May 23

"POPS" CONCERT

To Symphony Hall yester eve, many of the good folk of Plymouth township being there, to hear sweet musicke of viols, recorders, sackbuts, and other more curious instruments under the musickemaster, Goodman Fiedler. In good soothe Plymouth, methinks, did well in making Goodman Fiedler a worthy of the township, by the hand of William Brewster, 10th in line from Governor Brewster, forasmuch as he hath worked mightily toward the spreading of that noble Plymouth theeme songe, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," most prettily sung by the maydes of that township.

To shift to ye new-fangled spellyinge, Arthur Fiedler, conductor for many years of the Boston "Pops," was honored by the city of Plymouth. The "Prayer of Thanksgiving," written by Adrian Valerius in the year 1597, for a celebration in Holland, was well known to the Pilgrim fathers. This song has been adopted by Plymouth as its own; Arthur Fiedler, through concerts, recordings, and broadcasts, has made this beautiful old hymn well loved throughout the world. And the town of Plymouth gave the conductor last night a citation for his efforts. After the presentation by William Brewster, the girls of the Plymouth High School Glee Club sang this fine old tune with the orchestra. Not only did the glee club sing well, but they also presented a pretty picture as they sang from the balcony.

The program itself contained many familiar items such as Berlioz' "Hungarian March," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Bach's "Little Fugue in G minor" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersingers" by Wagner. Leo Litwin was piano soloist in Addinsell's syrupy "Warsaw Concerto" and Morton Gould's "Interplay," subtitled by the composer, American Concertette for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Gould's little diversion was jazzy and blue, drawn from ballet music written for the Ballet Theatre in 1945. It struck this reviewer that Mr. Litwin did about the utmost with his material.

The concluding pieces were selections from "South Pacific," "Classical Juke Box" by Le Roy Anderson and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." As usual, the orchestra and conductor presented numerous encores. It should be added that this orchestra was in excellent form and played with such spirit as is seldom encountered at a "Pops" concert.

And so to press.

TUCKER KEISER.

BOSTON POST, FRIDAY, MAY 23, 1952

PLYMOUTH HONORS FIEDLER

William Brewster (right), 10th generation descendant of Elder Brewster, Pilgrim father, presents citation to "Pops" conductor Arthur Fiedler, on behalf of the town of Plymouth. The presentation was for Fiedler's recording and popularization of "Prayer of Thanksgiving," Plymouth's official song. The pretty Pilgrim ladies are Joyce Contente (left) and Sheila Clough.

DAY, MAY 19, 195

WRITER OF HIT NOTED ARRANGER

Anderson's "Blue Tango" Is No. 1 on "Parade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That Leroy Anderson's "Blue Tango" should be a success is number one hit on [illegible] his news in a [illegible] fore has this [illegible] cupied by a [illegible] number, and Mr. Anderson [illegible] Harvard, 1930, is [illegible] cated and technic[illegible] beyond the average [illegible]

NOTED ARRANGER

Tunes that capture the popular fancy, and many do not hold it for long in these days of intensive plugging and frequent repetition by mechanical means, are often picked out with one finger. And even when the composer is able to provide his own harmony and in a manner acceptable to the trade—a most important consideration—and even to write it down, which all of them can't do as well, doesn't attempt to be his own arranger. And arranging for a manner of instrumental combinations up to and including the symphonic orchestra, is Mr. Anderson's forte.

Several of Mr. Anderson's compositions, "The Syncopated Clock" for one, are now widely circulated, but he got his real start at the Boston Pops and his first widespread recognition through his Pops recordings, which to date comprise the following items: "Chicken Reel" (arr.), "The Classical Juke Box," "Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicatto," "Fiddle-Faddle," "Christmas Festival," "Irish Suite," "Serenata" and "Sleigh Ride."

Pops Favorite

It might be said that Mr. Fiedler made Mr. Anderson and that the latter has handsomely repaid him, since a Pops program without one of Mr. Anderson's compositions or arrangements is a rarity. The man, in the following way. A Harvard man of the class of '29, who got his M.A., the next year. Mr. Anderson was one of the organizers of a Pops Harvard night. Furthermore, he submitted his own arrangement of Harvard songs so adroitly made that Mr. Fiedler was not long in asserting [illegible] make arrangements for [illegible] Anderson's orchestrations not only show a high degree of perceptiveness in the matter of orchestral color and the required section [illegible] voicing and [illegible] They also exhibit a [illegible] of fancy [illegible] the "Irish Suite," the Fire Society of Boston [illegible] ability to weld a series of airs into a cohesive pattern.

One of Mr. Anderson's teachers at Harvard was the eminent Russian composer, Georges Enesco, briefly in residence there. A practiced conductor, he led the Harvard band for four years and has often officiated at the Pops and elsewhere. He has [illegible] original [illegible] orchestra. [illegible] 20, 19[illegible] with Heifetz [illegible] with Gregor Piatigorsky [illegible] Rudolf [illegible] was organ[illegible] the Boston Conservatory [illegible] in Milton. He [illegible] composition and [illegible] has also had [illegible] cal experience.

Army Career

Mr. Anderson was [illegible] in Woo[illegible] Conn., [illegible] and has two chil[illegible] Jane Mary, [illegible] Eric Ba[illegible] [illegible] Fort Ba[illegible] S. C. [illegible] earned during Wo[illegible] his professional [illegible] him to be stationed [illegible] where he did translations and [illegible] son work with the Icelandic press and radio. At Harvard he had specialized in German and the Scandinavian languages. By the way, he plays his "Blue Tango" on a Decca record and the experts pronounce his version superior to those of Xavier Cugat, Guy Lombardo and others.

Figaro

6

LA MUSIQUE

«L'ŒUVRE

LA dernière de toutes les [illegible] et, comme il se doit, celui présente une sorte de re[illegible] et littéraires qui ont jalo[illegible] France seulement, mais dans le[illegible]

Ce projet ambitieux est le f[illegible] Constituée en 1950 par des inte[illegible] tuels de différents pays, cette [illegible] ciation se propose de démontre[illegible] force et la variété de la crés[illegible] artistique et spirituelle en Occi[illegible] protégée jusqu'à présent contre [illegible] asservissement tyrannique.

En marge d'une série de dé[illegible]

Le programme de la semain[illegible]

30 avril. — (Eglise Saint-Roch), 21 heures : « Magnificat » et « Cantate n° 6 » (Bach) « Stabat Mater » (Poulenc) Orchestre Lamoureux et chœurs Saint-Guillaume, avec Ernst Haefliger, Pierre Mollet, Lucie Rauze, G. Moizan.

2 et 3 mai. — (Champs-Elysées), 21 heures : « Wozzeck » (Alban Berg), par l'Opéra de Vienne, sous la direction de Karl Boehm.

5 mai. — Champs-Elysées, 21 heures : « Don Juan » (Strauss) ; « Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune » (Debussy) ; « Chant de la Terre » (Mahler) Orchestre de l'Opéra, direction Bruno Walter, avec Kathleen Ferrier et Lorenz Fehenberger.

publics entre écrivains des di[illegible] rentes nations du monde occide[illegible] et d'une grande exposition de p[illegible] tures composée de toiles maître[illegible] appartenant aux diverses écoles [illegible] XX[illegible] siècle, la musique se taill[illegible] part du lion. Du 30 avril au 1er j[illegible] 14 concerts de musique sympho[illegible] que et chorale, 8 soirées de bal[illegible] 13 représentations lyriques (d[illegible] trois créations), sept séances de [illegible] sique de chambre seront donn[illegible]

GERARD SOUZAY

trouve les critiques new-yor[illegible] terribles et enthousiaste

— Ne me demandes pas mes [illegible] pressions d'Amérique : je répét[illegible] ce que tant d'autres ont déjà di[illegible]

— Mais vous avez...

— J'ai voyagé. Quant à l'accueil [illegible] m'a été réservé, si je fais le mod[illegible] on me jugera hypocrite. Si je [illegible] vante, je serai ridicule. Je pr[illegible] m'abstenir.

— Comment les Américains [illegible] prennent-ils la mélodie française

— Mais... très bien. C'est plutôt [illegible] thétique européenne du lied et d[illegible] mélodie à laquelle ils sont moins [illegible] coutumés.

— La critique ?

— Terrible. Mais, quand on [illegible] plaît, lyrique et débordante. [illegible] curieuse de problèmes techniques — On vous parle beaucoup de [illegible] nique vocale ?

— Parfois ; cela me prépare [illegible] frontier, mercredi, le public pa[illegible] N'a-t-on pas l'idée... hardie [illegible] faire parler ? Avant de chanter, [illegible] falloir que j'explique comme[illegible] chante : si je le savais moi-m[illegible]

— Triple raison de réjouir l[illegible] blic : vous allez trembler, [illegible] chanter ; c'est tout un program[illegible] festival !

C.

Boston Post

DAY, MAY 19, 19

WRITER OF HIT NOTED ARRANGER

Anderson's "Blue Tango" Is No. 1 on "Parade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That Leroy Anderson's "Blue Tango" should have become the number one hit on the Hit Parade is news in a double sense. Not before has this coveted spot been occupied by a purely instrumental number, and Mr. Anderson, M. A. Harvard, 1930, is musically educated and technically skilled far beyond the average Hit Parader.

NOTED ARRANGER

Tunes that capture the popular fancy, and many do not hold for long in these days of intensive plugging and frequent repetition by mechanical means, are often picked out with one finger. And even when the composer is able to provide his own harmony, and in a manner acceptable to the trade—a most important consideration—and even to write it down, which all of them can't do, he still doesn't attempt to be his own arranger. And arranging for all manner of instrumental combinations up to and including the symphonic orchestra, is Mr. Anderson's forte.

Several of Mr. Anderson's compositions, "The Syncopated Clock," for one, are now widely circulated but he got his real start at the Boston Pops and his first widespread recognition through his Pops recordings, which to date comprise the following items: "Chicken Reel" (arr.), "The Classical Juke Box," "Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicatto," "Fiddle-Faddle," "Christmas Festival," "Irish Suite," "Serenata" and "Sleigh Ride."

Pops Favorite

It might be said that Mr. Fiedler made Mr. Anderson and that the latter has handsomely repaid him since a Pops program without one of Mr. Anderson's compositions or arrangements is a rarity. They met in the following way. A Harvard man of the class of '29, who got his M.A., the next year, Mr. Anderson was one of the conductors at a Pops Harvard night. Furthermore, he submitted his own arrangement of Harvard songs. It forthwith made that Mr. Fiedler was not long in asking him to make arrangements for him. Mr. Anderson's orchestrations not only show a high degree of perceptiveness in the matter of orchestral color and the required skill at balancing and contrasting sonorities, they also exhibit a high abundance of fancy humor and in the case of the "Irish Suite," commissioned by the Eire Society of Boston, the ability to weld a series of airs into a cohesive pattern.

One of Mr. Anderson's teachers at Harvard was the eminent Romanian composer, Georges Enesco, briefly in residence there. A practiced conductor, he led the Harvard band for four years and has officiated at the Pops and elsewhere. He has also made several original recordings with his own orchestra. Born in Cambridge June 29, 1908, he studied organ here with Henry Gideon and bass viol with Gaston Dufresne. He has been a tutor in the music division at Radcliffe and from 1932-35 he was organist and choir master at the East Congregational Church in Milton. How many Hit Parade composers can tie that record for background and a variety of musical experience?

Army Captain

Mr. Anderson's present home is in Woodbury, Conn. He is married and has two children, a daughter, Jane Margareta (1944) and a son, Eric Russell (1947). He is currently a captain in army intelligence at Fort Bragg, N. C., a task that he learned during World War II. The his proficiency in Iceland caused him to be stationed in Reykjavik where he did translating and li on work with the Icelandic pres and radio. At Harvard he ha specialized in German and th Scandinavian languages. By th way, he plays his "Blue Tango" o Decca record and the exper pronounce his version superior t those of Xavier Cugat, Guy Lo ardo and others.

6

Sur la

LA MUSIQUE

«L'ŒUVRE DU XX· SIÈCLE»

L'Europe entière, comme toutes les villes européennes, Paris, a son festival, qui, cette fois encore, offre un intérêt exceptionnel. Il nous présente une sorte de révision des valeurs musicales, picturales [illegible] qui jalonné le demi-siècle écoulé — non pas en France [illegible] le monde entier.

Ce [illegible] fait du Congrès pour la liberté de la culture.

[illegible] cette asso- [illegible] sur la [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Boston Post
DAY, MAY 19, 19

WRITER OF HIT NOTED ARRANGER

Anderson's "Blue Tango" Is No. 1 on "Parade"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That Leroy Anderson's "Blue Tango" should have become the number one hit on the Hit Parade news in a double sense. Not before has this coveted spot been occupied by a purely instrumental number, and Mr. Anderson, M. A. Harvard, 1930, is musically educated and technically skilled far beyond the average Hit Parader.

NOTED ARRANGER

Tunes that capture the popular fancy, and many do not hold for long in these days of intensive plugging and frequent repetition by mechanical means, are often picked out with one finger. And even when the composer is able to provide his own harmony, and in a manner acceptable to the trade—a most important consideration—and even to write it down which all of them can't do, he still doesn't attempt to be his own arranger. And arranging for all manner of instrumental combinations up to and including the symphonic orchestra, is Mr. Anderson's forte.

Several of Mr. Anderson's compositions, "The Syncopated Clock," for one, are now widely circulated but he got his real start at the Boston Pops and his first widespread recognition through Pops recordings, which to date comprise the following items: "Chicken Reel" (arr.), "The Classical Juke Box," "Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicatto," "Fiddle-Faddle," "Christmas Festival," "Irish Suite," "Serenata" and "Sleigh Ride."

Pops Favorite

It might be said that Mr. Fiedler made Mr. Anderson and that the latter has handsomely repaid him since a Pops program without one of Mr. Anderson's compositions or arrangements is a rarity. They met in the following way. A Harvard man of the class of '29, who got his M.A., the next year, Mr. Anderson was one of the conductors at a Pops Harvard night. Further there he submitted his own arrangement of Harvard songs, and Fiedler promptly made that Mr. Fiedler was not long in asking him to make arrangements for him. Mr. Anderson's orchestrations not only show a high degree of perceptive ness in the matter of orchestral color and the required skill at bal ancing and contrasting sonorities but they also exhibit a high abundance of fancy humor and in the case of the "Irish Suite," commissioned by the Eire Society of Boston, the ability to weld a series of airs into a cohesive pattern.

One of Mr. Anderson's teachers at Harvard was the eminent Russian composer, Georges Enesco, briefly in residence there. A practiced conductor, he led the Harvard band for four years and has often officiated at the Pops and elsewhere. He has also made several original recordings with his own orchestra. Born in Cambridge June 29, 1908, he studied organ here with Henry Gideon and bass viol with Gaston Dufresne. He has been a tutor in the music division at Radcliffe and from 1932-35 he was organist and choir master at the East Congregational Church in Milton. How many Hit Parade composers can tie that record for background and a variety of musical experience?

Army Captain

Mr. Anderson's present home is in Woodbury, Conn. He is married and has two children, a daughter Jane Margarets (1944) and a son Eric Russell (1947). He is currently a captain in army intelligence at Fort Bragg, N. C., a rank that he earned during World war II. There his proficiency in Icelandic caused him to be stationed in Reykjavik where he did translating and lis on work with the Icelandic pres and radio. At Harvard he ha specialized in German and th Scandinavian languages. By th way, he plays his "Blue Tango" o Decca record and the experts pronounce his version superior t those of Xavier Cugat, Guy Lo do and others.

6

Sur la

LA MUSIQUE

«L'ŒUVRE DU XX· SIÈCLE»

LA dernière de toutes les villes européennes, Paris, a son festival, et, comme il se doit, celui-ci offre un intérêt exceptionnel. Il nous présente une sorte de révision des valeurs musicales, picturales et littéraires qui ont jalonné le demi-siècle écoulé — non pas en France seulement, mais dans le monde entier.

Ce projet ambitieux est le fait du Congrès pour la liberté de la culture.

Constituée en 1950 par des intellectuels de différents pays, cette association se propose de démontrer la force et la variété de la création artistique et spirituelle en Occident, protégée jusqu'à présent contre tout asservissement tyrannique.

En marge d'une série de débats publics entre écrivains des différentes nations du monde occidental et d'une grande exposition de peintures composée de toiles maîtresses appartenant aux diverses écoles du XX· siècle, la musique se taille la part du lion. Du 30 avril au 1er juin, 14 concerts de musique symphonique et chorale, 8 soirées de ballets, 13 représentations lyriques (dont trois créations), sept séances de musique de chambre seront données au théâtre des Champs-Elysées, à l'Opéra, au Palais de Chaillot et à la Comédie des Champs-Elysées. Soit quarante-deux manifestations, non comptés les concerts habituels de la Saison de Paris, qui continue, pendant ce temps, comme si de rien n'était...

Parmi les « clous » du festival, citons la création à Paris de Wozzeck d'Alban Berg, de Billy Budd de Britten et de Quatre saints en trois actes de Virgil Thomson ; la venue de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, de l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande, de l'Orchestre de Berlin-Ouest, de l'Academia di Santa-Cecilia ; le concours du Covent Garden Royal Opera, de l'Opéra et de l'Orchestre philarmonique de Vienne et de l'American national theatre, accompagné du New-York City Ballet ; la contribution de trois grandes chorales étrangères et provinciales ; enfin, la présence au pupitre de chefs tels que Bruno Walter, Igor Strawinsky, Münch, Monteux, Ansermet, Britten, Boëhm et Rosbaud, sans compter plusieurs de nos chefs familiers.

Quoique brillante, la phalange des solistes n'a rien d'exceptionnel. On a voulu, pour une fois, subordonner les interprètes aux auteurs et réserver aux œuvres la primauté absolue : nul ne s'en plaindra, sauf les vedettes insatiables ! Quant au choix des ouvrages, il y aurait beaucoup à dire. Certes il est très aidu, pour ne pas dire chimérique, d'équilibrer un aussi vaste panorama sans rien laisser dans l'ombre de ce et de ceux qui ont marqué leur époque. Il faut compter avec le caprice légendaire des chefs d'orchestre qui exigent des programmes de prestige et refusent carrément de diriger certaines partitions. Il faut aussi tenir compte du goût esthétique des responsables du festival. Du point de vue français, il est très curieux de ne voir figurer ni d'Indy, ni Saint-Saëns, ni Dukas, ni Florent Schmitt (de l'inconvénient d'être mort, ou trop discret !), quand certains pygmées prennent insolemment la place des géants. Personnellement, j'aurais volontiers troqué un des dix ouvrages de Strawinsky contre le Prométhée de Fauré, dont on jouera la 2e Quintette à un concert de musique de chambre. Je n'aurais eu garde d'oublier Enesco. J'aurais... que n'aurais-je pas fait ?

Au reste, c'est fort bien ainsi. Les grands musiciens que je viens de citer ont déjà la gloire et il suffit de rappeler leur nom pour leur rendre justice. A d'autres, dont le temps effacera la trace dérisoire, il est charitable d'offrir une illusion fugitive... Si la synthèse des divers aspects du génie contemporain n'est pas absolument réussie, il n'en reste pas moins que le Congrès pour la liberté de la culture donne aux musiciens contemporains une chance unique de se manifester et propose aux amateurs des soirées exceptionnelles. Soyons reconnaissants de cette initiative opportune dans un monde menacé.

Clarendon.

Le programme de la semaine

... avril. — (Eglise Saint-Roch), 21 heures : « Magnificat » et « Cantate n° 6 » (Bach) ; « Stabat Mater » (Poulenc). Orchestre Lamoureux et chorale Saint-Guillaume, avec Ernst Haefliger, Pierre Mollet, Lucie Rauh, G. Moizan.

2 et 3 mai. — (Champs-Elysées), 21 heures : « Wozzeck (Alban Berg), par l'Opéra de Vienne, sous la direction de Karl Boehm.

5 mai. — Champs-Elysées), 21 heures : « Don Juan » (Strauss) ; « Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune » (Debussy) ; « Chant de la Terre » (Mahler). Orchestre de l'Opéra, direction Bruno Walter, avec Kathleen Ferrier et Lorenz Fehenberger.

GERARD SOUZAY

trouve les critiques new-yorkais terribles et enthousiastes

— Ne me demandez pas mes impressions d'Amérique : je répéterais ce que tant d'autres ont déjà dit ! (

— Mais vous avez...

— J'ai voyagé. Quant à l'accueil qui m'a été réservé, si je fais le modeste, on me jugera hypocrite. Si je me vante, je serai ridicule. Je préfère m'abstenir.

— Comment les Américains comprennent-ils la mélodie française ?

— Mais... très bien. C'est plutôt l'esthétique européenne du lied et de la mélodie à laquelle ils sont moins accoutumés.

— La critique ?

— Terrible. Mais, quand on lui plaît, lyrique et débordante. Très curieuse de problèmes techniques.

— On vous parle beaucoup de technique vocale ?

— Parfois ; cela me prépare à affronter, mercredi, le public parisien. N'est-on pas l'idée... hardie de me faire parler ? Avant de chanter, il va falloir que j'explique comment je chante : si je le savais moi-même !

— Triple faison de réjouir le public : vous allez trembler, parler, chanter ; c'est tout un programme de festival !

C. B.

Figaro April 30'52

Préface à «l'Œuvre du XX· siècle»

PAR DENIS DE ROUGEMONT

PARMI les traits qui définissent l'Occidental, le goût de se rendre compte est l'un des plus constants. Il nous fit inventer la boussole et la montre, mais aussi la science historique, la biographie, et les expositions.

L'Œuvre du XXe siècle veut être au premier chef, littéralement, un compte rendu. Exposition, biographie d'une époque, essai d'orientation parmi tant de recherches, d'égarements et de trouvailles, elle veut montrer plutôt que démontrer, et faire voir au lieu de faire croire. Mais cette prise de conscience du siècle en marche revêt, qu'on le veuille ou non, le caractère et la vertu d'un manifeste.

Une rumeur court le monde depuis plus de vingt ans : l'état de nos arts et de nos lettres, en Occident, serait la preuve de notre décadence. N'est-il pas curieux d'observer que ce jugement se trouve être à la fois celui des « passéistes » en art, et celui des adeptes de partis qui se proclament « progressistes » ? Cette part du grand public, chez nous, qui en est restée au tableau de genre, au pleinairisme, au réalisme, et qui prend pour la tradition ces innovations d'avant-hier, voit ses goûts confirmés et sanctionnés par les décrets de deux révolutions avides d'avenir. L'une, qui s'installait pour mille ans, est déjà morte. Notre art « dégénéré », disait-elle, lui survit. L'autre voudrait maintenant nous faire douter de la validité et de la vitalité de notre culture en libre essor.

Nous proposons au grand public contemporain de juger ce procès sur pièces. A l'entreprise de dénigrement poursuivie par la propagande des conformismes officiels, nous avons choisi d'opposer les chefs-d'œuvre de l'art et de la pensée libres : ils parleront d'eux-mêmes et le langage convaincra mieux que tous les arguments.

Le XXe siècle a vu se développer une série d'expériences toujours plus audacieuses, et dont plusieurs laisseront l'homme enrichi de nouveaux styles, de nouvelles techniques d'expression, et de nouveaux domaines à explorer. Tant de diversités spontanées ou voulues, tant de contradictions aussi, déconcertent l'esprit non moins qu'elles ne l'excitent, l'angoissent autant qu'elles le comblent. Une telle passion de liberté — d'ailleurs contemporaine des dictatures totales — ne va pas sans désordre, apparent ou réel. Mais nous pensons que la liberté d'expression et de création reste la condition première — non point la seule — du dégagement d'un ordre supérieur ; et que la tyrannie est le pire des désordres.

C'est dans cette vue que le Congrès pour la Liberté et la Culture a voulu rassembler au foyer même de l'aventure moderne, dans Paris, des œuvres dont la « nouveauté » semblait capable de durer, de témoigner encore dans la durée du siècle au-delà des surprises initiales — tableaux, symphonies, opéras, ballets, poèmes, et leurs auteurs vivants, et leurs commentateurs, et leurs exécutants, et ceux qui les critiquent, et ceux qui vont plus loin mais dans la même liberté.

Jamais convocation plus ample de ses forces n'aura marqué l'été d'un siècle ! Ce concours des génies et des merveilles de l'art renouvelle, dans un temps menacé, la fonction des Jeux séculaires, mainteneurs de la foi d'une cité dans son âme, et de la confiance d'une civilisation dans sa fécondité, dans son avenir.

Heureux donc ceux qui auront pu prendre de leur âge cette vue d'ensemble assurément sans précédent, et qui ne sera pas seulement rétrospective, si elle nous aide et nous anime à mieux comprendre d'où nous venons, où nous en sommes, où nous allons...

Denis de ROUGEMONT.

THE STARS AND STRIPES

Boston Symphony to Tour Europe

Cultural Congress Extends Bid For May

PARIS (Special) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it was announced here. Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux will conduct.

The company of 104 musicians will give three concerts in Paris in May as a major American contribution to "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," the month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention on the cultural achievements made by free men during the last 50 years. The exposition will open in Paris April 29 and continue through May, centering about the Théâtre des Champs Elysées.

The Paris exposition will dramatize the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to demonstrate the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to show the soundness of freedom of work and expression. To this end, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" will present outstanding works in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, which will present the Alban Berg opera, "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cécilia in Rome, the RIAS (Radio in American Sector) Orchestra from West Berlin, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields, American artists will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which Georges Balanchine is artistic director. The group will give six performances, one comprising the ballets of Igor Stravinsky, to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being made for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thompson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Art Exhibition

James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch and American paintings, including some that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe April 25, immediately upon conclusion of its 71st season in Symphony Hall.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the orchestra plans also during its tour abroad to perform in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Zurich, as well as in Belgium, Holland and Austria.

Munch, Monteux Will Share Baton

French Invitation

Since Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitsky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak to which it was brought in the 25 years of Koussevitsky's leadership. It was under Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the visit of French President Vincent Auriol which won a warm invitation from Auriol to bring the orchestra to France.

Monteux, Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the Boston Symphony since its founding in 1881. Paris-born, with a distinguished musical background in that city, Monteux was the Boston orchestra's conductor from 1919 to 1924. At present, he is conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

[146]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 1 - 1952

French Music Festival West's Answer to Reds

Paris—(AP)—Western culture sang of itself last night—to show Communists the West is civilized and to show the victims of twentieth century tyranny they have a champion.

The singing came in the opening concert of a month-long festival of music, art and literature called "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century." It was held in the old Church of St. Roch before an overflow crowd.

Star of the festival will be one of the century's greatest living composers, Russian-born Igor Stravinsky, now an American citizen. He will conduct performances of his own works, including ballets, his opera "Oedipus Rex," a concerto and his "Symphony in C."

* * *

SHARING top billing is the 104-man Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first European appearance. Charles Munch, native of Alsace-Lorraine, and French-born Pierre Monteux will conduct. The orchestra will tour Europe after the festival.

The first concert included classic Bach and a new composition by French composer Francis Poulenc, sung and played by the St. Guillaume Chorale of Strasbourg and the Orchestre des Concerts Lamoureux of Paris. Fritz Munch, brother of the Boston Symphony's conductor, conducted them.

A couple of discordant notes, both grating on the United States, were sounded before the concert.

Ballet dancer Serge Lifar, who was picketed in New York in 1948 as a Nazi collaborator, said "low intrigue" kept his Paris Opera Ballet out of the festival in favor of the New York City Ballet. The French officially cleared Lifar of the collaboration charge but he was kept out of the opera ballet for about two years.

* * *

L'HUMANITE, the Paris Communist paper, said the whole festival is an American device for cultural penetration of France and called it a "caricature of culture."

The show is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Its members include John Dewey, Bertrand Russell, Benedetto Croce and Jacques Maritain. The bulk of the $500,000 needed to underwrite the festival came from private sources in the United States.

Victims of tyranny, to whom the first concert was dedicated, were symbolized by 200 honor guests—former prisoners in Russian, German and Spanish camps.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 1 - 1952

Paris Fest Opens; Reds Lash at U.S.

Paris—(AP)—Western culture sang of itself last night—to show Communists the West is civilized and to show the victims of 20th Century tyranny they have a champion.

The singing came in the opening concert of a month-long festival of music, art and literature called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." It was held i nthe old Church of St. Roch before an overflow crowd.

Star of the festival will be one of the century's greatest living composers, Russian-born Igor Stravinsky, now an American citizen.

* * *

SHARING TOP BILLING is the 104-man Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first European appearance. Charles Munch, native of Alsace-Lorraine, and French-born Pierre Monteux will conduct.

The first concert included classic Bach and a new composition by French composer Francis Poulenc, sung and played by the St. Guillaume Chorale of Strasbough and the Orchestre Des Concerts Lamoureux of Paris. Fritz Munch, brother of the Boston Symphony's conductor, conducted them.

A couple of discordant notes, both gratin gon the United States, were sounded before the concert.

Ballet dancer Serge Lifar, who was picketed in New York in 1948 a sa Nazi collaborator, said "low intrigue" kept his Paris Opera Ballet out of the festival in favor of the New Yorw City Ballet, for which he had faint praise.

* * *

L'HUMANITE, the Paris Communist paper, said the whole festival is an American device for cultural penetration of France and called it a "caricature fo culture."

Victims of tyranny, to whom the first concert was dedicated, were symbolized by 200 honor guests—former prisoners in Russian, German and Spanish camps.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAY 1 - 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY, STRAVINSKY SHARE TOP PARIS BILLING

PARIS, May 1 (AP).—Western culture sang of itself Wednesday night—to show Communists that the West is civilized, and to show the victims of 20th Century tyranny that they have a champion.

The singing came in the opening concert of a month-long festival of music, art and literature called "masterpieces of the 20th Century." It was held in the old Church of St. Roch before an overflow crowd.

Star of the festival is one of the century's greatest living composers, Russian-born Igor Stravinsky, now an American citizen. He will conduct performances of his own works, including ballets, his opera "Oedipus Rex," a concerto and his Symphony in C.

Sharing top billing is the 104-man Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first European appearance. Charles Munch, native of Alsace-Lorraine, and French-born Pierre Monteux will conduct. The orchestra will tour Europe after the festival.

The first concert included classic Bach and a new composition by French Composer Francis Poulenc, sung and played by the St. Guillaume Chorale of Strasbourg and the Orchestre des Concerts Lamoureux of Paris. Fritz Munch, brother of the Boston Symphony's conductor, conducted them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 1 - 1952

Notes of Discord Mar Festival in Paris; Communists Call It 'Caricature of Culture'

PARIS, April 30 (AP)—The "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," a festival of music, art and literature designed to show the wares of Western culture, opened tonight with only a couple of dissonant notes.

An overflow crowd attended the opening concert in the old Church of St. Roch. It was dedicated to victims of tyranny in the twentieth century, symbolized by 200 former prisoners of the Germans, Russians and Franco Spain as guests of honor.

Classic Bach and a new composition by Francis Poulenc, French composer, were sung and played by the St. Guillaume Chorale of Strasbourg and the Orchestre des Concerts Lamoureux of Paris, conducted by Fritz Munch.

The discords came before the concert—one by the Communists, the other by Serge Lifar, ballet dancer. Both were aimed at the United States.

Lifar, who once danced with the famed Diaghilev Ballet in Russia, complained that his Paris Opera Ballet wasn't asked to contribute to the festival. He doled out faint praise for the New York City Ballet, which is the centerpiece of the dancing portion of the festival, but said—in a letter to a Paris newspaper—that "low intrigue" kept the opera ballet out.

The Communist paper L'Humanité described the festival as American, and said it was "a caricature of culture." Its aim, the newspaper declared gravely, is to facilitate ideologic occupation of France by the United States.

The month-long festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, a group of intellectuals whose members include John Dewey, Bendetto Croce, Jacques Maritain, Arthur Koestler and Bertrand Russell.

Julius Fleischmann, American yeast leader, raised through private sources and from his family's Fleischmann Foundation about $500,000 needed to float the festival.

Various Governments, including the French, have contributed to the expenses of sending orchestras or choruses to the festival, which is pointedly anti-Communist and pro-Western.

The 104-man Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, is the star offering. Later it will tour Europe, giving fourteen concerts. The New York City Ballet of sixty-five members will do two new ballets specially written by Georges Auric and Henri Sauguet.

Ethel Linder Reiner, associated with the American National Theatre and Academy, has underwritten the cost of flying an entire troupe to Paris from New York to do the opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," by Gertrude Stein. Virgil Thomson, who wrote the music, will conduct the performance. The cast is all-Negro.

This Clipping From
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT
MAY 2 - 1952

Couple of Sour Notes Are Heard In Pro-Western Arts Festival

Paris, May 1 (AP)—The "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," a festival of music, art and literature designed to show the wares of Western culture, opened last night with only a couple of dissonant notes. An overflow crowd attended the opening concert in the old Church of St. Roch.

It was dedicated to victims of Tyranny in the 20th Century, symbolized by 200 former prisoners of the Germans, Russians and of Franco Spain as guests of honor.

Classic Bach and a new composition by French Composer Francis Poulenc were sung and played by the St. Guillaume Chorale of Strasbourg and the Orchestre Des Concerts Lamoureux of Paris, conducted by Fritz Munch.

The discords came before the concert—one by the Communists, the other by ballet dancer, Serge Lifar. Both were aimed at the United States.

Damns With Faint Praise

Lifar, who once danced with the famed Diaghilev Ballet in Russia, complained that his Paris opera ballet wasn't asked to contribute to the festival.

He doled out faint praise for the New York City ballet, which is the center piece of the dancing portion of the festival, but said—in a letter to a Paris newspaper—that "low intrigue" kept the opera ballet out.

The Communist paper L'Humanite described the festival as American, and said it was " a caricature of culture."

It's aim, it declared gravely, is to facilitate ideologic occupation of France by the United States etc., etc.

The month-long festival is sponsored by the Congress for cultural freedom, a group of intellectuals; whose members include such names, as John Dewey, Bendetto Croce, Jacques Maritain, Arthur Koestler, and Bertrand Russell.

Fleischmann-Financed

Julius Fleischmann, heir to an American yeast and gin fortune, dug up through private sources and from his family's Fleischmann Foundation about $500,000 needed to float the festival.

Various governments, including the French, have contributed to the expenses of sending orchestras or choruses to the festival which is pointedly anti-Communist and pro-Western,

The 104-man Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, is the star offering. Later it will tour Europe, giving about 14 concerts.

The New York City Ballet of 65 members will do two new ballets specially written by George Auric and Henri Sauguet.

Ethel Linder Reiner, associated with the American National Theater and Academy, has underwritten the cost of flying an entire troupe to Paris from New York to do the the opera "Four Saints in Three Acts," by Gertrude Stein. Virgil Thomson, who wrote the music, will conduct the performance. The cast is all-Negro.

Besides these companies, two noted foreign-born United States conductors, Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter, are to appear. Stravinsky will lead the performance of a number of his ballets, operas and compositions.

An art exhibition of rarely-seen paintings is being arranged by American Critic James Johnson Sweeney. A number of American authors, including William Faulkner, W. J. Auden, James T. Farrell, Glenway Wescott, Katherine Anne Porter and Literary Critic Allen Tate will join in literary forums.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 3 - 1952

Boston Symphony Relaxes on Ship —With Concert

Want to know what the Boston Symphony Orchestra is doing during its trip to Europe on the Ile de France?

Just what the players would be doing in Boston

They gave a concert for other passengers on the ship yesterday afternoon and, acording to the commandant of the ship, the recital was "extraordinary and delightful."

They presented Mozart's "Ein Klein Nacht" and Haydn's "Symphony in G Major" in the permanent theatre aboard the Ile de France.

Commandant Frantz Caratique, captain of the ship, wired back news of the concert this morning with words of praise for the 90-odd players.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, led the group.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 4 - 1952

SYMPHONY ON BOARD SHIP

400 Attend Concert on Ile de France

The first symphony concert ever given at sea was staged yesterday aboard the Ile de France, bound for Europe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux.

The French Line ship, aboard which over 100 members of the symphony orchestra are traveling to Europe for a concert tour, has a theatre and stage, one of the few vessels so equipped.

Thirty members of the orchestra, gave a concert for the passengers and members of the crew in the 400 seat theatre. They played Mozart's "Eine Klene Nacht" and Haydn's "Symphony in G Major" conducted by Pierre Monteux.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

First Full Concert in Mid-Ocean Given by Boston Symphony

ABOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE (In the Irish Sea, May 3) By ship-to-shore telephone)—For the first time in the history of music at sea, the first time in the history of trans-atlantic travel, a full symphony orchestra and a world-famed conductor presented a concert in mid ocean yesterday.

The 90 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on their way to Europe aboard the Ile de France [illegible] of the Cunard line played Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Haydn's Symphony No. [illegible] under the direction of Pierre Monteux in a concert for the benefit of the Seamen's Fund.

Loud-speakers piped the performance into other [illegible] to take care of all the passengers who overflowed the [illegible] theatre.

A good part of the credit for the event must go to [illegible] Leslie Rogers of Brookline who had the foresight to carry along some music for this event that would not require the services of a group of players who were flying to Paris.

When the ship docks at Le Havre, France, tomorrow morning, the Boston Symphony will be the first American orchestra to visit the Continent since the [illegible] took the New York Philharmonic on a tour of Europe.

The Boston Orchestra under director Charles Munch will open its tour in Paris on May 6 with a concert of modern American and French music at the Conservatoire [illegible] Freedom's festival. "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Their program will include a toccata by Harvard Prof. Walter Piston of Belmont.

Wives, Children Along Too

The group will [illegible] in Paris and will [illegible] The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Munich's home town of Strasbourg in Alsace, Lyons, Bordeaux and London.

The orchestra's party [illegible] includes 27 [illegible] are [illegible] of the [illegible] Arthur Lehner, 10 [illegible] will visit [illegible] hagen, Denmark, [illegible] self by wi[illegible] the ship's [illegible]

The social [illegible] life is made [illegible] board. There [illegible] shuffleboard and deck [illegible] group from the [illegible] warmed up for the [illegible] cert with a jam [illegible]

Berets purchased [illegible] and slacks are very [illegible] the Bostonians [illegible] the Continent [illegible] for her [illegible] in the ship [illegible] distant [illegible] of Hungary [illegible] the party.

When [illegible] Boston at [illegible] 6 in the eve[illegible]

The weather [illegible] has been clear [illegible] and the sea [illegible]

Radio re[illegible] Perry's A[illegible] coming from [illegible] Boston office [illegible] in the Cool [illegible] waters of the Irish Sea.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAY [illegible]

Snow's Con[illegible] bring the B[illegible] chestra for [illegible] son instead of [illegible] Munch will con[illegible] 13 and March 12. [illegible] ductors are P[illegible] cember 4, [illegible] February 12.

There will [illegible] one series by the [illegible] chestra. All seats for [illegible] will be held [illegible] for both orche[illegible] Alexander Hils[illegible] Monteux will conduct [illegible] gram each. Eugene Ormandy will direct the other

[147]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

Extra Paris Concert on Boston Symphony's Crowded Schedule

By [illegible] WINSHIP

European schedule
Symphony Orchestra
[illegible] 13 arranged
[illegible] formances are [illegible] of the Twen[illegible] estival, and the [illegible] concert here empha-

[illegible] philosophers John [illegible] Benedetto Croce, [illegible] Bertrand Russell, of [illegible] as well as many other
[illegible] identified with West[illegible] its American affiliate is [illegible] Committee for Cul-
[illegible] headed by Prof. Sid-[illegible] New York University,
[illegible] Profs. Arthur M.
[illegible] Arthur Schlesinger Jr.,
[illegible] Niebuhr; Thornton
[illegible] Nabokov, who is [illegible] festival, and Serge
[illegible] before his death.
[illegible] intellectuals who in re[illegible] such as before the [illegible] French Revolutions, [illegible] the doom of regimes by [illegible] flight to the rebels'
[illegible] numbers of front-rank
[illegible] workers gathering here
[illegible] testimony that Western [illegible] both fresh and hope-

[illegible] will be some 75 con-
[illegible] being given last Wed-
[illegible] ticket prices will range
84 cents.

Open Rehearsals

[illegible] gesture to students,
[illegible] most politically volatile
[illegible] hope, they are being in[illegible] numerous musical dress
[illegible] the Boston Symphony,
[illegible] the Vienna Philhar-
[illegible] Rias Orchestra of Berlin, [illegible] Opera Orchestra of [illegible] other musical organiza-
[illegible] the festival, will take part [illegible] rehearsal scheme on [illegible] 21st. The theatre's bal[illegible] seats will accommodate [illegible] while the main floor will [illegible] better to manage the [illegible] operations characteriz[illegible] rsal. This is something of [illegible] Paris, though certainly [illegible] a feature for many attend-
[illegible] Boston Symphony's festivals
[illegible] Berkshires.

[illegible] American participants in [illegible] festival are the New York City
[illegible] Ballet Company, the American Na[illegible] Theatre and Academy, the [illegible] Bruno Walter and Igor
[illegible] Virgil Thomson, com-
[illegible] and critic while writers in[illegible] William Faulkner, James T.
[illegible] and W. H. Auden. The huge [illegible] ads in Paris advertising the [illegible] are packed with names of [illegible] artists and organiza-
[illegible] such as Jose Szigeti, Henri [illegible] Benjamin Britten, the [illegible] Garden Royal Opera and [illegible] Vienne; the "Orches[illegible] Symphonique de Boston" re[illegible] lagging billing.

Messrs. Munch and Monteux,
[illegible] return to their native France,
[illegible] conduct at his birth-
[illegible] Strasbourg and Paris, re-
[illegible] Mr. Monteux will re-
[illegible] for a time after the symphony
[illegible] tour conducting in Europe.
[illegible] members in the symphony
[illegible] born in Europe; and, while [illegible] on a fast trip, it will also [illegible] meeting of a return after the [illegible] in Back Bay.

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
MAY 5 - 1952

● Alice Hughes

A Woman's New York

I spent a weekend in Bean-town to wave so-long to my sister and French fiddle-playing brother-in-law just before the Boston Symphony orchestra left for Paris to play in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom. This is the UN organization under which member nations interpret the emotional and rational pleasures and profits of music, ballet, literature and other artistic and intellectual achievements by free men. Under the same Congress a few years ago the Soviet Union sent a "cultural" delegation to New York that drew pickets, riots and police to the scene. At Moscow's own "culture" session recently, the USSR lashed out at the works of us "effete" Westerners for our "modern, immoral and counter-revolutionary music." What kind of ears have Russians got that they can catch such unusual by-products from do-re-mi-fa-sol notes? In USSR when they detect such naughty emotions buried in the works of their own musicians, they denounce and even jail them for "anti-Communist sentiments."

The Boston band—104 of them—flew off on Monday. The preceding Saturday they held their last concert at Symphony Hall and, under the direction of eminent conductor Charles Munch, played an extraordinary concert. It was made up of five of the very compositions the Soviet had condemned: Barber's "School for Scandal," Honegger's "Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra," Piston's "Toccata," Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "Suite No. 2 Daphnis et Chloe," with a singing chorus. The audience—myself included—cocked ears to catch international implications, or neo-fascistic sounds. But none seemed to emerge except sense—stirring harmonies—joyous, romantic, melancholy, robust, refreshing, etc. This very concert is the initial one which will be played in the Paris Opera House, May 8. Supplementing the Boston Symphony Orchestra on this tour of 13 European cities in six countries are the New York City Ballet Company plus conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

But the music at the Saturday night concert didn't begin to add up to the excitement and mirth of the musicians and their wives and families, as they took off at Boston's Logan airport. Such jibes and jokes! mostly French, for these musikers live in a world apart. Their English, suffering from disuse, grows worse every year. My brother-in-law gave us amusing details to explain how the musical instruments and the baggage of the players were being accommodated. For each four men in the orchestra a huge trunk was built and their effects jointly packed. Preparations such as these, plus travel fees, etc., will cost about $1 million for the Boston Symphony alone. Who's to pay for this? Well, the European concerts will have some proceeds, I suppose, and I presume the United Nations provides considerable financial help from its "culture" budget.

* * *

IN EACH CITY where the B. S. O. plays, the leading state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders will be present. There will, be of course, parties receptions and all kinds of special events over which the Boston musicians' wives may have considerable anguish. They want to dress handsomely and take along plenty of shoes and other accessories. Their husbands' trunks were shipped via boat, but on the plane 45 pounds apiece challenged these women's skill for compressing their sartorial ambitions. My Boston sister took along two suits, a coat, a raincoat, two afternoon dresses, two evening dresses, one cocktail dress and some skirts, blouses and sweaters. My other sister Francie and I stood at the airport waving and wishing we were to go along . . .

As my Boston sister is at this moment in Paris celebrating her birthday with her daughter, Barbara, who is my beautiful young niece, I can sneak in this observation about my older sister, Classified, she'd come under the head of housewife. But she has more gumption, get-up-and-go, more urge for life and more skill, not only a cuisine but in knowing the more difficult ingredients of human relations, than almost anyone I know. She's a benevolent matriarch, opinionated but sound. (I've never won an argument with her yet.) Last summer she and my niece came back from Austria with a pair of 8-month-old twins, boy-and-girl, adopted by the niece and her husband. What they'll return with from this trip, heaven only knows!

(Copyright, 1952, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 6 - 1952

Arrive in France

Boston Symphony Players Will Open Tour Tonight

Paris —(AP)— Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France yesterday to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, will give its first concert on European soil tonight in the gold and gilt Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
MAY 6 - 1952

First Orchestra from U. S. To Play in Paris Opera House

Paris—(AP)—Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France yesterday to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, will give its first concert on European soil tonight in the gold and gilt Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

France's President Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U. S. Ambassador James Dunn and an array of art, music, literary, and society figures will be in the first-night audience.

The opera concert will be under the baton of the orchestra's permanent director, Dr. Charles Munch. On Thursday night, Pierre Monteux of San Francisco, its associate conductor, will lead the orchestra in Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Monteux, who was among yesterday's arrivals, conducted this composition for the first time almost exactly 39 years ago. Its reception then was hostile and Stravinsky left under a barrage of catcalls before it was over. The piece will be played at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, where it first was heard.

After its two Paris concerts, the orchestra will tour Europe at the expense of the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Hub Symphony Group Arrives in France

[illegible] Tuesday [illegible]
[illegible] members of the Boston Sym-[illegible] Orchestra arrived in [illegible] to begin 6 out-
[illegible] to make

[illegible] With [illegible] 71
[illegible] first concert
[illegible] tonight in the [illegible] Opera Hou e. It
[illegible] time in history
[illegible] an American orchestra has [illegible] invited to perform in the [illegible] building.

[illegible] Dress Trip To Europe

[illegible] Prosper Vincent [illegible] Foreign Minister Robert [illegible] U. S. Ambassador
[illegible] James Dunn, an array of art,
[illegible] literary, and society fig-
[illegible] ures will be in the first night
[illegible] audience.

[illegible] The opera concert will be under [illegible] the baton of the orchestra's perma[illegible] nent director, Dr. Charles Munch.
[illegible] On Thursday night, Pierre Monteux
[illegible] of San Francisco, its associate con-[illegible] ductor, will lead the orchestra in [illegible] Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

[illegible] Monteux, who was among yes-
[illegible] terday's arrivals, conducted this com-
[illegible] position for the first time almost ex-[illegible] actly 39 years ago. Its reception
[illegible] then was hostile and Stravinsky left [illegible] under a barrage of catcalls before [illegible] it was over. The piece will be played [illegible] at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, [illegible] where it first was heard.

[illegible] After its two Paris concerts, the [illegible] orchestra will tour Europe at the [illegible] expense of the Congress for Cul[illegible] tural Freedom.

Petrillo Sent Champagne

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

With the compliments of James C. Petrillo, president of the musicians union, a champagne fly-off party immediately preceded the transatlantic embarkation of the 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (the rest went by Ile de France) and the 11 wives, plus 2 daughters and miscellaneous camp-followers on Monday the 28th at 4 PM. Mayor Hynes had come to the final rehearsal at Symphony Hall Thursday morning to wish them bon voyage and success, and hand "Dr." Munch (which he isn't) an inscribed baton and official flag of the City of Boston to be unfurled and displayed wherever the orchestra plays.

The plane's departure had been postponed for "technical reasons," a phrase which remained unexplained but which orchestra men accepted with sympathetic resignation as applying as well to their own occasional delays. The plane finally took off in an unpleasant drizzle and was almost at once high above the clouds in warm brilliant sunshine. The original departure was scheduled for Sunday evening at 7, then postponed to Monday noon. No one had eaten since breakfast, so dinner was served immediately. We ate from Logan Airport to Halifax and Air France climaxed the meal with an enormous mocha cake decorated with a handsome lyre and some notes which no one could identify.

Captain Georges Libert is enjoying the trip as much as his passengers, as practically all the orchestra men who chose to travel by plane are French-born and an immediate camaraderie was established. The crew is entering into the gala spirit, too. There are five flight officers, two stewards and a hostess. The men's names are very difficult to spell, but the lovely hostess' name is Solange Arnold.

We are approaching Gander. The vivid sun is exactly on the horizon; the tundra is covered with residual snow and the countless bodies of ice, white-rimmed at the shores.

JAY C. ROSENFELD.
Gander, N.F.

* * *

Mr. Rosenfeld, this newspaper's music critic, is accompanying the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its first European tour. The orchestra will be the featured attraction in a music festival in Paris sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The initial program of the month-long series was presented last night by a French choral group and orchestra amid strong political overtones. A news report of it appears on page 2.—Ed.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
MAY 4 - 1952

Hub Symphony in First Sea Concert

Thirty of 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sailing [illegible] European tour in the group's history yesterday gave the first symphonic concert ever held at sea.

Aboard the Ile de France and under the b[illegible] Pierre Monteux, 76-year-old conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, the 30 musician played Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmuzik" and Haydn's "Symphony in G. Major." Every seat in the ship's 400-chair theater was taken.

The remaining members of the 105-man orchestra and conductor Charles Muench flew to Paris last week.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 6 - 1952

Boston Symphony Group In France

PARIS, May 5 (AP)—Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrived in France today to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, gives its first concert on European soil tomorrow night in the gold and gilt opera house. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the old Baroque building.

[148]

EVENTFUL YEAR FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony's 71st Season Extraordinary in Many Ways — Record Number of Conductors Seen

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season, which ended a week ago last evening, was one of the most eventful, varied, and also uncertain in its long history. Due to the unfortunate and long-continued indisposition of Charles Munch, a record number of seven conductors officiated. Mr. Munch himself, who ordinarily would have conducted 18 or 19 of the 24 pairs of concerts, directed but six, three at the beginning of the season and three at the end. The associated conductor, Richard Burgin, who generally takes two or three concerts as a matter of course, led a total of four. The lion's share of seven concerts fell to Ernest Ansermet, whose availability in mid-season was a circumstance of the most fortunate kind. Pierre Monteux, who had been engaged for two pairs of concerts, conducted a third at the season's end. The other pre-arranged guest conductor, Sir Thomas Beecham, duly appeared for his one pair in January. After the departure of Mr. Ansermet, Leonard Bernstein was engaged for two and G. Wallace Woodworth for one.

FM Broadcasts

Now and then in the past either the entire Saturday evening concert, or one hour of it, had gone over the air. This season the FM station, WGBH, established itself at Symphony Hall and proceeded to broadcast both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in their entirety, thus enormously increasing the orchestra's listening public. Unfortunately, the orchestra derives no financial benefit from these broadcasts, which will continue through the Pops season. Instead, it partly contributes to the station's support, and the management believes that this arrangement is greatly to the orchestra's advantage.

During this season the orchestra received its first invitation to visit Europe and early last week the 104 players and the two conductors for the tour, Messrs. Munch and Monteux, were on their way across, either by ship or by plane.

Mr. Munch's illness deprived us of many things. Not in years, for example, has the orchestra played so little new music from living hands. There was only one American novelty, the Second Piano Concerto of Lukas Foss, an agreeable if uneven work, and only three other native pieces were played, Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," Piston's Toccata, written for the Orchestra National of France and previously played here only by that body, and the Third Symphony of William Schuman. These three works were added, or returned to the repertory, specifically for the European tour.

Contemporary European novelties included Bartok's Concerto for viola (William Primrose,) Alban Berg's song cycle, "Der Wein" (Patricia Neway,) Honegger's "Monopartita," Frank Martin's Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments, the Third Symphony of William Pijper, the Piano Concerto of Roussel, and Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune. It might be added that of these composers only Honegger, Martin and Vaughn Williams are still among the living. Also added to the Orchestra's repertory were Chabrier's "Joyeuse Marche," Debussy's "Six Epigraphes Antiques," as orchestrated by Mr. Ansermet, Delius' "Marche Caprice" and "Summer Night on the River," the Suite from Handel's "Il Pastor Fido," as arranged by Beecham, and the G major Violin Concerto of Mozart, (Arthur Grumiaux.) In all, there were 84 works by 39 composers as compared with last season's total of 73 works by 44.

The above statistics bear witness to the variety of musical experience mentioned in the first paragraph. We had fewer choral pieces than we would have had if Mr. Munch had stayed on the job. Those we did get were Bach's St. John Passion, Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," the Vaughan Williams Fantasia and (in a sense) Ravel's Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, in which the chorus of the New England Conservatory sang here for the first time the choral parts that are generally replaced by instruments.

The Conductors

Getting back to the conductors, we were well served by all of them. Messrs. Monteux, Ansermet and Beecham gave us the benefit of their distinguished gifts and their ripe experience. They gave us interesting programs besides, though some found Sir Thomas' list a bit inconsequential, save for the Sibelius Sixth, and that is abysmally dull. We owed to Mr. Bernstein the challenging piece by Berg. Otherwise, his lists were disappointingly conventional. Mr. Burgin was, as always, a resourceful program-maker and a sound interpreter. The return of Mr. Munch found his powers undiminished but his platform manner somewhat subdued. He does not intend to spare himself in the immediate future. Besides conducting the majority of the European concerts, he will bear the principal burden at the Berkshire Festival. It has been announced that he will be with us next season and that the guest conductors will be Mr. Monteux and Guido Cantelli, as yet unkonwn here. The season just ended was, in a manner of speaking, a sort of interlude. Next year we can probably count on, and certainly hope for, "business as usual."

* * *

THE CONCERTS

The new Pops, entering their second week, will again take place on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights only, with the same program for each concert. The current one will bring Jesus Maria Sanroma in the G minor Piano Concerto of Mendelssohn. Beginning with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" and ending with the Valerius Prayer of Thanksgiving, this list contains equally familiar Pops offerings from the hands of Nicolai, Wagner, J. Strauss, McBride, Porter and Gade.

Margot Warner, soprano, will give a recital Tuesday evening in Recital Hall. The French pianist, Aline van Barentzen, will play this evening in the Junior High School Auditorium at Abington, under the auspices of the Catholic Women's Guild of that town. Francis Findlay, well-known Boston conductor, now on the faculty of B. U.'s College of Music, has been appointed conductor of the Worcester Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first concert in the Municipal Auditorium on Monday evening of next week. The assisting artist will be Mr. Sanroma.

The New England Conservatory Chorus, under Lorna Cooke de Varon, will give a concert at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, featuring music by M. A. Charpentier Dallapiccola, Vaughan Williams, Bartok and Copland. Free tickets on application.

Dany Caron and Bernard Blier in "Passion for Life," Kenmore screen.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
MAY 5 - 1952

Boston Symphony Is Off To Paris for UN Concerts

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, May 4—I spent a weekend in Bean-town to wave so-long to my sister and French fiddle-playing brother-in-law just before the Boston Symphony Orchestra left for Paris to play in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. This is the U. N. organization under which member nations interpret the emotional and rational pleasures and profits of music, ballet, literature and other artistic and intellectual achievements by free men. Under the same Congress a few years ago the Soviet Union sent a "cultural" delegation to New York that drew pickets, riots and police to the scene. At Moscow's own "culture" session recently the USSR lashed out at the works of us "effete" Westerns for our "modern, immoral and counter-revolutionary music." What kind of ears have Russians got that they can catch such unusual by-products from do-re-mi-fa-sol notes? In USSR when they detect such naughty emotions buried in the works of their own musicians, they denounce and even jail them for "anti-Communist sentiments."

Alice Hughes

The Boston band—104 of them—flew off Monday. The preceding Saturday they held their last concert at Symphony Hall and, under the direction of eminent Conductor Charles Munch, played an extraordinary concert. It was made up of five of the very compositions the Soviet had condemned: Barber's School for Scandal, Honegger's Symphony No 2 for String Orchestra, Piston's Toccata, Debussy's Le Mer and Ravel's Suite No 2, Daphnis et Chloe, with a singing chorus. The audience—myself included—cocked ears to catch international implications, or neo-fascistic sounds. But none seemed to emerge except sense — stirring harmonies — joyous, romantic, melancholy, robust, refreshing, etc. This very concert is the initial one which will be played in the Paris Opera House, May 8th. Supplementing the Boston Symphony Orchestra on this tour of 13 European cities in six countries are the New York City Ballet Co. plus conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

But the music at the Saturday night concert didn't begin to add up to the excitement and mirth of the musicians and their wives and families as they took off at Boston's Logan airport. Such jibes and jokes! mostly in French, for these musikers live in a world apart. Their English, suffering from disuse, grows worse every year. My brother-in-law gave us amusing details to explain how the musical instruments and the baggage of the players were being accommodated. For each four men in the orchestra a huge trunk was built and their effects jointly packed. Preparations such as these, plus travel fees, etc., will cost about $1,000,000 for the Boston Symphony alone. Who's to pay for this? Well, the European concerts will have some proceeds, I suppose, and I presume the United Nations provides considerable financial help from its "culture" budget.

In each city where the B.S.O. plays, the leading state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders will be present. There will be, of course, parties, receptions and all kinds of special events over which the Boston musicians' wives may have considerable anguish. They want to dress handsomely and take along plenty of shoes and other accessories. Their husbands' trunks were shipped via boat, but on the plane 44 pounds apiece challenged these women's skill for compressing their sartorial ambitions. My Boston sister took along two suits, a coat, a raincoat, two afternoon dresses, two evening dresses, one cocktail dress and some skirts, blouses and sweaters. My other sister Francie and I stood at the airport waving and wishing we were to go along . . .

Copyright, 1952, King Features Synd., Inc.

Europe: Churchill-Egyptian Envoy Discuss Sudan

British Prime Minister Churchill has personally discussed the Anglo-Egyptian deadlock over the future of the Sudan with Abdul Fattah Amr Pasha, Egyptian ambssador.

A twin-engined DC-3 airliner crashed and burned in dense woods about 150 miles from Oslo, killing at least 11 of the 29 persons reported aboard. The plant carried Norwegian whalers returning from the Antarctic.

The remainder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 85 members, has arrived in France, and the orchestra will give its first concert in the Paris Opera House tonight.

Far East: Admiral Radford Confers With Chiang

Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Commander of the United States Pacific Fleet, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek conferred for 2½ hours in Taipeh, Formosa. This is their first meeting since the Philippine-Formosa area was shifted to Admiral Radford's jurisdiction in mid-March.

Weather Predictions: Cloudy, Mild (Details Page 2)

Christian Science Monitor - Pa.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 6 - 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES IN FRANCE

PARIS, May 5 (AP)—Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrived in France today to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, gives its first concert on European soil tomorrow night in the gold and gilt opera house. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

France's President Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schumann, U. S. Ambassador James Dunn and an array of art, music, literary, and society figures will be in the first night audience.

The players, who arrived today on the Ile de France, will be joined by 22 others who flew in last Tuesday, in rehearsals tomorrow morning.

The opera concert will be under the baton of the orchestra's permanent director, Dr. Charles Munch. On Thursday night, Pierre Monteux of San Francisco, its associate conductor, will lead the orchestra in Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Monteaux, who was among today's arrivals, conducted this composition for the first time almost exactly 39 years ago. Its reception then was hostile and Stravinsky left under a barrage of catcalls before it was over. The piece will be played at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, where is first was heard.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 6 - 1952

Arrive in France

Boston Symphony Players Will Open Tour Tonight

Paris —(AP)— Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France yesterday to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, will give its first concert on European soil tonight in the gold and gilt Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 6 - 1952

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT

In Its First Concert on European Soil

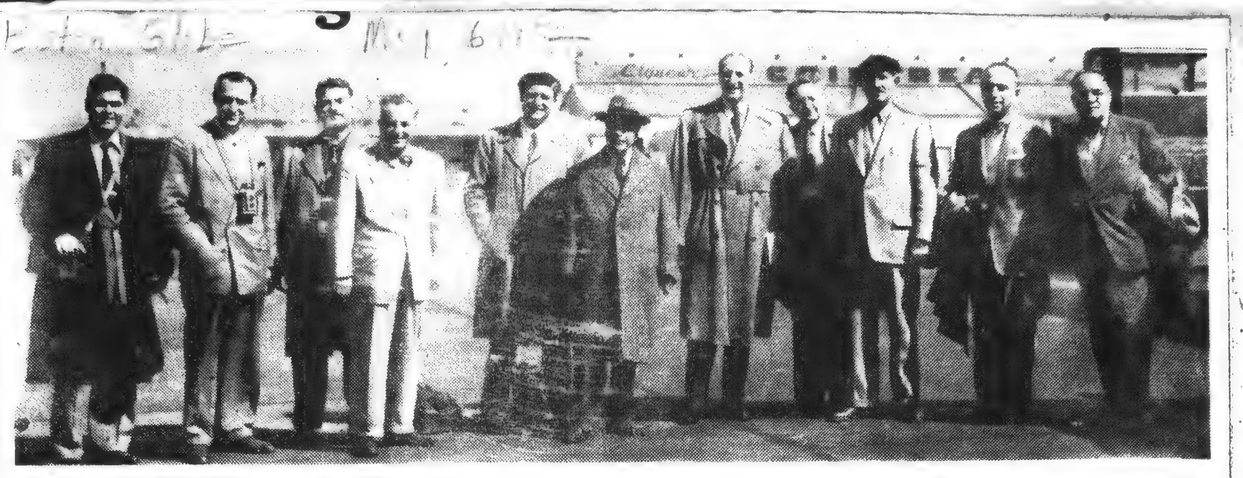
PARIS, May 5 (AP)—Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France today to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, gives its first concert on European soil tomorrow night in the Gold and Gilt Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

[19]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

Boston Symphony in Paris



SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN PARIS—Exclusive photo shows members of famed Boston orchestra arriving at Orly Airport for three weeks' European tour. Left to right, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Henry Portnoi, bass; Jean Cauhape, viola; Lucien Hansotte, trombone Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Herbert Lauga, violin; Alfred Krips, violin; Albert Bernard, viola; Bernard Zighera, harp, and Leon Marjollet, cello.

bruises on his feet from walking barefoot on the deck of the Hobson. jumped into the water . . . then I was picked up by a boat and taken on the Wasp."

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
952

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives In France For Tour

By John Roderick

Paris May 5, AP — [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France today to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra, which is 71 years old, gives its first concert on European soil Tuesday night in Paris' Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has ever been invited to perform on the European continent.

[illegible] Vincent Auriol, Ambassador Robert [illegible] Ambassador James Dunn and a host of art, music and society [illegible]

The players, who arrived today on the Ile De France, will be joined by 29 others who flew in last Tuesday, in rehearsals Tuesday morning.

The opera concert will be under the baton of the orchestra's permanent director, Dr. Charles Munch. On Thursday night, Pierre Monteux of San Francisco, its associate director, will lead the orchestra in Igor Stravinsky's Rite Of Spring."

Monteux, who was among today's arrivals, conducted this composition for the first time almost exactly 39 years ago. Its reception then was hostile and Stravinsky left under a barrage of catcalls before it was over. The piece will be played at the Theatre Des Champs-Elysees, where it first was heard.

The orchestra will hold a semi-public rehearsal on Thursday to which French students of composition and members of the press will be admitted.

Monteux, who is 77, has just retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. He is a Parisian by birth.

After its two Paris concerts, the orchestra will tour Europe at the expense of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which is backing the "masterpieces" festival. Concerts are scheduled for The Hague May 10, Amsterdam May 11, Brussels May 12, Frankfurt, May 14 and Berlin May 15.

The tour continues in Strasbourg May 17, where Dr. Munch conducts in his birthplace under the auspices of the Free Europe University in Exile. On May 18, it plays in Metz, May 19 at Lyon, May 23 and 24 at Bordeaux and May 26 in London's Royal Festival Hall.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Opens European Tour in Paris

PARIS May 6 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra made [illegible] when it began its European tour before a packed audience. [illegible] performance of an orchestra at the famous landmark to millions [illegible] heard by President Vincent Auriol, Ambassador and Mrs. James [illegible] Foreign Minister Robert [illegible] and a host of Parisian [illegible]

The performance was sponsored by Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century festival, which [illegible] orchestra on a six-nation tour.

Featured were [illegible] overture by American composer [illegible] were Aaron Copland's Symphony No. 2, Berlioz' "Toccata" and the [illegible] Maurice Ravel's [illegible]

Paris Critics Praise Hub Symphony

PARIS (AP)—French music critics today trotted out their warmest adjectives in praise of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra who gave their first Paris concert in the Opera House last night.

The critic of Le Monde especially praised Munch's conducting of Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

"He obtained from the magnificent orchestra he directs all the effects of finesse, all the grace, all the transparence and all the vigor needed to interpret the two masterpieces of French music," he wrote.

"One felt oneself in the presence of a factory of sound equipped with exceptional machine-tooling" commented Parisian finesse. "But, when all this mechanism goes into action, one is spellbound by its power, its suppleness and its precision. . . Only music has the power to realize such perfect solidarity. One feels each music-stand has before it a master of his instrument."

The Boston orchestra, which will give a second Paris concert tomorrow night, is here in connection with the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival, sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The festival, which will last all month, is intended to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

A PARIS DIARY by Paul White

A PERSISTENT whispering campaign to discredit M Pinay's dogged efforts to bring down prices is gathering strength, thanks to certain unpleasant elements who are reluctant to admit that the postwar golden era of easy overnight fortunes made at the expense of a desperately sick nation is on the way out.

These gentry are rejoicing at the uncompromising stand of the all-powerful meat industry—estimated annual turnover 700 milliard francs a year—which won't have the Pinay plan at any price—except its own. Some butchers have found a simple way to sabotage the tax cut of 44frs. a kilo on pork which M Pinay said must be passed on in its entirety to benefit the long-suffering consumer.

This weekend I asked my own regular man for a pork roast. He just laughed. "Haven't got any, don't intend to buy any," he said smugly. Pinay can order all the price cuts he likes but he can't make me stock pork. I can afford to wait longer than he can."

I suppose he can—in view of the prices he's been charging for the past few years.

◆ ◆ ◆

TALKING of meat, did you realise that your beefsteak provides a living for 26 branches of the meat industry before it gets to the butchers who control supply and demand, the price is up to 650frs. —more for choice cuts.

That's where you come in—and you can take it or leave it. Most of us grumble—and take it.

◆ ◆ ◆

WHAT a triumph last night for Frenchman Charles Munch when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first American symphony orchestra ever to play at the Opera in Paris, and, I suppose, the finest orchestra in the world today.

When I had a drink with him afterwards, I asked him what it felt like to return in such triumph to play before the President—but he couldn't put it into words. I don't think I have ever seen the Opera so full (except for Flagstad) and certainly never more enthusiastic.

The almost automatic comments of the French and Americans showed an amusing difference. Every Frenchman and woman dreamily said: "Ah! what a man!" and every American: "Ah! what an orchestra!"

◆ ◆ ◆

WINSTON CHURCHILL started something when he proved that a politician could also be a writer. Now I see that President Auriol is half way through his memoirs, Jules Moch has just brought out a 600-page volume, says, that she "struggled to fame." Now she can ask for—and get—£3,000 a week and expenses.

I'm told she expects to be offered radio and television engagements while she's here. Well, gentlemen, adjust your sights. Maybe her best friends wouldn't tell her, but Hildegarde has few equals when it comes to driving a bargain.

◆ ◆ ◆

M LEON BAILBY, honorary president of the Association of Paris Journalists and leading organiser of the most exclusive charity ball of the year, told me over luncheon yesterday at the Tour d'Argent that the "Bal des Petits Lits Blancs" will give away 7,000,000frs. worth of silk scarves, perfumes and orchids specially flown from Honolulu to the cream of Paris society attending this year.

Dinner, prepared by a dozen of the greatest restaurants in Paris, will be served in the historic caverns of the Museum of French Monuments at 15,000frs. a person. Later, guests will adjourn to the Palais de Chaillot theatre for an all-star show created especially for the occasion.

"There will be 70,000frs. worth of chinaware and glasses broken," M Bailby predicted. He has never been wrong in 24 years.

Hearing our conversation about the ball, a tourist couple at the

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAY 7- 1952

Parisians Applaud Boston Symphony

Paris, May 6 — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's President Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe.

The 71-year old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were DeBussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U. S. in 1907, and suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
MAY 7- 1952

Boston Symphony Scores Triumph In Paris Concert

By Reuters

Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a major success May 6 at the National Opera House here with the opening concert of its first European tour.

President Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, and American Ambassador James C. Dunn were in the packed house which gave the orchestra a great ovation, recalling its conductor, French-born Charles Munch, a dozen times.

Applause was so great that the orchestra repeated part of its last item, the "Daphnis and Chloé" suite of French composer Maurice Ravel.

The 104-member orchestra played modern American and French music at its opening concert, part of the May Festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

It will give a second concert here May 8 and will perform later in The Hague, Brussels, London, Berlin, and several French cities.

[15?]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 7- 1952

FRANCE WON BY SYMPHONY

Paris Concert Is Given Hearty Reception

PARIS, May 6 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Charles Munich, tonight won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe.

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U. S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis Et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

Besides President and Madame Auriol, celebrities who crowded into the Baroque Old Opera House to hear the celebrated orchestra included Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS OVATION FROM PARISIANS

By JOHN RODERICK

PARIS, May 6 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's President Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe..

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U. S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

Besides President and Madame Auriol, celebrities who crowded into the baroque old opera house to hear the celebrated orchestra included Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

The concert, under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch, was a gala event of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

It was the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the opera.

The orchestra opened its pro-

(Continued on Page Twenty-two)

Symphony Wins Paris Ovation

(Continued from First Page)

gram with Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," composed in 1932, which it first performed in Boston in 1940.

INTRODUCED IN 1946

Arthur Honegger's "Symphony No. 2" for string orchestra, was the second composition. It was introduced to Americans by Dr. Munch in 1946. The third, Albert Roussel's Second Suite from Act Two of the ballet "Bacchus Et Ariane," was given its world premier in Paris in 1936 and 10 year later, on Dec. 26, 1946, first played in America with the Boston Symphony.

The second half of the program opened with American composer Walter Piston's "Toccata," first played by Dr. Munch on the French national radio in 1948. The Boston played it Oct. 14 the same year.

Debussy's "La Mer," the most celebrated of the Bostons firsts, was given its first hearing in France in 1905. The Boston played it two years later.

WILL TOUR EUROPE

The 104-man Boston orchestra barely had time to re-assemble and get down to rehearsals before giving tonight's historic concert. The first section of 22 members arrived with Dr. Munch a week ago. The remainder, with Associate Conductor Pieree Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got in only yesterday.

For 43 members of the orchestra, tonight's event was a homecoming. These players were born in Europe, 21 of them in France.

After a second concert on Thursday, in which Monteux will lead the orchestra in a historic re-playing of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," the group will begin its European tour, which includes concerts in Brussels, Amsterdam, Germany, France and England.

Boston Symphony Wins Critics In Paris Debut

PARIS (UP) — Leading Paris music critics have hailed the European debut of the Boston Symphony as a brilliant triumph.

The orchestra opened its European tour Tuesday night at the International Culture Festival under maestro Charles Munch.

"Rarely has a brilliant triumph been rewarded more completely with success," said critic Rene Dumesnil in the influential newspaper Le Monde.

"Charles Munch obtained from the magnificent orchestra which he conducts all of the effects of finesse, grace, transparence and vigor so necessary to translate properly the two French works played," he wrote.

The Paris-Press carried a headline that said "The Boston Symphony Dazzled Parisians," and published a picture showing French President Vincent Auriol congratulating Munch.

The critic described the orchestra's interpretation of Roussel's "Baccus and Ariane" and Swiss-born Arthur Honegger's Second Symphony as "a transcending interpretation" and called the "Toccata" by American composer Walter Piston "a revelation."

Le Figaro, noting the fact that Munch was born in France, praised "the French general" who so ably led the symphony.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Opens Europe Tour in Paris

PARIS, May 7 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first European tour last night with a program under Maestro Charles Munch at the famed Paris Opera House.

The presentation marked the maiden performance of an American orchestra there. It was heard by an audience studded with celebrities.

French President and Madame Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower was unable to attend because of other engagements.

The performance was sponsored by the anti-Communist "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" Arts Festival, which later will take the orchestra on a tour of six European countries.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Opens European Tour in Paris

Paris, May 7 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first European tour last night with a program under maestro Charles Munch at the famed Paris Opera House.

The presentation marked the maiden performance of an American orchestra there. It was heard by an audience studded with celebrities including President and Mme. Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Captivates Paris As It Makes Bow at Festival There

Full Pomp and Ceremony Mark Occasion —Audience Recalls Orchestra After It Plays 'Daphnis et Chloe' Suite

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 6—What must have been one of the most brilliant occasions that the Paris Opera, the scene of many a brilliant occasion, has witnessed in this century was the first appearance in Europe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, which took place in that famous theatre this evening.

As a gala event, this one had all the outward trappings of pomp and ceremony and brilliant festivity. President Vincent Auriol and Mme. Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and United States Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn were mong those who attended.

But the performances given by the superb orchestra were by far the highest honor that the evening could invoke. The musicians were obviously on the qui vive to give their utmost. The audience was in an equally tense and expectant vein.

Excitement and enthusiasm were such that when a long program of modern French and American music had ended, it became necessary for Mr. Munch and the orchestra to play the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite over again.

This program had several special features appropriate to the purposes of the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" of which it was a feature. One was the presence in the audience of the composer, Arthur Honegger, who could not have failed to be profoundly moved by the reception given his tragical and heroic Second Symphony for Strings with solo trumpet.

Mr. Munch had introduced this work in America when he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 1946. The slow movement is an elegy of a simplicity yet profundity of thought that grows upon one with its every hearing.

The finale—resolute, militant, indomitable—reaches its climax when the solo trumpet, against stressful counterpoint of the strings, flings out the chorale theme that is like unto a hymn of faith. This symphony was composed by Honegger in Paris during the German occupation of the second World War.

It was Schumann who said that revolution could be concealed within the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. The symphony sounded strange and recondite to many who heard its first performances. Hitler's crew was unaware of its existence. Tonight's audience heard the symphony with unrestrainable enthusiasm, and understood well its cry for liberty.

Two American composers were on this program, Samuel Barber, with his early, gay, adroit overture, "School for Scandal," and Walter Piston, whose brilliant toccata Mr. Munch first presented on the French National Radio in 1948 and introduced in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 14 of the same year.

The Boston Symphony gave the first American performances of DeBussy's "La Mer" in 1907 and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" in 1917. These were indeed, interchanges of the arts and cultures of nations of democratic tradition and achievement memorably performed.

The program contained a fitting tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky, whose indefatigable labors and genius of more than a quarter of a century had done so much to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its present pre-eminence among the greatest orchestras of the world and whose record in performing new music and discovering young composers of talent is matched by no other master of the baton.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only playing matchlessly for the first time in Europe, it was also the first American orchestra to be invited to perform at the Paris Opera, which, with all its gilt and gewgaws, has a native magnificence and old-style grandeur in addition to exceptionally favorable acoustics for the performance of symphony music.

After the concert, a reception was held backstage for Mr. Munch and his men.

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Opens Six-Week Tour of Europe

PARIS, May 6 [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first European tour last night with a program under maestro Charles Munch at the famed Paris Opera House.

The presentation marked the maiden performance of an American orchestra there. It was heard by an audience studded with celebrities including President and Mme. Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

The concert, under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch, was a gala event of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

It was the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the opera.

The orchestra opened its program with Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," composed in 1932, which it first performed in Boston in 1940.

Munch's program [illegible] the School of Scandal overture by Samuel Barber, American composer. Also heard were Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for [illegible] Piston's Toccata, and the second suite of Maurice Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

A backstage party for Munch was held later by the French Ministry of Culture.

Thursday the Boston Symphony comes under the baton of Pierre Monteux, associate director and retired recently from the San Francisco Symphony, to direct Igor Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, which caused a riot when he performed it in the same theater 30 years ago.

BOSTON TRAVELER, THURSDAY, MAY 8, 1952

CONDUCTOR ARRIVES IN PARIS—(AP Photo) Pierre Monteux (left), familiar conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown as he arrived in Paris this week to conduct the orchestra at the "Twentieth Century Festival." Right is George Judd, administrator of the orchestra.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 8 - 1952

e Were Conquered,"

Paris Acclaim Surpasses Wil

By RUDOL

PARIS, May 7—Music

the Paris press went all o

uropean debut of the Bo

nder Charles Munch at th triumph of the first cate mphony Wins

(Continued from First Page)

hen for perhaps the first time s recent history the orchestra

ored, repeating the final pages

Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" traversing it with nearly fan-ic bravura.

ut in Paris, audience reaction ot an indication that the in-tial music critics and writers place their stamp of approval musical event. There was in equence a good deal of sus-e until such quotes as "What orchestra!" "Bravo, mon cher tre," and "Incomparable" ap-

ed in the press today.

E WERE CONQUERED"

he music critic of Le Figaro ck a military note. "The erican troops have landed," rote. "But let us not be emrassed in admitting we were quered. A French general

manded them." He added,

nch was in rare form."

ith these and equally glowing s, plus a wide photographic rage of the event contributing he acclaim, the Boston Symny passed its first European ts and its wildest dreams.

t was both for the orchestra's shbourg-born conductor and 104-man personnel an occasion

ught with challenge. The old ra House, although one of the t beautiful opera houses in world, is not designed for or-stral performances. Its acouss deadened as they are by the d brocade everywhere, are

h the orchestra arranged ban fashion, the strings way ard of the proscenium arch results were anything but

d compared to those in Boss Symphony Hall. The strings

ed dead, the brasses overnsized.

NDEES IN GALLERIES

aking this at the rehearsal

ra had faced the evening

h [illegible]ing. As the French

[illegible] has no opportunity fo

[illegible]m, however, for the oth

[illegible] hall is dead acousti

[illegible] tremendous dynami

[illegible] of the orchestra as well a [illegible] virtuosity prove ang to it.

he first number on the pro m, an overture by Barber, wa mildly received, but after th

rger that followed the issu never in doubt as one ovatio owed another.

he concert was one of th e musical events sponsored b

Congress of Cultural Freedo

ing May in Paris, and so wid preaded the fame of the or ra. It was completely sol with standees in the strato ge galleries.

champagne reception tende

by the ministry of culture t ductor and orchestra followe

concert.

he "official" benediction o

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Opens Six-Week Tour of Europe

PARIS, May 6—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra made musical history under Maestro Charles Munch tonight when it opened its first European tour before a celebrity-studded audience. The maiden performance of an American orchestra in the famous Paris Opera House, landmark to millions of tourists, was heard by President and Mme. Vincent Auriol, United States Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and a host of evening-gowned Parisian notalites.

The performance was sponsored by the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" arts festival, which will take the orchestra on a six-nation European tour.

Munch's program opened with the School of Scandal overture by Samuel Barber, American composer. Also heard were Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2, Walter Piston's Toccata, and the second suite of Maurice Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

A backstage party for Munch was held later by the French Ministry of Culture.

Thursday the Boston Symphony comes under the baton of Pierre Monteux, associate director who retired recently from the San Francisco Symphony. He will direct Igor Stravinsky's Rites of Spring, which started a riot when performed it in the same theater 39 years ago.

[illegible] conductor with [illegible] week to conduct [illegible] Judd, adminis-

"We Were Conquered," Critic Says

Paris Acclaim of Symphony Surpasses Wildest Dreams

By RUDOLPH ELIE

[illegible] and feature writers [illegible] in proclaiming the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Opera House last night [illegible] concert itself, with Presi[illegible] and Madame Vincent Auriol [illegible] the list of dignitaaries and [illegible]es attending, was obvi[illegible] a tremendous audience suc[illegible] cheers and bravos echoed [illegible] about the magnificient red [illegible] of good Opera House for more [illegible] 30 minutes while Dr. Munch [illegible] six recalls to the stage.

Continued on Page Twenty-seven

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

Paris Acclaim

Paris press came from Rene [illegible]mesnil. Writing in the influen[illegible] Le Monde, the critic discussed [illegible] history of the orchestra at [illegible]s described the reaction of [illegible] the audience as enthusiastic [illegible]most beyond his recollection, [illegible] and stated that the orchestra [illegible]ss itself magnificent in its tone, its finesse, its grace and vigor.

The audience, nearly all of it in evening clothes, began assembling before the vast edifice long before the concert, scheduled to begin at 9. Fifty or more gendarmes closed off the streets leading to the front of the building as the chauffeur-driven cars appeared with the celebrities who included such musical people as Ernest Ansermet, Nicolle Henriot and Arthur Honegger, who received a terrific ovation along with Munch and the orchestra following the performance of his "Second Symphony."

Meantime, the men of the orchestra, arriving early and nervously on the scene, entered the Opera's stage door and warmed up behind the scenes. It was first planned that it play both national anthems, but President Auriol, evidently careful not to set a precedent, changed his plans and arrived unofficially.

He took his place with Mme. Auriol and his daughter in full dress in the president's box just over the stage, but there was no ceremony. Munch bowed to the president, who smiled and waved, and the orchestra began with Samuel Barber's "School for Scandal."

Hovering nervously in the wings were George Judd, manager of the orchestra, as well as other members of the traveling orchestra staff.

5-MINUTE OVATION

The audience reaction to the opening number brought additional tension as it was only too apparent that the seating of the orchestra was anything but conducive to the best sound, but after the Honegger achieved a five-minute ovation the atmosphere was cleared.

After the concert the men of the orchestra themselves said they didn't think they ever had played so well. They had had more than seven days largely away from their instruments (practice aboard the Ile de France was difficult) and but one rehearsal, on the day of the concert itself.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Wins Paris Applause

PARIS, Wednesday (AP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra last night won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's President Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe.

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U. S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 9 - 1952

May 9

Boston Symphony in Second Paris Triumph

By JOHN RODERICK

PARIS, May 3 (AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated tonight a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theater on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near-riot and Stravinsky, a budding composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian Ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Tonight's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

MORE CHEERS

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

BOSTON PLAYERS

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston orchestra crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

SECOND TRIUMPH

It was a second triumphal concert for the Boston orchestra in Paris. The 104-piece group under the baton of its permanent director, Charles Munch, played its first concert on European soil Tuesday before a plush audience at the opera house.

No American artistic group has been received in France with such warmth and enthusiasm in recent times. Both the critics and public have used supehrlatives in describing its brilliance.

The orchestra goes on tour shortly under auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which is sponsoring the Paris festival. It will return to Paris May 21 for a farewell concert.

BOSTON POST, FRIDAY, MAY 9, 1952

SYMPHONY RECREATES OLD SCENE

Russian's "Rite of Spring" Greeted Wildly

PARIS, May 8 (AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated tonight a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

HAD TO FLEE BEFORE

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

2000 Attend

The great Russian Ballet Company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Tonight's gala audience of 2000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the mustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Thanks Orchestra

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage, he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston orchestra crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

MUSIC

Sanroma, Composers Make Pops Festive

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops were a gala occasion in Symphony Hall last night. He had Jesus Maria Sanroma, former staff pianist of the Boston Symphony, on hand as soloist in the Mendelssohn G Minor Piano Concerto. And Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d, guests in town for festivities at Boston University, visited the Pops the hear a medley of tunes from their latest hit musical, "The King and I."

Otherwise, Pops were normal, with clinking glasses, remembered music and Spring lightness in the air.

Mr. Fiedler and his new and brilliant orchestra played Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," the Prize Song from Wagner's "Meistersinger," the Overture to Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," Gade's "Jealousy" and the famed "Prayer of Thanksgiving" by Valerius.

A select place on the program was given to Robert McBride's "Mexican Rhapsody," a sort of popular companion to Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico." Mr. Copland drew his material from authentic folk sources. Mr. McBride's piece sounds as though he had heard his tunes on the Latin American radio.

Mr. Sanroma gave a skilled and determined performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto and was roundly applauded. Messrs. Rodgers and Hammerstein bowed to a thunderous ovation, when the large audience finally realized who they were.

Boston Symphony Scores Another Paris Triumph

PARIS (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premiere 39 years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation. The audience of mink-draped Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty a reception as it received Tuesday night in opening its first European tour.

Monteaux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

After a dozen bows he succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come onstage. There they hugged each other as the audience applauded enthusiastically.

[152]

TIGHT BINDING

Pre-Europ

POPS

Drama on Screen—Sanromá at Pops

Christian Science

Associated Press Newsphoto

Pierre Monteux and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrive in Paris.

Pianist Plays Mendelssohn For Symphony Hall Audience

By Rod Nordell

It's a hard man who could find nothing to his taste at the Pops last night.

The program began majestically with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" and came to a dignified close with Valerius's "Prayer of Thanksgiving." In between, entertainment ranged from an eloquent cuckoo call to a fine piano performance.

An audience nearly filling Symphony Hall seemed as responsive to the music as the players did to Arthur Fiedler's baton.

Jesús María Sanromá displayed his keyboard artistry in Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra. Mr. Sanromá played with an apparent effortlessness in keeping with the occasion. His melting phrases in the Andante were a delight.

♪ ♪ ♪

Recordings by the regular Pops orchestra have made familiar most of the evening's musical arrangements. The present players discovered a good deal of the merriment in Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," the Oriental flavor of Saint-Saëns' Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," the romance and frivolity in Strauss's Overture to "Die Fledermaus," and the smooth, sensuous rhythmic flow of Gade's Gypsy Tango, "Jealousy."

McBride's medley, "Mexican Rhapsody," gave the opportunity for some solid brass-section work and let the drummers loose with castanets, claves, maracas, and some less readily identifiable noise-makers. Wagner's Song from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" provided ballast for the first section of the program.

♪ ♪ ♪

As usual, lettered placards popped up from time to time out of the depths of the trumpets, and the audience settled back for unscheduled delicacies such as Bolzoni's spun-sugar "Minuet," Massenet's evocatively Spanish "Aragonaise" from "The Cid," and the orchestra's humorously lachrymose version of the popular song "Cry," which, incidentally, in its more serious moments revealed a pleasant melody hardly suspected from the exaggerated style of the vocal record most often heard.

A fillip to the festivity occurred when two visitors in the audience, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, were brought to their feet by Mr. Fiedler after the playing of selections from their "The King and I." They and the orchestra had to take bow after bow.

It seemed only right.

BAUDOUIN AT CONCERT

Belgian King Among 3,000 Who Cheer Boston Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 12—King Baudouin led the applause of an audience of 3,000 that filled the concert hall of the Brussels Palais Des Beaux Arts to capacity tonight to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch.

Belgian music critics described the orchestra as the most versatile heard here in living memory.

The program consisted of the Overture of the "School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber; Symphony No. 5, by Arthur Honegger, the "Bacchus and Ariadne" Suite, by Albert Roussel; "The Sea," by Claude Debussy, and "Daphnis and Chloe," by Maurice Ravel.

Monteux Acclaimed in Paris

By the United Press

Paris

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night.

They performed Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which touched off a riot at its première under the same conductor in the same theater 39 years ago.

The flashback found the Russian-American composer in the audience, just as he was on that May night in 1913 when some 50 persons were arrested in the fracas fomented by the composition. Critics said it was too modernistic and vulgar.

This time there was no riot. The audience of Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty an ovation as it received Tuesday when it opened its first European tour here.

♪ ♪ ♪

Besides the Stravinsky composition, works of three others were on the program. William Schuman's Third Symphony, Vaughan Williams' Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Darius Milhaud's Second Suite from "Protée" also were heard.

An especially warm welcome went to Monteux, who retired last month after 17 seasons as leader of the San Francisco Symphony. He is acting as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony on its tour under Charles Munch. Monteux headed it in the years 1919-24.

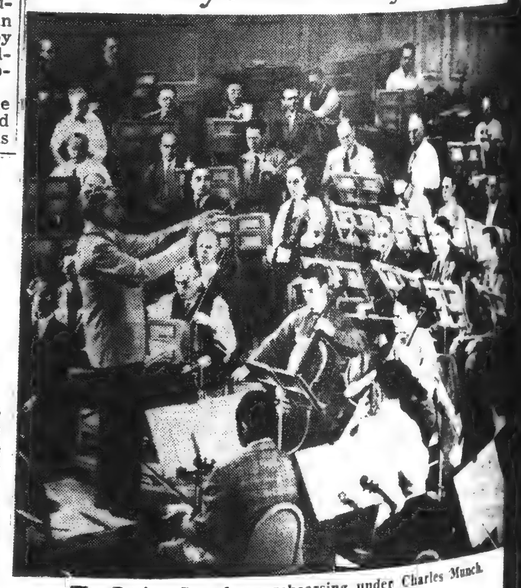
♪ ♪ ♪

After taking about a dozen bows, Monteux succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come to the stage. They hugged each other, and the audience gave them a tremendous ovation.

"It has been 39 years since I was here," Monteux said. "Let's have another rendezvous in 39 more years."

Friday, May 9, 19

They Took Paris by Storm



The Boston Symphony rehearsing under Charles Munch.

HE NEW YORK TIMES, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1952. AM

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

STRAVINSKY SCORES A HIT AT PARIS FETE

Boston Symphony's Reading of 'Sacre du Printemps,' Under Monteux, Real Triumph

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 8—Igor Stravinsky enjoyed a triumph of literally epochal significance tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, performed his "Sacre du Printemps" before a wildly cheering audience in the Champs-Elysées Theatre, and history reversed itself.

For this was the same Igor Stravinsky who fled the violence of a Paris audience that denounced his music and actually came to blows in a disturbance near to mob violence at the première of the "Sacre du Printemps" in the Chatelet Theatre on May 26, 1913, almost thirty-nine years ago.

On that turbulent occasion, one man stayed in his place at the head of the orchestra, which could not be heard in the din, conducting without a superfluous gesture or expression on a face that showed only his intentness on the score. That man was Monteux. Stravinsky had disappeared. Diaghileff, producer of the "Sacre" and head of the Ballet Russe, was in his box, and did not emerge.

Monteux Retains Poise

Monteux, his short, stocky body keeping its customary stance, his command of the orchestra steady and unflinching, saw the thing through to the end, and probably made no more signs of emotion or agitation of any sort than he did this evening. Turning after his brilliant performance, bowing to the audience and hardly smiling in response to its ovation, he kept looking through the auditorium for Stravinsky.

After minutes of cheering, Stravinsky, a small, quiet looking figure in an everyday suit, rose from a place at the back of the hall and the audience went wild again. They could not have enough of him, and at last got him on the stage, where Monteux was awaiting him.

What the old comrades in arms must have felt at this moment of crashing acclamation, whit they must have been remembering as they faced the roaring crowd can be imagined but not described. The work that affronted the public and aroused its violent indignation in a previous decade was now a classic monument deemed by many the most important symphonic creation of the twentieth century.

"There was just as much noise the last time," said Monteux after the show, "but of a different tonality!"

But Stravinsky was not the only composer of the evening whose score was especially eloquent of the purposes of the International Exposition of the Arts of the Twentieth Century, of which this concert was a part. Darius Milhaud was seated quietly in a corner of the hall, his health not permitting him to rise and acknowledge the enthusiastic reception for his early suite from the ballet "Protee"—a score that this writer has long considered one of his best.

This impression was borne out this evening. With no books or reference at hand, it is nevertheless possible to recall a first American performance of the work in the second decade of this century when this new music of Milhaud intoxicated us by its audacity and laughter and assurance. One might even say its insolence, in its then very new polytonality, and orchestration and rhythmic novelty.

Touch of Brazil's Rhythm

Milhaud had been in Brazil at the French Legation there, and Brazilian rhythms, some of them akin to American jazz, were in the score. The music had then a pungency and a Rabelaisian gusto. What is more important, it has the same youth, brilliancy and gusto today.

There were two other important scores during the evening. The first, which opened the program, was Vaughan Williams' poetical evocation of the Tudor past in his "Fantasy on the Theme of Tallis," a work that familiarity never deprives of its unique beauty and atmosphere.

The other work, by a composer of America's young generation—Symphony, a virile and splendidly constructed achievement. The symphony's forms are those of the eighteenth century; the content is very modern, with a fine tension and bite of counterpoint, and a confidence and zest in the writing that are contagious. Nor is the work one-sided in its character. There are passages of introspection and self-communion.

On a program with many celebrated names and highly individual music, this symphony of William Schuman gained an ovation.

Boston Symphony Sweeps Paris In Europe Debut

PARIS, May 8 (AP)—America's Boston Symphony Orchestra took Paris by storm, responding with an unprecedented encore to persistent cheering and clapping led by French President Vincent Auriol.

Orchestra members with 20 years' experience said they could not remember giving an encore except at wartime concerts for soldiers.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the late conductor who led the Boston Symphony for many years, said the group's first performance in Europe was "overwhelming."

[153]

tion center in Frankfurt's Carleton Hotel before noon the day of the performance. Tickets unclaimed after that time will be issued on a first-come, first-served basis.

For the military performance the conductor will be Charles Munch, the orchestra's musical director. The program will consist of selections from Barber, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms.

Now in Paris

The Boston Symphony, now in Paris, also will present public concerts at 8 pm May 13 in Frankfurt's Grosses Haus and at 8 pm May 15 in Berlin's Titania Palast, with the program featuring the works of a modern American composer along with older French and German compositions.

The American composer is William Schuman, whose Symphony No. 3 (in two parts and four movements) will be presented. Works of other composers include those of Brahms, Berlioz, Ravel, Hindemith and Strauss.

Pierre Monteux, who recently retired as director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest conductor in both concerts.

3 EC Concerts Se By Boston Symphon

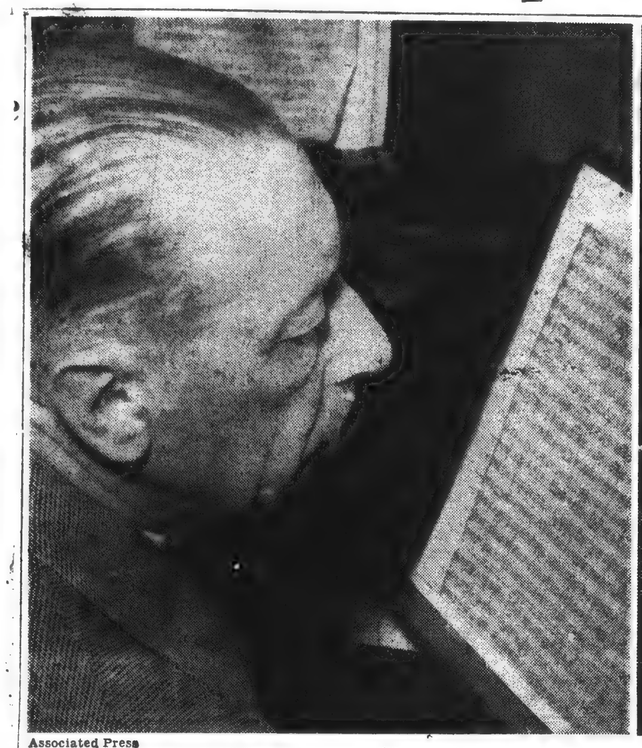
FRANKFURT, May 8 (S&S)—Three concerts—one of them exclusively for members of the U.S. Armed Forces and their guests—have been scheduled in the U.S. Zone and in Berlin next week by the touring Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All military posts in the Zone and their Special Services officers have been allocated ticket quotas for the armed services performance at 3 pm May 14 in Frankfurt's Grosses Haus. Each member of the Armed Forces is permitted to bring one German or American civilian g it was announced.

For EUCOM, ticket reserva started yesterday at Frankfurt tary Post Special Services Sec telephone 7254. Military perso stationed in Frankfurt. Mem Subpost should telephone that ber for tickets. Soldiers and cers in other parts of EUCOM the Frankfurt post must con their post or subpost Special S ices officers for ticket reserva

Reserved tickets must be p up at the Special Services offic

...ongress for Cultural Freedom Opens in Paris — 'Of Ti...



Associated Press

Igor Stravinsky will conduct his "Orpheus," May 14, and his opera-oratorio, "Oedipus Rex," at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, May 19, as part of the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris.

Charles Munch, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first European concert at the Paris Opera House Tuesday evening, May 6, as a part of the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

Boston Symphony Hailed

By the Associated Press

Paris

French music critics trotted out their warmest adjectives in praise of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra who gave their first Paris concert in the State Opera House on May 6.

The critic of Le Monde especially praised Munch's conducting of Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloé" suite.

"He obtained from the magnificent orchestra he directs all the effects of finesse, all the grace, all the transparence and all the vigor needed to interpret the two masterpieces of French music," he wrote.

"One felt oneself in the presence of a factory of sound equipped with exceptional machine-tooling," commented Paris-Presse. "But, when all this mechanism goes into action, one is spellbound by its power, its suppleness, and its precision . . . only music has the power to realize such perfect solidarity. One feels each music-stand has before it a master of his instrument."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 7 - 1952

Travel Symphony

French Music Critics Are in No Hectic Rush

By CYRUS DURGIN
Globe Music Critic

PARIS—The smoke is blowing away after what I suspect was one of the biggest nights in modern French musical history. The European debut of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was an overwhelming success. There was a cosmopolitan audience clapping and cheering its head off, and calling back Charles Munch again and again until he was obliged to violate that Bostonian tradition and play an encore.

★ ★ ★

The French press has been enthusiastic and, I am told, has paid the Boston Symphony the extraordinary compliment of reviewing the concert in next day's paper.

★ ★ ★

The French do not hasten to meet a deadline as we do of the United States, and if they get around to mention an event within three days, that is considered normal.

★ ★ ★

The French writers consistently admired the orchestra, but their response to the two American compositions of the program, "The School for Scandal," Overture by Samuel Barber, and Walter Piston's Toccata, were received no more than politely. "Agreeable," "pleasant," "clever," "but not original" were some of the expressions used regarding the Overture.

• • •

[illegible] to Mr. Piston's [illegible] except that its [illegible] not questioned—[illegible] either. What [illegible] French may have forgotten [illegible] both American composers, among a host of others, once learned from that paragon of French theoretical teaching, Mme. Nadia Boulanger.

• • •

But what these French reviewers did seize upon, and avidly, was the fact that more than 20 percent of the orchestra were French-born, and Charles Munch likewise. (Actually, he was born in Alsace before the victory of World War I liberated the province from the Germans.)

• • •

Le Figaro's man, in describing the historic concert in the red-and-gold Paris Opera House, ended by remarking that this had been "led by a French General." O, well, fair enough! We might take the same attitude were it a French orchestra with American conductor and players on exhibition in the United States.

• • •

Just how many of the average French this Festival, "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," is reaching, a stranger cannot tell without asking someone. The stated purpose of the Congress for Cultural Freedom is to show the world—and, most of all, the Russians—what free men have done in art these 50 years past.

• • •

I came across an unconventional point of view, communicated to me by one who has been long in Paris and who seems to be familiar with the ins and outs of life here. I offer it for what it is worth.

• • •

"This Festival is reaching only the wealthy French, the well-heeled cosmopolitans and the tourists," he said. "The Festival is actually a huge gravy train, and certain people stand to make a lot of money from it. The Boston Symphony was put up as the big attraction, and the Festival was sold on the strength of the Boston Symphony's reputation. Furthermore, when the Festival was first beginning to be organized, one influential individual said: 'We are not interested in America or Americans.'"

• • •

Now those are harsh words, and I cannot vouch for their absolute authenticity. But whatever the motive, the fact remains that the invitation to the Boston Symphony has been all benefit to us from the city on the Charles River. And it is a fact that one Boston Symphony rehearsal, at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees this morning, was thrown open to the public, and thronged.

• • •

After this rehearsal there was a cocktail party given the Boston Symphony by the French Radio Orchestra in the lobby of the theatre.

• • •

It was done in fine style, with champagne, martinis, sidecars and whatnot, and all with those little pastries whose creation is one manifestation of the French genius. But the crowd was terrific, and I never worked so hard in my life to get a drink.

• • •

There were appropriate remarks, of course, led off with a little speech of welcome by Wladimir Borche, director general of the Radio Diffusion Television. Henri Barraud, the composer and national program director of Radio France, followed. Alfred Zighera spoke for the members of the orchestra, and then came the two guests of honor, conductors Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch. It was a happy occasion.

Gala Paris Audience Welcomes Boston Symphony, Dr. Munch

Musicians Play Program Of American 'Firsts'; Applause Is Tumultous

Paris—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's President Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe.

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers—Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U.S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

Besides President and Madame Auriol, celebrities who crowded into the Baroque Old Opera House to hear the celebrated orchestra included Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U.S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

The concert, under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch, was a gala event of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of Western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

Dr. Charles Munch

It was the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the opera.

The orchestra opened its program with Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," composed in 1932, which it first performed in Boston in 1940.

Arthur Honegger's "Symphony No. 2" for string orchestra, was the second composition. It was introduced to Americans by Dr. Munch in 1946. The third, Albert Roussel's second suite from act two of the ballet "Bacchus et Ariane," was given its world premier in Paris in 1936 and 10 years later, on Dec. 26, 1946, first played in America with the Boston Symphony.

The second half of the program opened with American composer Walter Piston's "Toccata," first played by Dr. Munch on the French National Radio in 1948. The Boston played it Oct. 14 the same year.

Debussy's "La Mer," the most celebrated of the Boston's firsts, was given its first hearing in France in 1905. The Boston played it two years later.

The 104-man Boston orchestra barely had time to reassemble and get down to rehearsals before giving tonight's historic concert. The first section of 22 members arrived with Dr. Munch a week ago, the remainder, with Associate Conductor Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got in only yesterday.

For 43 members of the orchestra, tonight's events was a homecoming. These players were born in Europe, 21 of them in France.

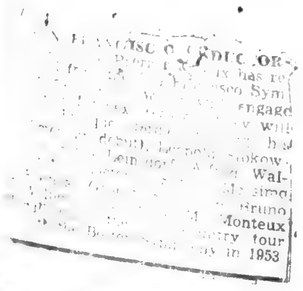
After a second concert tomorrow, in which Monteux will lead the orchestra in a historic replaying of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," the group will begin its European tour, which includes concerts in Brussels, Amsterdam, Germany, France and England.

Queen Juliana Hears Boston Symphony Concert

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 10 (Reuters)—Queen Juliana went to hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra gala performance here tonight.

Before the concert, the Boston musicians, who are on a European tour, were guests at an Amsterdam municipal reception in their honor.

[154]



...earing under Charles Munch.

...certs Se...
...Sympho...

...German or American civilian ...
...it was announced.

For EUCOM, ticket reserv... started yesterday at Frankfurt ... tary Post Special Services S... telephone 7254. Military per... stationed in Frankfurt Mus... Subpost should telephone that ... ber for tickets. Soldiers and ... cers in other parts of EUCO... the Frankfurt post must c... their post or subpost Special ... ices officers for ticket reserv...

Reserved tickets must be ... up at the Special Services in...

Friday, May 9, ...

Paris by Storm

...á at Pops

...Mendelssohn ...y Hall Audience

...Nordell

...some less readily identifiable noise-makers. Walther's Prize Song from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" provided ballast for the first section of the program.

★ ★ ★

As usual, lettered placards popped up from time to time out of the depths of the trumpets, and the audience settled back for unscheduled delicacies such as Bolzoni's spun-sugar "Minuet," Massenet's evocatively Spanish "Aragonaise" from "The Cid," and the orchestra's humorously lachrymose version of the popular song "Cry," which, incidentally, in its more serious moments revealed a pleasant melody hardly suspected from the exaggerated style of the vocal record most often heard.

A fillip to the festivity occurred when two visitors in the audience, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, were brought to their feet by Mr. Fiedler after the playing of selections from their "The King and I." They and the orchestra had to take bow after bow.

It seemed only right.

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

Hey You, Montoo! Shove Over, Willya

"Hey," yelled the news photographer, hanging over the rail overlooking the aft sun deck of the Ile de France at its New York pier, his camera at a rakish angle, "tell that little guy with the bushy hair to shove over."

The men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, more or less lined up in the overcast of a chilly afternoon, winced. One of the men on the fringes cupped his hands around his mouth and softly called up to the cameraman. "He's the conductor of the orchestra," he said. "You tell him to shove over."

"Yeah?" bellowed the photographer, "what's his name?"

"Monteux," said the musician, "Pierre Monteux."

The photographer leaned over the rail. "Hey you, Montoo!" he roared, "shove over, willya?"

The diminutive conductor, sharing with Charles Munch the responsibility of conducting the European concerts of the orchestra, shoved over with that curiously meek obedience even the most mighty reserve for cameramen.

'Give Us a Wave!'

"Okay, everybody," shouted the photographer, "give us a wave, whattya think 'ya going to, a funeral or something?"

Everybody waved, but with a numb sort of enthusiasm resulting from that combination of bewilderment, confusion, excitement, anxiety and helplessness that always accompanies starting off on an ocean liner. The ordeal of embarking had been less taxing than usual because the French Line, which had in the first place set the sailing date of the Ile de France ahead a few days out of courtesy to the orchestra's European schedule, had made it possible for the men to start embarking a half hour ahead of the others. Yet the incredible masses of papers, passports, instructions, tickets in blue envelopes, tickets in white envelopes, baggage checks, itineraries and certificates of inoculation combined with the riotous confusion on the pier, combined further with the awful sensation that the porter who promised with palm upturned to take your bags to your cabin is actually going to miss the boat entirely, all contrive to reduce the traveler to a 10-carat nervous breakdown.

Not only had the line let us go ahead a half hour early, but Mr. C. A. Emery, general agent for the line in Boston, had arranged a farewell party in the Cafe de Paris on board, and by the time we'd all tried the champagne and the almonds, some slight semblance of calm prevailed, if calm may ever be said to prevail on a ship an hour or two before sailing time. For there is probably no scene anywhere so supremely befuddling as the sight of what appears to be 11 million people shouting in 11 million languages and crawling aimlessly around in 11 million directions.

Only Old Friends

At first you have the agonizing impression it's going to be like this all the way. Only a little later, after you've taken a quick but searching glance at your cabin (and no matter how good it is it doesn't look very good at that point), do you realize that nine out of ten are only friends and relatives of the embarkees come to see them off in a cloud of flowers, champagne, baskets of fruit and vast beribboned boxes of candy. The sounds of merriment from the open-doored cabins everywhere increase in tempo with the swarming of the people in the corridors, the stairways, the foyers and the decks until the first warning blasts of the whistles jar everyone to a moment of silence, whereupon it all increases ten-fold.

In the middle of all this, however, the experienced travelers sneak rapidly and secretively off to the ship's dining room to make subtle arrangements with the maitre d'hotel, for a happy crossing depends almost entirely on (1) whom you dine with and (2) whom you bunk with, or vice versa. They're both largely a matter of pot luck, too, but pot luck that may be altered by certain secrets involving the proper application of the three P's—Persuasion, Personality and Pocketbook.

Not Much You Can Do

Still you can't do much about your cabin mates and flit from one cabin to another seeking congenial people when the ship, like this one, has been booked solid for months. (One I know did, however, going into every cabin until he found one with an empty bunk, which he did at 4:30 A. M. . . . and such is the high regard the French have for ingenuity he is considered by the stewards, who pursued him all night, the greatest guy on the ship.)

You can't really do much about your dinner companions, either, although I always operate on the theory that the maitre d' is so subjected to persuasion without pocketbook he is captivated by my announcement that I'll sit anywhere so long as there are at least three jeunes filles around. "Aha," he is theoretically supposed to say, "and is not one enough?" At this I theoretically give him a droll wink and tuck a few thousand theoretical franks under his charts, whereupon he seats me with three elderly members of the W. C. T. U. on a pilgrimage to suppress 'alf and 'alf.

So the only thing to do is get there early and hope for the best. Either that or get there late and get there loaded with what is known idiomatically as lettuce. Following the usual Elie pattern I got there in between—and those W. C. T. U. ladies are charming. I wish they wouldn't turn away when I offer to pour the wine, though. It makes me nervous.

[155]

Symphony in Germany

By the United Press

Frankfurt

A capacity crowd of more than 1,500 persons wildly applauded the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 13 and called back guest conductor Pierre Monteux for eight curtain calls.

The audience of Germans and U.S. servicemen at the Frankfurt Municipal Theater was particularly enthusiastic about the orchestra's rendition of William Schuman's Third Symphony.

A special delegation from the small town of Oberstaufenbach, birthplace of the Boston Symphony's original concertmaster Daniel Kuntz, attended the performance and presented a plaque to the orchestra.

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Gives Concert At Sea

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

From the moment the 1200 or so passengers of the Ile de France learned that about 70 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were aboard, the big question was "When would they give a concert?" The answer was fairly long in coming.

It had to be long in coming; most of the instruments were 60 or 70 feet below deck in the brand new trunks the Symphony, at a cost of some $30,000, had acquired to make this trip. I went down into the baggage room to look these new trunks over and the project that is moving 104 men around on a tour like this really staggering.

Din Terrific

Towering above all the great piles of suitcases, trunks, wicker baskets and packing cases in the hold were the six-foot-two-inch brass-studded black trunks marked, in great white letters, BSO. Standing and sitting here and there among the pieces were perhaps a dozen men of the orchestra, one playing a violin, another a flute, another a French horn, still another a 'cello and the din was terrific.

For they weren't playing together; they were practising, warming up, keeping their hands in, and the confusion of tones and sounds was indescribable. (Most of the violin players practiced in their cabins on the voyage, the other instruments being confined to the baggage compartment. But one bassoon player, kept awake all night by a crying baby in the next cabin, told the mother he was going to practice his bassoon all night in his cabin. It didn't work, however; he slept in the hospital all the way over).

They told me that these new trunks were designed to hold the clothing, the personal effects and in many cases the instruments of four men each. They proved to have doors on back and front, each providing a clothes pole, while the body contained two sets of four drawers each. Thus there are about 28 of these new contraptions, and although the initial cost was high, the reduced weight over the old individual piece is so great that they are figured to pay for themselves in saved baggage charges in three years.

The total weight of all the baggage, including instruments, music, music stands and all the rest, in case you like statistics, is well over 20 tons, the total value $200,000. In addition to those official trunks and packing cases containing instruments, each man in the orchestra has his own personal luggage in his cabin. How many pieces there are altogether I cannot imagine, but all of them are moved in one operation involving special arrangements with customs officials, railroad agents, hotel agents and whatnot.

No Simple Matter

Thus, to get it all out for a ship's concert was no simple matter, but ship's concerts for the benefit of seamen is one of the oldest traditions of trans-oceanic travel, (and the date was set for an afternoon concert in the "salon de spectacle," a 1000-seat affair with fine red plush seats and a smart modern decor.

The afternoon of the concert itself—and it happened to fall on the roughest day of an exceedingly calm voyage—found everyone on shipboard who possibly could, crowding into the theater. Although extra seats were provided, perhaps a hundred or two stood along the outer aisles of the theater. As there was no artist's room, the men of the orchestra stood either side of the stage while they tuned up, a process proving of the greatest interest and amusement to the audience milling curiously about.

Once assembled on the stage, the men had hardly enough room to bow their instruments, and when Pierre Monteux stepped onto the conductor's stand on the the floor below the stage, his head barely reached the top of the stage level; indeed, he must have been at least a foot below the level of the players. Exactly at this moment, the ship began to run into seas heavy enough to start her pitching in long back and forth movements. The conductor, pausing to grin at the audience, put his feet wide apart and began.

The orchestra, unrehearsed and, in fact, hardly aware of what they were going to play until an hour or two before, sailed into the Mozart, digging their heels into the stage to keep from sliding all over the deck, but it went off beautifully. The audience, meanwhile, an occasional member of which departed for an appointment with dramamine, was delighted with it all.

Boy Pianist Plays

The Mozart over, about 40 porters appeared, lifted a grand piano up on their shoulders, and lugged it out before the stage while a 15-year-old pianist and protege of Monteux named Samuel Lipman played a couple of solos handsomely. The porters hauled it away (to loud applause), and this time the full group of 28 assembled for the Haydn. This time the brasses and woodwinds were in the exceedingly unconventional situation of being in front of, rather than behind, the strings, and six or eight feet below them as well.

But again, entirely unrehearsed, sliding around in their chairs, and mostly unable to see the diminutive conductor at all, they played it as if they were in Symphony Hall. Nobody announced how much money was taken up in the collection baskets handed around by four of the best-looking girls they could find on ship board (there was considerable difference of opinion among the men of the orchestra if there were any at all), but it looked like several bushels to me.

When it was all over Mr. Monteux, a broad smile under his vast grey mustachios, said he guessed he'd done everything there was to be done now. "I have conduct at ze

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Boston Symphony

The tumultuous reception accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first Paris concert is excellent evidence that this collection of a hundred-odd musical ambassadors from the United States may be worth their weight in giveaway gold.

This country has been told continually that Europeans regard us all too often as cultural barbarians. Just recently, a State Department official was warning Americans that our culture is an important export to a Europe that still doubts our motives and understanding in spite of the billions of postwar aid we have extended.

Last year when Russian pianists and dancers toured Europe, they were enthusiastically received. There appears to be a European tendency to believe only Europeans can be trusted with the traditions of western civilization no matter how base their politics happen to be.

The Boston Symphony may help us prove otherwise. Debussy and Ravel in the hands of the Boston musicians were given such complete understanding in their first concert that Paris shouted itself hoarse in appreciation.

It would be well to follow the tour of the orchestra much as one watches the American fleet on a 'round-the-world "courtesy cruise," or as one watches an American statesman calling at European capitals on diplomatic business. The Boston Symphony is being tested and weighed carefully by the European mind. Much of what Europeans think of cultural America will be formulated with the echoes of the symphony ringing in continental ears.

This is not exactly "selling Americans to the Europeans." It's more in the nature of a solid demonstration that the traditions of 400 years are as much respected and loved on this side of the Atlantic as they are among the salons and concert halls in which these traditions were born.

Boston Sy begeistert

Es war wohl einer der sten Konzertabende dieses den das Frankfurter A mit einem Gastkonzert d
Symphony Orchestra einem teressierten Publikum da weite Rund des Hauses un den letzten Platz von einem ter Eleganz erschienenen A besetzt.
Der 77jährige Gastdirig
Monteux wurde mit herzl fall empfangen, den er sofo Orchester ablenkte. Es erg kaum möglich, die Leistu Klangkörpers mit den üb jektiven einer kritischen zu würdigen. Das war eine derartigen Geschlossenheit samteindruckes, daß man nicht zerpflücken darf. V Berlioz (Benvenuto Cellini über Johannes Brahms (III

Abendpost

This Clipping Fr
PORTLAND, M
PRESS-HERAL

MAY 8- 195

Boston Sympho
Wins High Pra
From French C

Paris, May 7. (UP) — music critics of the Fren ital today praised as "a triumph" the debut of th
Symphony at the Inter Culture Festival here.

"Rarely has a brilliant been more complete," sa
Rene Dumesnil in the ir
La Monde.

"Charles Munch obtai
the magnificent orchest he conducts all the e finesse, grace, transpare vigor so necessary to properly the two Frenc played."

Paris Presse carried i tory account of the per under the headline "th
Symphony dazzled Parisi

Munch was compelled applause, to play an unp
ed encore of Ravel's Dap Chloe

Critic Emile Vuillermoz
Presse hailed the orche
terpretation of Roussel's
And Ariane and Swissthur Honegger's second s as "a transcending in tion." He called the To American composer Walt
"a revelation."

France-Soir pointed President Vincente Au
"far from being alone"
chief executive excla
Munch "Merci, deux fo
(thank you, two times th

Figaro praised the general" who so ably c
the symphony, pointing
Munch was born in Fra

Also appearing on program was the ballet
Chilean-born Marquis D

The foreign artists are ing here in connection month-long "masterpiec 20th century" designed what free men can do
pered by the intellect
strictions of communism

Boston Symphony Orchestra begeisterte im Großen Haus

Es ... der großartigen ... eses Winters, ... Amerikahaus ... des Boston ... musikinarbot. Das ... es nur bis auf ... einem in größeren Auditorium

... Gastdirigent Pierre ... herzlichem Beifall ... sofort auf das ... Es scheint uns ... Leistung dieses ... höflichen Achtung ... Betrachtung ... von einer ... Geschlossenheit des Ge... man es einfach ... darf Von Hector ... (Carnival-Ouverture) ... Brahms (III. Symphonie), Maurice Ravel (Alborada del Grazioso) und Richard Strauß (Till Eulenspiegel) führte die Vortragsfolge zu William Schuman (Symphonie Nr. 3), einem amerikanischen Komponisten, dessen Werk trotz vieler Aeußerlichkeiten doch eine starke Substanz aufweist.

Es war vielleicht noch nicht einmal so sehr das „Was" sondern das „Wie" des Musizierens, das das Publikum zu ungeahnten Beifallsstürmen hinriß.

Nach dem Konzert empfing Hochkommissar McCloy das Orchester in engstem Kreise im Foyer des Großen Hauses. Im Rahmen dieses Empfanges überreichte ein Vertreter der Regierung von Rheinland-Pfalz eine künstlerisch ausgeführte Adresse für einen der Mitbegründer des Boston Symphony Orchestra, den heute 92jährigen Geiger Daniel Kuntz, der als junger Musiker von Oberstaufenbach bei Kusel (Pfalz) nach Boston ausgewandert war und dort zu den Männern gehörte, die das Boston Symphony Orchestra ins Leben riefen.

wwgg.

Abendpost Seite 5

Nr. 112 — Mittwoch, 14. Mai 1952

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
MAY 7- 1952

(AP Photo)

MUNCH IN PARIS—Charles Munch (center), conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, is greeted by Nicolas Nabokov (left), president of 20th Century Festival, upon Munch's arrival at Orly Field, Paris, with American composer Victor Rietti (right). Musicians will participate in festival this month.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 7 - 1952

French Music Critics Applaud Boston Symphony

Munch Included in Warm Praise; Elite of Paris at Gala Concert

Paris — (AP) — French music critics today trotted out their warmest adjectives in praise of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra who gave their first Paris concert in the state Opera House last night.

The critic of Le Monde especially praised Munch's conducting of Debusy's "La Mer" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

"He obtained from the magnificent orchestra he directs all the effects of finesse, all the grace, all the transparence and all the vigor needed to interpret the two masterpieces of French music," he wrote.

Perfect Solidarity

"One felt oneself in the presence of a factory of sound equipped with exceptional machine-tooling," commented Paris-Presse. "But, when all this mechanism goes into action, one is spellbound by its power, its suppleness and its precision . . . only music has the power to realize such perfect solidarity. One feels each music-stand has before it a master of his instrument."

The Boston Orchestra, which will give a second Paris concert tomorrow night, is here in connection with the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival, sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The festival, which will last all month, is intended to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States.

Besides President and Madame Auriol, celebrities who crowded into the baroque old opera house to hear the celebrated orchestra included Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U.S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

It was the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the opera.

The orchestra opened its program with Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," composed in 1932, which it first performed in Boston in 1940.

Arthur Honegger's "Symphony No. 2" for string orchestra, was the second composition. It was introduced to Americans by Dr. Munch in 1946. The third, Albert Roussel's second suite from act two of the ballet "Bacchus et Ariane," was given its world premier in Paris in 1936 and 10 years later, on Dec. 26, 1946, first played in America with the Boston Symphony.

Second Half

The second half of the program opened with American composer Walter Piston's "Toccata," first played by Dr. Munch on the French National Radio in 1948. The Boston played it Oct. 14 the same year.

Debussy's "La Mer," the most celebrated of the Boston's firsts, was given its first hearing in France in 1905. The Boston played it two years later.

The 104-man Boston orchestra barely had time to reassemble and get down to rehearsals before giving the concert. The first section of 22 members arrived with Dr. Munch a week ago, the remainder with Associate Conductor Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the San Francisco Symphony got in only yesterday.

For 43 members of the orchestra, last night's events were a homecoming. These players were born in Europe, 21 of them in France.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAY 7- 1952

Concert by Boston Symphony Delights Paris Music Lovers

President of France Among Audience Hearing Orchestra's First Program in Europe

Paris, May 6 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight won the tumultuous applause of an audience which included France's President Vincent Auriol. It was its first appearance in Europe.

Program of Firsts

The 71-year-old American orchestra played a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U. S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

Besides President and Madame Auriol, celebrities who crowded into the baroque old Opera House to hear the celebrated orchestra included Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn and the elite of Paris society, music, painting and letters.

The concert, under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch, was a gala event of the "masterpieces of the 20th Century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

It was the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the opera house.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Boston Symphony Wins High Praise From French Critics

Paris, May 7, (UP) — Leading music critics of the French capital today praised as "a brilliant triumph" the debut of the Boston Symphony at the International Culture Festival here.

"Rarely has a brilliant triumph been more complete," said critic Rene Dumesnil in the influential La Monde.

Charles Munch obtained from the magnificent orchestra which he conducts all the effects of finesse, the grace, the transparence and vigor so necessary to the interpretation of the two French works played.

Paris Presse called its laudatory review of the performance under the baton of the Boston Symphony "the greatest Paris has ever applauded."

Munch was compelled for long minutes to take an unprecedented number of bows. Dominique Arnold, Cultural Editor of Paris-Presse, said: "The Boston Symphony is one of the greatest orchestras of the world. Its conductor, Charles Munch, an Alsatian and Swiss-born American citizen, directed the second symphony of Arthur Honegger and Darius Milhaud's Suite of Provence, interpreted the American composer Walter Piston's Toccata, and Debussy's La Mer with a perfection which left the audience breathless."

Francois Mauriac, writing in Figaro, pointed out that the presence of President Auriol was itself a tribute to the Boston Symphony and to Munch, who was born in France.

Also singled out for praise in the program was the perfect tempo of Caribbean-born Maurice Durufle's Prelude, Adagio and Chorale for Organ and Orchestra.

The festival, which is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, is in connection with the "Masterpieces of the 20th century" designed to show what free men can do unhampered by the intellectual constrictions of communism.

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
MAY 8 1952

Boston Symphony Lauded After European Concert

PARIS, May 8—(AP)—French music critics continued Thursday to heap lyrical praise on the Boston symphony orchestra, and conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism." The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival, and gives another Thursday night.

[156]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 8- 1952

Boston Symphony's Paris Debut Draws Top Press Praise

Paris — (UP) — Leading Paris music critics have hailed the European debut of the Boston Symphony as a brilliant triumph.

The orchestra opened its European tour Tuesday night at the International Culture Festival under Maestro Charles Munch.

Le Figaro, noting the fact that Munch was born in France, praised "The French General" who so ably led the symphony.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
MAY 8 - 1952

Critics Still Heap Praise on Boston Symphony Group

PARIS (AP) — French music critics continued today to heap lyrical praise on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinarily ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been so carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival and gives another tonight.

"Is there in the world an orchestra which can interpret a program of modern music as brilliantly" as the Boston Symphony, asked the critic of Le Parisien Libere. "I don't know, but . . . all the musicians show a quality that I can never remember having heard before."

Jazz Package

First, balloon-shaped Meade Lux Lewis and Pete Johnson faced each other across grand pianos. Then came Erroll Garner, and finally big Art Tatum, his almost sightless eyes turned to the wall. If Birdland, Manhattan's midtown mecca of jive, wanted to put on a representative "parade" of jazz pianists last week, it could hardly have found four ivory ticklers with more varying styles.

While the "cool" spectators in the bleachers sat on their hands, Lewis & Johnson dished up heated samplings of the rumbling boogie-woogie that they made popular in the '30s. Standout: Honky Tonk Train, which, 325-lb. Lux Lewis once pounded out with such energy that the piano collapsed into his lap.

Art Tatum, 42, the old master of the swing era, and a pair of smooth-sounding sidemen riffed through Sweet Sue and Sweet Lorraine. His right hand rippled all over the keyboard, but the overall effect was one of sophistication rather than pandemonium.

Garner's "modern" style was not so slick, but he managed to make the others seem dated just the same. He treated happy Birdlanders to big, chunky chords crammed full of notes, then showed them how he could switch to rainbows of glassy melody and fantasy. As he played, he mouthed a word that looked something like "Ooom."

At week's end the piano package seemed to be a first-rate box-office success, and Lewis, Johnson, Garner, Tatum & Co. were planning to take it as far afield as Hawaii this fall.

Dorothy Siegel

PIANO MEN LEWIS, TATUM, JOHNSON & GARNER
From honky-tonk to "Ooom" in one night.

Tohu-Bohu in Paris

The audience remained quiet for the first two minutes. Then came boos and catcalls . . . Neighbors began to hit each other over the head with fists, canes or whatever came to hand . . . Everything available was tossed in our direction, but we continued to play on . . . Stravinsky had disappeared through a window backstage, to wander disconsolately along the streets of Paris.

—Pierre Monteux in Dance Index

Last week the scene—Paris' Théâtre des Champs-Elysées—and the principals were the same as at that uproarious première of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring in 1913, and again there was bedlam. But this time the composer stood in his box, bathed in spotlight glare and the audience's acclaim, clasping his hands together like a victorious boxer. The toku-bohu did not abate until Stravinsky marched onstage to buss Conductor Monteux on both cheeks. Said beaming Pierre Monteux: "There was just as much noise the last time, but of a different tonality."

A good share of the applause belonged to the orchestra that played the work—the Boston Symphony. The 104 musicians of the Boston had started their first European visit in a muddle over housing arrangements. The men wanted to shift for themselves, rebelled against a plan to billet them all in one hotel. Their conductor, Charles Munch, solved the problem in a hurry: "I don't care whether you gentlemen sleep together. What matters to me is that you play together."

Play together they did. In their first appearance at Paris' international Festival of the Arts, they offered modern French (Roussel, Honegger) and American (Barber, Piston) music, and left the audience (including President Auriol) shouting itself hoarse. In courtly appreciation, the orchestra and Conductor Munch broke a long-standing symphonic rule and played an encore. Two nights later came the success of Monteux, Stravinsky and The Rite of Spring.

Paris' critics came out gasping superlatives. Said Le Figaro: "An extraordinary ensemble, playing with an assurance and ardor that bordered on fanaticism." L'Aurore's critic said, "Never before have we heard anything comparable to the

Louis Heckly

STRAVINSKY IN PARIS
From boos to cheers in 39 years.

sumptuous sonority of the strings and mordant quality of the trumpets." Said one Boston musician: "We did our best because we realized what it meant to Munch and Monteux to play in Paris."

Ahead for the Boston: The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Strasbourg (Munch's home town), Lyons, Bordeaux and London.

• • •

New York's City Ballet captured its share of applause on its first Paris visit too. After Swan Lake, Ballerina Maria Tallchief had to take eight curtain calls; so did Nora Kaye after The Cage. The audience at the Opéra refused to go home until George Balanchine himself came out for a bow. Total curtain calls: 29.

A Crush on Haydn

Violinist Alexander Schneider, 43, has had a crush on Haydn for 22 years. As a young man, he and three other musicians sat for most of two days and nights playing all of the old master's 83 string quartets, while friends fed and watered them. Vilna-born "Sasha" Schneider has always

Newsweek, May 19

Boston in Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had never been heard before in Paris or, for that matter, anywhere else in Europe. But for the two conductors who led the 104 men of the Boston Symphony in their first two triumphal concerts in France last week the Parisian concerts were a gala homecoming. Charles Münch, musical director of the orchestra, went to Boston in 1949 from the Paris Conservatory orchestra. Pierre Monteux, Münch's associate conductor for the symphony's fifteen European concerts, was born in Paris and helped make musical history there in 1912 and 1913 when, as conductor for the Diaghileff ballet, he conducted the premières of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Monteux, who retired this season as musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, is also closely associated with the Boston Symphony, for he was its conductor from 1919 to 1924.

Paris homecoming: Münch (left) and Monteux return with Boston Symphony

As the symphony's regular head, Münch quite naturally conducted the opening "gala" at the Paris Opera last week. According to Olin Downes of The New York Times, who was present, the orchestra played "matchlessly." The program included both French and American music by Arthur Honegger, Debussy, Ravel, Samuel Barber, and Walter Piston. Final applause was such that Münch and the orchestra had to encore the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" suite.

Monteux conducted the symphony two nights later at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, and included on his program was a work which brought back many memories. It was the historic "Le Sacre du Printemps," first performed at the opening of the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 29, 1913. On that occasion, the audience greeted Stravinsky's violent modernism with an uproar of disapproval. Fist fights broke out, and at times the music could not be heard, although no less a figure than Claude Debussy pleaded for silence and attention. Now, 39 years later, Monteux could once again stand on that same podium and hear an uproar of another kind—a wild ovation which he shared with Stravinsky himself, who was in the audience. "There was just as much noise the last time," commented Monteux, "but of a different tonality!"

This first European tour of the Boston Symphony is being made under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which is currently staging an international exposition of the arts in Paris (NEWSWEEK, May 12). Besides playing in the French capital, the orchestra's schedule also includes performances in The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Metz, Bordeaux, Lyons, and London. The German appearances are sponsored by the office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany, and the one in Strasbourg, Münch's birthplace, by the Free Europe University in Exile.

Further appearances in Europe could have been arranged, but the orchestra has to be back home in time for the opening of the Boston Pops season on June 3. While all concerned hope that most of the $150,000 to $175,000 cost of the tour can be made back through ticket sales and possible radio broadcasts, the American Committee of the Congress has guaranteed to defray any deficit.

Easy to Forget...

Yet Simple to Remember

You've seen something like this, no doubt, wherever you live.

Until a few years ago, "U.S. 22" curled west through the village of Hillsdale, New York, before swinging back to the north on its way to Canada.

Then came surveyors, bulldozers and concrete mixers. The kink was straightened out. Now you roll along the cut-off without knowing that Hillsdale ever existed.

But the village is still there, its stores still doing a thriving Small Town business.

When you're hurrying along a super-highway to big city sales, it may be easy to forget that thousands of Small Towns pepper the map of America. But simple to remember about these Small Towns are two basic facts.

In them lives 1 out of 5 of your customers—20% of your market. What you sell to these millions of mothers, fathers and children can easily mean the difference between a highly profitable year and a borderline break-even.

In 16,000 Small Towns a single weekly publication—GRIT—gives you entrance and welcome into over 650,000 intelligent, prosperous families. What they buy, in variety, quality and quantity, differs little from what their city cousins buy, with this exception. Their choice of brands, as repeated Annual Surveys show, is largely guided by the advertising they read in GRIT.

These are the simple, remember-able facts, about Small Towns and about GRIT.

George L. Laurie
President

GRIT
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

LIFE ON THE NEWSFRONTS OF THE WORLD

Red prisoners hold a U.S. general as hostage and a fight announcer becomes a man of few words

BRIG. GENERAL FRANCIS T. DODD

Kidnaping on Koje

Captured Reds in Korea pulled a maneuver that deeply disturbed—and humiliated—the U.S. Brig. General Francis Dodd, American ily and seriously felt" and any greater reduction would "endanger the proposed military build-up now visualized." Later he said it is possible to make "reasonable cuts without fatal results," but apparently he considered $1 billion far from reasonable.

Taft said he would reduce expenditures by not one but two billions, adding, "It will in no way endanger the security of this country."

* * *

In Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, Communist police arrested a bookseller for advertising four Russian books, in this order, in her window: We Want to Live, Far From Moscow, In the Shadows of the Skyscrapers, Under a Foreign King.

A great cartoonist is dead

Rollin Kirby, one of the greatest political cartoonists the U.S. has produced, died of a heart attack at 76. Best known for his caricature of Prohibition (below), he won three Pulitzer prizes in the '20s when he worked for the old New York World.

TV sets, washing machines and similar goods.

Behind the suspension of Regulation W there was a sharp argument. The nation's merchants claim sales are slow because the government has placed too many restrictions on them. The Federal Reserve Board suspects sales are slow because of general market conditions—supply has caught up with demand. The argument is now about to be turned over to the one expert who can settle it, the U.S. consumer.

* * *

Since 1493 Europeans have had few kind words for American ventures in the arts, and since 1945 few kind words on any score. Last week, however, they had a great many. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Paris for an arts festival, gave two performances which left listeners dazed with awe. Critics unanimously used the word "extraordinary," and phrases like, "Is there another orchestra which could interpret modern music with such brilliance?" "Performance unparalleled in finesse and dynamism."

A nominee gets pinned down

The Senate Judiciary Committee put Judge

[158]

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAY 8 - 1952

Paris Critics Laud Boston Symphony

PARIS, May 8 (UP)—Leading Paris music critics have hailed the European debut of the Boston Symphony as a brilliant triumph.

The orchestra opened its European tour Tuesday night at the International Culture Festival under maestro Charles Munch.

"Rarely has a brilliant triumph been rewarded more completely with success," said Rene Dumesnil in the newspaper Le Monde.

"Charles Munch obtained from the magnificent orchestra which he conducts all of the effects of finesse, grace, transparence and vigor so necessary to translate properly the two French works played," he wrote.

The Paris press carried a headline that said "The Boston Symphony dazzled Parisians," and published a picture showing French President Vincent Auriol congratulating Munch.

The critic described the orchestra's interpretation of Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane and Swiss-born Arthur Honegger's Second Symphony as "a transcending interpretation" and called the "Toccata" by American composer Walter Piston "a revelation."

France-Soir said Auriol was "far from being alone" in profusely thanking Munch.

Le Figaro, noting the fact that Munch was born in France, praised "the French general" who so ably led the symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1952

Philharmonic Played in Paris

In yesterday's dispatch in this newspaper from Paris, concerning the appearance of the Boston Symphony at the Paris Opéra, it was incorrectly stated that it was the first American orchestra to be invited to perform there. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Arturo Toscanini, opened its European tour at the Paris Opera with two concerts on May 3 and 4, 1930.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAY 8 - 1952

Critic Strikes Military Note To Praise Boston Symphony

Paris, May 7—(AP)—The French music critic of Le Figaro struck a military note today in praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra's triumphal first concert in Europe.

"The American troops have landed," he wrote. "But let us not be embarrased in admitting we were conquered. A French general commanded them."

Le Figaro's praise was typical of the reaction of the French press and public to the Boston Orchestra's performance last night under the baton of Strasbourg-born Charles Munch.

"Munch was in rare form," Le Figaro's critic wrote.

The orchestra played before a wildly enthusiastic crowd at the stately old opera house. President Vincent Auriol was among those who attended.

It will give its second concert in the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Centnry" festival tomorrow night in the Theatre des Champs Elysees, under the baton of Pierre Monteux.

Well into the second week, the festival has won praise from many sources. Sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, it puts on display the musical, literary and artistic wares of Twentieth Century artists. Its theme is freedom of the intellectual.

There has been some criticism, however, of the festival. One of the most outspoken critics is Serge Lifar, director of the Opera Ballet. He is unhappy because his ballet group was snubbed in favor of the New York City Ballet. The Communists also have been critical, for different, more political reasons.

New criticism was aired today by the left-wing Paris newspaper Combat, which describes it as "the festival of NATO."

"Liberty and culture do not need to be defined by a congress," it said in a Page One box, "and their essential characteristics are to have no limits, no exclusiveness, nor any patronage."

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
MAY 9 - 1952

Music That Started Riot Draws Ovation

PARIS, May 9—(UP—The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation. Monteux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 9 - 1952

Paris Cheers U. S. Orchestra

Paris—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Starvinsky who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation. The audience of mink-draped Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty a reception as it received Tuesday night in opening its first European tour.

In the 1913 rioting, some 50 persons were arrested and critics said the presentation was too "modernistic and vulgar." Monteux played on during the disturbance but Stravinsky climbed out a rear window. Police were called in when people in the gallery began undressing and throwing their clothes on the stage.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 9 - 1952

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Turn Back Music Page in Paris

Paris—(UP)—Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony turned back a page of musical history last night.

They performed Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," which touched off a riot at its premiere under the same conductor in the same theatre 39 years ago.

The flashback found the Russian-American composer in the audience, just as he was on that May night in 1913 when some 50 persons were arrested in the fracas fomented by the composition. Critics said it was too modernistic and vulgar.

Last night there was no riot. The audience of mink-draped Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty an ovation as it received Tuesday when i opened its first European tou here.

Besides the Stravinsky composition, works of three others were on the program. American-born William Schuman's prize-winning Third Symphony, Vaughan Williams' "Fantasy of a Theme of Thomas Tallis," and Darius Milhaud's Second Suite from Protee also were heard.

An especially warm welcome went to Paris-born Monteux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as leader of the San Francisco Symphony. He is acting as associate conductor of the Boston orchestra on its tour under Charles Munch. Monteux headed it in the years 1919-24.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
MAY 9 - 1952

History Doesn't Repeat:

Paris Hails Monteux For Stravinsky Opus

PARIS, May 9 (UP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky were given a tremendous ovation.

Monteux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

The program was part of the anti-Communist "Master-pieces of the 20th Century" arts festival which opened last week.

In the 1913 rioting, some 50 persons were arrested and critics said the presentation was too "modernistic and vulgar." Monteux played on during the disturbance but Stravinsky climbed out a rear window.

Police were called in when people in the gallery begun undressing and throwing their clothing on the stage.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
MAY 9 - 1952

Stravinsky's 'Rite of Spring'

Work That Started Paris Riot In 1913 Repeated---to Ovation

Paris—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] page of musical history last night under the baton of [illegible] Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—the [illegible] position that started a riot when Monteux directed its [illegible] years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation.

Monteux, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

After a dozen bows he succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come onstage. There they hugged each other as the audience applauded enthusiastically.

"It's been 39 years since I was here," Monteux said. "Let's have another rendezvous in 39 more years."

The program was part of the anti-Communist "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" Arts Festival which opened last week.

In the 1913 rioting, some 50 persons were arrested, and critics said the presentation was too "modernistic and vulgar." Monteux played on during the disturbance, but Stravinsky climbed out a rear window. Police were called in when people in the gallery began undressing and throwing their clothes on the stage.

"Thank goodness tonight wasn't like that," Monteux said last night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 9 1952

Paris Cheers M[illegible] t Booed in [illegible]

Stravinsky Work Cond[illegible] Again by Monteu[illegible]

PARIS, May 8 (AP).—Pierr[illegible]ux, the Boston Sympho[illegible]estra conductor and Igo[illegible]sky re-created tonight [illegible]ble evening in the his[illegible]sic with the playing [illegible]ssian-born composer's "[illegible]ring" in the Theatre des [illegible]ysees.

Mr. Monteux, recently re[illegible]nductor of the San Fr[illegible]mphony Orchestra, co[illegible] world premiere of th[illegible]sky work in the same [illegible]n May 28, thirty-nine ye[illegible]s playing at that time[illegible], provoked a near ri[illegible]. Stravinsky had to flee[illegible] work was finished as [illegible]outs and whistling turn[illegible]litorium into Bedlam.

Tonight's gala audience [illegible]ons listened in rapt sil[illegible] composition. Before t[illegible]e they were on their

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAY 9 - 1952

Musical History Repeats in Paris

Paris, May 8 (AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated tonight a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theater on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAY 9 - 1952

Parisians Hail Boston Symphony Number That Once Started Riot

Paris, May 8. (UP) — Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony turned back a page of musical history tonight.

They performed Igor Stravinsky's Rites Of Spring, which touched off a riot at its premiere under the same conductor in the same theater 39 years ago.

The flashback found the Russian-American composer in the audience, just as he was on that May night in 1913 when some 30 persons were arrested in the fracas fomented by the composition. Critics said it wass too modernistic and vulgar.

Ovation Hearty

Tonight there was no riot. The audience of mink-draped Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty an ovation as it received Tuesday when it opened its first European tour here.

Besides the Stravinsky composition, works of three others were on the program. American-born William Schuman's prize winning Third Symphony, William Pyper's Symphony No. 3 and Darius Milhaud's Second Suite from Protee also were heard.

An especially warm welcome went to Paris-born Monteux, 77 who retired last month after 17 seasons as leader of the San Francisco Symphony. He is acting as associate conductor of the Boston orchestra on its tour under Charles Munch. Monteux headed it in the years 1919-24.

Ballet Opens Saturday

The program was part of the month-long "masterpieces of the 20th century" arts festival which opened last week. The New York City Ballet Company opens here Saturday, while the Marquis De Cuevas Ballet plays Friday.

Great names in the world of music and ballet were involved in the Rites Of Spring riot, Stravinsky recalled. In his book he told how Monteux then was conducting the orchestra of Serge Diaghilev's Famous Ballet Russe, with the immortal Vaslav Nijinsky as choreographer.

Stravinsky was in the lobby when he heard stamping and whistling from the first night audience. As the music warmed up, so did the audience.

It became so noisy that Nijinsky was forced to go onstage to count out the time for the dancers, while Diaghilev ordered the lights turned on and off to startle the rowdy throng.

Monteux played on. Stravinsky climbed out a back window.

Finally, when people in the gallery started to undress in protest and throw their clothes on the stage, police were called. Fifty were arrested.

"Thank goodness, tonight wasn't like that," Monteux said.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
MAY 9 - 1952

Paris Cheers Playing By Boston Symphony

Paris—(AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky last night recreated a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theater des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theater on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

1952 Crowd Cheers

The great Russian Ballet Company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Last night's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Back in 39 Years

Moneux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston orchestra crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Paris Cheers ... It Booed in ...

Stravinsky Work Conducted Again by Monteux

—Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky ... memorable ... in the ... Mr. Monteux arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Mr. Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said: "I'll make a date with you to play it again thirty-nine years from now."

Mr. Stravinsky is an individual ... of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held ... shouting, cheering and applauding.

Mr. Stravinsky, an American citizen, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Mr. Monteux, now a portly seventy-seven.

Mr. Stravinsky, who will be seventy next month, leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Mr. Monteux arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Mr. Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said: "I'll make a date with you to play it again thirty-nine years from now."

Mr. Stravinsky is an individual ... of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held ...

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 9 - 1952

39 Years? Just Brief Span for Two Musicians

Paris — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" — the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago.

* * *

THIS TIME the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation. The audience gave the orchestra as hearty a reception as it received Tuesday night in opening its first European tour.

Monteux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

After a dozen bows he succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come onstage. There they hugged each other as the audience applauded enthusiastically.

"It's been 39 years since I was here," Monteux said. "Let's have another rendezvous in 39 more years."

* * *

THE PROGRAM was part of the anti-Communist "Master Pieces of the 20th Century" Arts Festival which opened last week.

In the 1913 rioting, some 50 persons were arrested and critics said the presentation was too "modernistic and vulgar." Monteux played on during the disturbance but Stravinsky climbed out a rear window. Police were called in when people in the gallery began undressing and throwing their clothes on the stage.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
1952

Monteux, Stravinsky Get Paris Ovation

Paris—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history last night under the baton of maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago.

This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were given a tremendous ovation. The audience of mink-draped Parisians and visitors gave the orchestra as hearty a reception as it received Tuesday night in opening its first European tour.

Monteux, 77, who retired last month after 17 seasons as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, got an especially warm welcome.

After a dozen bows he succeeded in getting Stravinsky to leave his box and come onstage. There they hugged each other as the audience applauded enthusiastically.

In the 1913 rioting, some 50 persons were arrested and critics said the presentation was too "modernistic and vulgar." Monteux played on during the disturbance but Stravinsky climbed out a rear window. Police were called in when people in the gallery began undressing and throwing their clothes on the stage.

Weather Forecast
Mostly partly cloudy over Continental Europe. Morning light rain in eastern France and northern and central Germany. Afternoon light showers in southern France and western Italy. Warmer temperatures.
—Air Weather Service

EUROPEAN EDITION

THE STARS AND STRIPES

Unofficial Publication of the U.S. Armed Forces in the European Command

Volume 10, Number 27 — 5 cents a copy, $1.25 a month — Wednesday, May 14, 1952

Late News

BONN, May 13 (S&S)—A highly placed Bonn official announced tonight Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and the High Commissioners hope to complete the peace contract Thursday.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Dutch Hail Boston Symphony

THE HAGUE, May 11 (AP).—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night.

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
MAY 12 1952

Orchestra Thrills Dutch

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 12 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAILED

The Hague, The Netherlands—(AP)—Seven curtain calls greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

Boston Symphony In EC; Trio Recall Prewar Frankfurt

By HOWARD KENNEDY
Staff Correspondent

FRANKFURT, May 13 (S&S)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Frankfurt today, and its three members who were born in Germany took one look at the bomb-torn and partially reconstrutced city and shook their heads sadly.

"Not much like the old days when I knew Frankfurt as a beautiful old town," muttered violinist Emil Kornsand, who fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

"These ruined buildings are terribly depressing," agreed 68-year-old Max Polster, who spent his early years playing with a dozen different musical organizations in Germany and Western Europe, and who is completing 29 years with the Boston Symphony as a percussionist.

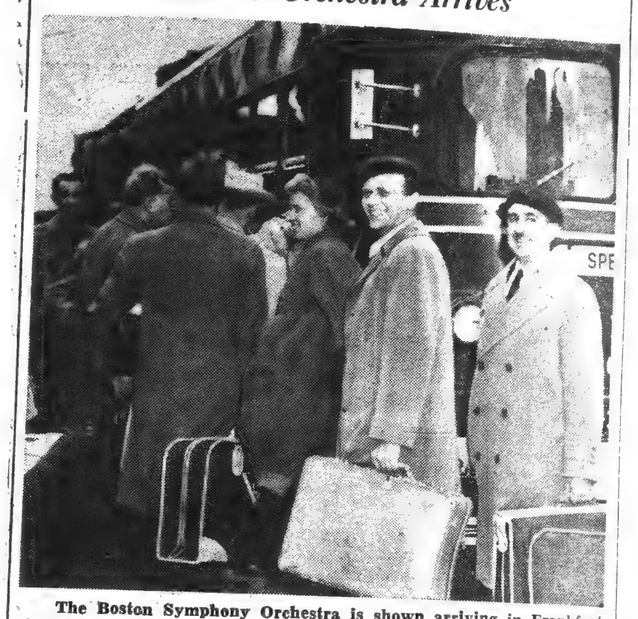
Alfred Krips, born in Berlin and now the Boston's second violinist, was too mournful to talk.

The German-born trio, who arrived with 103 other members of the Boston Symphony by train from Brussels, had only a couple of hours to sightsee before preparing for their first public concert tonight in Frankfurt's Grosses Haus, with guest conductor Pierre Monteux wielding the baton.

Tomorrow, at 3 pm, the orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will present a special concert exclusively for EUCOM military personnel and their guests, and will leave on the U.S. Army duty train tomorrow night for a second public concert at 8 pm Thursday in Berlin's Titania Palast.

Kornsand, who was born in Karlsruhe, said he knew Frankfurt well "in the old days." His father's brother ran a large printing plant here. He himself played with the Berlin Staatsoper for 13 years.

Famed Orchestra Arrives



The Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown arriving in Frankfurt for EC concerts. Three members were born in Germany and shook their heads at the war ruins in Frankfurt. Story Page 2. —S&S Photo

SYMPHONY LEADER: Munch, director, Boston Sym European tour at Paris Ope arrival in the French capit Nabokov (left), festival dire born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general to the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was guest leader of the Boston Symphony in Boston during the past season and Jonathan Sternburg, young American conductor. Also in the audience was Mrs. Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, predecessor of Mr. Munch as conductor of the orchestra.

Bostonians included Mrs. Dora Hirschmann and Mr. and Mrs. Edward Taft.

Sold Out for Weeks

This first European appearanc of the Boston Symphony has bee anticipated as the outstanding even of the musical part of the festival. The house was sold out weeks ag It was said that as much a ticket was offered by som unable to gain admission. the concert required eve Swans and dinner jackets o be worn.

program was arranged e cy of music composed sinc n of the century, wit Barber's overture, "Th for Scandal," and Walt Toccata as representativ can compositions.

Otherwise the music was French cond suite from the late Albe el's ballet, "Bacchus Ariane," Honegger's Second Sym ny, "La Mer," by Debussy, an the Ravel Suite.

Triumph orchestraler Brillanz

Bostoner Symphonieorchester in Frankfurt (Vorbericht)

Ein glanzvolles musikalisches Ereignis gestern abend im vollbesetzten Großen Haus. Mit den ersten, in scharf rhythmisiertem Brio genommenen Takten der einleitenden Ouverture zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz hatte das berühmte amerikanische Spitzenorchester sofort die Hörer auf seiner Seite. Desgleichen der Gastdirigent Pierre Monteux, der mit der Geste reifer meisterlicher Souveränität und zugleich höchst intensiver Antriebskraft den klingenden Apparat steuerte, trotz seiner 77 Jahre physisch bewundernswert unerschüttert. Wir werden über das bedeutende Konzert, das weiterhin an der Dritten Symphonie von Brahms, der Dritten Symphonie des Amerikaners William Schuman, dem Scherzo „Alborada del Gracioso" von Ravel und dem „Till Eulenspiegel" von Richard Strauß die blendende Spielkultur dieses Orchesters zeigte, in der nächsten Ausgabe noch ausführlich berichten.

H. P.

Auslandsstudien fördern

Die deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft künftig auch Stipendien für die Fortbildung wissenschaftlichen Nachwuchses im Ausland willigen. Damit soll der deutsche Forschungswuchs die Möglichkeit haben, den Stand wissenschaftlichen Arbeit im Ausland kennenzulernen. Für über 150 Forschungsvorhaben allen Gebieten der Wissenschaft wurden 1,4 Millionen DM verteilt. Großes Material bereitgestellt, für die Beschaffung eines Planigraphen für ein geodätisches Stuttgart. Der Stero-Planigraph, ein gerät zur automatischen Auswertung bildaufnahmen für Vermessungszwecke von der deutschen Wissenschaft

Das Bostoner Orchester in Frankfurt

Vom Großen Haus sehr angetan

Frankfurter Rundschau May 14 '52

Dienstagnachmittag, Frankfurter Hauptbahnhof: auf dem Bahnsteig, in den der planmäßige Kölner D-Zug einlief, standen die Reporter, Photographen, Rundfunkleute und konnten beim besten Willen den erwarteten illustren Gast nicht entdecken. Er hätte nicht übersehen werden können, denn, kurz gesagt: es handelte sich um das Bostoner Symphonieorchester, immerhin hundertundzehn Musiker mit allem, was noch dazu gehört.

Während man noch wartete, waren die Musiker schon in ihren Hotels: Savoy, Haus der Kochkunst, National, Monopol-Metropol und die beiden Dirigenten, Pierre Monteux und Charles Munch im Frankfurter Hof. Eigentlich hätten sie mit Flugzeugen kommen sollen. Der Oelstreik verhinderte das. Nun hatten ihre Sonderwagen den planmäßigen Zug so verlängert, daß sich die Bundesbahn entschloß, den Sonderanhang — darunter allein zwei Wagen für das Gepäck mit den Instrumenten — auch gesondert laufen zu lassen. So war das Orchester vorzeitig nach Frankfurt gekommen, so daß die Empfangs- und Interview-Welle zunächst im Sande verlief.

Inzwischen hatte es einige Schwierigkeiten bei der deutschen Zollbehörde im Frankfurter Hauptbahnhof gegeben. Aber schließlich konnten die Instrumente ausgeladen und ins Große Haus gebracht werden. Die Orchesterleute, mit denen wir sprachen, zeigten sich vom Großen Haus sehr angetan, vom Zuschauerraum, von der Bühne, von dem Raum, den sie noch übrigließ, um immense Mengen von Instrumenten, Zubehör und sonstigen Dingen übersichtlich abzustellen. Vom europäischen Publikum, das sie auf dieser Reise zum ersten Male kennenlernen, sind sie begeistert, von ihrer Aufnahme in Paris, wo sie zwei Konzerte beim Festival des „Kongresses für kulturelle Freiheit" (mit „Meisterwerken des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts") gaben, von Amsterdam, Den Haag und Brüssel. In Deutschland werden sie nun drei Konzerte geben, zwei in Frankfurt, danach eines in Berlin. Es folgen Straßburg, Lyon, noch einmal Paris, Bordeaux und London: vierzehn Konzerte in zwanzig Tagen. Das Orchester ist an solche Strapazen gewöhnt. In Boston gibt es für die Symphoniker nicht nur eine Saison, sondern vier, jeweils in anderem Rahmen: weit über zweihundert Veranstaltungen im Jahr, 47 Wochen angestrengter Orchesterarbeit, zwar mit wechselndem Programm-Niveau, aber stets mit dem gleichen musikalischen Niveau, das den Bostoner Symphonikern den Ruf eingetragen hat, zumindest eines der besten Orchester Amerikas zu sein.

-ke

Frankfurter Presse

3e FESTIVAL DE MUSIQUE BORDEAUX
15-25 Mai 1952
15, 18, à 20 h., Grand Théâtre
ROMEO ET JULIETTE
Grenier de Toulouse
16 à 16 h. 30, Château la Brède
WIENER ORTETT
16, 17, à 21 h., Grand Théâtre
BALLET du TH. NATIONAL de L'OPERA
19, à 16 h. 30, Saint-Emilion
AGRUPACION CORAL DE CAMARA DE PAMPLONA - Dir. MORONDO
19, 21, à 21 h., Grand Théâtre
SALOME - Dir. SEBASTIAN
20, à 21 h., Cathédrale St-André
MESSE EN RE DE BEETHOVEN
Dir. V. ANDREAE
22, à 21 h., Grand Théâtre
ORCH. PHILHARM. BORDEAUX. Soliste Mme GROB-PRANDL. Dir. SEBASTIAN
23, à 16 h. 30, Château la Brède
Pierre BERNAC - Francis POULENC
23, 24, à 21 h., Grand Théâtre
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
le 23 : dir. P. MONTEUX
le 24 : dir. C. MUNCH
24, à 17 h., Temple Chartrons
MUSIQUE SACREE XVIIe, XVIIIe siècles av. J. CELLIER, M. SENECHAL, A. VESSIERES, ORCH. PHILH. BORDEAUX, CHORALE EGLISE REFORMEE
Dir. Alex CELLIER
25, à 21 h., Jardin Public
BALLET ORCH. DU GRAND THEATRE
Dir. A. LEBOT et L. MORA
RENSEIGNEMENTS - LOCATION
Bordeaux : Grand Théâtre
Paris : 252, Fg Saint-Honoré. Wag. 97-28

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
MAY 12 1952

7 CURTAIN CALLS FOR SYMPHONY

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thundering bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

[161]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. [illegible] and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who is guest leader of the Boston [illegible] in Boston during [illegible] season and Jonathan [illegible] young American [illegible]. Also in the audience [illegible] Natalia Naumoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor of the orchestra.

[illegible] Mrs. Dora [illegible] Mr. and Mrs. [illegible]

Had Out for Weeks

[illegible] appearance [illegible] has been [illegible] ding event [illegible] the festival [illegible] weeks ago [illegible] as [illegible] has [illegible] of [illegible]

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come for festivals of all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
OHIO STATE JOURNAL
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS & COURIER
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
This Clipping From
HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT
This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL HERALD
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD-DISPATCH
This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
This Clipping From
HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST
MAY 12 1952
This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
FLA. TIMES-UNION
This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAY 12 1952

Dutch Charmed

THE HAGUE—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was first leader of the Boston ... in Boston during ... season and Jonathan ... young American ... Also in the audience ... Nadia Nadoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, ... Mr. ... conductor of the or...

... Mrs. Dora ... Mr. and Mrs. ...

... Out for Weeks

... appearance ... city has been ... ding event ... the festival, ... ago ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has c... all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league ... getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 ... and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be ... Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
OHIO STATE JOURNAL
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS & COURIER
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
This Clipping From
HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT
This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL HERALD
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD-DISPATCH
This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
This Clipping From
Kittens escaped.
NEWS
MAY 12 1952

Bravos for Symphony

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP).—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam. Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from The First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival, Masterpieces of the 20th Century, sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed for the occasion which included among its guests Premier Rene Mayer of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. [illegible]

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions,

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
OHIO STATE JOURNAL
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS & COURIER
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
This Clipping From
HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT
This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL HERALD
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
H[illegible]
MAY 12 1952

Boston Symphony Wins Plaudits at The Hague

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam. Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. ... and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who ... the Boston ... Paris during ... and Jonathan ... young American ... Also in the audience ... Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, predecessor of Mr. ... as conductor of the or-

... Mrs. Dora ... Mr. and Mrs. ...

... Out for Weeks

... appearance ... city has been ... ending event ... the festival, ... ago ... as ... some ... A ... of ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has c... all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league, is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be ... Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
OHIO STATE JOURNAL
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS & COURIER
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
This Clipping From
CLEVE...

Kittens escaped.

46 WEST FOR

Dutch Like Symphony

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor who conducted the Ballets de Monte Carlo in Boston during the season and Jonathan Miller, young American pianist. Also in the audience were Mme. Vera Naumeff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the orchestra, and Mrs. Dora [illegible] and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible]

[illegible] Out for Weeks

[illegible] appearance [illegible] has been [illegible] event [illegible] festival, [illegible] weeks ago [illegible] as [illegible] one [illegible] A [illegible] of [illegible]

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when it's festival time in music and all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 11, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

[168]

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
OHIO STATE JOURNAL

[illegible] kittens escaped.

46 WEST FO[illegible]

MAY 12 1952

Dutch Hail U. S. Orchestra

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP).—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

... from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. ... and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was guest leader of the Boston ... in Boston during ... season and Jonathan ... young American ... Also in the audience ... Natimeff Kousse... of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra ... Mrs. Dora ... Mr. and Mrs. ...

... Out for Weeks

... appearance ... only has been ... ding event ... the festival ... weeks ago ... as ... me ... A ... of ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

... picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be ... Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

... Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

ORCHESTRA 'HIT' ABROAD

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11. (AP) — Seven bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters) — Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival. Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed for the occasion which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mrs. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. [illegible] Jr.

[illegible] Nicolas Nabokov, secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, Ernest Ansermet of Switzerland, who conducts the Boston during [illegible] at Jonathan [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] Mrs. Dora [illegible] and Mrs. [illegible]

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when it does for all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

[162]

MAY 12 1952

Dutch Cheer Orchestra

THE HAGUE, THE NETHERLANDS, May 11—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thundered bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of [illegible] which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed [illegible] audience which included [illegible] ambassadors Presidents of the Senate of France and the Senate and United States Ambassador James G. [illegible]

[illegible] organized music [illegible] Nicolas Nabokov, [illegible] and secretary general [illegible] Congress for Cultural Freedom, Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor who [illegible] of the Boston Symphony in Paris during [illegible] season and Jonathan [illegible] young American composer. Also in the audience [illegible] Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, predecessor of Mr. [illegible] conductor of the orchestra, [illegible] Mrs. Dora [illegible] and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible]

Out for Works

[illegible] appearance [illegible] has been [illegible] ding event [illegible] the festival. [illegible] works ago [illegible] as [illegible] some [illegible] A [illegible] ve- [illegible] of

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when it's the custom to celebrate all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

Orchestra Praised

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands —Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra after its first performance in this country. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included many dignitaries Presidential Arrival of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was guest leader of the Boston Symphony during [illegible] Jonathan [illegible] American [illegible] Naumoff Koussevitzky and Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the orchestra.

Also Mrs. Dora [illegible] Mr. and Mrs.

Sold Out for Weeks

[illegible] appearance [illegible] has been [illegible] ding event [illegible] the festival. [illegible] as [illegible] some [illegible] A [illegible] of

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has c[ome] all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

Orchestra Bravo'd

THE HAGUE, The Netherland—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

... From Page

The concert was the first of ... sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed ... audience which included ... the dignitaries Presi... Vincent Auriol of France ... Mme. Auriol and United ... Ambassador James G. ... and Mrs. Dunn.

... distinguished guests ... were Nicholas Nabokov, ... and secretary general ... the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet ... conductor ... who ... the Boston ... in Paris during ... and Jonathan ... American ... on the audience ... Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky ... widow of Serge Koussevitzky ... conductor of the orchestra ... Mrs. Dora ... Mr. and Mrs. ...

... Out for Weeks

... appearance ... city has been ... ding event ... the festival. ... ago ... as much as ... some ... A ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be ... Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

[16?]

MUNSAN, Korea, Monday, May ...

MAY 12 1952

APPLAUD BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE HAGUE, the Netherlands, May 11—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

(Continued from Page 1)

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival, Masterpieces of the 20th Century, sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with a glittering audience which included ambassadors, Premier Antoine Pinay of France, Mayor Andre Marie and United States Ambassador Jefferson Caffery.

Nicholas Nabokov, secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and Mrs. Nabokov, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Munch and Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky were in the audience.

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when it's mixed with all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

DUTCH CHEER ORCHESTRA.

The Hague, May 11.(AP) — Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston symphony orchestra after its first performance in this country last night.

[illegible] duetor Charles Munch at a reception.

[16?]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was guest leader of the Boston Symphony in Boston during ... season and Jonathan ... young American ... Also in the audience ... Natmeff Koussevitzky, son of Serge Koussevitzky, successor of Mr. ... conductor of the orchestra.

... Mrs. Dora ... Mr. and Mrs. ...

... Out for Works

... appearance ... has been ... during event ... the festival. ... ago ... ch as ... are some ... A ... ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be ... Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

Boston Symphony Given Ovation at The Hague

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

The concert was the first of three which the Boston Symphony will present in the festival "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed with an audience which included among the dignitaries President Vincent Auriol of France and Mme. Auriol and United States Ambassador James G. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

Among distinguished musicians were Nicholas Nabokov, composer and secretary general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom; Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who was guest leader of the Boston Symphony in Boston during [illegible] season and Jonathan [illegible] young American [illegible] Also in the audience [illegible] Natanoff Koussevitzky, widow of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra [illegible]

[illegible] Mrs. Dora [illegible] Mr. and Mrs. [illegible]

Out for Works

[illegible] appearance [illegible] has been [illegible] ding event [illegible] the festival, [illegible] ago [illegible]

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

Boston Symphony a Hit

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[162]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

... from the First Page

The concert was the first of ... which the Boston Symphony ... present in the festival ... Masterpieces of the 20th ... sponsored by the ... Cultural Freedom.

The Opera House was packed ... audience which included ... signatures Prosper ... of France ... Arts and United ... James G. ... Paris ... Nicholas Nabokov, ... secretary ... Congress for Cultural Freedom, Ernest Ansermet ... Boston during ... and Jonathan ... audience ... Sergei Koussevitzky ... Mr. ... Dora ... and Mrs. ...

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when it does for all sorts of other cultural functions.

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be Lee Cooper, who will be entering her second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL
MAY 12 1952

Boston Symphony Hailed

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11.—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam.

Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[163]

Boston Symphony Gets Frenzied Greeting in Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS, May 6—Cheering and frenzied applause greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in Europe in the historic Paris Opera House tonight.

French - born conductor Charles Munch received repeated ovations which at the last could be acknowledged only by playing as an encore the closing section of the last piece on the program, Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe."

SYMPHONY ... Page 4

SYMPHONY LEADER IN FRANCE — Dr. Charles Munch, director, Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened European tour at Paris Opera House last night, is shown on arrival in the French capital being received by Nicholas Nabokov (left), festival director, and Vittorio Rieti, Italian-born composer.

SYMPHONY

... on the First Page

The concert was the first of ... the Boston Sym... present in the fes... Masterpieces of the 20th ... sponsored by the ... Cultural Freedom. ... House was packed ... were many notables includ... Ambassadors Presti... Ambassador of France ... Armed and United ... James G. ... Dean ... Secretary ... Congress for Cul... Freedom; Ernest Ansor... conductor who ... Nabokov, and Serge Kous... of the ... Mrs. Dora ... and Mrs.

The largely French audience received Barber's bouncy opening piece respectfully, but it was not until the end of the Honegger symphony, emotionally associated with the Nazi occupation of France and the French resistance to foreign domination that the applause really worked up to a boiling point. From then on it was one ovation after another.

Stage Enlarged Over Pit

The orchestra had to be seated in part on a wide apron added to the stage over the usual orchestra pit. This meant that some of the resonance was lessened, but all the same, the orchestra sounded gloriously rich and powerful from where I sat, which was almost as close to heaven as you could get without going through the roof.

(For all their good intentions, the French management treated the international press rather shabbily in allotment of tickets and locations).

Mr. Munch was in his best form, with all his old fire and rhythmic drive, and the polish and discipline which he had maintained had its electrifying effect in the superlative quality of the playing as a whole.

After the Ravel piece, George Laurent, first flute, who it is said will retire at the end of the Tanglewood festival, deservedly was brought forward to take a bow.

Following the concert the orchestra and its conductor were honored with a reception, complete with patisserie and champagne, in the ballet practice hall of the Opera House.

Conversation at the party was much the same as what would be heard from the departing audience in the lobbies. Boston has a wonderful orchestra and conductor. The famed old red and gilt Paris Opera has added a new and brilliant, if short, chapter to its history.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

If Music Is Your Dish, This Is Festive Season

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—There's music all over the map.

Now again the time of year has come when all sorts of other cultural functions,

Biggest single celebration is "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" in Paris theaters, opera house, concert halls, galleries and churches.

It opened Wednesday and continues to June 1. Among the world "firsts" will be several operas and ballets, and Paris' as well as Europe's first hearing of the Boston Symphony, with Charles Munch, who hails from Paris, conducting. The festival will end with the Gertrude Stein-Virgil Thomson "Four Saints in Three Acts," written there nearly a quarter century ago but heard there for the first time.

The Paris Festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, of which there is an American committee. Nicholas Nabokov, of New York is director, and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, is chairman.

"Arts of the Free World" is the theme of the month-long vent. "We are proving," said Fleischmann, in this city briefly on his way to Paris, "that all Western culture is not decadent as the Russians have charged. We are presenting the musician, artist and dancer from the free world, and presenting him under private auspices, without any government help." He heads the committee raising $500,000 to finance the project.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAY 13 1952

Boston Symphony Draws Big Crowd In Brussels

BRUSSELS, May 13 (Reuters) Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the Palais des Beaux Arts for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
MAY 12 1952

Monteux Conducts In Paris

No Riots This Time Accompany Playing Of Stravinsky Work

By JOHN RODERICK

Paris, May 10 (AP).—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated Thursday night a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Thursday's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston Symphony crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Orpheus" May 14, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 19, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

"You were wonderful," he told Monteux.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

The American Symphony league is getting ready for its national convention in Erie, Pa., June 19-21 and many interesting facts are being revealed. There will be special sessions for those orchestras with budgets of less than $5,000; for those with budgets between $6,000 and $25,000 and for those with budgets above $25,000. The exemption from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax granted last fall has enabled many of the orchestras to end the season without great deficits. The York, Pa., orchestra has broken even rather than going in the red as in former seasons and many other orchestras have been able to face orchestral work with enthusiasm rather than discouragement.

THE ORCHESTRAL

. . . picture is increasing. Last week a new orchestra in Wilkes Barre, Pa., the Wyoming Valley Philharmonic, gave its first concert and the 60-piece group sponsored by Wilkes college and led by Ferdinand Liva plans three concerts for next season. The new Worcester Philharmonic of Worcester, Mass., will give its first concert Monday night with Francis Findlay conducting. Next season, the Baton Rouge, La., symphony will expand its subscription series from six to eight concerts and the conductor will be [illegible] Cooper, who will be entering his second year with the orchestra. The St. Petersburg, Fla., orchestra had given its conductor, Leon Poulopoulos, a two-year contract.

ALTHOUGH THE

. . . Boston symphony orchestra is in Europe, the Boston Pops concerts began their 67th season last week. Heretofore the Boston orchestra has played under the name Boston Pops orchestra but this year Arthur Feidler, the conductor had to gather a new orchestra for the series. He not only hired musicians from the Boston area but also from other cities whose orchestras had completed their regular seasons. The Esplanade concerts will follow the Pops concerts and the Boston orchestra will play the Berkshire festival in July and August.

MAY 12 1952

DUTCH LIKE U. S. CONCERT

The Hague, May 12 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 13 1952

Hub Symphony Orchestra Stops Brussels Traffic

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 13 (Reuters)—Traffic was disrupted in the heart of the Belgian capital last night when a mile-long flow of cars converged on the "Palais Des Beaux Arts" for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert.

King Baudouin, a galaxy of Cabinet Ministers and foreign Ambassadors and a packed house of Belgian music-lovers applauded the orchestra's imposing performance of modern music conducted by Charles Munch.

The Boston symphony arrived here on the third lap of its European tour, after having played in Paris and Amsterdam. Today it continues the tuor, moving on to Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Lyon, London and then home.

[16?]

...on, Bonn und Paris wurden ...e Texte der westlichen Ant... die letzte Deutschlandnote der ...entlicht. Wie der Pressechef der ...desregierung bekanntgab, ist vor ...Noten die Bundesregierung kon... und diese haben die einhellige ... Bundesregierung gefunden. ...t auch bei den verschiedenen ...undeskanzlers mit den Hohen ...rochen worden. Die Note sehen.

In Kreisen der SPD-Opposition fanden die Westnoten gestern ebenfalls Zustimmung. Es entspreche der Auffassung der Sozialdemokratie, so wurde gesagt, sich nicht auf eine bestimmte Form der Untersuchung der Wahlvoraussetzungen festzulegen. Es wäre nicht schlecht, wenn einer UNO-Kommission die Prüfung übertragen würde, jedoch würde es den Weg zu Verhandlungen erschweren, wenn man sich auf diese Forderung versteifte.

In ihren Noten haben die Westmächte der Sowjetunion die Prüfung der Voraussetzungen zu gesamtdeutschen freien Wahlen durch eine unparteiische Kommission angeboten. Der Bericht einer solchen Kommission soll dann anschließend von Vertretern der britischen, amerikanischen, französischen und sowjetischen Regierung geprüft werden. Durch diese Prüfung soll festgestellt werden, ob eine Einigung über die Wahlen in ganz Deutschland erzielt werden kann und ob sich die vier Mächte über Zusicherungen einigen können, damit die aus diesen Wahlen hervorgehende gesamtdeutsche ...zum Inkrafttreten des Friedensvertrags die notwendige Handlungsfreiheit erhält. Die Westmächte haben jedoch erneut die Forderung der Sowjetunion abgelehnt, Deutschland den Anschluß an die westliche Gemeinschaft zu verbieten.

Diese Vorschläge der USA, Frankreichs und Großbritanniens sind in gleichlautenden Noten enthalten, die der Sowjetregierung gestern als Antwort auf die zweite sowjetische Deutschlandnote vom 9. April übermittelt wurden.

...versagten

...Hobson"

...erstörer versagt. Zu ...son" noch etwa 3000 ...ntfernt gewesen und ...mit optischen Ge... ...be den Kurs der ...folgt. Der Zer... ...Kapitäns wegen ...deten Lichtern ...chen gewesen. ...ch ständig ge... ...hinenraum so... ...hlen. Wenige ...son" jedoch ... geschnitten.

...lehnend

...uptvorstand ...rkschaft in ...neuen Ent... ...zes ab. Er ...gegenüber ...dem alten ...bestehen... ...erschlech... ...ein ein... ...für alle ...en Dien... ...haft ein ...des Be... ...ten, be... ...sungen. ...aftliche ...ie pari...

Von Cramm trainierte

Düsseldorf, 14. Mai. (Eigener Bericht) Gottfried von Cramm wird am Freitag in Düsseldorf gegen Brasilien spielen! Wenn die endgültige Nominierung der deutschen Daviscup-Mannschaft auch erst am Donnerstag zur Auslosung erfolgen soll, weil der Deutsche Tennis-Bund abwarten will, wie von Cramm das Training durchsteht, so besteht nach dem ersten Trainingstag schon kein Anlaß mehr zu Befürchtungen. Deutschlands Spitzenspieler schmetterte und schlug auf, als wäre er nie verletzt gewesen.

Jubel um die Bostoner Symphoniker

Von unserem Dr.-St.-Musikkritiker

Frankfurt, 14. Mai. (Eigener Bericht) Von weither waren Musiker und Musikfreunde gestern abend im neuen Frankfurter Opernhaus zusammengeströmt, um das einzige Konzert zu hören, das die Bostoner Symphoniker in der Bundesrepublik geben. Die Wagenauffahrt rings um das große Frankfurter Haus ließ schon von außen den Ausnahmecharakter des Ereignisses erkennen. Denn das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester hat am meisten dazu beigetragen, Amerikas Musikleben in der Welt berühmt zu machen. Arthur Nikisch und Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux und Serge Kussevitzky waren die Lehrmeister dieses mehr als hundertköpfigen Orchesters. Die große europäische Musiktradition lebt hier in einem Stil und in einer Vollendung fort, wie sie das arme Europa heute kaum noch leisten kann.

Freilich ist auch etwas typisch Amerikanisches hinzugetreten: man verachtet dort nicht die Technik. Im Gegenteil: die Virtuosität jedes einzelnen dieser Musiker ist unüberbietbar. Strengste Auslese und Musizierdisziplin hat hier eines der ganz großen Weltorchester entstehen lassen, das uns einen neuen Maßstab für Vollkommenheit aufzwingt. Der greise Pierre Monteux, ein Meister der klaren Form und der unbedingten Werktreue, dirigierte das Frankfurter Konzert mit seinem altmodischen langen Taktstock. Aber was er mit ihm zuwege brachte, war voller Leben und idealer Klangschönheit. Bei Ravel waren die 65 Streicher dieses Orchesters wie eine einzige große Harfe, im „Till Eulenspiegel" von Richard Strauß entdeckte man Dinge, die man mit solcher Klarheit und Präzision überhaupt noch nie gehört hat. Daß aber auch die große Tradition der deutschen Symphonik, in der dieses amerikanische Orchester aufgewachsen ist, ungebrochen weiterwirkt, bewies die klassisch groß gespielte Dritte von Brahms. Mit William Schumans Dritter Symphonie gab es ein repräsentatives Werk des zeitgenössischen Amerika. Der Beifall steigerte sich im Lauf des Abends bis zu einem brausenden Erfolg. Die Bostoner, die zu den Pariser Mai-Festspielen nach Europa gekommen sind, werden morgen noch ein Gastkonzert im Berliner Titania-Palast geben.

...reckenplage seit 1850

...rmaßnahmen in Afrika und Asien

...arsten

Mittwoch, 14. Mai 1952

Eleganz und Solidität

Begeisterung für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester in Frankfurt

Boston Symphony Orchestra — für die Amerikaner Inbegriff vom Reichtum der Orchestermusik, für die Europäer bisher nur der Klang eines Namens, der irgendwie mit märchenhaften Schönheiten zu tun hatte, vielleicht auch von manchen als eine Art verchromter Apoll beargwöhnt; nun kam der Klang selber nach Europa (von wo er einst auszog) — Festival in Paris, Begeisterung in Holland und Belgien. Erstes Konzert in Deutschland. Galastimmung im Frankfurter Großen Haus. Anwesenheit von hohen, höheren und höchsten Persönlichkeiten aus allen Zweigen des öffentlichen Lebens. Kaskaden von Beifall. Verbeugungen. Wieder Beifall.

Das gäbe allein schon Stoff für eine fällige Lobeshymne. Aber, abgesehen davon, war diese Begegnung doch so ernsthaft, daß sie — und das ist mehr als eine Lobeshymne — eine sachliche Würdigung verdient.

In den letzten Wochen haben wir in Frankfurt verschiedene bedeutende Orchester gehört, das Pariser Rundfunkorchester, die Berliner Philharmoniker. Vergleiche drängen sich auf. Und am ehesten wären die Bostoner mit den Franzosen zu vergleichen. Nicht allein, weil an diesem Abend Pierre Monteux vor dem Orchester stand. Dieses Orchester hat die aggressive Leichtigkeit, die wir an den Franzosen bewunderten, Durchsichtigkeit des Klanges und jene rhythmische Eleganz, die ihren Impuls nicht aus dem Metrum, sondern aus der melodischen Phrase bezieht. Es hat dazu auch eine Perfektion, die manchmal an Politur erinnert. Die Delikatesse mischt sich aufs eigenartigste mit einer fast handfesten Solidität.

Die Ankündigung besagte, daß die Bostoner, in deren Reihen Solisten — und welche Solisten! — aller-europäischen Abstammungen sitzen, auch ältere deutsche und französische Musik spielen würden. Diese bestand aus der Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz und der dritten Symphonie von Brahms und wurde in der ersten Programmhälfte absolviert. Nicht eigentlich absolviert. Dafür sorgte die Musikalität der Musiker und des Dirigenten, dessen Zeichengebung zwar präzise sparsam war, aber doch geeignet, Impulse freiwerden zu lassen.

Nach der Pause gab es ein mit einem amerikanischen Kritikerpreis ausgezeichnetes Werk: die dritte Symphonie des noch jungen William Schumann Sie benutzt alte Formen, Passacaglia, Fuge, Choral und Toccata und erinnert an eine kontrapunktische Zeichnung, worin auch die großen Klangflächen mit hartem Bleistift koloriert wurden. Virtuosität schloß sich an: „Alborado del Grazioso" von Ravel und „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" von Richard Strauß. Es war Virtuosität und Schönheit der Virtuosität in jedem Sinne. Heinz Enke

Debüt einer Pianistin

Im Kunstkabinett (Frankfurter Kunstgemeinde) debütierte die junge Leopolder-Schülerin Margot Machemer. Ihre technische Ausbildung und ihre musikalischen Grundlagen sind solide, so daß ihr Spiel bereits jene Züge aufweist, die zu einem abgerundeten und verbindlichen Vortrag gehören. Einige Details waren sicher und überzeugend herausgearbeitet, so etwa die Ueberleitung zur Reprise im ersten Satz von Beethovens e-moll-Sonate op. 90, während anderes (so der Schluß der gleichen Sonate) vorerst nur heruntergespielt schien. Ausdrucksfähigkeit bewies Margot Machemer mit den Brahms-Klavierstücken op. 76, deren intim-spröder Reiz sich im Konzertsaal nie ganz enthüllen wird. Präludium, Choral und Fuge von César Franck — in Deutschland sonst leider viel zu wenig gespielt — waren in jeder Hinsicht Höhepunkt und der Abschluß des beifällig aufgenommenen Abends. H. E.

This Clipping From
UTICA, N. Y.
PRESS
MAY 12 1952

Orchestra Hailed

The Hague, The Netherlands—(AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAY 12 1952

Dutch Cheer Symphony

The Hague, The Netherlands, May 11. (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country Saturday night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 13 1952

BAUDOUIN AT CONCERT

Belgian King Among 3,000 Who Cheer Boston Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BRUSSELS, Belgium, May 12—King Baudouin led the applause of an audience of 3,000 that filled the concert hall of the Brussels Palais Des Beaux Arts to capacity tonight to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch.

Belgian music critics described the orchestra as the most versatile heard here in living memory.

The program consisted of the Overture of the "School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber; Symphony No. 5, by Arthur Honegger, the "Bacchus and Ariadne" Suite, by Albert Roussel; "The Sea," by Claude Debussy, and "Daphnis and Chloe," by Maurice Ravel.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

THE WOR

By ROSS PARMENTER

AT SEA: Shipboard concerts can sometimes be a trial, especially if the passengers who want to entertain have more zeal than talent. But first-class passengers on the Ile de France recently had a treat. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was on board and thirty members came up from tourist class to play for them. The men did Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and Haydn's G major Symphony under the baton of Pierre Monteux.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 11 1952

Queen Juliana Hears Boston Symphony Concert

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 10 (Reuters)—Queen Juliana went to hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra gala performance here tonight.

Before the concert, the Boston musicians, who are on a European tour, were guests at an Amsterdam municipal reception in their honor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

N. Y. Ballet Troupe Acclaimed in Paris

First-Night Program Ends With 29 Curtain Calls

PARIS, May 10 (UP)—The New York City Ballet Co. was greeted here tonight with one of the most spectacular welcomes ever seen in the Paris Opera on the opening of its invitation engagement in the French capital.

A glittering first night audience, which included American Ambassador James C. Dunn, called the dancers back for twenty-nine curtain calls after the performance. The packed house gave long cheers and applause for the performance of the troupe, first of its kind ever invited to perform at the Paris Opera.

Ballerina Maria Tallchief who danced "Swan Lake" and Nora Kaye, in Stravinsky's "The Cage" received eight curtain calls each. Georges Balanchine, director-choreographer of the company, also came out for a bow when the audience refused to stop applauding.

The New York company arrived here yesterday from Barcelona, Spain. Its engagement came only a few days after another American group, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was warmly acclaimed in a concert at the Opera.

[163]

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 12 1952

Front Pg Mittag May 14 1952

'een Dagblad

Maandag 12 Mei 1952
73ste Jaargang — No. 111

Prijs 13 cent — 46 cent per week

SPORT
Pagina 4, 5 en 6

VORSTIN EN DIRIGENT

Tijdens de pauze van het galaconcert dat het Boston Symphony Orchestra Zaterdagavond in Den Haag gaf, liet koningin Juliana dirigent Charles Munch (links) aan zich voorstellen. Aan het geanimeerde gesprek nam ook de heer De Jong Schouwenburg, onderdirecteur van de n.v. Concertgebouworkest, deel.

Symphony In Germany May 13-15

FRANKFURT — Americans in Germany will have a chance to hear their own Boston Symphony Orchestra when the orchestra takes time out from its Paris concerts for a short European tour.

A special program for U. S. service personnel will be given in Frankfurt on May 14 under the baton of Musical Director Charles Munch. A program on May 13 for the Frankfurt public will be directed by 78-year-old Pierre Monteux, retired director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, who will also conduct the May 15 concert in Berlin.

Sponsored jointly by HICOG and the Armed Forces Entertainment Branch, the special concert for service personnel will feature the works of Barber, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms.

All military posts have been allocated a quota of tickets for the special program. Reservations may be made by contacting local special services officers. Each member of the Armed Forces is permitted to bring one civilian guest.

Tickets for the May 13 and 15 concerts may be obtained through regular German ticket agencies.

The Boston orchestra is being flown to Germany by the U.S. Air Force.

Frankfurt Concerts 'Sold Out'

FRANKFURT, May 12 (S&S) — The "standing room only" sign went up today for both the regular and the military concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in Frankfurt's Grosses Haus tomorrow and Wednesday.

Every one of the theater's 1,400 seats have been sold for the regular concert at 8 pm tomorrow, the management reported.

Likewise, soldiers throughout EUCOM have applied for all the seats available at the special military performance at 3 pm Wednesday also in the Grosses Haus, Frankfurt Military Post Special Services office said.

The orchestra, on a European tour, is scheduled to arrive in Frankfurt tomorrow by train from Brussels.

It originally was planned to furnish air transportation for the orchestra's engagements in EUCOM, but the oil workers' strike in the U.S. and the temporary embargo on nonduty flying in order to conserve aviation gasoline supplies has caused air transportation to be withdrawn, 12th AF Hq said in Wiesbaden today.

The orchestra will take the Army duty train from Frankfurt to Berlin Wednesday night following the afternoon military performance, and will present a third concert in Berlin's Titania Palast at 8 pm Thursday.

MAY 13, 1952 (Europe) ARMY TIMES A

May 1952

Frankfurter Rundschau

furter Spiegel

ATBLATT DER FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU

hen

l blamiere uns Dame als Gast nter, der mich trahm, zu sei- e immer so mit mir, daß Peter n unentwegt be strahlendem ugen. Nur eine n aufsässig zu n Wagen habe. n bremse zu ndig oder wolle nde nicht mehr r, daß er Peter nd ne verständen im Wagen ver- nder geschäftlich erwegs sein, aber ht gut ausruhen. große Strecke ge- ter seine ganze n durchzuhalten. nen wenn wirk- ann vor — eine r Ich nickte bei m Kopf, ja, nnchen) aber, so

nden kung

Flugzeuglschaften ndenen Linien rikanischen Oel- ntrage bei der ur hierzu, daß Strecken von ten wurden. dies jede zeuge th.

nun einmal sind, oftmals launisch und eigensinnig, unausgeglichen oder auch nur unausgeschlafen. Lieschen kann ja nun nicht gleich bei Beginn der Arbeit wissen, in welcher Verfassung ich bin, und so passieren die tollsten Tippfehler. Ich rassele weiter, sehe aber schließlich doch ein, daß es so nicht weitergehen kann, und unterhalte mich nun mit Lieschen: „Du merkst und fühlst doch, daß ich heute in schlechter Verfassung bin, warum willst du mir gerade heute nicht helfen? Komm, sei anständig, einer von uns beiden muß doch in Form sein." Noch nie hat Lieschen mich im Stich gelassen. Immer ist sie eingesprungen, wenn eigene Kraft nicht ausgereicht hat. Oftmals ist es so, als schreibe sie ganz von selber. Und wenn ich meinen Arbeitsplatz verlasse, zwinkere ich ihr immer von der Tür her noch mit dem linken Auge zu, was besagen soll: Wir beide halten zusammen. Denn ich weiß es: Auch in meiner Maschine schlägt ein Herz. Sp

Der Spitzl

In der A

Eine neue Phase des Wiederaufbaus unserer Stadt beginnt: Am 15. Mai ziehen die Bauleute der Frankfurter Aufbau AG. auf der Großbaustelle zwischen Fahrgasse, Schnurgasse, Trierische Gasse und Töngesgasse ein, am 17. Mai machte die Nassauische Heimstätte GmbH. den ersten Spatenstich zu ihrem Großbauprojekt südlich des Doms. Eine lange Phase des Projektierens und der gründlichen Vorbereitung ist damit abgeschlossen, der Planung folgt die Tat.

Die bisherige Baupolitik der Stadt Frankfurt begegnete vielfacher Kritik: Während am Stadtrand neue große Siedlungen entstanden, wuchsen in der Innenstadt und in der Altstadt auf den Trümmerhaufen der zerstörten Häuser Unkraut und wucherten Hecken und junge Bäume. Lediglich einzelne nur teilzerstörte Häuser wurden bisher wieder aufgebaut.

Daß die Stadt Frankfurt nicht eher an einen großzügigen Wiederaufbau der Innenstadt herangehen konnte, hatte jedoch sehr triftige Gründe: Hart auf hart stießen vielfach die Interessen der alten Eigen-

Das Bostoner Orchester in Frankfurt

Vom Großen Haus sehr angetan

Dienstagnachmittag, Frankfurter Hauptbahnhof: auf dem Bahnsteig, in den der planmäßige Kölner D-Zug einlief, standen die Reporter, Photographen, Rundfunkleute und konnten beim besten Willen den erwarteten illustren Gast nicht entdecken. Er hätte nicht übersehen werden können, denn, kurz gesagt: es handelte sich um das Bostoner Symphonieorchester, immerhin hundertundzehn Musiker mit allem, was noch dazu gehört.

Während man noch wartete, waren die Musiker schon in ihren Hotels: Savoy, Haus der Kochkunst, National, Monopol-Metropol und die beiden Dirigenten, Pierre Monteux und Charles Munch im Frankfurter Hof. Eigentlich hätten sie mit Flugzeugen kommen sollen. Der Oelstreik verhinderte das. Nun hatten ihre Sonderwagen den planmäßigen Zug so verlängert, daß sich die Bundesbahn entschloß, den Sonderanhang — darunter allein zwei Wagen für das Gepäck mit den Instrumenten — auch gesondert laufen zu lassen. So war das Orchester vorzeitig nach Frankfurt gekommen, so daß die Empfangs- und Interview-Welle zunächst im Sande verlief.

Inzwischen hatte es einige Schwierigkeiten bei der [illegible] Zollbehörde im Frankfurter Hauptbahnhof schließlich konnten die In- [illegible]nd ins Große Haus gebracht werden. Die Orchesterleute, mit denen wir sprachen, zeigten sich vom Großen Haus sehr angetan, vom Zuschauerraum, von der Bühne, von dem Raum, den sie noch übrigließ, um immense Mengen von Instrumenten, Zubehör und sonstigen Dingen übersichtlich abzustellen. Vom europäischen Publikum, das sie auf dieser Reise zum ersten Male kennenlernen, sind sie begeistert, von ihrer Aufnahme in Paris, wo sie zwei Konzerte beim Festival des „Kongresses für kulturelle Freiheit" (mit „Meisterwerken des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts") gaben, von Amsterdam, Den Haag und Brüssel. In Deutschland werden sie nun drei Konzerte geben, zwei in Frankfurt, danach eines in Berlin. Es folgen Straßburg, Lyon, noch einmal Paris, Bordeaux und London: vierzehn Konzerte in zwanzig Tagen. Das Orchester ist an solche Strapazen gewöhnt. In Boston gibt es für die Symphoniker nicht nur eine Saison, sondern vier, jeweils in anderem Rahmen: weit über zweihundert Veranstaltungen im Jahr, 47 Wochen angestrengter Orchesterarbeit, zwar mit wechselndem Programm-Niveau, aber stets mit dem gleichen musikalischen Niveau, das den Bostoner Symphonikern den Ruf eingetragen hat, zumindest eines der besten Orchester Amerikas zu sein.

-ke

[164]

Tuesday, May 13, 1952

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 12 1952

BIG RECEPTION AT THE HAGUE

Dutch Go Wild Over Hub Symphony

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 11 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its [redacted] performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

French View of 'Twentieth Century Masterpieces'—

Boston Symphony Acclaimed; Marquis de Cuevas Ballet

By Emile Vuillermoz

Paris

Some unfortunate misunderstandings have troubled the friendly relations between the Paris press and the too strict organizers of the magnificent series of spectacles which have succeeded one another during May under the title "Masterpieces of the 20th century." They are now resolved, but we must deplore the mistakes made in the conception of this huge enterprise, and it is better to discuss them plainly than to keep any stifled ill humor.

Everyone says that the French part of the programs shows a party spirit and the influence of a clique. One has not the right to speak of the contributions of the 20th century. While ignoring those of Paul Dukas, Florent Schmitt, Vincent d'Indy, Jacques Ibert, and so many others. It is unfair to summarize the tremendous choreographic endeavors of our time by keeping exclusively to the seven dance spectacles of the Marquis de Cuevas and Balanchine, without making the slightest allusion to Fokine, Serge Lifar, and Massine, or to central European ballets and Spanish dance.

Ambiguous Term

Actually the expression "twentieth century" is ambiguous. In art the 20th century did not begin with 1900. Up to 1914 it was still the intellectual climate, the musical ideal of the 19th century which held supreme sway. The feverish disquiet, the anxious research, and the bold experiments which constitute the "spirit of the 20th century" were engendered by the war of 1914.

It is from this mental and social upheaval that the new generations have drawn modes of expression and styles adapted to their times. It is the sharp cut between the prewar and postwar periods and not the year 1900 that will be marked in the history of universal art. And it is the mingling of the works of the past century with works by those ambitious to replace them which has thrown this music presentation out of balance.

In actual fact, the public has nothing to complain about, since the Boston Symphony orchestra has been able to rouse great enthusiasm for its offerings of prewar masterpieces which do not shock the public's sensibilities.

The musical ambassadors from Boston won a real victory in Paris. The technical and artistic quality of this splendid "instrument" has been a revelation to us. Its sonorous richness, discipline, and resplendent virtuosity truly make of it the outstanding orchestra of the world.

Munch and Monteux

We have been able to observe it under two different batons. That of Charles Munch led it to victory in two works which were masterfully realized: Honegger's Second Symphony and Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane." Munch was not so happy in Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloé," in which he did not create just the right atmosphere.

Contrasting strongly with the physical action and dynamic gestures of his colleague, Pierre Monteux unloosed the wild splendors of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" with a moderation of posture and restraint of gesture, the efficacy of which was miraculous. This tumultuous masterpiece could not have been conducted with more intelligence and mastery.

While he bowed under the thunders of the audience's applause, I recalled in thought the matinee at which he had conducted, 39 years ago, the first performance of the same score, amid whistles and catcalls, while the indignant Saint-Saëns pounded the floor with his cane, shouting: "Madman!" The Boston Orchestra, Monteux, and Stravinsky will never forget the warmth of the ovations which they have received here.

We were looking forward to some performances of American symphonic works, but Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal" was dropped, and Walter Piston's Toccata, as well as William Schuman's Third Symphony, were too encumbered with the European school forms to bring us the message of a young and bold nation. With fugues, counterpoint, passacaglia, and classic tradition we are completely saturated, and have nothing to learn.

Performances of an Italian opera and two French ballets made an interesting evening. Vittorio Rieti is a sensitive and distinguished musician who has turned a tale by Lorca, entitled "Don Perlimplin," into rapid lyric drama. This noble personage married a flighty woman to make her abandon her many lovers. The light and sensitive score, from which emotion is not absent, was sung with taste.

Two Ballets

The two ballets, with music commissioned of Messrs. Auric and Sauguet, had been chosen, somewhat arbitrarily, to represent "most significant masterpieces produced by our civilization in the last half century." Such a designation makes one smile, for these two works, pleasant but certainly not characteristic, were not equal to this role.

Auric's "Coup de Feu" shows some firemen called to extinguish the flames of love which are consuming two lovers, and who, instead of doing their task, complaisantly expose themselves to their burning caresses. And Sauguet's "Cordelia" is the story of a child banished to an attic where some faded old costumes enable her to escape into dreams.

Two scores without great value, but well adapted to the dance, two clever décors by Cassandre and Jacques Dupont, two banal choreographies, and two interpretations in which the troupe of the Marquis de Cuevas proved equal to itself; that is to say, it has some brilliant leaders, such as Hightower and Dolores Starr, Golovine and Skouratoff, and some ordinary rank and file.

Art Assembled in Paris

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Art Wins Friends for U. S.

By CYRUS DURGIN

AMSTERDAM—So far it has been one triumph after another for the touring Boston Symphony Orchestra. The night they played in The Hague, they got a terrific ovation, although the people there are said almost to sit on their hands. The following afternoon, at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, the reception was warm and continuing.

The Saturday concert at The Hague was a "gala," for which everyone had to be in evening dress because Queen Juliana attended. Of course there were appropriate ceremonials: the concert did not begin until the Queen entered her first balcony box, a little down the side, stage right, through the private entrance reserved for the royal presence.

* * *

When she came in, attended by a small retinue, and wearing a most becoming turquoise gown, everybody stood up. Then conductor Charles Munch played The Netherlands National Anthem, after which the business of the evening was attacked. That business was Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe," and that wonderful old rouser, the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. When it all was over, the audience clapped and cheered en masse, and there were many cries of "Bis!", which is a European way of saying you want an encore. But no encore was forthcoming.

During the intermission, the Queen, who had arrived not in a coach of state, but in a handsome big Cadillac job, summoned four men to be received in the royal private room just across the corridor from her box. They were Mr. Munch, manager George E. Judd, and the two Dutch-born members of the orchestra, Boaz Piller and Jacobus Langendoen. (This afternoon I shook one of the four hands which had shaken the hand of Her Majesty Juliana, Queen of The Netherlands. I won't wash my right hand for a week, if ever.)

* * *

At the Concertgebouw ("Concertgebouw" means building) Director Monteux was the returning hero. About 25 years ago he was for several seasons, regular conductor there. He, too, and the orchestra, got a welcome from the Amsterdamers they won't forget. When the last chords of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" were finished, the gathering in the large hall rose as one, and just stood there, clapping and yelling "Bravo!"

Actually, due to the peculiar acoustics of this hall, which make the sonorities loud but not so warm, rich and powerful as the Boston Symphony usually sounds, the tone was less than Bostonians know it can be. Each wind instrument, too, was brought out sharply.

The stage is high and tiered, and the brass and percussion have to be placed at the back, which means the top. It takes a bit of experience for an orchestra to be its fine self in such a tricky auditorium. But the precision and the discipline of the Boston Symphony were the main topic when the Concertgebouw Orchestra gave a reception after the concert.

* * *

Here again there were speeches, too many and too long. But Messrs. Monteaux and Judd, with just enough words, beautifully expressed, carried off the honors. The Dutch and the American musicians mingled, drank sherry and Geneva gin (beer and coke, too, if you wanted that), ate pastries, talked, laughed and had a fine time.

If the musical art can make many friends and influence peoples, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is doing a fine piece of work for Uncle Sam & Co.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT
MAY 13 1952

Miss French Is Fiancee of William Primrose, Violist

Announcement is made of the engagement of Miss Alice Virginia French, daughter of Mrs. Francis Henry French, 20 Forest road, Davenport, and the late Francis Henry French, to William Primrose, internationally - known violist who was soloist with the Tri-City Symphony orchestra in January. No date has been set for the wedding.

Miss French, who is connected with a leading Quad-city family, attended St. Katharine's school, Bennington college in Bennington, Vt., and Bard college in Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y. She has spent considerable time in Paris, where she has studied art. She is a member of the Junior board of the Tri-City Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Primrose, the son of Mrs. Margaret Primrose of London, England, resides in Switzerland and is in this country on a concert tour. He is a houseguest at the French home and will leave in a few days for New York City for recording work.

Considered to be one of the greatest musicians of the day, Mr. Primrose made his debut as a solo violist under Sir Thomas Beecham. When the new NBC Symphony was formed in New York by Toscanini, he joined that group as chief viola player, leaving the orchestra in 1942 to devote all of his time to solo work. He has played with the Philadelphia, Boston and other leading symphonies.

MISS ALICE V. FRENCH.

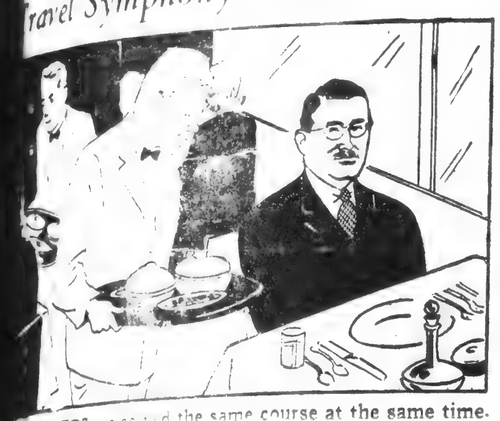
Last New Year's day, he was announced as commander of the Order of the British Empire by King George VI, and he will go to London this summer to receive the citation.

Mrs. French honored the betrothed couple at a party Monday evening attended by a group of relatives and close family friends.

[105]

Netherlands' Quick, Jolly, Easy Customs Men Will Not Be Fooled

Travel Symphony—IX



DINERS are served the same course at the same time.

...gers to bed before 1 a.m. and ...time due to the beguilements of ... it had been 2.

...Train out into the gangway of the ... carrying the members of ... orchestra, some with wives and families. The stories were good, and ... One about the American ... who, ordering more butter ... breakfast, received two large ... of beer. (Beurre, with an ... which must have been like ... can be translated into bière!)

Another, of a French-born member who vented his righteous indignation upon a taxi-driver who seemed to be going deliberately the long way 'round. But when they both had calmed down, and the musician discovered that the taxi-driver had come from near his own home-town in Southern France, the musician not only tipped handsomely, but invited the driver to have a drink at the nearest cafe!

The conversation turns, naturally, to the concert of the night before in the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, and concerns mostly the huge success of "Le Sacre du Printempts."

But there are many questions about how the orchestra sounded in the Theatre, where, as in the Paris Opera House, an apron had been added to the stage over the orchestra pit, and the violins, and part of the violas and cellos had to sit out from under the proscenium.

The answer is, the orchestra had sounded very well, in good balance and not too loud, in the comparatively small theatre, where the acoustics are sharp, indeed. The program is discussed: The cordial reception for the third America work, William Schuman's Third Symphony, which the Boston Orchestra had played in Paris. And then the warm and continuing ovation for orchestra and conductor Pierre Monteus, with cries of "Encore!", answered amiably by Mr. Monteux with the reasonable explanation that the men were tired after long rehearsal that morning, and the evening's concert.

★ ★ ★

By now the Paris suburbs, and St Denis, long since have passed. The train is in the open, rolling French countryside, where every foot of soil and vegetation, it seems, is carefully tended. (Would that they did the same thing in careless, wasteful U. S. A.!)

★ ★ ★

First stop, Compiegne, of which little can be seen from the station. Whatever became of that famous railway car in which the armistice of World War I was signed, in which the French humiliation of World War II was realized when Hitler granted them an armistice in 1940, and which, thereafter, the Nazis took away? Totally destroyed, no doubt.

The Dutch immigration and customs men are quick, jolly, easy of manner, but very careful in the execution of their duty. You have the feeling that these men will not be fooled. Nor will the staff in the dining car, who have an organized way of operating, as inflexible as the laws of the Medes and the Persians.

All those who are of one sitting at a meal must be in the dining car before anyone lifts a finger. Then everyone is served the same course at the same time, just as around any well-regulated family table. And the Dutch are certainly well-regulated!

Here comes Rotterdam, its huge and pitiful square mile of Stuka-wrought obliteration just 12 years ago this month, partially repaired, but with enough empty space to show where the bombs struck. Then Delft, then Haarlem, and finally Amsterdam with its canals. Here, as on the train, the Dutch are obliging, courteous, quick and humorous, but you know full well that their duty comes first.

Even to the apple-cheeked boy who brings you a schnapps of Geneva gin as you set out to write this piece, and whose command of English, and curiosity about the tongue, leads you to let him read the first page just for practice.

I suspect the Dutch are the New Englanders of Europe.

The World's Day

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Europe: Britain Plans to Buy Soviet Sea Food

Britain is to buy $420,000 worth of canned crab and $2,240,000 worth of canned salmon from the Soviet Union, the Ministry of Food announced.

The International Press Institute's first general assembly ended in Paris after bringing together 107 editors from 22 countries. Lester Markel, Sunday editor of the New York Times, was reelected chairman of the executive board.

In a speech at Oxford University, Herbert Morrison, Foreign Minister in Britain's former Labor government, appealed to Russia to "come in with the rest of us" and cooperate for the security, peace, and progress of mankind.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give its first concert in Britain at the Royal Festival Hall May 24.

Communist and pro-American Parisians broke up the opening performance of "Colonel Foster Pleads Guilty" with fist fights when the play depicted United States soldiers in Korea as being brutal to Korean civilians.

Special Broadcasts To Honor Koussevitzky

Special broadcasts honoring the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the internationally revered conductor, have been scheduled by major networks and independent stations throughout the country, for the week of June 4, 1952, the first anniversary of his death.

These programs, which will also commemorate the tenth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will include recordings conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky and works commissioned by the Foundation which he created to carry into the future the unmatched record for encouraging and supporting composers throughout the world. In Paris, where Koussevitzky established his international reputation after leaving revolutionary Russia, the anniversary will be observed in a memorial broadcast by radiodiffusion Francaise, and in a concert by the Pascal String Quartet under the auspices of the U. S. Embassy, performing quartets by William Bergsma and Peter Mennin which were commissioned by the Foundation.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a memorial concert at Tanglewood on August 9th during the Berkshire Music Festival, and will include in the program Aaron Copland's Symphony No. 3, commissioned by the Foundation. A number of major symphony orchestras here and abroad will pay homage to the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky by including in their Fall programs works commissioned by the Foundation.

Antal Dorati, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, has informed the Foundation that his tribute will include performances of Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Burrill Phillip's "Tom Paine Overture," and Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana." Thor Johnson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has chosen Heitor Villa - Lobos' "Madona," Nikolai Lopatnikoff's "Concertino for Orchestra," and the Bartok Concerto. Walter Hendl will conduct several works commissioned by the Foundation in the Fall concerts of the Dallas Symphony. Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy have also stated their intention of performing commissioned works in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Firsts and Fisticuffs at Paris Festival

By EDMUND PENDLETON

PARIS, MAY 17

"Cordelia," a one-act ballet by Henri Sauguet, inaugurated an evening of new productions given in the Champs-Elysees Theatre during the second week of the Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts. On the same program were a second ballet, "Coup de Feu," scenario and costumes by A. M. Cassandre, music by Georges Auric, and between the two. "Don Perlimplin," opera by Vittorio Rieti. The ballets were danced by the Marquis de Cuevas's troupe.

Another major event of the week was the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted first by Charles Munch in the Opera House and later by Pierre Monteux in the Champs-Elysees Theatre, which reached triumphant proportions and clearly indicated that its musical ambassadorship is of inestimable value.

The initial concert was played before a capacity audience which included President Vincent Auriol and Madame Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schumann and Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn. Mr. Munch, elegant and persuasive in his gestures, interpreted Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" suite divinely, devoted keen attention to Samuel Barber's overture "The School for Scandal" and Walter Piston's spirited "Toccata," conducted Honegger's "Second Symphony" and Debussy's "La Mer" with the breadth of conception necessary to obtain their contrast, and gave a thrilling performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Second Suite, even though it bordered upon precipitance. The orchestra sounded like some super-virtuoso whose tone quality remained beautiful from the softest whisper to the fullest tutti, and whose phrasing, delicate or warm as the moment required, was constantly poetical.

Pierre Monteux's program comprised Ralph Vaughan Williams' Fantasy on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Darius Milhaud's Symphonic Suite "Protee," William Schumann's Third Symphony and Igor Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps. Solidly riveted to the podium, Mr. Monteux waved a long white baton with remarkable clarity and precision, indicating entrances, or raising the forefinger of his left hand to his lips in a characteristic gesture. At the end of the concert, Igor Stravinsky climbed upon the stage to embrace him and to acknowledge the massive applause. Finally in response to the audience's insistence, Mr. Monteux said "Thirty-nine years ago I conducted the first performance of the Sacre; I gave you a rendezvous to hear me do it again thirty-nine years hence."

Bruno Walter, conducting the Paris Opera orchestra, obtained an execution charged with fire and imagination of Richard Strauss's Don Juan. If his interpretation of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" was lovely, it was a tame Faun sans horns and sans hoofs that was being portrayed—the tempi could have supported a little more contrast and fantasy. These two attributes were far from lacking in Gustav Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde"; its Viennese popular expression and the composers's meditative soul were effectively opposed. Elsa Cavelti and Lorenz Fehenberger were the soloists.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler, heading his own Berlin Symphony, displayed versatility in his program comprising Weber's Oberon, Schumann's Fourth Symphony (taken at a deliberate tempo) Honegger's Symphonic Movement No. 3, Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody and Strauss' Death and Transfiguration. The next day, Beethoven's Egmont overture, and Great Fugue opus 133, and Brahms's double violin and cello concerto played by Joseph Szigeti and Pierre Fournier, and Secondy Symphony comprised the program which revealed the celebarted orchestra and its conductor in an excellent light.

Chamber Music

The Twentieth Century Exposition's first firecracker exploded when spectators came to blows at the hearing of Pierre Boulez's "Structures" for two pianos during a chamber music concert given in the Comédie des Champs-Elysées. The concert inaugurated a series of seven to be heard in the same theatre, afternoons at 5:30 p. m., in which reputed instrumental and vocal ensembles will take part.

Following the hearing of an alert and intelligently written Quintet for woodwinds and horn by Elsa Barraine, a Chorale and Variations for piano by Henri Dutilleux which exploits the piano idiom, Songs by Yves Baudrier admirably presented by Le Marc'Hadour, and imaginative "Incantations" for flute alone by André Jolivet, Pierre Boulez and Olivier Messiaen took their places, each at a keyboard. The hall was fairly well filled with an audience composed mainly of composers, including Igor Stravinsky.

If one did not sense a mathematical formula at the basis of what one heard, and if one was not aware of the musical science in the possession of the performers, one would have thought that they were playing the piano for the first time in their lives and struggling at it. Isolated notes at the extremes of the instruments, sharply contrasted dynamics, sudden flurries, silences probably extremely difficult to measure judging by the executants' visible efforts at counting, and an occasional soft, but massive harmony is what the ear seizes upon at first hearing.

Hardly a minute had gone by before the majority of the audience was in a humorous but respectful mood. When the performers turned their pages back to the beginning and a repeat was about half-way through, a woman in an orchestra seat, unable to contain herself any longer, timidly cried "Bravo." Instantly a husky youth from the back row leaped over several rows of seats and bore down menacingly upon the frightened woman. A section of the audience rose to its feet and a policeman apprehended the youth, who, as he was being led out, received a blow from the woman's bag; the audience commented upon the incident excitedly while the two performers, unperturbed, continued their counting and hammering. Another youth shouted as he fled the hall, "This was written in the score!"

Charles Koechlin's woodwind trio which terminated the concert was played before a near-empty house as most of the listeners crowded into the hallway to satisfy their curiosity rather than submit to the soothing influence of melodic line and "natural" resonance.

TIGHT BINDING

Congress of Cultural Freedom Finds Paris Politely Tolerant

By RUDOLPH ELIE

PARIS, May 17—There are still a great many aspects of this Congress of Cultural Freedom in Paris this month of May that I do not understand—for example, who is paying for it all—but it turns out to be a pretty exceptional thing at that.

It is, to be sure, the sort of thing Parisians like to joke about. They are, after all, a fairly cynical sort of people who have lived a lot, seen a lot and been disillusioned a lot. And while they love their own festivals, such as those great "galas" that make Paris in the spring a place of incredible beauty and gayety (the summer tourist never knows what he misses in Paris from April to June), they look upon such contrived events as last year's Bimillennial with skeptical shrugs.

This is not to say the celebration of the 2000th year of the

(Continued on Page Forty)

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, MAY 18, 1952

Congress of Cultural Freedom Finds Paris Politely Tolerant

(Continued from First Page)

founding of Paris was not a success; it is merely that the Parisian knows that Paris may be 2010 or 1992 years or even 2633 years old, and so what? That's for the tourist.

In view of the fact that in any given city, even one with such a reputation for culture as Paris, perhaps less than 30 per cent of the citizens give a hoot for music, art, literature, poetry, drama, philosophy and other branches of the creative spirit, it is more than likely that the man in the street here knows little or nothing about the Congress.

The newspapers have not devoted much space to the Congress here, save to announce the concerts and events as they come along. These events, however, are truly historic in musical significance, and in creative significance as well.

For the Congress, during this exposition, has assembled the finest achievements of the composers, writers, painters and thinkers of the western world during the last 50 years. It is fairly easy for most people to shrug off this attainment, especially in the field of music, where the general opinion is that nothing worth bothering with has been done since the death of Brahms.

FORM PARIS GROUPS

Presented in almost nightly procession, however, by the greatest orchestras and conductors of the times, these works make a formidable list. Already given have been "Wozzeck," Berg's great opera in the Viennese production of last year; Stravinsky's world masterpiece "Rite of Spring" (by the Boston symphony in the exact scene of its riotous premiere 39 years ago); as well as such established classics as 'Das Lied von der Erde," Honegger's Symphony No. 2; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and works by Hindemith, Martinu, Bartok, Debussy, Ravel, Messiaen, Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff, Schoenberg, Shostakovitch, Vaughan Williams, Poulenc, and Roussel.

Still to be given are Britten's opera "Billy Budd," Virgil Thomson's "Three Saints in Four Acts," a concert of the works of Stravinsky with the composer conducting, Schoenberg's opera-oratorio "Erwartung," and a concert suite from Shostakovitch's forbidden "Lady Macbeth of Minsk."

Taking part in all this, besides the Boston Symphony, whose debut in Paris on the night of May sixth ranks as the greatest triumph of the exposition so far, are the four Paris orchestras, the RIAS orchestra of Berlin, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, the orchestra of the Santa Cecilia of Rome and the Froment Chamber orchestra. Operas are being done by the Covent Garden Royal Opera, the Vienna State Opera and the American National Theater and Academy. Ballets are being offered by the New York City Ballet and the Marquis de Cuevas Grand Ballet. Choruses from Strasbourg, Rome and Amsterdam, two string quartets and nearly 30 soloists of world reputation are also taking part.

In the meantime, though not officially in the exposition, Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" is being given its 50th anniversary performance, and Strauss' "Salome" is being produced by the Paris Opera company, while the London Philharmonic and numberless other outside organizations fill up every concert minute of the month.

The other events are less specifically stated although the art collection at the Musee d'Art Moderne, gathered by Mrs. James Sweeney and Rene Huyghe, is, for me at least, one of the great achievements of the expositon. The literary end of it promises to be equally interesting involving, as it does, such figures as Stephen Spender, Glenway Westcott, W. H. Auden, William Faulkner, Rosamond Lehmann, de Madriaga, Andre Malraux, Denis de Rougemont and many others in round table discussions.

THREE THEMES

The themes of these literary and philosophical meetings, held at the Sorbonne, are three in number. The first deals with the problem of the creative writer's position in the 20th century. Can he make use of today's mass media without betraying himself, which is to say can the creative writer accept the constraint implicit in mass media and still be creative?

The second deals with perpetuating the liberty of people to accept or refuse the principles of the society in which they live; in short to submit to the supposed fellowship of totalitarianism or to find a way to assert the value of revolt while still seeking fellowship.

The third deals with the problems of free inquiry and free expression despite the apparent chaos of style and doctrine with a view to seeking artistic universality. It'll be interesting to see what comes out of all this.

But in the meantime the first Congress of Cultural Freedom is certainly attempting a gigantic production. I have been told by one of the group that if every single event in the entire series is sold out, the receipts would be a mere drop in the ocean of expense. Merely subsidizing the European tour of the Boston Symphony runs into the upper hundreds of thousands; you do not tour 104 men with 20 tons of luggage for 30 days in Europe on a limited budget.

However it is being subsidized, it is a pretty significant thing just the same, even if it is only a start. There is no plan at this point to make it an annual event, but if the whole exposition achieves but a fraction of the success of the appearances of the Boston Symphony during the opening week, there seems little doubt it will contribute

First Full Concert in Mid-Ocean Given by Boston Symphony

ABOARD S. S. ILE DE FRANCE (In the Irish Sea), May 3 (By ship-to-shore radiotelephone)—For the first time in the history of music and the first time in the history of transatlantic travel, a full symphony orchestra and a world-famed conductor presented a concert in mid-ocean yesterday.

The 90 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on their way to Europe aboard the Ile de France for a three-week tour of the Continent played Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Haydn's Symphony No. 88, under the direction of Pierre Monteux in a concert for the benefit of the Seamen's Fund.

Loud-speakers piped the performance into other lounges to take care of all the passengers who overflowed the 400-chair theatre.

A good part of the credit for the event must go to librarian Leslie Rogers of Brookline who had the foresight to carry along some music for this event that would not require the services of a group of players who were flying to Paris.

When the ship docks at Le Havre, France, tomorrow evening, the Boston Symphony will be the first American orchestra to visit the Continent since the '20s when Arturo Toscanini took the New York Philharmonic on a tour of Europe.

The Boston Orchestra under director Charles Munch will open its tour in Paris on May 6 with a concert of modern American and French music in the Committee for Cultural Freedom's festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Their program will include a toccata by Harvard Prof. Walter Piston of Belmont.

Wives, Children Along Too

The group will play three times in Paris and will also visit The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Munch's home town of Strasbourg in Alsace, Lyons, Bordeaux and London.

The orchestra's party on shipboard includes 27 musicians' wives and five of their children. Andreas Lehner, 10, of Newton Center, who will visit his grandmother in Copenhagen, Denmark, distinguished himself by winning 300 francs ($1.04) in the ship's "horse races."

The social informality of musical life is making itself felt on shipboard. There are cocktail parties, shuffleboard and deck tennis. One group from the "long-hairs" even warmed up for the symphony concert with a jam-session.

Berets purchased at a shipboard shop are very much in evidence as the Bostonians prepare to take on the Continental look. Conspicuous for his lack of a beret but often seen in the ship's swimming pool is assistant manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. of Hingham, who is in charge of the party.

When the call came through to Boston at 2 p. m., E. D. T., it was 6 in the evening on board.

The weather during the crossing has been clear for the most part and the seas smooth.

Radio reception was so good that Perry's voice might have been coming from his Symphony Hall Boston office instead of from a ship in the cool and appropriately green waters off the coast of England in the Irish Sea.

This Clipping From
MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS
MAY 5 1952

The New

Alice Hughes

I spent a weekend in Bean-town to wave so-long to my sister and French fiddle-playing brother-in-law just before the Boston Symphony orchestra left for Paris to play in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. This is the UN organization under which member nations interprat the emotional and rational pleasures and profits of music, ballet, literature and other artistic and intellectual achievements by free men. Under the same Congress a few years ago the Soviet Union sent a "cultural" delegation to New York that drew pickets, riots and police to the scene. At Moscow's own "culture" session recently, the U. S. S. R. lashed out at the works of us "effete" westerners for our "modern, immoral and counter-revolutionary music." What kinds of ears have Russians got that they can catch such unusual by-products from do-re-mi-fa-sol notes? In USSR when they detect such naughty emotions buried in the works of their own musicians, they denounce and even jail them for "anti-communist sentiments."

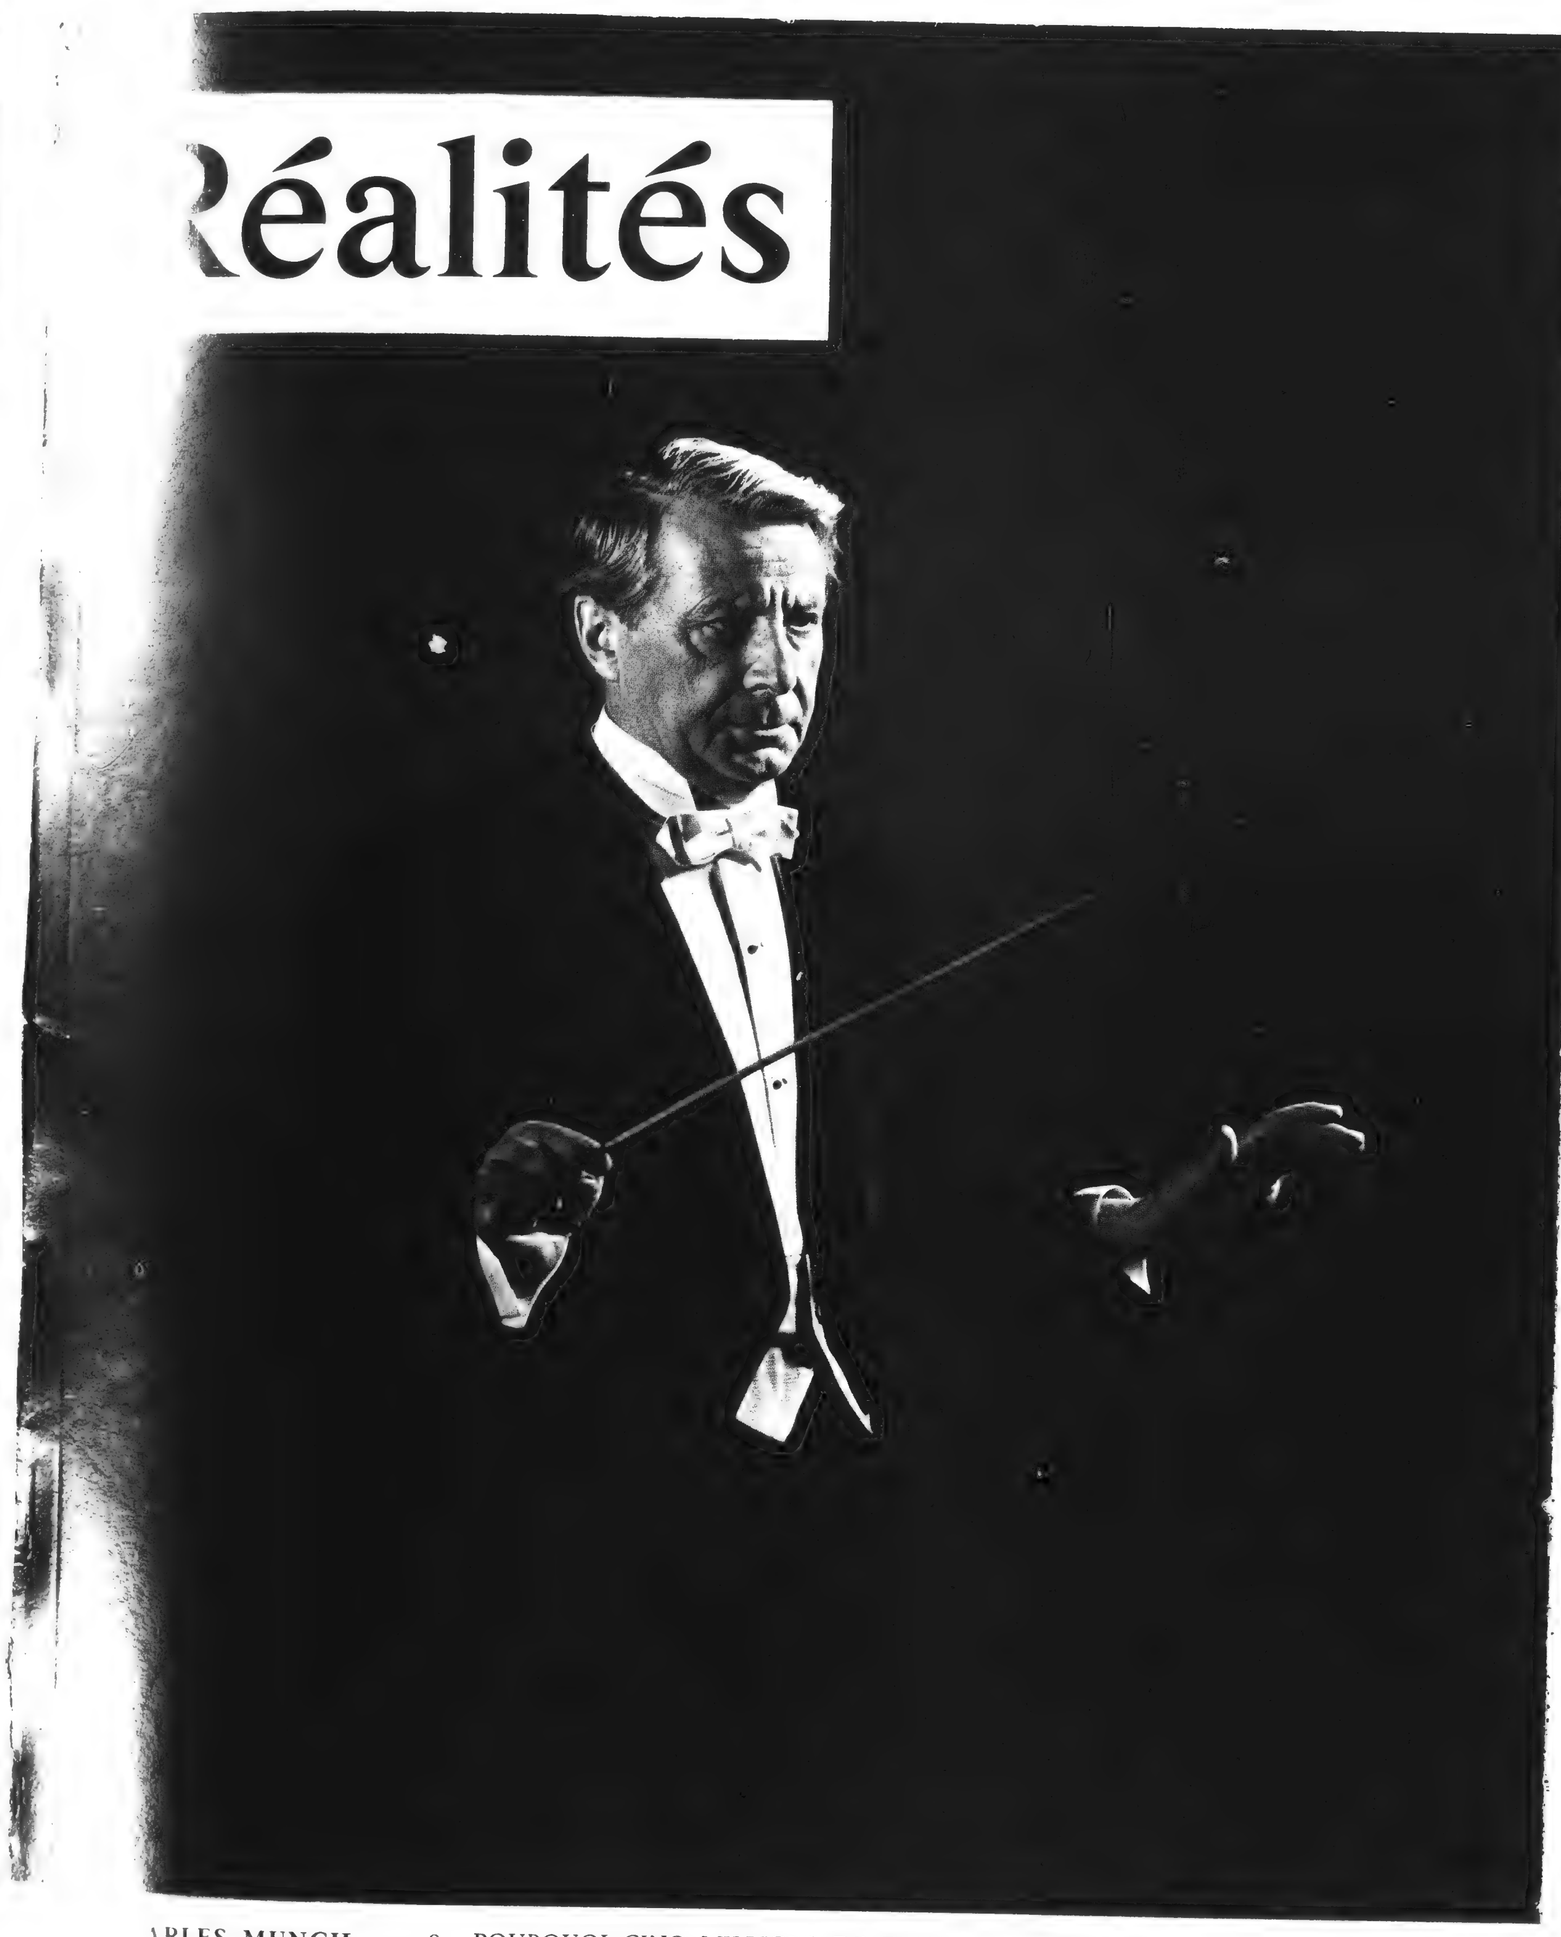
Alice Hughes

The Boston band—104 of them—flew off on Monday. The preceding Saturday they held their last concert at Symphony Hall and, under the direction of eminent conductor Charles Munch, played an extraordinary concert. It was made up of five of the very compositions the Soviet had condemned: Barber's "School for Scandal," Honegger's "Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra," Piston's "Toccata," Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "Suite No. 2 Daphnis et Chloe," with a singing chorus. The audience — myself included — cocked ears to catch international implications, or neo-fascistic sounds. But none seemed to emerge except sense—stirring harmonies—joyous, romantic, melancholy, robust, refreshing, etc. This very concert is the initial one which will be played in the Paris Opera House, May 8. Supplementing the Boston Symphony orchestra on this tour of 13 European cities in six countries are the New York City Ballet company plus conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

But the music at the Saturday night concert didn't begin to add up to the excitement and mirth of the musicians and their wives and families, as they took off at Boston's Logan airport. Such jibes and jokes! mostly in French, for these musikers live in a world apart. Their English, suffering from disuse, grows worse every year. My brother-in-law gave us amusing details to explain how the musical instruments and the baggage of the players were being accommodated. For each four men in the orchestra a huge trunk was built and their effects jointly packed. Preparations such as these, plus travel fees, etc., will cost about $1 million for the Boston Symphony alone. Who's to pay for this? Well, the European concerts will have some proceeds, I suppose, and I presume the United Nations provides considerable financial help from its "culture" budget.

In each city where the B.S.O plays, the leading state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders will be present. There will be, of course, parties, receptions and all kinds of social events over which the Boston musicians' wives may have considerable anguish. They want to dress handsomely and take along plenty of shoes and other accessories. Their husbands' trunks were shipped via boat, but on the plane 45 pounds apiece challenged these women's skill for compressing their sartorial amibitions. My Boston sister took along two suits, a coat, a raincoat, two afternoon dresses, two evening dresses, one cocktail dress and some skirts, blouses and sweaters. My other sister Francie and I stood at the airport waving and wishing we were to go along . . .

Réalités



ARLES MUNCH, page 81. POURQUOI CINQ MILLIONS DE FRANÇAIS VOTENT COMMUNISTE, page 38

Mai 1952 France

Réalités

ARLES MUNCH, page 81. POURQUOI CINQ MILLIONS DE FRANÇAIS VOTENT COMMUNISTE, page 38.

Mai 1952 France

CHARLES MU

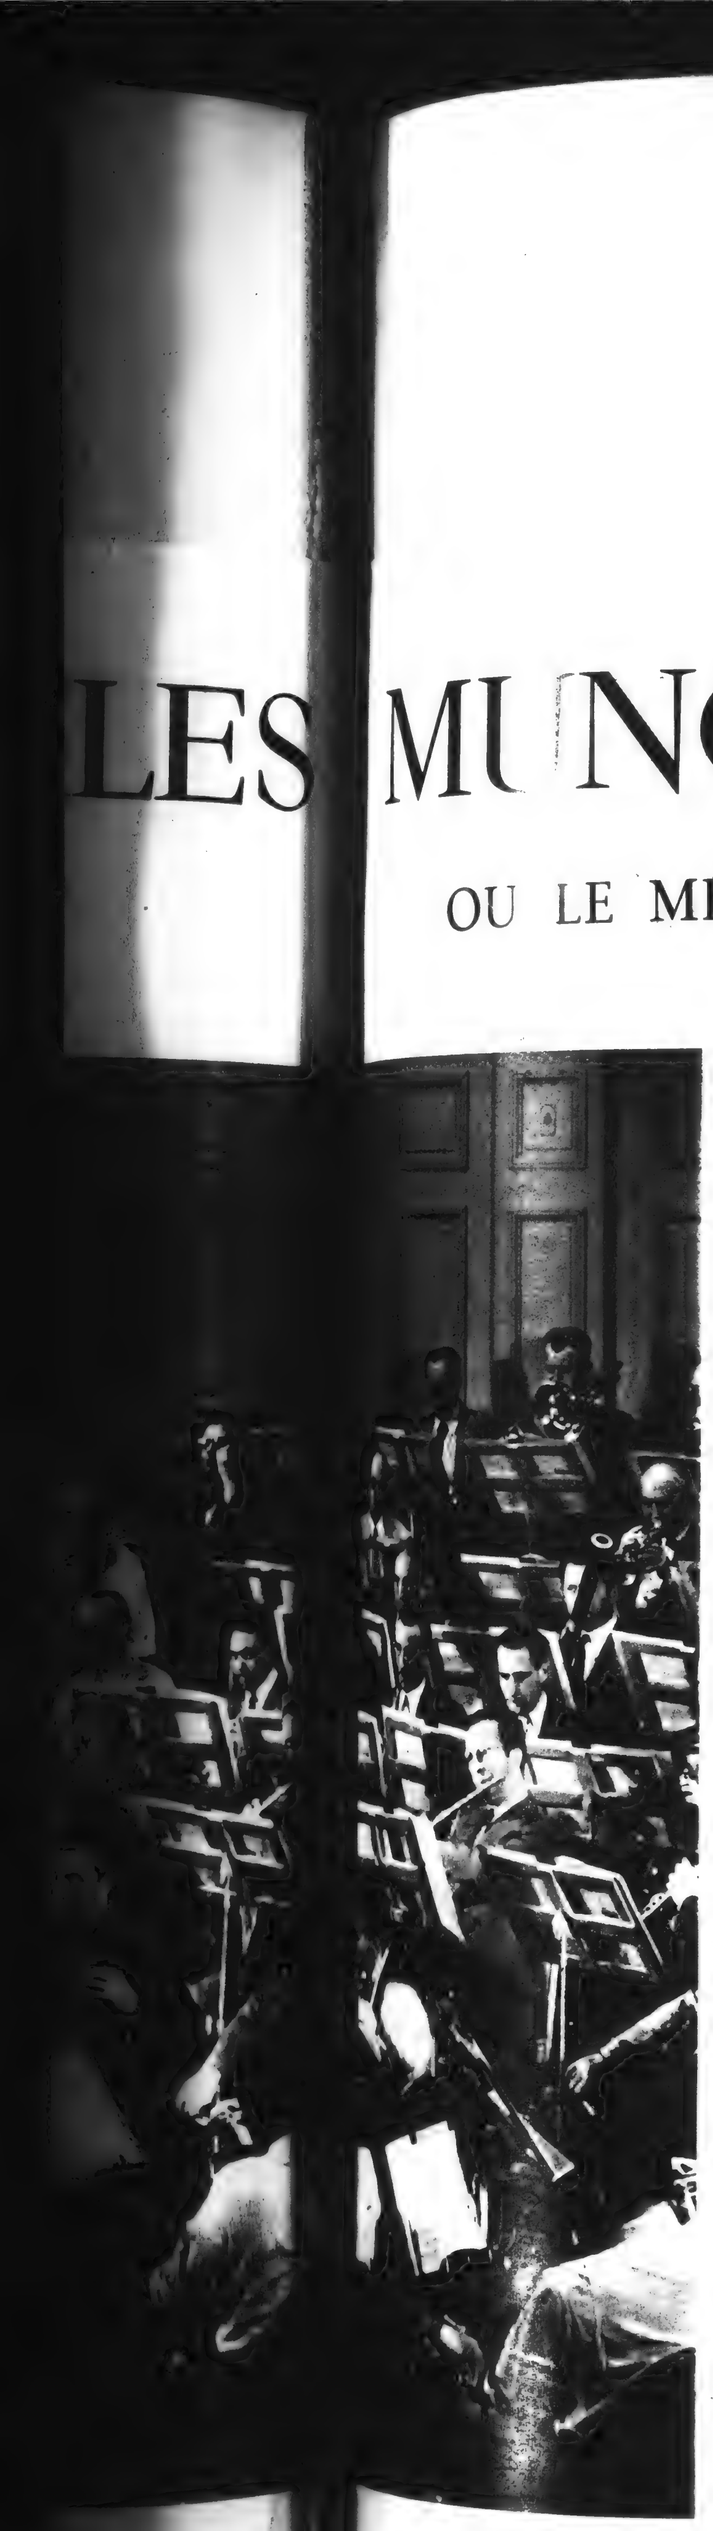
OU LE

CHARLES MU

OU LE

LES MUNCH

OU LE MÉTIER DE CHEF D'ORCHESTRE



Le Boston Symphony Orchestra, qui compte 24 Français à commencer par son chef, est un des Trois Grands d'outre-Atlantique. C'est lui que Munch vient présenter ce mois-ci à Paris.

Le 8 avril 1948, dans le salon vert de Huntington Avenue, l'illustre chef d'orchestre Serge Koussewitzky réunit quelques-uns des sept cents commanditaires et amis du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Après le thé il leur annonça sa décision de prendre sa retraite — il avait soixante-quatorze ans — et de proposer à Charles Munch de lui succéder à la tête de cet orchestre qu'il avait dirigé pendant vingt-cinq années. En 1945 ce choix eût étonné, la réputation de Munch en Amérique étant encore à faire, et l'on eût mieux vu à la tête du Boston Symphony un Mitropoulos, un Georg Szell ou encore l'élève favori de Koussewitzky, le jeune Léonard Bernstein. Mais le passage de Munch en 1946 avait soudain bouleversé le monde musical des États-Unis. D'emblée il avait été consacré. Titulaire depuis près de dix ans du meilleur orchestre français, précédé d'une prestigieuse renommée européenne, il avait été invité, dès la reprise des relations artistiques internationales, à diriger les orchestres de New-York et de Boston. Ce fut un triomphe. Sa fougue étonnait, sa plastique séduisait, sa distinction naturelle, faite de gravité protestante et de courtoisie latine, ajoutait encore à son charme. Les critiques furent unanimes, et le plus célèbre d'entre eux, Virgil Thomson, aurait pu redire ce que, plus de douze ans auparavant, il écrivait dans le New York Herald, après avoir vu pour la première fois Munch diriger un concert parisien : « Charles Munch est vraiment le type même du chef d'orchestre pour le Boston Symphony. Il a le ventre plat et la chevelure grisonnante, et il provoque l'émotion, particulièrement chez les femmes de plus de cinquante ans... »

Aujourd'hui la prophétie s'est réalisée. Les douairières de Beacon Hill (le « Passy » de Boston) ont pris possession de Charles Munch. Elles le trouvent beau, avec sa taille de 6 pieds, la chevelure d'argent classique des sénateurs américains. Elles l'appellent « Charry », connaissent ses habitudes, ses menus, son Oldsmobile noire ainsi que le prénom de son chauffeur et celui de son airedale. Elles savent surtout qu'il se comporte toujours en parfait homme du monde et qu'il apporte des gerbes de roses lorsqu'il est invité à dîner. On lui pardonne de ne savoir que trois mots d'anglais et d'avoir l'air décidé à ne pas en apprendre davantage, parce que le français qu'il parle est très raffiné et que ses gestes sont infiniment plus expressifs que ne peut l'être le langage courant. Il est instructif de parcourir les comptes rendus de sa première saison au Boston Symphony : tous les magazines publient sur leur couverture un gros plan de son visage dans l'une de ces attitudes expressives qui firent sa légende, des articles de vingt colonnes retracent, à grand renfort d'anecdotes, les divers épisodes de sa carrière.

Réalités
Mai 1952
France

de la plastique de n'elle varie selon les interprète. Personne
ne possède la vérité conscience du style
u'il conduit. On l'a de longs fragments
ues dans une immobiabsolue, soucieux seununiquer au public la ibre et de pureté clas-ntait, et un moment
la Valse de Ravel
m d'expansion phy-
e un chef d'orchestre
a musique de toutes
s, comme les acteurs, affinités avec certains ins styles. On verrait rtwaengler conduire
ui serait sans doute ijours dans un tempo
e on verrait mal un
français donner d'une
Bruckner l'interpréta-

il que Munch excelle
ation de la musique
ssel, Berlioz, Ravel
prennent une signifi-
e. Il aime aussi les s chorales : les Pas- et l'Oratorio de Noël ;
Berlioz ; la Messe en
Schubert ; la Missa
eethoven ; Jeanne au
Danse des Morts.
ce Martyre de Saint
ebussy, dont la reprise
300.000 francs à la ncerts du Conserva-demeure l'une des soirées musicales de D'autre part, de sa
acien protestant lui
lt passionné pour la
n. Sait-on que sur les ante concerts qu'il ciété entre 1937 et soixante-sept fois les debourgeois et une
de l'Art de la Fugue.
La musique contem-mais il ne s'en est
pécialité, comme un
Markewitch, un Anser-rmière. En France plusieurs fois les hien, d'Honegger, de rawinsky, de Bartok.
ef de l'un des pred'outre-Atlantique,
ent vers la musique
méricaine qu'il tourne
6 mai prochain, à e, il donnera entre é et la Mer deux preaméricaines, l'Ecole
Samuel Barber, et ter Piston.

h rentre en effet ce
e, mais pour peu de invité, pour présenter
'est la première fois
tion (1881) que le
y traversera l'Atlanil visitera La Haye, elles, Londres. Ren-
, Munch accueillera uveau à Boston un
de solistes français
dont les pianistes
rucholleric et Nicole oivent les plus beaux
jeune et déjà presti-
ar au delà des mers
as la France.

AURICE LE ROUX.

LES PLUS CÉLÈBRES CHEFS D'ORCHESTRE

L'art de la direction d'orchestre est récent. Jusqu'au début du XIXe siècle l'exécution des œuvres est confiée au compositeur lui-même, qui dirige soit au clavecin, soit avec son archet de violoniste. Les orchestres de cour sont médiocres et les chefs, peu exigeants. Seuls, Lulli et Cannabich, qui a monté à Mannheim un orchestre sélectionné célèbre dans toute l'Europe pour sa qualité, se soucient d'améliorer la qualité technique de leur orchestre. Après 1800 la complexité croissante des partitions exige une spécialisation. On commence à « interpréter ». Aujourd'hui, dégagé des outrances de l'époque romantique, où s'attardent encore Stokowsky, Sebastian et quelques autres, c'est plutôt dans la fidélité absolue à la partition et à la pensée de l'auteur que le chef d'orchestre authentique cherche et découvre le secret d'originalité de son jeu.

JEAN-BAPTISTE LULLI (1633-1687) exige de l'orchestre de l'opéra le respect des « tempos » et de la note écrite. Invente le « coup d'archet » permettant aux violons une attaque franche.

JEAN-PHILIPPE RAMEAU (1683-1764), pendant vingt ans chef d'orchestre de La Popelinière, à Passy. Théoricien et compositeur de génie, il s'applique au renouvellement du coloris orchestral.

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART (1756-1791) dirige ses opéras et ses quarante symphonies. Suivant l'exemple de Cannabich, à Mannheim, il exige nuances et attaques précises.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN (1770-1827), sourd, ne renonce pas à la baguette. Dirige la première exécution de sa « Neuvième ». La complexité de ses partitions suscita des chefs de métier.

FRANÇOIS-ANTOINE HABENECK (1781-1849), premier chef d'orchestre de métier, fonde en 1828 la « Société des Concerts du Conservatoire », où il impressionne Berlioz et Wagner.

HECTOR BERLIOZ (1803-1869), génial orchestrateur, chef passionné et exigeant, dirige à Londres, Moscou et Paris des ensembles de neuf cents et de mille deux cents exécutants.

FÉLIX MENDELSSOHN (1809-1847) révèle Bach au monde. Formé aux disciplines classiques, chef de l'illustre orchestre du Gewandhaus, de Leipzig, il dirige avec conscience et précision.

RICHARD WAGNER (1813-1883) écrit l' « Art de diriger » (1869), premier ouvrage didactique, il s'oppose à la conception de Mendelssohn et annonce la grande tradition allemande.

HANS DE BULOW (1830-1894), type du virtuose romantique. Sillonne l'Europe et l'Amérique, dirige sans partition, passionne le public par des interprétations originales mais discutables.

ARTHUR NIKISCH (1855-1922), d'origine hongroise, prend en 1889 la direction du Boston Symphony. Partout sa plastique et ses dons d'acteur lui assurent des succès sans précédent.

PAUL-FÉLIX WEINGARTNER (1863-1940) ruine les fausses traditions d'interprétation du romantisme allemand. Publie « Uber das Dirigiren », pamphlet dirigé contre les outrances de Bulow.

A MER

e inconnu, dont l'homme, ... d'instru-xploration nouveaux, commence seulement ir la véritable figure et à sonder le mystère.

marines des dix der-de questions inat-réponses nouvelles.
es que l'homme a continental, dont le
it jusqu'alors la base pliquer la répartition ans : les vallées sous-et c'est une nouvelle savants se voient
onsidérait comme un ne scientifique. Telles du Pacifique, appelées
nne de cône, à surface mètres et distant de
: leur origine est inex-
liers démontre qu'il ne
enfin le fond fantôme.
lé par le Commandant-
intercepte les sondages ur et qui descend à le lever du soleil pour découvertes nouvelles.

de l'océanographie. Le ciale devait s'approcher soin vital de connaître courants. L'officier qui lait savoir longtemps
au jour J. Ce caractère cherches actuelles, où il stallation d'un port ne de Port-Jérôme, dans dix ans une montagne
e s'est rempli de galets, avements des sédiments
lement construites au
d'Alger sur 400 mètres
400 tonnes. Or on peut prend la houle en un
es et sa force maximum des marges de sécurité

suffisantes pour qu'elle n'ait pratiquement rien à la France l'a fait déjà pour le port militaire el-Kébir. De la mer et de son sous-sol on peut produits chimiques et des matières premières brome, le magnésium, le pétrole. Privés pendant guerre des potasses de Stassfurt, c'est à la mer
les Alliés les demandèrent. Un procès oppos...
nement fédéral des États-Unis aux États confédé pour la possession des eaux du littoral dont le riche en pétrole (Texas, Louisiane, Californie).

L'exploitation des ressources énergétiques de n'est encore qu'au stade des projets et des études
la priorité est accordée à l'énergie thermique,
la différence de température entre la surface
Des études sont faites près d'Abidjan où, à 4
en mer, dans une fosse de 500 mètres la températ de 28 à 4 degrés. Plus délicate se révèle l'ut marées, bien que le principe en soit très sim gasiner l'eau à marée haute, l'évacuer à travers
à marée basse. Elle réclame aussi des investiss importants. Des projets sont établis pour un
700 mètres sur la Rance qui fournirait 700 millio soit la moitié de Génissiat, et servirait d'es barrer de Cancale à Granville toute la baie du Michel, projet dont on espère 15 milliards d fois plus cette fois qu'à Génissiat. La pêche e ressée au développement de l'océanographie.
qui repère les bancs de poissons par le sonda sons voit aujourd'hui son bénéfice doubler po plus courte de 40 %. Quand les conditions de vi et leurs migrations seront mieux connues, u tation sera possible avec l'établissement de les zones de reproduction.

LES INSTRUMENTS NOUVEAUX

Toutes les études des océanographes d instruments qu'ils ont à leur disposition.
récents de la physique les dotent chaque jo nouveaux. Il n'y a pas si longtemps que pou dage il fallait stopper le navire, descendre e

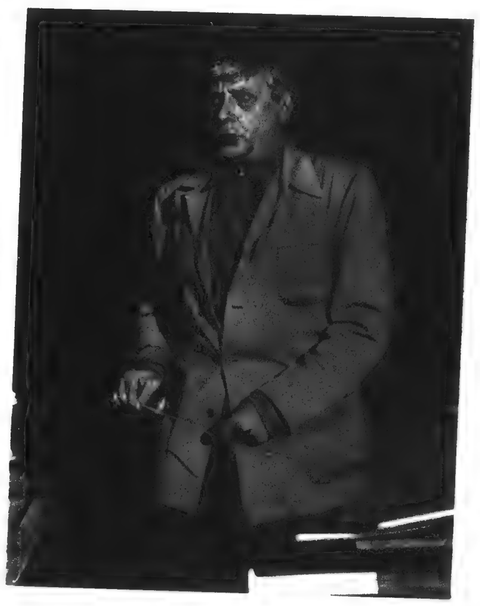
[171]

LA PLASTIQUE harmonieuse et l'originalité des gestes de Charles Munch sont dues à une formation physique combinant la danse hindoue, le sport, les massages et la pratique durant vingt années d'un instrument à archet. Indépendance des bras, mobilité du visage, intensité du regard, toutes les ressources d'expression sont mises en œuvre pour obtenir le maximum de rendement et la sonorité optimum des instrumentistes. Sur ces images, prises au cours d'une répétition de travail, on remarquera la diversité très grande d'attitudes plastiques commandée par l'interprétation des différents passages de l'œuvre musicale en lecture.

chaque génération produit quelques êtres particulièrement doués pour exprimer la musique. Roberto Benzi est indiscutablement de ceux-là. Mais ne nous abusons pas*; il ne faut pas être extrêmement compétent pour faire marcher des orchestres de la qualité de l'Orchestre national ou du Philharmonique de Berlin. Les conventions de gestes pour faire correctement un départ, une levée, un point d'orgue, pour mettre en place des pizzicati ou un accelerando forment un catalogue assez restreint. Autre chose est de faire œuvre de chef d'orchestre, de connaître la signification profonde d'une œuvre, sa forme, son style. Le public, qui, la plupart du temps, est au concert dans l'absolue incapacité de juger une interprétation puisqu'en définitive il ignore la forme, les tempos, les rythmes exacts de l'œuvre, applaudit avant toute chose à la prouesse, au geste acrobatique d'un bambin qui lui transmet une œuvre dont les grandes lignes et les thèmes principaux lui sont familiers et qui, par surcroît, est jouée par les meilleurs instrumentistes du monde. En vérité, on n'est pas chef d'orchestre avant vingt-cinq ou trente ans. Il y a tant de choses à savoir, il y a tant de sentiments intraduisibles par des gestes d'enfant, même, et peut-être surtout, si ces gestes ont été organisés, normalisés, comme c'est le cas pour Benzi, par un grand homme de métier comme Cluytens. Le résultat est prodigieux, mais il faut avoir la patience d'attendre l'époque où l'enfant sera devenu un homme, dont les dons exceptionnels prendront alors toute leur résonance ; je pense à la boutade de Florent Schmitt, qui, d'un ton bourru, murmurait à la sortie d'un concert de l'un de ces prodiges : « Mais il ne joue pas mieux qu'une grande personne ! ».



Au surplus, ce n'est pas seulement au concert que se juge un grand chef d'orchestre, mais dès la première répétition. Comme on s'en doute, avant de se présenter devant un orchestre pour faire travailler une œuvre, il faut la posséder à fond. Mais savoir une partition, ce n'est pas connaître la silhouette d'une œuvre, c'est pouvoir la récrire. Ce travail d'assimilation est un phénomène de mémoire visuelle. Devant une partition inconnue le chef doit se rendre compte, en quelques heures de lecture, de son style, de sa forme, de sa composition : pour les partitions modernes, dont l'écriture est précise, où les tempos sont rigoureusement marqués, où rien n'est laissé au hasard, on ne peut hésiter sur l'interprétation. En revanche, la complexité des agrégations harmoniques, des échafaudages de rythmes et de nuances de la musique moderne exigent de la part du lecteur une faculté de déchiffrage, une attention, une précision visuelle et ensuite une mémoire particulièrement développées. Toutes les difficultés : coups d'archet, carrures, mouvements métronomiques, nuances, seront soulignées et éventuellement grossies pour l'œil au crayon de couleur. Mais au delà de ces détails il y a la signification profonde de l'œuvre. Celle-ci demande encore de longues heures de réflexion.

S'il s'agit d'œuvres classiques, le problème est encore plus compliqué. En effet, outre le fait qu'on est toujours impressionné par l'interprétation d'un maître ou d'un confrère qu'on a longtemps considérée comme idéale, les partitions classiques sont infiniment moins précises d'écriture que les œuvres modernes. A chaque instant se posent des problèmes sur lesquels on disputerait des chaque génération produit quelques êtres particulièrement doués pour exprimer la musique. Roberto Benzi est indiscutablement de ceux-là. Mais ne nous abusons pas*; il ne faut pas être extrêmement compétent pour faire marcher des orchestres de la qualité de l'Orchestre national ou du Philharmonique de Berlin. Les conventions de gestes pour faire correctement un départ, une levée, un point d'orgue, pour mettre en place des pizzicati ou un accelerando forment un catalogue assez restreint. Autre chose est de faire œuvre de chef d'orchestre, de connaître la signification profonde d'une œuvre, sa forme, son style. Le public, qui, la plupart du temps, est au concert dans l'absolue incapacité de juger une interprétation puisqu'en définitive il ignore la forme, les tempos, les rythmes exacts de l'œuvre, applaudit avant toute chose à la prouesse, au geste acrobatique d'un bambin qui lui transmet une œuvre dont les grandes lignes et les thèmes principaux lui sont familiers et qui, par surcroît, est jouée par les meilleurs instrumentistes du monde. En vérité, on n'est pas chef d'orchestre avant cinquante ou trente ans. Il y a tant de choses à savoir, il y a tant de sentiments intraduisibles par des gestes d'enfant, même, et peut-être surtout, si ces gestes ont été organisés, normalisés, comme c'est le cas pour Benzi, par un grand homme de métier comme Cluytens. Le résultat est prodigieux, mais il faut avoir la patience d'attendre l'époque où l'enfant sera devenu un homme, dont les dons exceptionnels prendront alors toute leur résonance ; je pense à la boutade de Florent Schmitt, qui, d'un ton bourru, murmurait à la sortie d'un concert de l'un de ces prodiges : « Mais il ne joue pas mieux qu'une grande personne ! ».

FIN PAGE 100

INFORMATION OBSCURED

LA MER

Un monde inconnu, dont l'homme, armé d'instruments d'exploration nouveaux, commence seulement à découvrir la véritable figure et à sonder le mystère.

CHACUNE des découvertes sous-marines des dix dernières années a posé autant de questions inattendues qu'elle apportait de réponses nouvelles. Telles ces vallées abruptes que l'homme a repérées au flanc du socle continental, dont le caractère uniformément incliné formait jusqu'alors la base solide de la théorie avancée pour expliquer la répartition sur le globe des continents et des océans : les vallées sous-marines ont tout remis en question, et c'est une nouvelle hypothèse, révolutionnaire, que les savants se voient obligés de substituer à ce que l'on considérait comme un des avoirs les plus sûrs du patrimoine scientifique. Telles encore ces cent soixante montagnes du Pacifique, appelées « guyots », dont le sommet est un tronc de cône, à surface entièrement plate, haut de 3.000 mètres et distant de 1.200 mètres de la surface de l'océan : leur origine est inexpliquée, car une série de traits particuliers démontre qu'il ne s'agit pas de véritables volcans. Tel enfin le fond fantôme, observé dans le Pacifique puis signalé par le Commandant-Charcot retour de la Terre Adélie, qui intercepte les sondages sonores à 400 mètres de profondeur et qui descend à raison de 5 mètres par minute avant le lever du soleil pour remonter au crépuscule : autant de découvertes nouvelles, autant d'énigmes.

C'est la guerre qui a eu besoin de l'océanographie. Le sous-marin qui pour une mission spéciale devait s'approcher au plus près des côtes avait un besoin vital de connaître les moindres secrets du relief et des courants. L'officier qui préparait un débarquement voulait savoir longtemps à l'avance quel serait l'état de la mer au jour J. Ce caractère d'utilité a été conservé dans les recherches actuelles, où il vient stimuler la science pure. L'installation d'un port ne peut plus se faire au hasard : celui de Port-Jérôme, dans l'estuaire de la Seine, est devenu en dix ans une montagne de vase, et si celui de Cros-de-Cagne s'est rempli de galets, c'est par méconnaissance des mouvements des sédiments locaux. Les digues ont été généralement construites au jugé : en 1934 la houle renversa celle d'Alger sur 400 mètres et déplaça de 8 mètres des blocs de 400 tonnes. Or on peut étudier les formes particulières que prend la houle en un lieu donné, ses orientations possibles et sa force maximum de façon à dessiner une digue avec des marges de sécurité suffisantes pour qu'elle n'ait pratiquement rien la France l'a fait déjà pour le port militair el-Kébir. De la mer et de son sous-sol on peut produits chimiques et des matières premières
brome, le magnésium, le pétrole. Privés pendant guerre des potasses de Stassfurt, c'est à la mer
les Alliés les demandèrent. Un procès oppos nement fédéral des États-Unis aux États confé pour la possession des eaux du littoral dont le riche en pétrole (Texas, Louisiane, Californie).

L'exploitation des ressources énergétiques de l
n'est encore qu'au stade des projets et des études
la priorité est accordée à l'énergie thermique,
la différence de température entre la surface
Des études sont faites près d'Abidjan où, à 4
en mer, dans une fosse de 500 mètres la températ de 28 à 4 degrés. Plus délicate se révèle l'uti marées, bien que le principe en soit très simp
gasiner l'eau à marée haute, l'évacuer à travers
à marée basse. Elle réclame aussi des investiss importants. Des projets sont établis pour un
700 mètres sur la Rance qui fournirait 700 millio soit la moitié de Génissiat, et servirait d'ess
barrer de Cancale à Granville toute la baie du Michel, projet dont on espère 15 milliards de fois plus cette fois qu'à Génissiat. La pêche en ressée au développement de l'océanographie.
qui repère les bancs de poissons par le sondag sons voit aujourd'hui son bénéfice doubler pou plus courte de 40 %. Quand les conditions de vie et leurs migrations seront mieux connues, u tation sera possible avec l'établissement de r
les zones de reproduction.

LES INSTRUMENTS NOUVEAUX

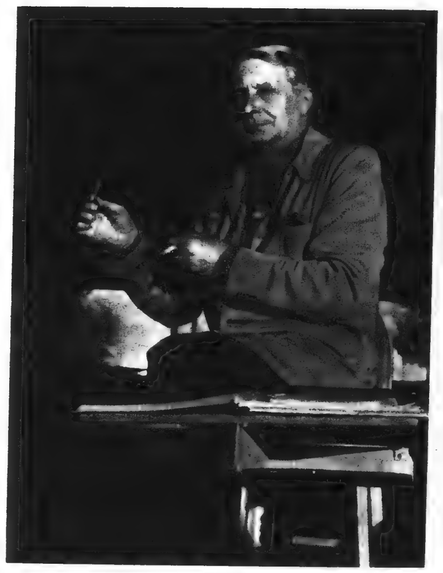
Toutes les études des océanographes dé instruments qu'ils ont à leur disposition. O récents de la physique les dotent chaque jou nouveaux. Il n'y a pas si longtemps que pour dage il fallait stopper le navire, descendre et



LA PLASTIQUE harmonieuse et l'originalité des gestes de Charles Munch sont dues à une formation physique combinant la danse hindoue, le sport, les massages et la pratique durant vingt années d'un instrument à archet. Indépendance des bras, mobilité du visage, intensité du regard, toutes les ressources d'expression sont mises en œuvre pour obtenir le maximum de rendement et la sonorité optimum des instrumentistes. Sur ces images, prises au cours d'une répétition de travail, on remarquera la diversité très grande d'attitudes plastiques commandée par l'interprétation des différents passages de l'œuvre musicale en lecture.

an fèr un sig mi les Ja
co tic
Bé
Sa
M da
D ma et tiv
Br
ve
M ré de so m qu
qu
l'é po
L' di d' as ét
qu
m
Ce
so à m d' cla
de co fo tru nu l'a po l'œ rev au ab
esp pri ab
ser
Ur ma
co vér
vir Sy d'u qu
mu plu res me ch qu
de reg ma
ser
«
mei dev rép con troi sou tou inté
tion

chaque génération produit quelques êtres particulièrement doués pour exprimer la musique. Roberto Benzi est indiscutablement de ceux-là. Mais ne nous abusons pas ; il ne faut pas être extrêmement compétent pour faire marcher des orchestres de la qualité de l'Orchestre national ou du Philharmonique de Berlin. Les conventions de gestes pour faire correctement un départ, une levée, un point d'orgue, pour mettre en place des pizzicati ou un accelerando forment un catalogue assez restreint. Autre chose est de faire œuvre de chef d'orchestre, de connaître la signification profonde d'une œuvre, sa forme, son style. Le public, qui, la plupart du temps, est au concert dans l'absolue incapacité de juger une interprétation puisqu'en définitive il ignore la forme, les tempos, les rythmes exacts de l'œuvre, applaudit avant toute chose à la prouesse, au geste acrobatique d'un bambin qui lui transmet une œuvre dont les grandes lignes thèmes principaux lui sont familiers et qui, par sur est jouée par les meilleurs instrumentistes du mond vérité, on n'est pas chef d'orchestre avant vingt-cin trente ans. Il y a tant de choses à savoir, il y a tan sentiments intraduisibles par des gestes d'enfant, m et peut-être surtout, si ces gestes ont été organisés, malisés, comme c'est le cas pour Benzi, par un grand ho de métier comme Cluytens. Le résultat est prodig mais il faut avoir la patience d'attendre l'époque où l'e sera devenu un homme, dont les dons exceptio prendront alors toute leur résonance ; je pense à la bou de Florent Schmitt, qui, d'un ton bourru, murmura la sortie d'un concert de l'un de ces prodiges : « M ne joue pas mieux qu'une grande personne ! ».

[171]

LA MER

Un monde inconnu, dont l'homme, armé d'instruments d'exploration nouveaux, commence seulement à découvrir la véritable figure et à sonder le mystère.

écouvertes sous-marines des dix der- a posé autant de questions inat- lle apportait de réponses nouvelles. vallées abruptes que l'homme a flanc du socle continental, dont le t incliné formait jusqu'alors la base vancée pour expliquer la répartition ents et des océans : les vallées sous- s en question, et c'est une nouvelle naire, que les savants se voient à ce que l'on considérait comme un s du patrimoine scientifique. Telles te montagnes du Pacifique, appelées mmet est un tronc de cône, à surface ut de 3.000 mètres et distant de face de l'océan : leur origine est inex- e traits particuliers démontre qu'il ne volcans. Tel enfin le fond fantôme, que puis signalé par le Commandant- rre Adélie, qui intercepte les sondages de profondeur et qui descend à minute avant le lever du soleil pour e : autant de découvertes nouvelles, a eu besoin de l'océanographie. Le e mission spéciale devait s'approcher avait un besoin vital de connaître relief et des courants. L'officier qui nement voulait savoir longtemps tat de la mer au jour J. Ce caractère dans les recherches actuelles, où il ce pure. L'installation d'un port ne asard : celui de Port-Jérôme, dans st devenu en dix ans une montagne Cros-de-Cagne s'est rempli de galets, nce des mouvements des sédiments t été généralement construites au renversa celle d'Alger sur 400 mètres des blocs de 400 tonnes. Or on peut iculières que prend la houle en un tions possibles et sa force maximum e digue avec des marges de sécurité suffisantes pour qu'elle n'ait pratiquement rien la France l'a fait déjà pour le port militair el-Kébir. De la mer et de son sous-sol on peut produits chimiques et des matières premières brome, le magnésium, le pétrole. Privés pendant guerre des potasses de Stassfurt, c'est à la mer les Alliés les demandèrent. Un procès oppos nement fédéral des États-Unis aux États confé pour la possession des eaux du littoral dont le riche en pétrole (Texas, Louisiane, Californie).

L'exploitation des ressources énergétiques de l n'est encore qu'au stade des projets et des études la priorité est accordée à l'énergie thermique. la différence de température entre la surface Des études sont faites près d'Abidjan où, à 4 en mer, dans une fosse de 500 mètres la températu de 28 à 4 degrés. Plus délicate se révèle l'uti marées, bien que le principe en soit très simp gasiner l'eau à marée haute, l'évacuer à travers à marée basse. Elle réclame aussi des investiss importants. Des projets sont établis pour un 700 mètres sur la Rance qui fournirait 700 millio soit la moitié de Génissiat, et servirait d'ess barrer de Cancale à Granville toute la baie du Michel, projet dont on espère 15 milliards de fois plus cette fois qu'à Génissiat. La pêche en ressée au développement de l'océanographie. qui repère les bancs de poissons par le sondag sons voit aujourd'hui son bénéfice doubler pou plus courte de 40 %. Quand les conditions de vie et leurs migrations seront mieux connues, u tation sera possible avec l'établissement de r les zones de reproduction.

LES INSTRUMENTS NOUVEAUX

Toutes les études des océanographes dép instruments qu'ils ont à leur disposition. O récents de la physique les dotent chaque jou nouveaux. Il n'y a pas si longtemps que pour dage il fallait stopper le navire, descendre et années sans résultat. Les éditions diffèrent, des nuances sont mal notées, un accent peut être pris pour un signe diminuendo (exemple : le premier accord de l'ouverture d'Egmont), les tempos sont difficiles à établir. Jamais un chef d'orchestre n'a pu se conformer, par exemple, aux indications métronomiques marquées par Beethoven en tête de ses symphonies. Sans doute l'appareil inventé par Maëlzel — ami de Beethoven cependant — n'était-il pas encore au point. De toute façon, les mouvements marqués sont toujours trop rapides et ne donnent qu'une indication relative, d'un morceau à l'autre. Chez Brahms, aucune indication de mouvement en tête des partitions ; chez Mozart ou Bach, à fortiori, aucune référence, sinon le maximum d'agilité des violonistes, ou le maximum de souffle des flûtistes. Assez artificiellement une sorte de tradition s'établit qui vraisemblablement ne représente que de très loin l'interprétation de l'époque. Un problème semblable se pose à propos de l'instrumentation. L'orchestre de Beethoven était très différent de celui de notre temps : d'abord les instrumentistes jouaient assez mal, ensuite le quatuor à cordes était beaucoup moins important en quantité, enfin les instruments chromatiques en cuivre étaient inconnus. Cela explique que certains équilibres sonores soient actuellement difficiles à réaliser si l'on respecte scrupuleusement les nuances de l'auteur. En d'autres termes, jamais une œuvre classique, par exemple une Symphonie de Beethoven, n'est jouée exactement comme elle est écrite. Ici il faut renforcer un timbre en doublant un instrument, là il faut atténuer une nuance ou aggraver un tempo. Tout l'art du grand chef d'orchestre est de posséder suffisamment le style de l'œuvre qu'il interprète pour que ces revisions passent inaperçues et soient au service de la musique. Il faut aborder les œuvres classiques dans un esprit d'honnêteté intellectuelle, de prudence respectueuse, de soumission absolue. Des années de travail n'épuiseront pas la matière de ces œuvres. Un maître tel que Carl Schuricht, malgré ses soixante-cinq ans et sa connaissance rare de l'œuvre beethovénienne, aime à répéter qu'il a encore vingt ans de travail sur la Neuvième Symphonie. Que penser en revanche d'un Stokowsky, moins scrupuleux, qui attire à lui les beautés d'une musique, réorchestre à sa façon les plus grands chefs-d'œuvre et ne s'intéresse qu'aux effets qui pourront mettre en valeur la beauté de sa chevelure ou la finesse de ses mains, qu'il sait admirables. L'essentiel est de repenser une œuvre, de la replacer dans son cadre historique, mais en lui redonnant la vie. C'est, semble-t-il, le véritable sens du mot « tradition ».

CHARLES MUNCH

(FIN de la page 85)

La partition et l'œuvre complètement assimilées, le chef se présente devant son orchestre pour la première répétition. En général, pour un concert il y a trois répétitions de trois heures, dont une « générale », souvent publique, dans laquelle en tout cas le programme se déroule intégralement sans autres corrections que de nuances. Autrement dit, les œuvres inscrites au programme doivent être montées en cinq heures et demie, les musiciens n'emportant jamais, par principe, la musique chez eux, et si l'on tient compte pour chaque répétition du quart d'heure de pause, syndicalement obligatoire. Il faut donc faire vite et savoir obtenir en un minimum de temps le maximum de choses. Toutes les méthodes sont bonnes et chaque chef a la sienne. Charles Munch le plus souvent fait répéter par larges fragments les œuvres du programme. D'autres chefs s'attacheront principalement à des détails difficiles, des équilibres de plans, des changements de tempo. C'est là qu'il faut utiliser toutes les conventions d'exécution, des battues claires, trouver naturellement des gestes de bras, des jeux de physionomie efficaces, des images susceptibles de faire comprendre aux instrumentistes le plus rapidement possible l'expression désirée. Dans ce domaine Munch excelle. Il sait donner confiance à ses musiciens, détendre l'atmosphère, ne pas fatiguer ses hommes, les réprimander ou les féliciter quand il faut, s'excuser de ses propres mouvements d'humeur. Si l'on compare les répétitions d'un Munch à celles des autres grands chefs, il semble que l'on soit frappé avant tout par l'atmosphère détendue qui règne sur le plateau. A la Société des Concerts, il laissait une certaine souplesse dans la discipline des horaires, il autorisait même les instrumentistes à fumer discrètement. Il savait que, s'adressant à des artistes français, il faut compter avec un certain nombre de défauts qui font partie du patrimoine national, mais qu'en revanche on peut exiger certaine sonorité admirable, certain prodige technique. D'autres chefs étrangers s'habituent parfois fort mal au désordre et au bruit qui règnent sur nos plateaux de répétition ; il faut voir un Kleiber, un Karajan s'en plaindre, parfois assez rudement, accoutumés qu'ils sont à la ponctualité, au respect, à la gravité silencieuse des orchestres de leur pays. La connaissance des hommes, le sens psychologique est essentiel dans ce métier éminemment social. Il faut savoir compter avec la susceptibilité des instrumentistes. Chaque groupe n'accepte pas les observations de la même façon ; on peut réprimander violemment les cordes, qui sont en nombre, chacun attribuant à son voisin de pupitre une observation qui lui est destinée ; les « bois » sont des solistes délicats, sensibles, qui comprennent les choses ; les « cuivres » sont des sanguins, nerveux et violents, ils ont conscience de leur supériorité sonore sur les autres groupes, ce sont des hommes qu'il faut ménager, il faut savoir leur parler.

Charles Munch possède le don de parler à l'orchestre. En répétition, les plaisanteries, les explications analytiques ou philosophiques agacent les instrumentistes ; il faut exprimer par des gestes et trouver le mot qui fera image. Ainsi Munch, montant pour la première fois sur le podium du Boston Symphony : il regarda longuement ses musiciens, qui, dans l'attente d'un discours de bienvenue, avaient la gorge serrée d'émotion ; après un silence il sourit et dit simplement : « Et maintenant... relax ».

Véritable metteur en scène, le chef d'orchestre doit posséder une oreille infaillible, des gestes efficaces, une volonté de fer, un œil précis, une mémoire sans défaut. C'est sans doute cette dernière qualité qui étonne le plus le mélomane. Karajan, Schuricht, Sabata, Mitropoulos font toutes les répétitions, quelles que soient les œuvres qu'ils travaillent, sans la moindre partition sous les yeux. Munch, comme Furtwaengler, Toscanini et bien d'autres, s'y réfère au contraire volontiers, préférant la simplicité de ce geste à la tricherie qu'entrainerait une éventuelle défaillance de mémoire, toujours possible.

Cependant, au concert le chef doit être libre, libre d'exprimer la musique même et la pensée fondamentale de l'auteur. La partition n'est donc plus ici qu'une gêne comme sans doute le sera bientôt la fine baguette, héritière du solide « bâton de mesure » en ébène et ivoire (avec diapason facultatif à l'intérieur...) des Habeneck et des Hainl que Cluytens et Mitropoulos n'utilisent déjà plus. Au concert le rôle du metteur en scène est terminé, celui de l'acteur commence. L'œuvre est en place, parfaitement préparée ; certes le chef ne doit cesser de veiller que l'ordre des choses ne soit pas dérangé, que les musiciens qui ont soixante mesures à compter fassent leur entrée au bon moment, que les plans de la polyphonie soient harmonieusement équilibrés. Mais il ne doit pas faire une « démonstration » de l'œuvre, ni enseigner celle-ci, ni montrer qu'il l'a bien apprise ; il doit la recréer et la « faire passer » dans le public. Or les gestes qu'un chef doit faire pour qu'un orchestre marche ne sont pas nécessairement ceux qui exprimeront la musique et la communiqueront au public. Comme dans le métier d'acteur, aucune règle n'est formelle. Chaque grand chef d'orchestre a ses moyens physiques personnels, selon sa taille, sa force musculaire, pour parvenir à l'expression de l'œuvre qui l'habite. J'ai vu Karajan diriger une partition entière sans ouvrir les yeux et créer de cette manière une tension extraordinaire dans le jeu des instrumentistes. Tout le monde connaît la célèbre main gauche de Furtwaengler qui dans les passages expressifs est agitée d'un tremblement nerveux incessant, analogue au vibrato des grands solistes noirs de jazz, et qui reflète bien l'animation intérieure du grand chef allemand. La plastique de Munch est d'une beauté merveilleuse. Cet homme de 1 m. 90, aux épaules larges, à la taille fine, a préparé son corps par la pratique des sports, la rythmique hindoue, les massages à savoir exprimer les moindres nuances de la pensée musicale. Il possède une absolue indépendance des bras, l'articulation des coudes est effacée, le poignet souple, les doigts sont expressifs. Son buste est mobile au-dessus de l'immuable socle de ses pieds joints. Peu de chefs possèdent ou ont acquis cette aisance. Au cours d'une exécution son visage s'anime ; il souffle pendant les pianissimi, il chante aux passages particulièrement expressifs, il hurle dans les fortissimi. Il dépense une énergie incroyable et se donne avec une générosité absolue tout en gardant authentique son émotion et harmonieux ses gestes.

Le miracle de la plastique de Munch, c'est qu'elle varie selon les œuvres qu'il interprète. Personne autant que lui ne possède la variété d'expression, la conscience du style des musiques qu'il conduit. On l'a vu interpréter de longs fragments d'œuvres classiques dans une immobilité à peu près absolue, soucieux seulement de communiquer au public la sensation d'équilibre et de pureté classique qu'il ressentait, et un moment après, conduire la Valse de Ravel avec le maximum d'expansion physique. Sans doute un chef d'orchestre peut-il diriger la musique de toutes les époques, mais, comme les acteurs, les chefs ont des affinités avec certains langages et certains styles. On verrait difficilement Furtwaengler conduire du Debussy, qui serait sans doute trop lourd et toujours dans un tempo trop lent, comme on verrait mal un chef d'orchestre français donner d'une symphonie de Bruckner l'interprétation idéale.

Toujours est-il que Munch excelle dans l'interprétation de la musique française. Roussel, Berlioz, Ravel, sous ses doigts prennent une signification éclatante. Il aime aussi les grandes œuvres chorales : les Passions, de Bach, et l'Oratorio de Noël, le Requiem, de Berlioz ; la Messe en sol majeur, de Schubert ; la Missa Solemnis, de Beethoven ; Jeanne au Bûcher et la Danse des Morts d'Honegger, et ce Martyre de Saint Sébastien, de Debussy, dont la reprise en 1942 coûta 300.000 francs à la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, mais qui demeure l'une des plus admirables soirées musicales de Charles Munch. D'autre part, de sa formation d'Alsacien protestant il est resté un goût passionné pour la musique de Bach. Sait-on que sur les trois cent soixante concerts qu'il dirigea à la Société entre 1937 et 1947 figurèrent soixante-sept fois les Concertos Brandebourgeois et une audition intégrale de l'Art de la Fugue qui reste célèbre. La musique contemporaine l'attire, mais il ne s'en est pas fait une spécialité, comme un Scherchen, un Markewitch, un Assermet, un Désormière. En France il fit acclamer plusieurs fois les noms de Messiaen, d'Honegger, de Milhaud, de Strawinsky, de Bartok. Aujourd'hui, chef de l'un des premiers orchestres d'outre-Atlantique, c'est principalement vers la musique contemporaine américaine qu'il tourne ses regards. Le 6 mai prochain, à l'Opéra de Paris, il donnera entre Daphnis et Chloé et la Mer deux premières auditions américaines, l'Ecstatic du Scandale, de Samuel Barber et Toccata, de Walter Piston.

Charles Munch rentre en effet ce mois-ci en Europe, mais pour peu de temps et comme invité, pour présenter son orchestre. C'est la première fois depuis sa fondation (1881) que le Boston Symphony traversera l'Atlantique. Après Paris il visitera La Haye, Amsterdam, Bruxelles, Londres. Rentré aux U. S. A., Munch accueillera sans doute à nouveau à Boston un certain nombre de solistes français qu'il affectionne, dont les pianistes Monique de la Bruchollerie et Nadine Henriot, qui lui doivent les plus beaux moments de leur jeune et déjà prestigieuse carrière. Car au delà des mers Munch n'oublie pas la France.

MAURICE LE ROUX

Boston Symphony Back in Paris; Tour Success

PARIS (AP)—The Boston [illegible] arrived in [illegible] tonight.

[illegible] orchestra, led by [illegible] has been received [illegible] West European [illegible] has played in [illegible] Amsterdam. The [illegible] Frankfort and Berlin [illegible] Strasbourg, [illegible] France.

[illegible] Saturday the orchestra [illegible] at the annual [illegible] festival and next [illegible] its final appearance [illegible] garden concert [illegible]

[illegible] concert, which includes [illegible] Symphonie Fantastique [illegible] Brahms Symphony [illegible] under the auspices [illegible] Communist Confederation [illegible] Freedom.

[illegible] trade unions, [illegible] businesses and workmen [illegible] encouraged to purchase [illegible] selling at 13 cents [illegible]

20 Curtain Calls for Charles Munch As Symphony Plays Again in Paris

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theater des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

The orchestra is leaving for Bordeaux to play concerts May 23 and May 24 and then will go to London where it is scheduled to give a concert in the festival music hall May 26.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston from 1919 to 1924 and recently retired as conductor of Sa nFrancisco Symphony is associate conductor on this trip.

The orchestra's tour—first time is has crossed the Atlantic since it was founded 71 years ago—has been an enormous success. It has played to packed houses all along the route.

Tonight's concert attracted a capacity house of French music lovers anxious t ohear it play a classical program. Its two previous performances were of works by twentieth century composers.

The orchestra demonstrated its superb quality in both compositions.

The Symphonie Fantastique was written in 1830 for an English actress, Henriette Smithson, whom Berlioz was wooing without success. Miss Smithson was cold at the first playing in 1831, but a year later, at its second, she gave in. He married her.

APR 26 1952

Munch und die Bostoner Symphoniker

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester wird unter Leitung seines Dirigenten Charles Munch am 13. Mai in Frankfurt und am 15. Mai in Berlin gastieren.

Im Jahre 1881 gründete Henry Higginson das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. Er sammelte sechzig ausgebildete Instrumentalisten und lud den jungen Sänger, Komponisten und Dirigenten Georg Henschel aus London ein, die Leitung dieses neugebildeten Ensembles zu übernehmen. Das erste Programm der Bostoner Symphoniker — am Samstag, dem 22. Oktober 1881 — bestand ausschließlich aus Werken deutscher Klassik und Romantik.

Siebzig Jahre sind seitdem vergangen. Unter der Leitung bedeutender Dirigenten, unter dem Einfluß verschiedener musikalischer Persönlichkeiten hat sich das Orchester zu einem Instrument entwickelt, dessen Möglichkeiten nach allen Seiten hin erprobt und ausgebildet sind. Durch seine musikalischen Leiter stand das Orchester ständig unter dem Einfluß bester europäischer Tradition: Nach dem Ungarn Nikisch, der sich in Leipzig die ersten Lorbeeren erworben hatte, betrat der kultivierte, elegante Operndirigent Karl Muck aus Berlin das Dirigentenpult. Ihm folgten, nach einer kurzen Uebergangszeit unter dem Pariser Komponisten Henri Robaud, der geduldige, unermüdliche Arbeiter Pierre Monteux, bekannt als Dirigent von Serge Diaghileffs Ballet Russe. Nach ihm führte der virtuose Russe Koussevitzky 25 Jahre lang den Stab, den er vor drei Jahren Charles Munch aus Straßburg übergab.

Munch stammt nicht nur aus einem hochmusikalischen Elternhaus, sondern — wie Albert Schweitzer — auch aus einem Land, das durch seine glücklich-unglückliche Lage gleichermaßen Anteil an der französischen wie an der deutschen Musikliteratur hat. Er spielte Violine bei Lucien Capet in Paris und fand sich bei Ausbruch des ersten Weltkrieges in der deutschen Armee. Nach dem Krieg setzte er sein Studium unter Flesch in Berlin fort und wurde Konzertmeister im Leipziger Gewandhausorchester unter Furtwängler und Bruno Walter. 1929 ließ er sich in Paris nieder, gründete das Orchestre Symphonique de Paris und begab sich auf eine Reihe erfolgreicher Tourneen als Gastdirigent. 1937 übernahm er das Orchester des Pariser Konservatoriums. Für jeden Dirigenten hätte es ein Problem bedeutet, der Nachfolger eines Koussevitzky zu werden. Charles Munch aber erwarb sich Anerkennung und Zuneigung des Orchesters und des Publikums.

Im Januar 1950 erschien das Dreigestirn der Bostoner Dirigenten zum letzten Male gemeinsam in der traditionellen Konzerthalle: neben Munch als Gastdirigenten Pierre Monteux und Koussevitzky. A. D.

Boston Symphony Back in Paris; Tour Success

PARIS (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Paris for a concert tonight.

The 105-piece orchestra, led by Charles Munch, has been received favorably on its first European tour. The orchestra has played in The Hague and Amsterdam, The Netherlands; Frankfort and Berlin, Germany and Strasbourg, Metz and Lyon, France.

Friday and Saturday the orchestra will play at the annual Bordeaux music festival and next Monday it makes its final appearance in a Covent Garden concert in London.

Tonight's concert, which includes Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony Number 4, will be under the auspices of the anti-Communist Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The French free trade unions will be co-sponsors and workmen will be permitted to purchase seats at prices starting at 43 cents and up.

20 Curtain Calls for Charles Munch As Symphony Plays Again in Paris

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theater des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

The orchestra is leaving for Bordeaux to play concerts May 23 and May 24 and then will go to London where it is scheduled to give a concert in the festival music hall May 26.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston from 1919 to 1924 and recently retired as conductor of Sa nFrancisco Symphony is associate conductor on this trip.

The orchestra's tour—first time is has crossed the Atlantic since it was founded 71 years ago—has been an enormous success. It has played to packed houses all along the route.

Tonight's concert attracted a capacity house of French music lovers anxious t ohear it play a classical program. Its two previous performances were of works by twentieth century composers.

The orchestra demonstrated its superb quality in both compositions.

The Symphonie Fantastique was written in 1830 for an English actress, Henriette Smithson, whom Berlioz was wooing without success. Miss Smithson was cold at the first playing in 1831, but a year later, at its second, she gave in. He married her.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ARCHIVE

APR 26 1952

Munch und die Bostoner Symphoniker

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester wird unter Leitung seines Dirigenten Charles Munch am 13. Mai in Frankfurt und am 15. Mai in Berlin gastieren.

Im Jahre 1881 gründete Henry Higginson das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. Er sammelte sechzig ausgebildete Instrumentalisten und lud den jungen Sänger, Komponisten und Dirigenten Georg Henschel aus London ein, die Leitung dieses neugebildeten Ensembles zu übernehmen. Das erste Programm der Bostoner Symphoniker — am Samstag, dem 22. Oktober 1881 — bestand ausschließlich aus Werken deutscher Klassik und Romantik.

Siebzig Jahre sind seitdem vergangen. Unter der Leitung bedeutender Dirigenten, unter dem Einfluß verschiedener musikalischer Persönlichkeiten hat sich das Orchester zu einem Instrument entwickelt, dessen Möglichkeiten nach allen Seiten hin erprobt und ausgebildet sind. Durch seine musikalischen Leiter stand das Orchester ständig unter dem Einfluß bester europäischer Tradition: Nach dem Ungarn Nikisch, der sich in Leipzig die ersten Lorbeeren erworben hatte, betrat der kultivierte, elegante Operndirigent Karl Muck aus Berlin das Dirigentenpult. Ihm folgten, nach einer kurzen Uebergangszeit unter dem Pariser Komponisten Henri Robaud, der geduldige, unermüdliche Arbeiter Pierre Monteux, bekannt als Dirigent von Serge Diaghileffs Ballet Russe. Nach ihm führte der virtuose Russe Koussevitzky 25 Jahre lang den Stab, den er vor drei Jahren Charles Munch aus Straßburg übergab.

Munch stammt nicht nur aus einem hochmusikalischen Elternhaus, sondern — wie Albert Schweitzer — auch aus einem Land, das durch seine glücklich-unglückliche Lage gleichermaßen Anteil an der französischen wie an der deutschen Musikliteratur hat. Er spielte Violine bei Lucien Capet in Paris und fand sich bei Ausbruch des ersten Weltkrieges in der deutschen Armee. Nach dem Krieg setzte er sein Studium unter Flesch in Berlin fort und wurde Konzertmeister im Leipziger Gewandhausorchester unter Furtwängler und Bruno Walter. 1929 ließ er sich in Paris nieder, gründete das Orchestre Symphonique de Paris und begab sich auf eine Reihe erfolgreicher Tourneen als Gastdirigent. 1937 übernahm er das Orchester des Pariser Konservatoriums. Für jeden Dirigenten hätte es ein Problem bedeutet, der Nachfolger eines Koussevitzky zu werden. Charles Munch aber erwarb sich Anerkennung und Zuneigung des Orchesters und des Publikums.

Im Januar 1950 erschien das Dreigestirn der Bostoner Dirigenten zum letzten Male gemeinsam in der traditionellen Konzerthalle: neben Munch als Gastdirigenten Pierre Monteux und Koussevitzky. A. D.

[172]

QUE LE MAI PARISIEN SOIT CELUI DE LA PENSÉE LIBRE

Figaro Littéraire — 17-3-52

PAR THIERRY MAULNIER

TOUT annonce que l'exposition, « L'Œuvre du vingtième siècle », organisée sous les auspices du Congrès pour la liberté de la culture, sera une éclatante manifestation de la vitalité artistique de notre siècle. C'est la première fois, à ce qu'il semble, qu'est organisé à Paris un aussi somptueux rassemblement de tout ce que l'esprit de nos contemporains a produit de meilleur dans les diverses disciplines de la création artistique : peinture, musique, danse, plus de cinquante compositeurs d'Auric à Hindemith et d'Alban Berg à Honegger, les chefs d'orchestre les plus illustres du monde, Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud et Benjamin Britten dirigeant eux-mêmes leurs œuvres, les ouvrages des peintres les plus illustres amenés de tous les coins du monde, Faulkner à la Sorbonne, Gottfried Benn, Curtius, Madariaga, Piovene, Silone, Rosamond Lehmann, André Malraux...

Paris, la plus digne sans doute entre toutes les villes d'accueillir semblable concile, se montrera vraiment en ce mois de mai dans sa gloire et dans son bonheur de capitale des esprits. M'est-il permis, en cette occasion grandiose, de faire trois vœux — le nombre de vœux permis étant borné à trois depuis les contes de fées ?

Le premier de ces vœux est que l'exposition de « L'Œuvre du vingtième siècle » devienne au sens propre du terme une solennité, qu'elle soit désormais reproduite chaque année avec le même éclat. Le mot de « festival » a été, je crois, prononcé à son propos.

La première tasse de thé, à Orly : Stravinsky arrive à Paris, en compagnie de sa femme, pour participer à « L'Œuvre du XXe siècle ».
(Photo Billeaut, exclusivité Figaro Littéraire.)

Il serait bon, en effet, il serait utile et magnifique, qu'il y eût désormais un festival de Paris et que ce festival, que ce « mai parisien » fût celui de la pensée libre, de la pensée qui veut rester libre et qui témoigne de la liberté, pour la liberté, dans la liberté, de la manière la plus naturelle : comme l'arbre, en portant ses fruits.

Le second vœu serait que la manifestation dont il s'agit trouve au cours des années qui vont venir — et peut-être dès cette année, s'il en est temps encore — un plus exact équilibre. Le programme qu'on nous a communiqué est magnifique, mais il est incomplet.

La part de la musique et des ballets — une manifestation grandiose chaque jour, pendant un mois — y semble disproportionnée, comparée à celle de la littérature — quatre ou cinq conférences ou débats publics dans les salons du « Centre de relations internationales » après une inauguration plus majestueuse à la Sorbonne. Il semble que rien, ou presque rien, n'ait été prévu touchant les activités scientifiques. Les physiciens, les sociologues, les psychologues, les biologistes du monde libre ne devraient-ils pas, eux aussi, être appelés à se rencontrer ? On me dira peut-être que la science est un tout autre domaine, et que les savants ont leurs congrès. Mais comment séparer la sociologie de la civilisation, des arts, des techniques éducatrices ? Du moins, l'architecture et l'urbanisme devraient-ils avoir leur place dans l'exposition de l'œuvre du vingtième siècle ; et aussi l'art cinématographique, en dépit de la concurrence des festivals de plage.

Je n'ai pas encore nommé le théâtre : c'est pourtant l'absence de toute manifestation de l'art dramatique au programme de « L'Œuvre du vingtième siècle » qui me paraît la plus criante. Les Noces de Perlimpin et de Bélise, un charmant divertissement en un acte de Lorca, mis en scène par Yves Robert, pour représenter un demi-siècle de théâtre occidental, de Claudel à Camus, de Pirandello à Synge, de Shaw à Tennessee Williams, c'est vraiment assez mince.

Il est difficile d'oublier que l'art dramatique est une des formes privilégiées de l'expression artistique au vingtième siècle, qu'il unit les recherches des arts plastiques et les soucis de la pensée militante, les activités du poète et celles du philosophe, qu'il a séduit les plus illustres écrivains de ce temps. Rien n'était plus aisé, semble-t-il, que de l'inclure, avec des œuvres représentatives et des mises en scène représentatives, françaises et étrangères, au programme de « L'Œuvre du vingtième siècle ». Qu'il n'en ait pas été ainsi est surprenant, presque choquant.

Thierry Maulnier.

(Lire la suite en 4e page.)

Que le Mai parisien soit celui de la pensée libre

(SUITE DE LA PREMIERE PAGE)

MAIS voici le troisième vœu, qui eût dû être le premier : que « L'Œuvre du vingtième siècle », au cours des prochaines années, garde sur ses manifestations la marque des graves soucis qui lui ont donné naissance, qu'elle continue d'affirmer sa filiation à ce Congrès pour la liberté de la culture dont elle est issue. Que ce haut témoignage de l'activité artistique désintéressée n'en vienne pas à favoriser la confusion entre le désintéressement et le dilettantisme.

Nous avons appris, si nous l'avions oublié, que dans une époque comme la nôtre la liberté de l'artiste, comme toute liberté, est un bien qui se défend. Face aux disciplines totalitaires, la pensée occidentale est aujourd'hui fortement engagée dans les devoirs que lui impose la sauvegarde de son propre exercice et du climat de civilisation qui constitue pour elle le seul air respirable. Qu'on m'entende bien. Je ne prétends pas que la pensée libre soit irréductiblement solidaire de tel système d'institutions, de telle forme de société. L'histoire nous montre, par de nombreux exemples, que les plus hautes activités spirituelles ont prospéré parfois dans des disciplines étroites, sous l'effet de commandes précises, et — tout au moins en ce qui concerne les arts plastiques — dans la soumission quasi unanime à certaines vérités ou à certaines erreurs. Il peut se faire que la pensée se fortifie par l'acceptation des contraintes, ou dans la lutte contre les contraintes et l'effort pour leur échapper. Ce qui ne s'est jamais produit, et ce qui ne peut se produire, c'est que l'écrivain ou l'artiste puissent tirer d'eux-mêmes quelque œuvre digne de ce nom dans l'obéissance prudente ou terrifiée aux consignes d'une doctrine d'Etat. Il y a incompatibilité absolue entre la possibilité même d'une création artistique et la surveillance policière de l'artiste. La liberté intellectuelle est désormais, et sera sans doute aussi longtemps que nous vivrons, une liberté menacée. Menacée par le géant totalitaire qui, comme le mancenillier des légendes, tue ce qu'il touche de son ombre. Menacée par le contrôle bureaucratique. Menacée par la peur. Nous ne la connaîtrons jamais joyeuse, insouciante. Je ne veux pas dire que les écrivains, les artistes du proche avenir soient condamnés à ne produire que des [illegible] Mais il faudra bien qu'[illegible] ou d'une autre — [illegible] témoignant par [illegible] de la protestation [illegible] l'histoire qui [illegible] — [illegible] portent [illegible] combat [illegible] dans le [illegible] temps [illegible]

Non, [illegible] occidentale [illegible] un festival [illegible] tres comme [illegible] naître des [illegible] charges [illegible] règlement [illegible] de, on [illegible] que pour [illegible] nisme et [illegible] russe : d'[illegible] complice [illegible] contre les [illegible] pour « [illegible] tique de [illegible] maladie [illegible] prouver [illegible] ce : de [illegible] pour pe[illegible] moustach[illegible] Devant [illegible] l'atroc[illegible] de défi[illegible] tiste, de [illegible] ne soit [illegible] tout cou[illegible]

Thierry Ma[illegible]

GRAPOUILLOT
Directeur
GALTIER-BOISSIERE
Numéros spéciaux :
LA SEXUALITE [illegible]
MONDE : 400 fr. [illegible]
VERS LES AGES [illegible]
HISTOIRE DE [illegible]
2.000 fr. — PARIS [illegible]
800 fr. ; luxe 1.200 [illegible]
D'ARGOT : [illegible] 1.500 fr.
GIE DE LA [illegible]
975 fr. ; luxe 1.800 fr.
LIBRAIRIE GRAPOUILLOT
3, Place de la Sorbonne
Paris Ve — Tél. ODÉ. 87-91 — C. P. 417-98

TIGHT BINDING

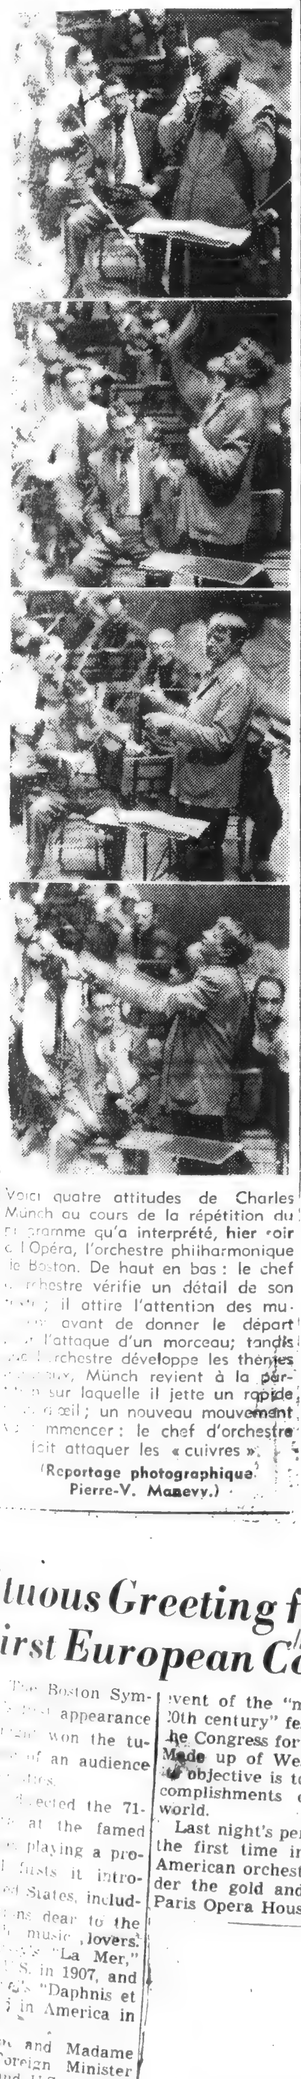
12

LE FIGARO

7 MAI 1952

Dernière minute parisienne

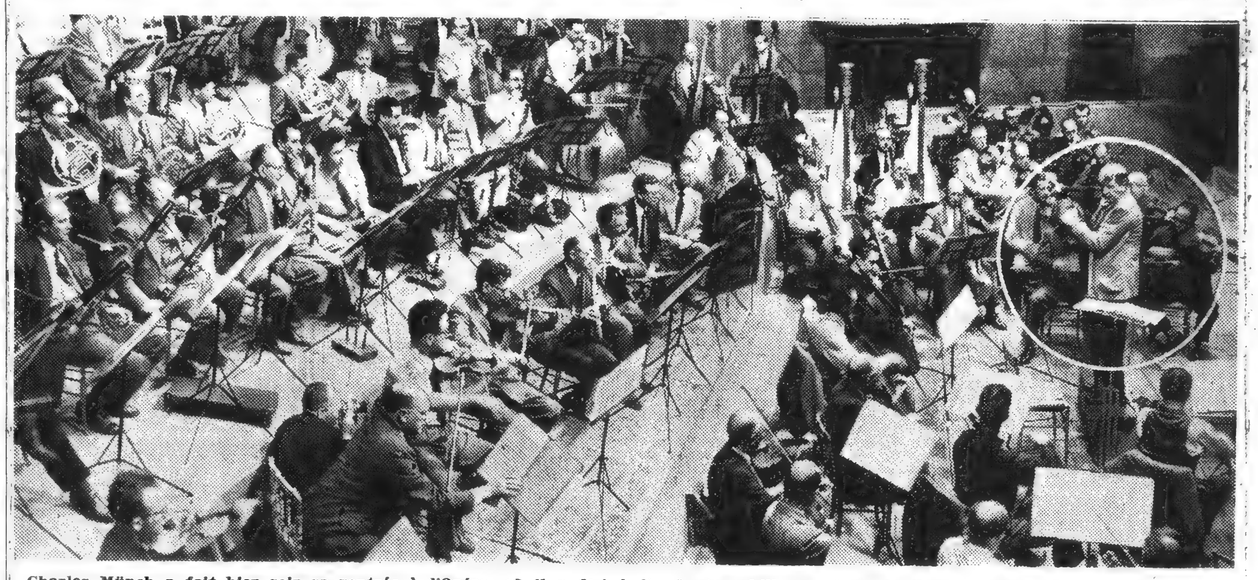
CHARLES MUNCH ONDUIT A LA VICTOIRE ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON



Voici quatre attitudes de Charles Münch au cours de la répétition du programme qu'a interprété, hier soir à l'Opéra, l'orchestre philharmonique de Boston. De haut en bas : le chef d'orchestre vérifie un détail de son texte ; il attire l'attention des musiciens avant de donner le départ d'une attaque d'un morceau; tandis que l'orchestre développe les thèmes successifs, Münch revient à la partition sur laquelle il jette un rapide coup d'œil ; un nouveau mouvement va commencer : le chef d'orchestre fait attaquer les « cuivres ».

(Reportage photographique Pierre-V. Manevy.)

CHARLES MUNCH ET L'ORCHESTRE PHILHARMONIQUE DE BOSTON A L'OPERA



Charles Münch a fait hier soir sa rentrée à l'Opéra, où il a dirigé l'orchestre philharmonique de Boston qui vient pour la première fois en France, sous la conduite de son chef titulaire. Le programme associait les noms de Ravel, Roussel, Debussy et Honegger à ceux de Samuel Barber et Walter Piston. Voici une vue générale de l'orchestre — dont font partie vingt-trois musiciens français — pendant la répétition qui dura tout l'après-midi. (En page 12, dernière minute parisienne et suite du reportage photographique de Pierre-V. Manevy.)

LE FIGARO - 7 MAY 52
PARIS

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAY 6 - 1952

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives In France For Tour

By John Roderick

Paris, May 5. (AP) — Eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in France today to begin a tour of Europe scheduled to make musical history.

The orchestra which is 71 years old, gives its first concert on European soil Tuesday night in the gold and gilt Opera House. It will be the first time in history that an American orchestra has been invited to perform in the baroque old building.

France's President Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, U. S. Ambassador James Dunn and an array of art, music, literary, and society figures will be in the first night audience.

The players, who arrived today on the Ile De France, will be joined by 22 others who flew in last Tuesday, in rehearsals Tuesday morning.

The opera concert will be under the baton of the orchestra's permanent director, Dr. Charles Munch. On Thursday night, Pierre Monteux of San Francisco, its associate director, will lead the orchestra in Igor Stravinsky's "Rite Of Spring."

Monteux, who was among today's arrivals, conducted this composition for the first time almost exactly 39 years ago. Its reception then was hostile and Stravinsky left under a barrage of catcalls before it was over. The piece will be played at the Theatre Des Champs-Elysees, where it first was heard.

The orchestra will hold a semi-public rehearsal on Thursday to which French students of composition and members of the press will be admitted.

Monteux, who is 77, has just retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. He is a Parisian by birth.

After its two Paris concerts, the orchestra will tour Europe at the expense of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which is backing the "masterpieces" festival. Concerts are scheduled for The Hague May 10, Amsterdam May 11, Brussels May 12, Frankfurt, May 14 and Berlin May 15.

The tour continues in Strasbourg, May 17, where Dr. Munch conducts in his birthplace under the auspices of the Free Europe University in Exile. On May 18, it plays in Metz, May 19 at Lyon, May 23 and 24 at Bordeaux and May 26 in London's Royal Festival Hall.

Quand Charles Münch mène à la victoire son bataillon de choc

Claude Baigneres.

IL n'est guère, dans le monde musical, de silhouette plus connue que celle de Charles Münch ! Deux longs bras qui retombent après un ultime sursaut de désespoir, au terme d'un chant où se concentre toute la douleur de la terre, deux épaules qui se haussent tandis que les poings serrés et frémissants viennent essuyer les larmes qui coulent des yeux, deux mains grandes ouvertes vers le ciel en signe de triomphe : voilà trois attitudes de Charles Münch fixées sur l'écran de toutes les mémoires, de Boston à Paris, de Londres à Rome.

Un chef d'orchestre est une sorte de condottiere qui a pour mission d'entraîner les troupes les plus diverses à la victoire ; mais le Boston Symphonic Orchestra reste pour Charles Münch un bataillon de choc. On l'a bien vu à la répétition qui précéda ce concert donné à l'Opéra dans le cadre de l'Œuvre du XX^e^ siècle. Un simple froncement de sourcils, un simple regard, et les instrumentistes obéissent sans la moindre hésitation.

L'art de Debureau n'a pas de secret pour Charles Münch. Cela, le public l'ignore, qui ne voit les traits de son visage qu'au terme d'une exécution ; mais les instrumentistes de l'orchestre savent bien qu'il faut lire la musique plus encore sur la figure de leur chef que sur les partitions. Ceux qui doutent encore de l'influence que peut avoir un Kappelmeister sur ses musiciens peuvent interroger les membres du Boston Symphonic, ils seront édifiés.

L'interrogatoire sera d'autant plus facile que la langue française semble la langue maternelle de cet orchestre. Près de vingt-cinq instrumentistes sur cent deux viennent de France.

— En voici un, me dit Charles Münch, qui a du sang indien dans les veines ; là-bas, vous voyez un Grec qui offre une cigarette à un Russe, et ce Calabrais qui travaille un trait avec acharnement depuis le début de l'entracte parle uniquement, je crois, l'anglais et le patois de son pays.

Et tout cela fait un excellent orchestre américain.

Trois coups de baguette sur le pupitre, en un clin d'œil chacun a regagné sa place. Silence de plomb, les archets sont suspendus sur les cordes des stradivarius ; le timbalier s'immobilise, figé comme une statue, un bras levé ; cors et trompettes se fixent sur les lèvres.

Dynamisme, autorité, lyrisme enflammé, éternelle jeunesse ; comment ne pas reprendre cette définition chère aux Américains : « Charles Münch, l'homme le plus extraordinaire que j'ai rencontré ».

Tumultuous Greeting for BSO In Its First European Concert

May 7

The Boston Symphony's first appearance won the tumultuous applause of an audience of connoisseurs.

Conducted the 71-year-old at the famed Opera playing a program of firsts it introduced to States, including dear to the music lovers, "La Mer," S. in 1907, and "Daphnis et in America in

President and Madame Auriol, Foreign Minister Schuman and U.S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present. The performance was a gala event of the "masterpieces of the 20th century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of Western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

Last night's performance marked the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the Paris Opera House.

Philadelphia Inquirer
May 7 1952

Boston Orchestra Makes Paris Deput

PARIS, May 6 (UP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra made musical history under Maestro Charles Munch tonight when it opened its first European tour before a celebrity-studded audience.

The maiden performance of an American orchestra in the famous Paris Opera House, landmark to millions of tourists, was heard by President and Mme. Vincent Auriol, U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and a host of evening-gowned Parisian socialites.

[174]

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

MAY 8 - 1952

Beauty as Heritage

DOLLARS of Americans too long have been accused of treating art treasures of Europe as pillage and decoying to this country outstanding artists in many fields, of whom Caruso in his long sojourn with us was a prime example. Never was a better time for individuals and representative institutions of this country to demonstrate their feeling that beauty, in its appeal to any of the senses, belongs to all who can appreciate it than the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" being held this year in Paris.

It is, therefore, both astonishing and heartening to note that on the evening of the very day that paintings by European artists from American collections were exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing for the first time in Europe, achieved an unforgettable triumph at the Paris Opera. It was a gala event, with President Auriol, Robert Schuman, diplomats, notable composers, society and just plain music lovers in the throng, which responded fervently to a long program divided between American and French music. Conductor Charles Muench and the orchestra had to give their hearers for a second time the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et and Chloe" suite.

To such an Exposition of the Arts as Paris planned and is carrying out we should be glad that Americans are unselfishly contributing. In an increasingly technological age humans dare not become automata. Sanity prescribes an increasing love of beauty as one of the great preventatives.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

MAY [illegible] 1952

PARIS RECREATES FAMOUS PREMIERE

Monteux Directs, Stravinsky Present for 'Rite of Spring' Performance

Paris, May 8. — (AP) — Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky [illegible] created tonight a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time provoked a riot and Stravinsky had to flee before the work was finished.

The Russian Ballet company, directed by Igor Diaghilev and with Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Tonight's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, [illegible] many [illegible] stood up in the box. Later he was persuaded to [illegible] stage. The [illegible] deafening as the composer, Monteux, took [illegible].

Monteux, smiling, raised [illegible] waving away [illegible] stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

The composer, now a citizen of the United States, is an honored guest of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival being held here.

This Clipping From
Montreal, Can.
Star

MAY 8- 1952

Music...

Paris Hears U.S. Symphony

Boston Orchestra Plays For Socialite Audience

PARIS, May 8 —(U.P.)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first European tour Tuesday night with a program under maestro Charles Munch at the famed Paris Opera House.

The presentation marked the maiden performance of an American orchestra there. It was heard by an audience studded with celebrities.

French President and Madame Vincent Auriol, foreign minister Robert Schuman and U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower was unable to attend because of other engagements.

The performance was sponsored by the anti-communist Masterpieces of the 20th Century Arts Festival, which later will take the orchestra on a tour of six European countries.

Munch's program included American composer Samuel Barber's School for Scandal Overture, Swiss-born Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2, Walter Piston's Toccata, part of Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane Ballet, Debussy's La Mer, and the second suite of Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

The ministry of culture gave a backstage party for the orchestra afterward.

Today the Symphony will be led by associate director Pierre Monteux, recently retired from the San Francisco Symphony.

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 8 1952

French Critics High in Praise of Boston Symphony

PARIS, May 8 (AP). — French music critics continued Thursday to heap lyrical praise of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" festival, and will give another Thursday night.

"Is there in the world an orchestra which can interpret a program of modern music as brilliantly" as the Boston Symphony, asked the critic of Le Parisien Libere. "I don't know, but all the musicians show a quality that I can never remember having heard before."

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST

MAY 9 - 1952

'Rites Of Spring' Brings No Riot

PARIS — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history Thursday night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago. This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were giv ena tremendous ovation.

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 8 1952

A Woman's New York

Boston Symphony to Spread Beantown Culture in Europe

BY ALICE HUGHES.

NEW YORK, May 8.—I spent a week-end in Beantown to wave so-long to my sister and French fiddler brother-in-law just before the Boston Symphony Orchestra left for Paris to play in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

This is the U. N. organization under which member nations interpret the emotional and rational pleasures and profits of music, ballet, literature and other artistic and intellectual achievements by free men. Under the same Congress a few years ago the Soviet Union sent a "cultural" delegation to New York that drew pickets, riots and police to the scene. At Moscow's own "culture" session recently, the U. S. S. R. lashed out at the works of us "effete" Westerners for our "modern, immoral and counter-revolutionary music." What kind of ears have Russians got that they can catch such unusual by-products from do-re-mi-fa-sol notes? In USSR when they detect such naughty emotions buried in the works of their own musicians, they denounce and even jail them for "anti-Communist sentiments."

CHARLES MUNCH.

CONDEMNED BY REDS.

The Boston band—104 of them—flew off on Monday. The preceding Saturday they held their last concert at Symphony Hall and, under the direction of eminent conductor Charles Munch, played an extraordinary concert. It was made up of five of the very compositions the Soviet had condemned: Barber's "School for Scandal," Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra," Pist-on's "Toccata," Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "Suite No. Daphnis et Chloe." The [illegible] ing chorus. The [illegible] self included cooked eggs to catch international [illegible] or neo-fascistic songs. Ravel seemed to emerge [illegible] stirring harmonies [illegible] mantic, melancholy, [illegible] freshing, etc. This very concert is the initial one which [illegible] played in the Paris Opera House. Thursday. Subsequent to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on this tour of 13 European cities in six countries are the New York City Ballet Company [illegible] conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

But the music at the Saturday night concert didn't seem to add up to the excitement and [illegible] of the musicians and their wives and families, as they took off for Boston's Logan airport. Side jibes and jokes! Most of the French, for these musikers live in a world apart. Their English, suffering from disuse, grows worse every year. My brother-in-law gave us amusing [illegible] to explain how the musical instruments and the baggage of the players were being accomodated. For each four men in the orchestra a huge trunk was built and their effects jointly packed. Preparations such as these plus travel fees, etc., will cost about $300,000 for the Boston Symphony alone. Who's to pay for this? Well, the European concerts will have some proceeds, I suppose, and I presume the United Nations provides considerable financial help from its "culture" budget.

SOCIAL EVENTS.

In each city where the B. S. O. plays, the leading state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders will be present. There will be, of course, parties, receptions and all kinds of special events over which the Boston musicians' wives may have considerable anguish. They want to dress richly and take along plenty of shoes and other accessories. Their husband's trunks were shipped via boat, but on the plane 45 pounds apiece [illegible] ed these women's skis for pressing these sartorial [illegible] My Boston sister took [illegible] suits, a coat [illegible] afternoon dress [illegible] dresses, one [illegible] some skirts, [illegible] er. My other sister [illegible] I stood at the airport [illegible] and wishing we were [illegible]

As my Boston [illegible] moment in Paris [illegible] birthday with [illegible] bara, who is my [illegible] niece. I can speak [illegible] vation about [illegible] Classified, she's [illegible] head of housey [illegible] more gumption, [illegible] more lust for life and [illegible] not only a cuisine but [illegible] ing the more difficult [illegible] of human relations [illegible] anyone I know. [illegible] legit matriarch [illegible] round. (I've never [illegible] ment with her yet [illegible] she and my [illegible] from Austria [illegible] month-old twin [illegible] adopted by [illegible] husband. What [illegible] with this trip [illegible] knows!

Copyright [illegible]

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
MAY 8 1952

French Critics Like Boston Symphony

Paris, May 8 (AP).—French music critics continued today to heap lyrical praise on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been so carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" Festival, and gives another tonight.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

MAY 8 - 1952

Beauty as Heritage

DOLLARS of Americans too long have been accused of treating art treasures of Europe as pillage and decoying to this country outstanding artists in many fields, of whom Caruso in his long sojourn with us was a prime example. Never was a better time for individuals and representative institutions of this country to demonstrate their feeling that beauty, in its appeal to any of the senses, belongs to all who can appreciate it than the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" being held this year in Paris.

It is, therefore, both astonishing and heartening to note that on the evening of the very day that paintings by European artists from American collections were exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing for the first time in Europe, achieved an unforgettable triumph at the Paris Opera. It was a gala event, with President Auriol, Robert Schuman, diplomats, notable composers, society and just plain music lovers in the throng, which responded fervently to a long program divided between American and French music. Conductor Charles Muench and the orchestra had to give their hearers for a second time the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et and Chloe" suite.

To such an Exposition of the Arts as Paris planned and is carrying out we should be glad that Americans are unselfishly contributing. In an increasingly technological age humans dare not become automata. Sanity prescribes an increasing love of beauty as one of the great preventatives.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

MAY 9 - 1952

PARIS RECREATES FAMOUS PREMIERE

Monteux Directs, Stravinsky Present for 'Rite of Spring' Performance

Paris, May 8. — (AP) — Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky recreated tonight a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theatre on May 28, 39 years ago.

Its playing at that time provoked a riot and Stravinsky had to flee before the work was finished.

The Russian Ballet company, directed by Igor Diaghilev and with Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing then. Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Tonight's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood up in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now 77.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

The composer, now a citizen of the United States, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival being held here.

This Clipping From
Montreal, Can.
Star

MAY 8- 1952

Music...

Paris Hears U.S. Symphony

Boston Orchestra Plays For Socialite Audience

PARIS, May 8 —(U.P.)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its first European tour Tuesday night with a program under maestro Charles Munch at the famed Paris Opera House.

The presentation marked the maiden performance of an American orchestra there. It was heard by an audience studded with celebrities.

French President and Madame Vincent Auriol, foreign minister Robert Schuman and U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower was unable to attend because of other engagements.

The performance was sponsored by the anti-communist Masterpieces of the 20th Century Arts Festival, which later will take the orchestra on a tour of six European countries.

Munch's program included American composer Samuel Barber's School for Scandal Overture, Swiss-born Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2, Walter Piston's Toccata, part of Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane Ballet, Debussy's La Mer, and the second suite of Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

The ministry of culture gave a backstage party for the orchestra afterward.

Today the Symphony will be led by associate director Pierre Monteux, recently retired from the San Francisco Symphony.

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 8 1952

French Critics High in Praise of Boston Symphony

PARIS, May 8 (AP). — French music critics contihued Thursday to heap lyrical praise of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" festival, and will give another Thursday night.

"Is there in the world an orchestra which can interpret a program of modern music as brilliantly" as the Boston Symphony, asked the critic of Le Parisien Libere. "I don't know, but all the musicians show a quality that I can never remember having heard before."

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST

MAY 9 - 1952

'Rites Of Spring' Brings No Riot

PARIS — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra turned back a page of musical history Thursday night under the baton of Maestro Pierre Monteux.

It presented Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring"—the same composition that started a riot when Monteux directed its premier 39 years ago. This time the reception was different. Both Monteux and Stravinsky, who was in the audience, were giv ena tremendous ovation.

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 8 1952

A Woman's New York

Boston Symphony to Spread Beantown Culture in Europe

BY ALICE HUGHES.

NEW YORK, May 8.—I spent a week-end in Beantown to wave so-long to my sister and French fiddle-playing brother-in-law just before the Boston Symphony Orchestra left for Paris to play in the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

This is the U. N. organization under which member nations interpret the emotional and rational pleasures and profits of music, ballet, literature and other artistic and intellectual achievements by free men. Under the same Congress a few years ago the Soviet Union sent a "cultural" delegation to New York that drew pickets, riots and police to the scene. At Moscow's own "culture" session recently, the U. S. S. R. lashed out at the works of us "effete" Westerners for our "modern, immoral and counter-revolutionary music." What kind of ears have Russians got that they can catch such unusual by-products from do-re-mi-fa-sol notes? In USSR when they detect such naughty emotions buried in the works of their own musicians, they denounce and even jail them for "anti-Communist sentiments."

CHARLES MUNCH.

CONDEMNED BY REDS.

The Boston band—104 of them—flew off on Monday. The preceding Saturday they held their last concert at Symphony Hall and, under the direction of eminent conductor Charles Munch, played an extraordinary concert. It was made up of five of the very compositions the Soviet had condemned: Barber's "School for Scandal," Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra," Piston's "Toccata," Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "Suite No. 2 Daphnis et Chloe," with a [illegible] ing chorus. The audience itself included—cocked ears to catch international implications or neo-fascistic sounds. But none seemed to emerge except sense—stirring harmonies—joyous, romantic, melancholy, robust, refreshing, etc. This very concert is the initial one which will be played in the Paris Opera House Thursday. Supplementing the Boston Symphony Orchestra on this tour of 13 European cities in six countries are the New York City Ballet Company plus conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

But the music at the Saturday night concert didn't begin to add up to the excitement and mirth of the musicians and their wives and families, as they took off at Boston's Logan airport. Such jibes and jokes! Mostly in French, for these musikers live in a world apart. Their English suffering from disuse, grows worse every year. My brother-in-law gave us amusing details to explain how the musical instruments and the baggage of the players were being accomodated. For each four men in the orchestra a huge trunk was built and their effects jointly packed. Preparations such as these, plus travel fees, etc., will cost about $1,000,000 for the Boston Symphony alone. Who's to pay for this? Well, the European concerts will have some proceeds, I suppose, and I presume the United Nations provides considerable financial help from its "culture" budget.

SOCIAL EVENTS.

In each city where the B. S. O. plays, the leading state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders will be present. There will be, of course, parties, receptions and all kinds of special events over which the Boston musicians' wives may have considerable anguish. They want to dress handsomely and take along plenty of shoes and other accessories. Their husband's trunks were shipped via boat, but on the plane 15 pounds apiece challenged these women's skill for compressing their sartorial ambitions. My Boston sister took along two suits, a coat, a raincoat, two afternoon dresses, two evening dresses, one cocktail dress and some skirts, blouses [illegible] er. My other sister [illegible] I stood at the airport [illegible] and wishing we were [illegible]

As my Boston sister is at the moment in Paris celebrating her birthday with her daughter Barbara, who is my beautiful goddaughter niece, I can sneak in this observation about my older sister. Classified, she's come under the head of housewife. But She's more gumption, get-up-and-go, more lust for life and more [illegible] not only a cuisine but in [illegible] ing the more difficult intricacies of human relations, than [illegible] anyone I know. She's a [illegible] legit matriarch, opinionated [illegible] sound. (I've never won [illegible] ment with her yet.) Last [illegible] she and my niece [illegible] from Austria with a [illegible] month-old twins [illegible] adopted by the niece's husband. What [illegible] with this trip, [illegible] knows!

(Copyright 1952 [illegible])

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
MAY 8 1952

French Critics Like Boston Symphony

Paris, May 8 (AP).—French music critics continued today to heap lyrical praise on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been so carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" Festival, and gives another tonight.

[175]

« L'ŒUVRE DU VINGTIEME SIECLE »

CHARLES MUNCH
et l'orchestre de Boston à l'Opéra

Ce geste musical du XX[e] siècle, qu'on entreprend de peindre, commence à se préciser. Voyons de quels traits nouveaux Charles Munch et l'orchestre de Boston l'ont enrichi mardi soir.

[illegible] est lui-même, et pas un autre : plein d'appréhensions, [illegible] de son orchestre, épuisé, mais jamais [illegible] dans la solidarité de son orchestre, épuisé, mais jamais [illegible] de faire de la musique, soutenu par l'amour [illegible] que, heureux de faire de la musique, soutenu par l'amour [illegible] beau métier, gravissant les crescendos au pas d'un jeune [illegible] le public aperçoit une [illegible] séduisante, racée, les [illegible] au corps, sauf dans les [illegible] quand il s'amuse, on [illegible] chrysantheme de [illegible] s'il se tourne, [illegible] jouant de profil [illegible] comme il se doit, la [illegible]. Pour assurer [illegible] sa direction, le sais [illegible] de Munch, quand il [illegible] le plus éloquent du [illegible] chefs règnent par [illegible]. D'autres se font [illegible] agit par osmose : [illegible] plus contagieux que le [illegible] de Munch, illuminé par le [illegible] qu'il aime. Nul ne [illegible] à cette foi véhémente qui [illegible] orchestres, à défaut des [illegible]

[illegible], nous le retrouvons ; [illegible] troupe, nous faisons sa [illegible] célèbre dans l'Amé[illegible], comment juger cet [illegible] prestigieux ? C'est un [illegible] extraordinaire, il faut le [illegible]. Nos orchestres nationaux ne [illegible] pas ombrage de cet en[illegible], car sur cent deux mu[illegible] l'orchestre de Boston [illegible] vingt-trois Français ! Sa [illegible] dominante, c'est assuré[illegible] ardeur, et même le fana[illegible]

[illegible] joue si bien de son ins[illegible]ment, cet instrument est de si [illegible] qualité, la confiance dans le [illegible] est si totale, les œuvres ont [illegible] minutieusement répétées que [illegible]tion est absolument parfaite. [illegible] a, de surcroît, un élan, une [illegible]gueur, un dynamisme, quelque [illegible] de vigoureux, de clair, de [illegible] à quoi l'on n'est pas ha[illegible]. Je fais ici surtout allusion [illegible] prodigieux trompettiste Roger-[illegible]oin, qui est la super-vedette de [illegible] orchestre de virtuoses. Sa trom[illegible]e d'or, qu'il boit renversée [illegible]me un calice, réveillerait l'uni[illegible] au jugement dernier et c'est [illegible], d'ailleurs, à la fin de la [illegible]mphonie de Honegger, qui em[illegible]me de son soleil la broussaille [illegible] archets. Roger-Voisin donne [illegible]ée exacte du ton général de [illegible]mble et de son éclat prodi[illegible] un vol de flèches dans la [illegible]ière de midi. Le danger d'être [illegible] point brillant, l'écueil aussi [illegible] programme de prestige, c'est [illegible] difficulté de revenir, quand il le [illegible]aut, à la traduction de senti[illegible]ents plus calmes. S'il est vrai que [illegible] Symphonie de Honegger est [illegible] aux nues, et qu'on a folle[illegible] acclamé Bacchus et Ariane [illegible] que la fin de Daphnis et Chloé [illegible] revanche, la Mer debussyste [illegible] paru singulièrement houleuse, [illegible] poésie, n'offrant que peu [illegible] d'îlots à la rêverie. Nettoyée de son halo, de sa brume, de ses vapeurs, de sa féerie. La Mer n'était plus La Mer. Mais comment exiger d'un orchestre, même splendide, un changement de registre aussi brusque ? Autant demander à Michel-Ange de peindre une aquarelle après le plafond de la Sixtine !

Une Ouverture sympathique de Samuel Barber, une Toccata nerveuse de Walter Piston mettaient une note américaine dans ce concert gracieusement voué au génie français. L'Orchestre de Boston et son chef l'ont bien servi.

Clarendon.

L'AURORE

2 a

L'ŒUVRE DU XX[e] SIÈCLE

L'Orchestre symphonique de Boston à l'Opéra

Parmi les reproches que certains critiques ont adressés au Festival du XX[e] siècle, il en était un de justifié, l'omission dans les programmes de trois musiciens de premier rang : Roussel, Dukas, Schmitt. Grâce à M. Charles Munch, réparation est faite au moins en ce qui concerne Roussel.

Sa suite d'orchestre Bacchus et Ariane, introduite à la dernière minute en supplément dans le programme du concert donné mardi à l'Opéra par l'Orchestre de Boston, est venue rappeler à ceux qui l'avaient oublié, et apprendre à ceux qui l'ignoraient, que Roussel est probablement le plus grand musicien français du demi-siècle. Placé à côté de la Mer et de Daphnis et Chloé, son Bacchus apparaît comme une œuvre moins habile sans doute, mais plus sensible et plus forte. Remercions nos visiteurs d'avoir rendu hommage à Roussel et souhaitons que nos orchestres et nos théâtres se montrent moins oublieux à l'égard d'un maître dont les symphonies et les ballets sont injustement sacrifiés à des ouvrages de qualité bien inférieure.

Berlioz, quand par hasard ses cors ne s'étaient pas embrouillés en comptant leurs mesures, et quand ses trombones étaient partis à temps dans le finale, écrivait à ses amis : « Exécution foudroyante »...

Aucun mot ne traduirait mieux ce qu'ont été les péroraisons de Bacchus et de Daphnis. Entraînés par Charles Munch dans un presto irrésistible, les 102 instrumentistes de Boston ont tracé une fresque sonore d'une couleur éblouissante et d'une intensité extraordinaire.

Existe-t-il au monde un orchestre qui puisse interpréter d'une manière aussi brillante un programme de musique moderne ? Je ne sais, mais depuis la sonorité somptueuse des contrebasses jusqu'au mordant des trompettes, tous les pupitres font preuve d'une qualité dont je ne me souviens pas d'avoir jamais entendu ailleurs un équivalent aussi complet.

Quant à M. Munch, non seulement il a magnifiquement traduit les chefs-d'œuvre, mais il a même réussi par la qualité des timbres, à donner vie à des morceaux assez insignifiants, comme les pièces de Barber et de Piston qui encadraient la première et la seconde partie de son concert. Il était impossible en l'entendant de ne pas songer Koussevitzky, le musicien prestigieux qui a forgé l'incomparable ensemble qu'une salle enthousiaste, interminablement acclamé l'autre soir.

Jean MISTLER.

Avec sa carrosserie de grand luxe
LE "BOSTON SYMPHONY" A EBLOUI LES PARISIENS

Le seul aspect du Boston symphony orchestra, avec son quatuor géant, ses « bois » touffus et ses riches mines de cuivre a quelque chose de satisfaisant pour l'œil et l'esprit. On se sent en présence d'une usine sonore pourvue d'un outillage exceptionnel. Mais lorsque tout ce mécanisme entre en action, on est ravi de sa puissance, de sa souplesse et de sa précision.

Le président Vincent Auriol tint à féliciter Charles Munch.

Nous avons là une admirable sélection de virtuoses appartenant à toutes les nations du monde. Nos compatriotes y sont nombreux et leur haute qualité nous fait honneur. La musique, seule, avait le pouvoir de réaliser une solidarité aussi parfaite

La discipline de ces soixante-cinq archets est impeccable. On sent que chaque pupitre est occupé par un maître de son instrument et, à chaque instant, quelques notes d'un alto solo, d'un violoncelle solo, un trait de contrebasses dans l'aigu, un jet de flamme de la trompette (gloire à Roger Voisin) nous éblouissent par leur splendeur. S'effaçant modestement derrière ses collaborateurs, Charles Münch a voulu que nos applaudissements s'adressent à eux seuls. L'enthousiasme du public parisien leur a prouvé que leur talent, visiblement survolté par un grand amour de la musique et une ferveur passionnée, a été apprécié à sa juste valeur.

Le programme nous était, en grande partie familier mais Charles Münch a donné de Bacchus et Ariane de Roussel et de la 2me Symphonie, d'Honegger, une interprétation transcendante. Moins heureux dans Debussy et Ravel, il nous a révélé une Toccata, de Walter Piston, écrite avec la savante application d'un bon élève de Nadia Boulanger et une Ouverture, de Samuel Barber qui révèle chez son auteur une grande distinction de pensée et de goût, une excellente culture artistique et une clairvoyante pondération.

Emile VUILLERMOZ.

The very aspect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its great quartet (of strings), its opulent winds, and the rich treasure of its brass, at once satisfies the eye and the spirit. One feels oneself in the presence of a factory of sound, beautifully equipped, and when this entire mechanism enters into action one is overwhelmed by its power, its subtlety and its precision.

We have in this orchestra an admirable selection of virtuosos from many nations of the earth. Our compatriots are numerous and their high quality does us honor. The music itself had an equally perfect integration.

LA MUSIQUE

CHARLES MUNCH
et l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston

Bien qu'il n'eût jamais encore franchi l'Océan, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston était loin d'être inconnu de ce côté-ci de l'Atlantique. Sa réputation s'étendait grâce à ses enregistrements (l'un des plus célèbres est celui de Harold en Italie, sous la direction de Serge Koussevitzki, avec l'altiste William Primrose en scliste), mais aussi grâce au renom des chefs qui furent successivement appelés à le diriger, et qui tous avaient acquis au préalable en Europe, et particulièrement à Paris, une véritable popularité.

Fondé en 1881 par Henry Lee Higginson, le Boston Symphony Orchestra donna son premier concert le 22 octobre 1881. Il accueillit toujours avec empressement les ouvrages et les artistes français : en 1919 Pierre Monteux en devenait le chef et le demeura pendant cinq ans, jusqu'à ce qu'il revint parmi nous et prît la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Paris. Nous le retrouverons au second concert. Serge Koussevitzki, lorsqu'il quitta Paris où il avait pendant trois ans conduit les concerts de l'Opéra, succéda à Pierre Monteux. Il créa à Boston quantité d'œuvres françaises, commandées pour la plupart en souvenir de sa femme Natalie, et c'est ainsi que Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, ont écrit pour Boston quelques-uns des ouvrages les plus marquants de la production contemporaine. Koussevitzki, qui allait mourir le 3 juin 1951, se retira en 1949, et conserva le titre de directeur honoraire du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Münch, mis en vedette en Amérique par ses brillantes tournées, recueillit ce lourd héritage, et l'on sait quel est aujourd'hui son prestige, étendu au monde entier.

Les débuts en Europe de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, en présence de M. Vincent Auriol, avaient naturellement attiré à l'Opéra un public aussi enthousiaste que nombreux. L'enthousiasme se manifesta dès la fin du premier morceau, une ouverture de The School for Scandal de Samuel Barber, composition fort sage, agréable aussi, mais sans trop d'originalité. Après la Symphonie n° 2, pour cordes et trompettes, d'Arthur Honegger, ce fut du délire, et il fallut que l'auteur parût auprès de Charles Münch pour recueillir l'hommage de la foule. C'est que l'œuvre possède une vertu qu'elle doit à la vigueur de ses accents, à leur sincérité ; c'est que le finale entraînant, l'admirable choral qui lui sert de conclusion, constituent une des pages maîtresses de la musique de ce temps. La deuxième suite de Bacchus et Ariane d'Albert Roussel — revanche de l'échec du ballet à l'Opéra, dû à une malencontreuse mise en scène et à une chorégraphie non moins malheureuse — fut elle aussi saluée d'applaudissements interminables.

La seconde partie du concert débutait par une Passacaille de Walter Piston, écrite pour la venue de l'Orchestre national aux Etats-Unis en 1948, et qui, au cours de la tournée qu'il y fit au printemps, fut jouée quarante et une fois. Œuvre de construction classique, et habilement réalisée, la Passacaille fut chaleureusement accueillie. Mais naturellement avec la Mer, puis avec la deuxième suite de Daphnis et Chloé, Charles Münch obtint du magnifique orchestre qu'il dirige tous les effets de finesse, toute la grâce, toute la transparence et toute la vigueur propres à traduire les deux chefs-d'œuvre de la musique française par lesquels s'achevait ce concert. Rarement triomphe plus éclatant récompensa réussite plus complète.

RENÉ DUMESNIL.

— Gian-Carlo Menotti, compositeur du Consul, est attendu le 12 mai à Paris, où il doit présenter le premier opéra qu'il écrivit à l'âge de vingt-quatre ans : Amélie va au bal. Cet ouvrage sera joué au Théâtre de l'Humour, avec, au même programme, trois « petites minutes » inédits de Darius Milhaud, Voyante, d'Henri Sauguet, et En bas, dans la vallée, de Kurt Weil.

SPECTACLES

LE FIGARO — 8 MAI 1952

« L'ŒUVRE DU VINGTIEME SIECLE »

CHARLES MUNCH et l'orchestre de Boston à l'Opéra

Le visage musical du XX[e] siècle, qu'on entreprend de peindre, commence à se préciser. Voyons de quels traits nouveaux Charles Münch et l'orchestre de Boston l'ont enrichi mardi soir.

Münch est lui-même, et pas un autre : plein d'appréhensions, mais confiant dans la solidarité de son orchestre, épuisé, mais jamais las, frénétique, heureux de faire de la musique, soutenu par l'amour d'un beau métier, gravissant les crescendos au pas d'un jeune homme. Le public aperçoit une silhouette séduisante, racée, les épaules au corps, sauf dans les épaulettes ; quand il s'anime, on croit danser le chrysanthème de cheveure grise, et s'il se tourne, c'est Le Hargy jouant de profil. L'orchestre a, comme il se doit, la meilleure part. Pour avoir joué une fois sous sa direction, je sais que le regard de Münch, quand il conduit, est le plus éloquent du monde. Certains chefs règnent par l'autorité calme, d'autres se font craindre, celui-là agit par osmose ; rien de plus contagieux que le visage de Münch, illuminé par le chef-d'œuvre qu'il aime. Nul ne résiste à cette foi véhémente qui soulève les orchestres, à défaut des montagnes.

Le chef, nous le retrouvons ; quant à la troupe, nous faisons sa connaissance. Célèbre dans l'Amérique entière, comment juger cet orchestre prestigieux ? C'est un ensemble extraordinaire, il faut le dire. Nos orchestres nationaux ne craindront pas ombrage de cet enfant-là, car sur cent deux musiciens, l'orchestre de Boston compte vingt-trois Français ! Sa qualité dominante, c'est assurément l'ardeur, et même le fanatisme.

Chacun joue si bien de son instrument, cet instrument est de si belle qualité, la confiance dans le chef est si totale, les œuvres ont été si minutieusement répétées que l'exécution est absolument parfaite. Il y a, de surcroît, un élan, une jeunesse, un dynamisme, quelque chose de vigoureux, de clair, de percutant à quoi l'on n'est pas habitué. Je fais ici surtout allusion au prodigieux trompettiste Roger-Voisin, qui est la super-vedette de cet orchestre de virtuoses. Sa trompette d'or, qu'il boit renversée comme un calice, réveillerait l'univers au jugement dernier et c'est elle, d'ailleurs, à la fin de la 2[e] Symphonie de Honegger, qui emplit de son soleil la broussaille des archets. Roger-Voisin donne une idée exacte du ton général de l'orchestre et de son éclat prodigieux : un vol de flèches dans la lumière de midi. Le danger d'être à ce point brillant, l'écueil aussi d'un programme de prestige, c'est la difficulté de revenir, quand il le faut, à la traduction de sentiments plus calmes. S'il est vrai que la Symphonie de Honegger est dédiée aux nues, et qu'on a follement acclamé Bacchus et Ariane ainsi que la fin de Daphnis et Chloé — en revanche, la Mer debussyste a paru singulièrement houleuse, plus prosaïque, n'offrant que peu d'îlots à la rêverie. Nettoyée de son halo, de sa brume, de ses vapeurs, de sa féerie, La Mer n'était plus La Mer. Mais comment exiger d'un orchestre, même splendide, un changement de registre aussi brusque ? Autant demander à Michel-Ange de peindre une aquarelle après le plafond de la Sixtine !

Une Ouverture sympathique de Samuel Barber, une Toccata nerveuse de Walter Piston mettaient une note américaine dans ce concert gracieusement voué au génie français. L'Orchestre de Boston et son chef l'ont bien servi.

Clarendon.

L'AURORE — 2 a

L'ŒUVRE DU XX[e] SIÈCLE

L'Orchestre symphonique de Boston à l'Opéra

Parmi les reproches que certains critiques ont adressés au Festival du XX[e] siècle, il en était un de justifié, l'omission dans les programmes de trois musiciens de premier rang : Roussel, Dukas, Schmitt. Grâce à M. Charles Munch, réparation est faite au moins en ce qui concerne Roussel.

Sa suite d'orchestre Bacchus et Ariane, introduite à la dernière minute en supplément dans le programme du concert donné mardi à l'Opéra par l'Orchestre de Boston, est venue rappeler à ceux qui l'avaient oublié, et apprendre à ceux qui l'ignoraient, que Roussel est probablement le plus grand musicien français du demi-siècle. Placé à côté de la Mer et de Daphnis et Chloé, son Bacchus apparaît comme une œuvre moins habile sans doute, mais plus sensible et plus forte. Remercions nos visiteurs d'avoir rendu hommage à Roussel et souhaitons que nos orchestres et nos théâtres se montrent moins oublieux à l'égard d'un maître dont les symphonies et les ballets sont injustement sacrifiés à des ouvrages de qualité bien inférieure.

Berlioz, quand par hasard ses cors ne s'étaient pas embouillés en comptant leurs mesures, et quand ses trombones étaient partis à temps dans le finale, écrivait à ses amis : « Exécution foudroyante »...

Aucun mot ne traduirait mieux ce qu'ont été les péroraisons de Bacchus et de Daphnis. Entraînés par Charles Munch dans un presto irrésistible, les 102 instrumentistes de Boston ont tracé une fresque sonore d'une couleur éblouissante et d'une intensité extraordinaire.

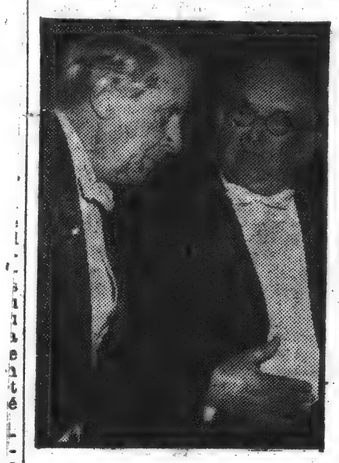
Existe-t-il au monde un orchestre qui puisse interpréter d'une manière aussi brillante un programme de musique moderne ? Je ne sais, mais depuis la sonorité somptueuse des contrebasses jusqu'au mordant des trompettes, tous les pupitres font preuve d'une qualité dont je ne me souviens pas d'avoir jamais entendu ailleurs un équivalent aussi complet.

Quant à M. Munch, non seulement il a magnifiquement traduit les chefs-d'œuvre, mais il a même réussi par la qualité des timbres, à donner vie à des morceaux assez insignifiants, comme les pièces de Barber et de Piston qui encadraient la première et la seconde partie de ce concert. Il était impossible en l'entendant de ne pas penser à Koussevitzky, le musicien prodigieux qui a forgé l'incomparable ensemble qu'une salle enthousiaste a interminablement acclamé l'autre soir.

Jean MISTLER.

Avec sa carrosserie de grand luxe LE "BOSTON SYMPHONY" A ÉBLOUI LES PARISIENS

Le seul aspect du Boston symphony orchestra, avec son quatuor géant, ses « bois » touffus et ses riches mines de cuivre a quelque chose de satisfaisant pour l'œil et l'esprit. On se sent en présence d'une usine sonore pourvue d'un outillage exceptionnel. Mais lorsque tout ce mécanisme entre en action, on est ravi de sa puissance, de sa souplesse et de sa précision.



Le président Vincent Auriol tint à féliciter Charles Munch.

Nous avons là une admirable sélection de virtuoses appartenant à toutes les nations du monde. Nos compatriotes y sont nombreux et leur haute qualité nous fait honneur. La musique, seule, avait le pouvoir de réaliser une solidarité aussi parfaite

La discipline de ces soixante-cinq archets est impeccable. On sent que chaque pupitre est occupé par un maître de son instrument et, à chaque instant, quelques notes d'un alto solo, d'un violoncelle solo, un trait de contrebasses dans l'aigu, un jet de flamme de la trompette (gloire à Roger Voisin) nous éblouissent par leur splendeur. S'effaçant modestement derrière ses collaborateurs, Charles Münch a voulu que nos applaudissements s'adressent à eux seuls. L'enthousiasme du public parisien leur a prouvé que leur talent, visiblement survolté par un grand amour de la musique et une ferveur passionnée, a été apprécié à sa juste valeur.

Le programme nous était, en grande partie familier mais Charles Münch a donné de Bacchus et Ariane de Roussel et de la 2me Symphonie, d'Honegger, une interprétation transcendante. Moins heureux dans Debussy et Ravel, il nous a révélé une Toccata, de Walter Piston, écrite avec la savante application d'un bon élève de Nadia Boulanger et une Ouverture, de Samuel Barber qui révèle chez son auteur une grande distinction de pensée et de goût, une excellente culture artistique et une clairvoyante pondération.

Emile VUILLERMOZ.

The very aspect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its great quartet (of strings), its opulent winds, and the rich treasure of its brass, at once satisfies the eye and the spirit. One feels oneself in the presence of a factory of sound, beautifully equipped, and when this entire mechanism enters into action one is overwhelmed by its power, its subtlety and its precision.

We have in this orchestra an admirable selection of virtuosos from many nations of the earth. Our compatriots are numerous and their high quality does us honor. The music itself had an equally perfect integration.

Does there exist anywhere an orchestra that can interpret in so brilliant a fashion a program of contemporary music? From the rich sonority of the basses to the incisive one of the trumpets, every stand gives proof of a most individual quality.

LA MUSIQUE

CHARLES MUNCH et l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston

Bien qu'il n'eût jamais encore franchi l'Océan, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston était loin d'être inconnu de ce côté-ci de l'Atlantique. Sa réputation s'étendait grâce à ses enregistrements (l'un des plus célèbres est celui de Harold en Italie, sous la direction de Serge Koussevitzki, avec l'altiste William Primrose en soliste), mais aussi grâce au renom des chefs qui furent successivement appelés à le diriger, et qui tous avaient acquis au préalable en Europe, et particulièrement à Paris, une véritable popularité.

Fondé en 1881 par Henry Lee Higginson, le Boston Symphony Orchestra donna son premier concert le 22 octobre 1881. Il accueillit toujours avec empressement les ouvrages et les artistes français : en 1919 Pierre Monteux en devenait le chef et le demeura pendant cinq ans, jusqu'à ce qu'il revînt parmi nous et prît la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Paris. Nous le retrouverons au second concert. Serge Koussevitzki, lorsqu'il quitta Paris où il avait pendant trois ans conduit les concerts de l'Opéra, succéda à Pierre Monteux. Il créa à Boston quantité d'œuvres françaises, commandées pour la plupart en souvenir de sa femme Natalie, et c'est ainsi que Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, ont écrit pour Boston quelques-uns des ouvrages les plus marquants de la production contemporaine. Koussevitzki, qui allait mourir le 3 juin 1951, se retira en 1949, et conserva le titre de directeur honoraire du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Münch, mis en vedette en Amérique par ses brillantes tournées, recueillit ce lourd héritage, et l'on sait quel est aujourd'hui son prestige, étendu au monde entier.

Les débuts en Europe de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, en présence de M. Vincent Auriol, avaient naturellement attiré à l'Opéra un public aussi enthousiaste que nombreux. L'enthousiasme se manifesta dès la fin du premier morceau, une ouverture de The School for Scandal de Samuel Barber, composition fort sage, agréable aussi, mais sans trop d'originalité. Après la Symphonie n° 2, pour cordes et trompettes, d'Arthur Honegger, ce fut du délire, et il fallut que l'auteur parût auprès de Charles Münch pour recueillir l'hommage de la foule. C'est que l'œuvre possède une vertu qu'elle doit à la vigueur de ses accents, à leur sincérité ; c'est que le finale entraînant, l'admirable choral qui lui sert de conclusion, constituent une des pages maîtresses de la musique de ce temps. La deuxième suite de Bacchus et Ariane d'Albert Roussel — revanche de l'échec du ballet à l'Opéra, dû à une malencontreuse mise en scène et à une chorégraphie non moins malheureuse — fut elle aussi saluée d'applaudissements interminables.

La seconde partie du concert débutait par une Passacaille de Walter Piston, écrite pour la venue de l'Orchestre national aux Etats-Unis en 1948, et qui, au cours de la tournée qu'il y fit au printemps, fut jouée quarante et une fois. Œuvre de construction classique, et habilement réalisée, la Passacaille fut chaleureusement accueillie. Mais naturellement avec la Mer, puis avec la deuxième suite de Daphnis et Chloé, Charles Münch obtint du magnifique orchestre qu'il dirige tous les effets de finesse, toute la grâce, toute la transparence et toute la vigueur propres à traduire les deux chefs-d'œuvre de la musique française par lesquels s'achevait ce concert. Recueillir triomphe plus éclatant récompensa jamais plus complète.

René DOMMERGUE.

— Gian-Carlo Menotti, compositeur du Consul, est attendu le 12 mai à Paris, où il doit présenter le premier opéra qu'il écrivit à l'âge de vingt-quatre ans : Amélie va au bal. Cet ouvrage sera joué au Théâtre de l'Humour, avec, au même programme, trois « courtes minutes » inédites de Darius Milhaud, Voyante, d'Henri Sauguet, et En bas dans la vallée, de Kurt Weill.

[176]

TIGHT BINDING

Boston Symphony Gives Brilliant Performance in Paris

Koussevitzky's Dream a Gala Affair Under Direction of Munch

BY Claudia Cassidy

PARIS—Three times the chestnut trees have turned into perfumed candelabra with their lovely weight of cream and rose blossoms, and three times they have reminded me that because it was so close to me I could never write what I wanted to write about Serge Koussevitzky.

The first time was three years ago when we [when I say "we" I include my husband—the editorial we always makes me feel like Queen Victoria after she got fat] went backstage to surprise him after his concert as guest with the French National orchestra, once under the direction of Charles Munch. The second was last year when we were inconsolably saddened by news of his death. The third was the gala debut of the Boston orchestra, to which Koussevitzky devoted a quarter of a century, when under the direction of Munch it achieved one of Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, and not only appeared in Paris, but became the first American orchestra to give a concert in the glittering crimson and gold jewel box that is the Paris Opera.

• • •

It is no news that the concert was a triumph, even in a "cultural exposition" to which the French are taking violent exception, partly because as Americans we are supposed to be barbarians avid for European culture and willing to pay thru the teeth for it, not presumptuous enough to bring our own, even when it happens to be superior.

It is not even news, tho amusing, that the French woman who shared our box remarked with unmistakable satisfaction the instant she scanned her program, "We have four, and you have two." It took a startled inquiry to discover she meant composers. Munch had billed Piston and Barber along with Honegger, Debussy and Ravel, plus Roussel as an added starter. Why try to tell her, or Paris, that the Boston orchestra has long been renowned for its French music? How hope to explain that under Koussevitzky it was a superb propagandist for American music, too? Most of all, how to tell this cheering audience that this was the glorious Boston orchestra without the heady propulsion of its heart's blood?

• • •

For that was Koussevitzky, and that was why I loved him, as a musician and as a man. It was not just that he had a fabulous ear, a tinderbox imagination and the insistent craving for perfection that drove him to polish his orchestra with infinite care, strand by strand. It was that into all this he poured his heart's blood, so that you heard the beat of the music's heart, and it quickened your own. It was because from all this blazed a molten incandescence that made the orchestra a living thing sensitive to all human emotions, to joy and sorrow, and darkness and light.

Because Koussevitzky believed implicitly, at least for the moment, in the music he was playing, he would have told Paris more [had he chosen to play them] of Samuel Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal" and Walter Piston's Toccata. Munch told Paris that these were neat, well made pieces by men of erudition, and Paris applauded politely. But Koussevitzky would have said—with what irresistible persuasiveness—"Look, see my Americans, what resilience, what freshness, what charm, brilliance and wit!" He might even have played Copland, as only Koussevitzky could.

• • •

Munch came into his own with the second suite from Roussel's "Ariadne and Bacchus," which was all brilliance and points of light, and especially in his particular masterpiece, the Symphony for Strings, which had Arthur Honegger bowing repeatedly from a nearby box. The Honegger to me is the best thing Munch does, but then I have heard him in limited repertory. At least he finds in it the human element, the deep expression of an almost inexpressible weariness, that in the trumpet finale lifts its head and defies defeat. Despite the glory of the Boston trumpets, that finale lacked the irresistible exhilaration I have known Munch to give it before—but he is himself a weary man who has been seriously ill for months. But the rest of it was magnificent Honegger, which is to say magnificent music, and it underscored what I have suspected, that Munch is a sensitive, civilized human being who has within him the fires of music, tho not the concentrated furies that drive him to make himself and others miserable until they blaze in the incandescent release of magnificence.

So it was that I could not find what I had come to hear in the sumptuous tone of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," Boston played, and especially in Debussy's "La Mer," which of all music was perhaps the Koussevitsky-Boston masterpiece. Yet it had the crowd shouting, it was rich in virtuosity, and when the cellos and Koussevitsky's beloved basses lunged into the inimical furies of the deep, I, who am sometimes frozen when most bitterly bereft, wept for Koussevitsky for the first time since his death. There in the crimson loge of the Paris Opera hearing his matchless orchestra in the music he loved, I knew the legacy—and the loss.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN-TIMES
MAY 9 - 1952

STRAVINSKY SCORES

Falls Flat In 1913, But Now — Sharp!

PARIS (AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Igor Stravinsky Thursday night recreated a memorable evening with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theater 39 years ago.

At that time it provoked a near riot and Stravinsky had to flee before the work was finished. Catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Thursday night's audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence. As the last note died down they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafening as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the mustache and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said: "I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

The composer, now an American citizen, is star of the "Masterpieces of 20th Century" festival being held here. He will conduct his ballet "Orpheus" Wednesday, his opera "Oedipus Rex" May 16, and a concert on May 22.

Stravinsky will be 70 in June. A slender man with a few strands of black hair crossing a bald head, he looks and acts far younger.

This Clipping From
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAY 9 1952

Paris Hails Stravinsky

His 'Rite of Spring' Brings Cheers

PARIS—(AP)—Pierre Monteux, the Boston symphony orchestra and Igor Stravinsky last night recreated a memorable evening in the history of music with the playing of the Russian composer's "Rite of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Stravinsky

Monteux

Monteux, recently retired as conductor of the San Francisco symphony orchestra, conducted the world premiere of the Stravinsky work in the same theater on May 28, thirty-nine years ago.

Its playing at that time, however, provoked a near riot and Stravinsky, a budding young composer, had to flee before the work was finished as catcalls, shouts and whistling turned the auditorium into bedlam.

The great Russian ballet company, directed by Diaghilev and with the immortal Nijinsky in the principal role, was dancing to Diaghilev, on the verge of tears, had shouted out the measures as the noise drowned out the orchestra.

Last night's gala audience of 2,000 persons listened in rapt silence to the composition. Before the last note died down, they were on their feet, shouting, cheering and applauding.

Stravinsky, an inordinately shy man, brought more cheers when he stood in the loges. Later he was persuaded to come to the stage. The din was deafining as he embraced Monteux, now a portly 77.

Stravinsky leaped in the air like an acrobat, then fell into Monteux' arms. He kissed him square on the moustaches and fled with the applause of the crowd behind him.

Monteux, smiling happily and wiping away tears, stilled the crowd and said:

"I'll make a date with you to play it again 39 years from now."

Backstage he shook hands with Stravinsky again. Players of the Boston orchestra crowded around the two men to congratulate them.

"Tell them," said Stravinsky, "that I thank them all."

The composer, now an American citizen, is an individual star of the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival being held here. He is to conduct his ballet "Or-

[77]

LE MONDE. — 10 mai 1952

LA MUSIQUE

— PAR RENÉ DUMESNIL —

Pierre Monteux dirige
l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston aux Champs-Elysées

Nous avons retrouvé un Pierre Monteux tout pareil à celui que nous rejoignions tous les dimanches, au temps de l'O.S.P. Et même, en le regardant, en l'écoutant mettre au point le matin, à la répétition, le Sacre du Printemps, c'est plus loin encore que remontaient les souvenirs. En ce beau Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, alors en sa nouveauté, naissait dans le tumulte, sous la baguette du même chef, cette musique de ballet qui allait provoquer tant de discussions. C'était le 29 mai 1913, soir mémorable entre tous ; puis, les passions calmées, sinon complètement éteintes, ce fut en avril de l'année suivante que Pierre Monteux, à ses concerts du Casino de Paris, put enfin faire entendre l'œuvre nouvelle. Souvenirs lointains, mais si bien remplis que deux guerres ont passé sans les amoindrir. Aujourd'hui, le ciel en paix ! le Sacre ne soulèvera qu'une salve de bravos. Et Protée, de Darius Milhaud, qui fut si copieusement sifflé lorsque Pierné eut l'audace de faire entendre au public de Colonne la suite tirée en 1921, Protée, que Paul Claudel et Milhaud montrent dans l'île de Naxos avec la nymphe Brindosier, au milieu de leur cour de phoques, Protée, que Monteux a rendu enfin inoffensif, provoquera ce soir les applaudissements d'un auditoire que n'épouvantent plus les dissonances et qui serait même déçu s'il en entendait moins.

Deux ouvrages américains devaient figurer au programme de ce concert. L'un, la Symphonie n° 3, de William Pyper, fut remplacé au dernier moment par la Fantaisie sur un thème de Thomas Tallys, de Ralph Vaughan Williams. Tallys fut le maître de Byrd et l'organiste de la cour d'Henry VIII. Ralph Vaughan Williams est un des musiciens les plus représentatifs de l'école anglaise de la période d'entre les deux guerres, l'un de ceux qui, comme le dit M. Norman Demuth dans ses Musical Trends of the 20th Century, ont le mieux contribué à former un style proprement anglais. Williams, qui étudia avec Max Bruch à Berlin, travailla aussi l'orchestration avec Maurice Ravel. Il en reçut certes d'utiles conseils, mais sut rester lui-même. Sa Fantaisie garde au thème de Tallys toute sa noblesse et le vêt d'une instrumentation raffinée. La Symphonie n° 3 du compositeur américain Williams Schuman, précédée du Protée, de Milhaud, et suivie du Sacre de Stravinsky, n'a pas supporté sans quelque dommage ce dangereux voisinage. Le compositeur ne manque pas d'adresse, et s'il substitue aux mouvements classiques de la symphonie une passacaille et une fugue, un choral et toccata, la hardiesse est sans grands périls. Mais peut-être l'aurait-on appréciée davantage si l'auteur avait montré plus d'originalité.

Pierre Monteux fit preuve, lui, d'une vaillance peu commune, et l'Orchestre de Boston montra les qualités les plus solides.

LE FIGARO — 10-11 MAI 1952

« L'ŒUVRE DU XX• SIECLE »

En présence de Strawinsky Pierre Monteux fait triompher « Le Sacre du Printemps »

LA première partie du concert avait été morne. On n'en avait pas voulu sérieusement à Ralph Vaughan Williams, car sa Fantaisie sur un thème de Thomas Tallis, outre qu'elle est sérieusement écrite, dans un style d'école très sage, avait permis à l'Orchestre de Boston de faire admirer la splendeur de son quatuor : l'école russe du violon y a laissé sa trace. Les soixante-trois « cordes » ont des profondeurs d'orgue ; quant aux solistes, je vous les recommande... Mais je proteste si l'on inscrit cette page estimable sous le signe de « l'esprit du vingtième siècle ». Bannir Dukas et Schmitt sous prétexte que leur esthétique est « du siècle dernier » et admettre Vaughan Williams dont l'écriture est celle d'un élève de Mendelssohn, quelle aberration ! Au reste, les protestations ne sont point demeurées absolument vaines, puisque, depuis le début du festival, les organisateurs ont entr'ouvert la porte à Enesco et à d'Indy, puis accordé à Fauré une place plus importante. Malgré les courageuses lettres d'Enesco et de Honegger, qui s'étalent dans une vitrine des Champs-Elysées, Florent Schmitt sera-t-il exclu jusqu'à la fin ? Ce serait fâcheux, non pour lui, mais pour ses contempteurs.

Jadis sifflée aux concerts Colonne, la suite symphonique de Protée fut accueillie avec sympathie. D'immenses acclamations saluèrent les dernières mesures de la longue, de la cérébrale, de la pruvaine Troisième Symphonie de William Schuman : ravissement ou délivrance ? Au vrai, cet ouvrage est un désert d'ennui avec, çà et là, des caravanes de lieux communs.

Vint le Sacre du Printemps, c'est-à-dire l'originalité vraie, l'arsenal des trouvailles dont tant de compositeurs, ensuite, usèrent et abusèrent. Certes, le monde entier n'a pas attendu 1952 pour effacer le scandale de la première représentation donnée le 28 mai 1913, en ce même théâtre des Champs-Elysées par le même chef. Tout de même, la présence de Strawinsky dans une loge, la silhouette massive de Pierre Monteux, boulonné sur l'estrade comme une statue sur son socle, l'autorité magistrale du grand chef, l'économie de ses gestes (il se contente, prosaïquement, de battre la mesure !), la couleur de l'orchestre, cette musique, surtout...

J'ai rarement vu de plus folle ovation ! Monteux dans les bras de Strawinsky, l'orchestre debout, l'arme au poing, une salle crépitante, le glorieux chef-d'œuvre rayonnant de toutes ses flammes — c'était vraiment, en ce soir de mai, le sacre du printemps, l'apothéose du génie et l'anniversaire de la gratitude.

Clarendon.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 10 1952

Paris-presse-l'intransigeant 10-5-1952

L'APOTHEOSE DE PIERRE MONTEUX

au Théâtre des Champs-Elysées

LE second concert du Boston Symphony Orchestra n'avait plus rien à nous apprendre sur la virtuosité supérieure de ces instrumentistes d'élite qui, mardi dernier, dans un programme extrêmement brillant, avaient ébloui le public parisien, mais la soirée d'hier nous a permis d'apprécier la maîtrise d'un sympathique revenant, notre compatriote Pierre Monteux qui, après une si longue absence, a retrouvé intacte l'admiration que lui avaient valu ses extraordinaires qualités de chef d'orchestre et de musicien.

Quelles hautes leçons ce merveilleux artiste inflige à nos danseurs d'estrade qui se croient obligés de trépigner pour conduire le plus tranquille andantino !. Tout son travail est accompli aux répétitions. Devant le public, sa longue et fine baguette se contente de superviser l'exécution avec une discrète vigilance. Il a l'œil et l'oreille à tout, mais ne fait rien pour en donner la sensation à ses auditeurs. Ce n'est pas lui qui accable ses musiciens de « départ » spectaculaires et d'injonctions gesticulantes stimulant l'effroi d'une catastrophe imminente qu'il conjure à bon compte. Ses indications très précises et très efficaces, ne sont jamais humiliantes pour ses instrumentistes.

Le « Sacre du Printemps » quarante ans après : un triomphe !

Son programme était exempt de toute recherche de succès. La 3e Symphonie de Pyper avait été remplacée par une Fantaisie de Vaugham Williams qui mit en valeur toute la magnificence des cordes de l'orchestre, des fragments de Prothée de Darius Milhaud — dont l'Ouverture et la Pastorale sont charmantes — et une très scolastique Symphonie de William Schuman préparaient l'entrée triomphale du Sacre du Printemps de Strawinsky, dirigé par cœur avec une incroyable aisance et interprété avec une splendeur qui bouleversa l'assistance. Et je suppose qu'en s'inclinant sans fin pour répondre aux ovations frénétiques des mélomanes de 1952, ce courageux pionnier songeait à la matinée historique du Casino de Paris où nous le vîmes révéler ce chef-d'œuvre, il y a quarante ans, au milieu des huées et des cris d'animaux, pendant que Saint-Saëns, dans une loge, martelait le plancher d'une canne indignée en criant : « Au fou ! ». Que de chemin parcouru depuis cette époque !...

Emile VUILLERMOZ.

Famed Philadelphia Orchestra To Return in Bushnell Series

THE famed Philadelphia Orchestra, which has been playing an annual concert in Hartford for many years and will return next season in the Bushnell Symphony Series, recently completed a most unusual project in international good will, according to information received by Managing Director William H. Mortensen of the Bushnell. The project revolved around $11,000 worth of musical instruments.

The Santiago Symphony Orchestra in Chile, and students in the Santiago Conservatory, were finding it impossible or inordinately expensive to obtain certain musical instruments. Members of the large Philadelphia Orchestra undertook the task of combing musical markets, following a request from the Braden Copper Company, which has headquarters in New York and heavy holdings in Chile.

The musicians located, among other instruments of the finest quality but at bargain prices, a celesta, harpsichord, trombones, clarinets, flutes, oboes, tympani, trumpets and drums. The copper company footed the $11,000 bill, and without prior announcement the instruments were shipped to Santiago to delight the musicians.

The Philadelphia, under the baton of Eugene Ormandy, will be in Hartford as one of the five outstanding orchestras making up the Bushnell Symphony Series, for which subscriptions are now being taken. Others are the Danish State Symphony, the Cleveland, Boston and New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestras.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
MAY 11 1952

Boston Orchestra, Monteux to Play in Wilson Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, will play in Pasadena Civic Auditorium on May 3, 1953, as the ninth and an extra attraction in the Elmer Wilson concert series.

The series will open with Nadine Conner, soprano, and David Poleri, tenor, on Oct. 9. Other events will include George London, Nov. 21; Vladimir Horowitz, Dec. 12; Solomon, Jan. 22; Victoria de los Angeles, Feb. 17; First Operatic Symphonette, Vladimir Bakaleinikoff conducting, March 3; Jan Peerce, March 27, and Carol Brice, April 21.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 11 1952

French Critics Give Enthusiastic Praise To Boston Symphony

Paris, May 10 — (AP) — French music critics continue to heap lyrical praise on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductor Charles Munch.

Commented Le Figaro: "It is an extraordinary ensemble. Its dominating quality is certainly its ardor, even its fanaticism."

The paper said: "Each one plays his instrument so well, the instrument is of such quality, the confidence in the leader is so total, the pieces have been so carefully rehearsed that the execution is absolutely perfect."

The Boston Orchestra gave its first European concert Tuesday night as part of the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival and gives another tonight.

"Is there in the world an orchestra which can interpret a program of modern music as brilliantly" as the Boston Symphony, asked the critic of Le Parisien Libere. "I don't know, but . . . all the musicians show a quality that I can never remember having heard before."

Galaconcert in Den Haag

KONINGIN Juliana woonde Zaterdagavond in Den Haag het galaconcert bij van het Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tijdens de pauze werd de dirigent Charles Münch links) aan de Koningin voorgesteld. In het midden de vice-voorzitter van het Concertgebouworkest, mr. J. W. De Jong Schouwenburg.

Boston Symphonie Orkest - een kolossaal ensemble

NAUWELIJKS is de tournée van het Boston Symphonie Orkest, uitgenodigd door het Concertgebouw N.V., begonnen of reeds behoort zij tot het verleden. Men hoorde het ensemble Zaterdagavond in Den Haag onder zijn vaste dirigent Charles Münch, in aanwezigheid van koningin Juliana, de vice-president van de Raad van State, jhr. mr. F. Beelaerts van Blokland en het nagenoeg voltallige corps diplomatique — men hoorde het gistermiddag in Amsterdam, aangevoerd door Pierre Monteux.

Magnifiek apparaat

OP de prestaties van dit fameuze orkest uitvoerig terug te komen dunkt ons overbodig, omdat wij hierover reeds berichtten uit Parijs. Te meer omdat de indrukken van toen volledig worden gedekt door die van nu. Hier speelt een magnifiek apparaat, dat perfect blijkt van organische gesloten heid, een apparaat, dat prompt elke aanwijzing van zijn dirigent honoreert, een apparaat tegelijkertijd dat zich het dynamisme en de technische perfectie als onmiddellijk doelwit koos. Het bereikte dit triomfantelijk en men constateert andermaal dat deze deugden, hoe noodzakelijk en onontbeerlijk ook als grondslag, zich wreken wanneer niet gecompleteerd door die eigenschappen, welke het karakter en het wezen bepalen van de interpretatie als zodanig. Wij schreven dit eergisteren — wij schrijven dit ook nu.

ONDER MÜNCH

Doch anderzijds: hoor zulk een „Daphnis et Chloe" van Ravel onder Münch. Letterlijk geen moeilijkheid, en zij zijn hier opgestapeld, of zij wordt opgelost via de virtuositeit van kunnen en klank. Van de ademende pianissimi tot de als gegraveerde crescendi leeft het geluid, enerverend en opwindend. Poëtisch en voluptueus in de langzame aanvang als extatisch in het vervoerde en bezeten tweede deel, ervaart men het stuk door dit Boston Symphonie Orkest onder Münch in een en al genieting van geraffineerd en verrukkelijk geluid. Zelden heeft het in onze concertzalen dermate los van de hels moeilijke noten geklonken, zo geïnspireerd en zo enivrerend van climax.

ONDER MONTEUX

Deze openbaring herhaalde zich Zondagmiddag toen Pierre Monteux een „Alborado del Gracioso" van Ravel in de „Tijl" van Strauss bracht. Andermaal deze volstrekte gekundheid, deze onwankelbare discipline en deze levenspenderende vitaliteit. Andermaal ook de kneedbaarheid van dit apparaat, zijn nerveuze gespannenheid en zijn intelligente virtuositeit. Dit alles bereikt met een minimum aan gebaar door Pierre Monteux, die zijn keurcorps leidt door deze terreinen, die als bezaaid zijn met muzikale en technische boobie-traps en het een uiterste aan rendement afdwingt. Rendement aan finesse, aan plastiek van detail en conceptie — de spanning ladend en vasthoudend in de hachelijke fermate in Strauss en de zaal als electriseert.

Nu ligt dit alles achter ons — doch de herinnering blijft, die aan een kolossaal ensemble.

H. J. M. MULLER.

RECEPTIE

Na afloop van de matinée was er in de grote foyer van het Concertgebouw een receptie, waar de leden van het Boston Symphonie Orkest gelegenheid hadden kennis te maken met die van het Concertgebouworkest en waar de vice-voorzitter van het Concertgebouw, mr. J. W. de Jong Schouwenburg, zijn gasten begroette. Hij gewaagde van zijn erkentelijkheid voor de komst van het Boston Symphonie Orkest naar ons kleine land; hij legde de nadruk op het instructieve element er van voor ons muziekleven en nadat hij de moeilijkheden van een dergelijke organisatie uitdrukkelijk had gereleveerd, sprak hij de hoop uit, dat de beide orkesten elkander hun geheimen zouden uitwisselen. Dan is het woord aan mr. Judd, organisator van deze tournée door Europa, die zijn dank uitspreekt voor de ontvangst door het Concertgebouwbestuur en zegt te hopen eenmaal ons orkest te mogen ontmoeten in Boston.

Beminnelijk en onvermoeid als steeds sprak ook Monteux en zulks op zijn wijze, onbevangen, ongewichtig, maar, vriend van ons land als hij sinds jaren is, allerhartelijkst. Ook hij, gelijk mr. De Jong Schouwenburg, legt het accent op de verbroedering. Als vierde spreker fungeert de voorzitter van de vereniging „Het Concertgebouworkest", de heer D. C. Mesman, die zich richt als collega tot collega's en ten slotte een Nederlands lid van het Boston Orkest, Boaz Piller, die in ons land, na 42 jaar, ons orkest in rechte en ongezouten Nederlandse bewoordingen, een saluut brengt namens het eigen orkest.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By [illegible] ELIE

Eleven Courses For Every Meal

I am [illegible] the Ed[illegible] York [illegible] wisdom [illegible]

I [illegible] one of my [illegible] mured that [illegible] of dramatic [illegible] trouble is wh[illegible] cosis, or [illegible] stomach with [illegible] danse, de bon [illegible] sense, de crawl[illegible]

They always [illegible] ships were gay, [illegible] they had 11 [illegible] ing from Cavi[illegible] suzettes, from snoo[illegible] nests of love. And [illegible] either, that you shou[illegible] have your head examined if you imagine you would ever get any work done.

What and Why of It

But the work must be done, and so I shall begin with a few [illegible] as to what this is [illegible] follows:

1. The Boston [illegible] orchestra, of which I am [illegible] Symphonic, left Boston on the morning of [illegible] Paris on [illegible] debut in a cele[illegible] May 6. Thus, in this more or less continued narrative of [illegible] events, impressions and adventures of the orchestra, and the tour you have to move back a week or so in time.

I am writing this [illegible] for example, on May 1 on the [illegible] France, but it won't appear in this [illegible] today.

The reason for [illegible] in using airmail rather than cable. [illegible] much for the technical aspects of the situation which are not as complicated [illegible] might seem.

2. Because you missed [illegible] to all this, which [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] is now making its first European [illegible] of its history. [illegible] in 11 European cities [illegible] days ashore. There [illegible] along these lines: Paris, May 6 and 8; The Hague, May 10; [illegible] May 12; Brussels, May 13; [illegible] Berlin, May 15; Stuttgart, May 16; Metz, May 18; Lyons, May 20; Paris, May 21; Bordeaux, May [illegible]; London, May 26. The whole tour is under the auspices of the U. S. Army.

Cultural Project

3. These concerts are sponsored by the Congress of Cultural [illegible] an international organization [illegible] phers, composers, painters, sculptors and creative artists in [illegible] at this moment [illegible] Its stated purpose [illegible] defense of freedom [illegible] quiry, free expression and [illegible] expansion of intellectual [illegible] where," which is necessary a stand as anyone [illegible]

The headquarters [illegible] of Cultural Freedom [illegible] tary general [illegible] Nicholas Nabokov [illegible] poser who served [illegible] World War II [illegible] of his career with [illegible] Stravinsky, has [illegible] war and so on. [illegible] notice when [illegible]

And in this [illegible] gress is sponsoring [illegible] of the arts [illegible] under the general [illegible] the 20th Century [illegible] long program, which [illegible] stresses concert [illegible] ferent orchestras [illegible] York City Ballet [illegible] ten's "Billy Budd" [illegible] Saints in Tampa [illegible] etc.), art shows [illegible] music, lectures [illegible] Huxley, Forster, [illegible] etc.)

Long and Involved

How the Boston [illegible] American orchestra [illegible] fell into this [illegible] and involved [illegible] that Mr. Nabokov [illegible] brought out by [illegible] a warm spot in [illegible] tra aside from [illegible] as one of the [illegible] symphonies. The [illegible] Münch undoubtedly [illegible] tation; Mr. Münch's [illegible] is second to none.

[179]

ALGEMEEN DAG

oston sym

N HAAG. — Wanneer een [illegible] dat van Boston, dat de naam [illegible] beste ter wereld te zijn, zijn [illegible] ek aan de cultuurcentra van [illegible] Europa brengt, kan men staa[illegible] op een perfecte voorbereidin[illegible] een er ten gehore zal worde[illegible] ht. Het kan echter de meest [illegible] e toehoorder niet zijn ontgaa[illegible] incidentele voorbereiding [illegible] uze resultaten kan opleveren. [illegible] de scholing de hoogst der[illegible] d heeft bereikt. Dit orkest i[illegible] dat[illegible] eenheid, zowel in zijn ge[illegible] als in zijn geheel. Wie dit c[illegible] mag de naam van wijlen Serge [illegible] zky, die het Bostonorkest gedu[illegible] ren leidde, niet onvermeld la[illegible] lussen staat de Franse dirigent [illegible] Münch ten onzent wel beker[illegible] e drie jaren voor dit keurorke[illegible] de het concert, op Zaterdagav[illegible] Haag dat door de Koningi[illegible] aanwezigheid werd vereerd [illegible] genoot Pierre Monteux, als [illegible] dritte verwelkomd, dirigeer[illegible] st Zondagmiddag te Amsterda[illegible] it de veelheid van indrukken [illegible] slechts enkele greepen te do[illegible] zadelde sonoriteit, welke in de [illegible] schakeringen gehandhaafd blij[illegible] de voorgrond. Bij alle verfijni[illegible] k steeds gezond en imposan[illegible] der persoonlijk dan bijvoorbe[illegible] de Weense Philharmonie of [illegible] gebouworkest, hetgeen ook [illegible] gaten van de houtblazers to[illegible] nt. Wat een heftig en virtue[illegible] t als Münch met dit pracht[illegible] l weet te doen is duizelingv[illegible] e sloegen de golven in La [illegible] bussy! Te hoog welicht. Naas[illegible] rende vertolkingen van De[illegible] loé van Ravel en de Sympho[illegible] tique van Berlioz, orgieën va[illegible] aardeerde men de ouvert[illegible] bool for Scandal van de A[illegible] muel Barber, een fris, onschu[illegible] ziek.

Monteux deed het rustiger a[illegible]

Galaconcert in Den Haag

Boston Symphonie Orkest - een kolossaal ensemble

NAUWELIJKS is de tournée van het Boston Symphonie Orkest, uitgenodigd door het Concertgebouw N.V., begonnen of reeds behoort zij tot het verleden. Men hoorde het ensemble Zaterdagavond in Den Haag onder zijn vaste dirigent Charles Münch, in aanwezigheid van koningin Juliana, de vice-president van de Raad van State, jhr. mr. F. Beelaerts van Blokland en het nagenoeg voltallige corps diplomatique — men hoorde het gistermiddag in Amsterdam, aangevoerd door Pierre Monteux.

Magnifiek apparaat

OP de prestaties van dit fameuze orkest uitvoerig terug te komen dunkt ons overbodig, omdat wij hierover reeds berichtten uit Parijs. Te meer omdat de indrukken van toen volledig worden gedekt door die van nu. Hier speelt een magnifiek apparaat, dat perfect blijkt van organische geslotenheid, een apparaat, dat prompt elke aanwijzing van zijn dirigent honoreert, een apparaat tegelijkertijd dat zich het dynamisme en de technische perfectie als onmiddellijk doelwit koos. Het bereikte dit triomfantelijk en men constateert andermaal dat deze deugden, hoe noodzakelijk en onontbeerlijk ook als grondslag, zich wreken wanneer niet gecompleteerd door die eigenschappen, welke het karakter en het wezen bepalen van de interpretatie als zodanig. Wij schreven dit eergisteren — wij schrijven dit ook nu.

ONDER MÜNCH

Doch anderzijds: hoor zulk een „Daphnis et Chloe" van Ravel onder Münch. Letterlijk geen moeilijkheid, en zij zijn hier opgestapeld, of zij wordt opgelost via de virtuositeit van kunnen en klank. Van de ademende pianissimi tot de als gegraveerde crescendi leeft het geluid, enerverend en opwindend. Poëtisch en voluptueus in de langzame aanvang als extatisch in het vervoerde en bezeten tweede deel, ervaart men het stuk door dit Boston Symphonie Orkest onder Münch in een en al genieting van geraffineerd en verrukkelijk geluid. Zelden heeft het in onze concertzalen dermate los van de hels moeilijke noten geklonken, zo geïnspireerd en zo enivrerend van climax.

ONDER MONTEUX

Deze openbaring herhaalde zich Zondagmiddag toen Pierre Monteux een „Alborado del Gracioso" van Ravel in de „Tijl" van Strauss bracht. Andermaal deze volstrekte gekundheid, deze onwankelbare discipline en deze levenspenderende vitaliteit. Andermaal ook de kneedbaarheid van dit apparaat, zijn nerveuze gespannenheid en zijn intelligente virtuositeit. Dit alles bereikt met een minimum aan gebaar door Pierre Monteux, die zijn keurcorps leidt door deze terreinen, die als bezaaid zijn met muzikale en technische boobie-traps en het een uiterste aan rendement afdwingt. Rendement aan finesse, aan plastiek van detail en conceptie — de spanning ladend en vasthoudend in de hachelijke fermate in Strauss en de zaal als electriseert.

Nu ligt dit alles achter ons — doch de herinnering blijft, die aan een kolossaal ensemble.

H. J. M. MULLER.

RECEPTIE

Na afloop van de matinée was er in de grote foyer van het Concertgebouw een receptie, waar de leden van het Boston Symphonie Orkest gelegenheid hadden kennis te maken met die van het Concertgebouworkest en waar de vice-voorzitter van het Concertgebouw, mr. J. W. de Jong Schouwenburg, zijn gasten begroette. Hij gewaagde van zijn erkentelijkheid voor de komst van het Boston Symphonie Orkest naar ons kleine land; hij legde de nadruk op het instructieve element er van voor ons muziekleven en nadat hij de moeilijkheden van een dergelijke organisatie uitdrukkelijk had gereleveerd, sprak hij de hoop uit, dat de beide orkesten elkander hun geheimen zouden uitwisselen. Dan is het woord aan mr. Judd, organisator van deze tournée door Europa, die zijn dank uitspreekt voor de ontvangst door het Concertgebouwbestuur en zegt te hopen eenmaal ons orkest te mogen ontmoeten in Boston.

Beminnelijk en onvermoeid als steeds spreekt ook Monteux en zulks op zijn wijze, onbevangen, ongewichtig, maar, vriend van ons land als hij sinds jaren is, allerhartelijkst. Ook hij, gelijk mr. De Jong Schouwenburg, legt het accent op de verbroedering. Als vierde spreker fungeert de voorzitter van de vereniging „Het Concertgebouworkest", de heer D. C. Mesman, die zich richt als collega tot collega's en ten slotte een Nederlands lid van het Boston Orkest, Boaz Piller, die in ons land, na 42 jaar, ons orkest in rechte en ongezouten Nederlandse bewoordingen, een saluut brengt namens het eigen orkest.

KONINGIN Juliana woonde Zaterdagavond in Den Haag het galaconcert bij van het Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tijdens de pauze werd de dirigent Charles Münch links) aan de Koningin voorgesteld. In het midden de vice-voorzitter van het Concertgebouworkest, mr. J. W. De Jong Schouwenburg.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 2 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

(Mr. Elie ... with the Boston Symphony ...)

Eleven Courses For Every Meal

I am ... in my cabin on the Ile ... out of New York ... my hands and wishing I ... I too, am ... one of my cabin ... so just ... mured that he wishes ... and the ... of dramamine ... trouble is what is known as Ile de France-cosis, or immense distension ... stomach with complications de ... danse, de bon company and, in no ... sense, de champagne.

They always told me that French ships were gay. But they didn't tell me they had 11 courses for every meal ranging from Caviar frais malossal to crêpe suzettes, from gnocchi a la Romana to nests of love. And they didn't tell me, either, that you should have your head examined if you imagined you would ever get any work done.

What and Why of It

But the work must be done, and so I shall begin with a few routine statements as to what this is all about and why, as follows:

1. The Boston Symphony orchestra, of which I am now an appendix, left Boston on the morning of April 28, arrived in Paris on May fifth and made its European debut in a concert at the Opera House on May 6. Thus, in this more or less continued narrative of the events, impressions and adventures of the orchestra, and the tour you have to move back a week or so in time.

I am writing this piece, for example, on May 1 on the Ile de France, but it won't appear in this space until today.

The reason for this is that in filing these dispatches I am using airmail rather than cable. So much for the technical aspects of the situation which are not as complicated as they might seem.

2. In case you missed the background to all this, which seems hardly likely, the Boston Symphony orchestra is now making its first European tour in the 71 years of its history. It is to give 15 concerts in 11 European cities in the space of 21 days ashore. These concerts are scheduled along these lines: Paris, May 6 and 8; The Hague, May 10; Amsterdam, May 11; Brussels, May 12; Frankfurt, May 13, 14; Berlin, May 15; Strasbourg, May 17; Metz, May 18; Lyons, May 19; Paris, May 21; Bordeaux, May 23 and 24; London, May 26. The visit to Germany is under the auspices of the U. S. Army.

Cultural Project

3. These concerts are sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom, an international organization of writers, philosophers, composers, painters, scientists and creative artists in ... at this moment ... Its stated purpose ... defense of freedom ... quiry, free expression and the continuing expansion of ... where," which ... sary a stand as any ...

The headquarters ... of Cultural Freedom ... tary general of ... is Nicholas Nabokov, ... composer who served ... in World War II and ... of his career with ... Stravinsky, his ... war and so on, ... notice when published.

And in this ... gress is sponsoring ... of the arts of the ... under the general ... the 20th Century." ... long program, with ... stresses concert ... ferent orchestras ... York City Ballet ... ten's "Billy Budd ... Saints in Tarot ... etc.), art shows, ... music, lectures and ... Huxley, Forster, ... etc.)

Long and Involved

How the Boston ... American orchestra ... fell into this ... and involved story, ... that Mr. Nabokov ... brought out by the ... a warm spot in his ... tra aside from ... as one of the ... symphonies. The presence of Charles Munch undoubtedly influenced the invitation; Mr. Munch's reputation in Europe is second to none.

The finances are complicated, too, but the general understanding around is that the Congress itself is paying about two-thirds of the expenses from the gross receipts of the tour (already a sell-out with an American philanthropist guaranteeing the other third. The talk is that Julius Fleischmann is the guarantor, but this is only talk. In any case, the cost of the tour does not fall upon the subscribers and friends of the orchestra in Boston, nor on Boston itself. It is, in fact, a little of a pity, that Boston can't take any credit for helping to sponsor this tour. It gets all the credit but doesn't pay any of the bills.

This, I trust, takes care of the statistics. And now, after another slight repast of 11 courses, four wines and two brandies, I'll get on to something a little less ponderous ... if I can stay awake.

[179]

...ipping From
...ON, MASS.
...ERALD
...AY 12 1952

E ROVING EYE

RUDOLPH ELIE

...Europe on tour with the Boston ...ra.)

...Courses ...y Meal

...sely sitting in my cabin on ... three days out of New ...y head in my hands and ...stayed home. I feel awful, ...hat I am sea sick, though ...in mates is (he just mur- ...wishes he and the inventor ... were dead). No; my ...t is known as Ile de Fran- ...mense distension of the ...complications de party, de ...company and, in no small ...pagne.

...s told me that French ..., but they didn't tell me ...urses for every meal rang- ...r frais malossal to crepes ...gnocchi a la Romana to ... And they didn't tell me, ...u should have your head ...imagined you would ever ...one.

...Why of It

...k must be done, and so I ... a few routine statements ...is all about and why, as

...n Symphony orchestra, of ... appendix, left Boston ... of April 28, arrived in ...th and made its European ...rt at the Opera House on ...n this more or less con- ... of the events, impres- ...atures of the orchestra, ...ou have to move back a ...me.

... this piece, for example, ...he Ile de France, but it ... this space until today. ...or this is that in filing ...s I am using airmail ...ble. So much for the ... of the situation, which ...plicated as they might

...u missed the background ...n seems hardly likely, the ...y orchestra is now mak- ...pean tour in the 71 years ...it is to give 15 concerts ...cities in the space of 21 ...se concerts are scheduled ...: Paris, May 6 and 8; ... 10; Amsterdam, May 11; ...; Frankfurt, May 13, 14; ...; Strasbourg, May 17; ... Lyons, May 19; Paris, ...x, May 23 and 24; Lon- ...he visit to Germany is ...s of the U. S. Army.

...ject

...rts are sponsored by the ...ural Freedom, an inter- ...tion of writers, philoso- ... painters, scientists and ...n general about which, ...I know next to nothing. ...e is "the assertion and ...m of thought, freee in- ...sion and the continuing ...llectual freedom every- ... as good and as neces- ...y in the world today. ...ers of the Congress of ... is Paris. The secre- ... the organization is ..., a Russian-born com- ... in the U. S. Army in ... whose amusing account ...n personal sidelights on ...experiences during the ...enjoyed very favorable ...shed last year.

...anth of May, the Con- ...g a cultural exposition ...e free world in Paris ... title "Masterpieces of ...." While the month- ...h daily events, largely ...erformances, by 12 dif- ... also offers ballet (New ... opera (Benjamin Brit- ... and Thomson's "Four ...cts," Berg's "Wozzeck" ...church music, chamber ...d discussions (Auden, ...alraux Graham Greene,

...olved

...n Symphony, the only ... invited to participate, ...tional honor is a long ... but there is no doubt ... whose music was often ... late Koussevitzky, had ... heart for the orches- ...preciating its position ...ree ranking American ... presence of Charles ... influenced the invi- ... reputation in Europe

...agblad

SPORT

Pagina 4, 5 en 6

... Prijs 13 cent — 46 cent per week

...ORSTIN EN DIRIGENT

ALGEMEEN DAGBLAD

...Boston symphonie orkest

...DEN HAAG. — Wanneer een orkest ... naam heeft ... in eerste ... van het ... staat ma- ... van ... ge- ... de ... sco- ... uitzon. dat ... slechts ... n- ... denkbare ... ... laten. ... de Franse ... Cha- ... bezond. na ... Concertgebouworkest. H ... Zondagmiddag in ... de Koningin met ... vereerd. Zij ... Mauleon, als steed ... dirigeerde re ... Amsterdam. ... de ... vallen. ... doen. Le ... de zicht- ... ...

Lib. Lyon. Mardi 13 Mai 1952

Lundi 19 Mai, à l'Opéra de Lyon

PIERRE MONTEUX

dirigera l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston

Pierre MONTEUX

Il y a encore quelques jours, le Boston Symphony Orchestra n'avait pas encore franchi l'Atlantique. La réputation d'une des formations les plus fameuses des Etats-Unis n'était pourtant plus à faire en Europe où, tant le renom de ses chefs successifs que la diffusion de ses enregistrements, lui avaient valu une véritable popularité.

On sait que dans le cadre de « L'œuvre du XX^e siècle », le Boston Symphony Orchestra est venu donner à Paris un concert qui préludait ainsi à la tournée qu'il entreprend en Europe. Les mélomanes lyonnais peuvent se réjouir : lundi 19 mai, à l'Opéra, Pierre Monteux dirigera cet orchestre qui a remporté un véritable triomphe à Paris.

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston a été créé en 1881 par Henry Lee Higginson, financier et philanthrope, qui entretint cette compagnie pendant 37 ans. En 1918, Higginson, âgé de 80 ans, lui donna un conseil d'administration et, depuis, l'existence de l'orchestre est assurée par des dons, des legs et la contribution annuelle des mélomanes de la ville. Il comprend 105 musiciens.

Le premier chef fut Georg Henschel qui vint de Grande-Bretagne pour diriger un groupe de 60 exécutants. D'éminents musiciens lui succédèrent, parmi lesquels on compte Arthur Nickisch, Max Fieldler, Karl Muck, le compositeur français Henri Rabaud — qui tint la baguette au cours de la saison 1918-19 — suivi de Pierre Monteux, un Parisien qui avait fait ses preuves à l'orchestre du Metropolitan Opera de New-York. C'est Pierre Monteux qui sera au pupitre lundi prochain. En 1924, Serge Koussevitzky prit la direction de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston, direction qu'il conserva jusqu'à sa retraite, en 1949. Charles Munch fut alors choisi pour prendre la direction de la célèbre formation. Rappelons que Charles Munch dirigea à Paris les concerts de l'orchestre du Conservatoire de 1937 à 1948.

C'est Charles Munch qui a puissamment contribué à maintenir la réputation de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston. Outre sa sympathie bien connue pour Berlioz, Debussy et Ravel, il a introduit au programme des œuvres de compositeurs américains comme Aaron Copland, Barber, David Diamond et Foss. Il a également présenté des œuvres avec chœurs : les deux « Passions » et l' « Oratorio de Noël » de Bach ; le « Requiem » de Berlioz ; la « Messe en sol majeur » de Schubert ; « Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher », d'Honegger, notamment.

Pendant la saison — d'octobre à avril — l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston donne régulièrement 63 concerts, sans compter les tournées dans les villes de l'est et les séances de musique consacrées aux collèges et universités des Etats-Unis. En été, il participe au Berkshire Music Festival de Tanglewood, à l'ouest du Massachusetts, qui attire chaque année plus de cent mille personnes.

Il convient de porter encore à l'actif de la célèbre formation ses « Pops », concerts populaires qui se poursuivent en mai et juin de chaque année depuis 1885 et qui sont consacrés à l'opérette et à la musique « semi-classique », et ses concerts gratuits en plein air, donnés en juillet, sur le quai de la Charles River

LE PROGRÈS

LA MUSIQUE

L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON

DU « Boston Symphonic Orchestra » nous avons déjà écrit, et notre collaborateur parisien en a, hier, loué dans ce journal « la formation magnifique, puissante, disciplinée » ; son article célébrait aussi la rentrée, à Paris, de M. Pierre Monteux, qui va diriger, après-demain lundi, le concert unique du Grand-Théâtre.

M. Monteux, croyons-nous, n'a jamais dirigé à Lyon ; nos concitoyens et les nombreux amateurs qui sans doute viendront de toute la région lyonnaise, sont curieux d'entendre et de voir ce chef français excellent et célèbre depuis plus de trente ans, qui a parcouru la plus grande partie de sa carrière aux Etats-Unis, surtout à Boston et à San-Francisco.

L'établissement du programme, spécialement destiné à notre ville, n'a pas dû être facile. Nos compatriotes devaient y être représentés : ils le sont dignement par Berlioz (« Benvenuto Cellini ») et par Maurice Ravel (« Alborada del gracioso ») ; les maîtres de l'Allemagne aussi ; on a retenu les noms de Brahms avec sa troisième symphonie, et de Richard Strauss avec l'éblouissante fantaisie de « Till Eulenspiegel ». De ces quatre œuvres l'exécution et l'interprétation dansa américaine présenteront l'intérêt le plus vif, le plus complexe.

La France et l'Allemagne étant bien honorées, un choix se présentait, difficile à faire : quel compositeur américain serait appelé à l'honneur de représenter son propre pays ? On imagine que la compétition a été nombreuse : tant de musiciens, citoyens des Etats-Unis mais d'origine diverse, méritaient ce privilège. Les quelques noms connus en France ont été éliminés ; un seul a été retenu, complètement ignoré chez nous, celui de M. William Schuman. Origine évidemment germanique, naissance à New-York, formation musicale en partie au pays de Mozart, à Salzbourg, mais achevée en Amérique, M. Schuman a été professeur dans diverses universités, directeur de l'édition Schirmer, puis de la Juillard School.

Né en 1910, M. William Schuman a composé de nombreuses partitions, cantates, symphonies, ballets, chœurs, trios et quatuors à cordes. Il est considéré par ses compatriotes comme digne de les représenter dans les concerts à l'étranger.

Sa symphonie, que nous entendrons après-demain, est d'une couleur qui surprendra les musiciens habitués à se composer de deux parties, chacune prenant chacune deux mouvements. Ainsi se succèdent quatre pièces de nom et vraisemblablement de style classique : « Passacaille », « Fugue », « Choral », « Toccata ». Cette dénomination conservatrice, voire traditionnaire, couvre-t-elle une partition très moderne ? Souhaitons que son noble encadrement par Berlioz et Brahms, Ravel et Strauss, ne paraisse pas trop riche et ne nuise pas à la symphonie américaine.

L. A.

---

magistral, exceptionnel. Sans exagération expressive, sans outrance, sans enflure il a réalisé une exécution musicale de la plus grande valeur, l'une des plus parfaites que l'on ait jamais entendues au Grand-Théâtre, avec cette extraordinaire représentation de Tristan et Isolde achève la saison lyrique 1951-1952.

Georges MANSUET.

Le grand événement artistique de la saison sera sans doute la venue à Lyon de cette grande formation symphonique, puisqu'elle ne comporte pas moins de 110 exécutants, qu'est le « Boston Symphony Orchestra », qui se fera entendre le lundi 19 mai, à 21 heures, à l'Opéra, sous la direction de Pierre Monteux.

Ce concert bénéficie d'un programme de choix que nous donnons ci-dessous :

Ouverture de Benvenuto Cellini : Berlioz ;
3e Symphonie : Brahms ;
3e Symphonie : William Schuman ;
Alborado del Gracioso : Ravel ;
Till Eulenspiegel : R. Strauss.

AUX CÉLESTINS

Après le « Festival de la Magie » qui connut du succès, un second spectacle de variétés attira un nombreux public aux Célestins pendant la Foire de Lyon.

Nous avons applaudi d'abord des acrobates, Tarzan et son fameux singe-homme Ponjo, des prestidigitateurs, une excellente séance de transmission de pensée avec Myroska, virtuose de l'intuition ; ensuite apparurent sur la scène les Après une savante et vivante causerie de M. Feschotte, l'éminent critique, sur Vivaldi, le « prêtre roux de Venise » et sur Edouard Lalo, Jean Witkowski, aussi brillant violoncelliste que chef d'orchestre, accompagné par l'orchestre régional, dirigé par M. Zuccone, exécuta dans un très beau style où la finesse alternait avec la fougue, un concerto de Vivaldi et un de Lalo.

Wandy TWOREK

Un concert organisé par le Consulat de Danemark à Lyon nous révéla le célèbre violoniste danois Wandy Tworek que l'on peut classer parmi les meilleurs virtuoses internationaux.

Une sonate de Bach et une sonate de Bartok, la Trille du diable de Tartini, des pièces de Paganini, d'auteurs scandinaves et Tzigane de Ravel, ont fait apprécier la belle sonorité, tour à tour puissante, profonde et pure dans les notes filées, l'archet souple et mordant, le « staccato » d'une précision rare de cet artiste.

L'exécution magistrale de la curieuse sonate de Bartok, œuvre âpre, sauvage et colorée, d'une difficulté immense et Tzigane de Ravel, provoquèrent les acclamations d'un auditoire d'élite, heureux de rendre ainsi hommage à ce grand violoniste.

Edouard COMMETTE

Notre compatriote, l'organiste Edouard Commette, qui jouit depuis de longues années de l'estime et de l'affection de ses élèves, de ses amis, de ses admirateurs et aussi d'une renommée mondiale, grâce à la diffusion de ses disques enregistrés, vient de se faire entendre à Saint-Jean, dans notre vieille cathédrale riche en trésors et en souvenirs du passé.

Dans des œuvres de Bach, dont il est sans doute à l'heure présente, avec Marcel Dupré, l'un des meilleurs interprètes, et dans des pièces variées de Reveyron, de Vierne, de Dupré et de lui-même, Edouard Commette nous entraîna sur les sommets.

Comme un prêtre à l'autel, le maître, qui est la simplicité, l'amabilité en personne, officie vraiment à ses claviers, là-haut, dans une tribune voilée d'ombre et de mystère. Il sert la musique avec un amour, un respect infini et voilà ce qui donne la vleur et le rayonnement de ses exécutions inoubliables.

Jean CHACHUAT.

CHARBONNIERES

à deux tours de roues de Lyon

CASINO

DINERS - SPECTACLES

● TOUS LES JOURS ●

Service spécial d'autocars
Départ de Lyon, Place Antonin-Poncet

Vendredi 9 mai.

OPERA. — 20 h. 30 : Rosario et Antonio.
CELESTINS. — 20 h. 30 : Zoé, de Jean Marsan, avec l'auteur, Micheline Gary.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Gala des Evadés de Guerre.

Samedi 10 mai.

OPERA. — 20 h. 30 : Rosario et Antonio.
CELESTINS. — 20 h. 30 : Zoé.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Présentation de collection Worth ture, Paris.

Dimanche 11 mai.

OPERA. — 14 h. 30, 20 h. 30 : Rosario et Antonio.
CELESTINS. — 14 h. 30, 20 h. 30 : Zoé.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Matinée : dans le Parc du Casino [illegible] des petits de la Maternelle. — Soirée : Présentation de collection Worth. Haute couture, Paris.

Mercredi 14 mai.

SALLE MOLIERE. — 20 h. 30 : Chorale Concordia.

Jeudi 15 mai.

OPERA. — 20 h. 30 : La Veuve Joyeuse, avec M. Merkès, P. Merv Louisard.
CELESTINS. — 20 h. 30 : Chopin. Conférencier : E. TRILLAT.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Soirée Valentin Hauy.

Vendredi 16 mai.

OPERA. — 20 heures : La Veuve Joyeuse.

Samedi 17 mai.

OPERA. — 20 heures : La Veuve Joyeuse.

Dimanche 18 mai.

OPERA. — 14 h. 30, 20 heures : La Veuve Joyeuse.

Lundi 19 mai.

OPERA. — 21 heures : Le Boston Symphony Orchestra.
PALAIS DE LA MECANIQUE (Esplanade de la Foire). — 21 heures : Holiday On Ice 1952. Location Célestins.

Mardi 20 mai.

PALAIS DE LA MECANIQUE (Foire). — Holiday On Ice 1952.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Gala du Grand Prix. Présentation Mauguin, de Paris.

Meroredi 21 mai.

PALAIS DE LA MECANIQUE (Foire). — Holiday On Ice 1952.

Jeudi 22 mai.

PALAIS DE LA MECANIQUE (Foire). — 16 h., 21 h. : Holiday On Ice 1952.
CASINO DE CHARBONNIERES. — Gala du Grand Steeple.

Vendredi 23 mai.

OPERA. — 20 heures : La Veuve Joyeuse.
PALAIS DE LA MECANIQUE (Foire). — 16 heures : Holiday On Ice 1952.

TOUT LYON [181]

FEUILLETON

Jubel um das „Boston Symphony Orchestra"

Frankfurter Gastspiel unter Pierre Monteux im Großen Haus

Am Schluß des Konzertes, nach dem zündend gespielten „Till Eulenspiegel", verließen die faszinierten Besucher noch lange auf den Plätzen. Begeisterter Beifall rief Pierre Monteux, den Dirigenten, immer wieder auf das Podium. Mit liebenswerter Bescheidenheit und Bonhomie wies der berühmte französische Senior-meister des Taktstocks die Ovationen der Orchester zu, schließlich auch dessen jetzigem ständigem Leiter, Charles Münch, der im Publikum saß.

Ein ungewöhnlich erfreuliches musikalisches und gesellschaftliches Ereignis war dieses erste deutsche Gastspiel des viel genannten amerikanischen Elite-Orchesters. Man kannte den herrlichen Klangkörper, der mit den zwei Tage zuvor hier gehörten Berliner Philharmonikern die fast gleichaltrige Tradition (70 Jahre) hat, hierzulande bisher nur von Schallplatten. Seine fast unwahrscheinliche Vollkommenheit der Spielpräzision, der klanglichen Kultur — Ergebnis kontinuierlicher Erziehungsarbeit durch Spitzendirigenten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Kussewitzky, um nur die hervorstechendsten Namen zu nennen —, diese Qualitäten offenbarten sich am Dienstagabend in Frankfurt hinreißend. Schnittig und federnd elastisch „kam" das Rhythmische, musterhaft durchsichtig bot sich das Klangbild im beweglichen Wechsel- und Zusammenspiel der Instrumentalgruppen. Die Aufzählung der Orchestermitglieder im Programmheft verriet deren Abkunft aus aller Herren Länder. Ein eindrucksvolles Beispiel, wie im „Schmelztiegel" Amerika sich aus dem Beitrag verschiedenster Nationen eine eigene amerikanische Kulturleistung konsolidiert hat.

Die Ouvertüre zur Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" von Hector Berlioz — an sich ein schon etwas verblaßtes, nur noch in seinen impetuosen Allegro-Teilen noch stärker fesselndes Stück — wurde hier zum elektrisierenden Auftakt in der brillanten Art, wie sie durch Monteux und das Orchester klingendes Leben erhielt. Die Dritte Symphonie (F-dur) von Brahms, in Frankfurt lange nicht mehr gehört, erstand mit einer bei uns ungewohnten, gleichsam lateinischen Klarheit und Eleganz des Klanglichen, die aber in der Zurückdrängung des norddeutsch Schwerblütigen, Grüblerischen sehr ansprechen konnte. Als eine gewisse „pièce de résistance" erschien vielen Hörern wohl die Dritte Symphonie des Amerikaners William Schuman. Ein Werk von oft recht harter Linearität und in aggressiven, grellen Farben ausklingend, doch — wenn auch nicht bruchlos im formalen Aufbau — Aeußerung eines urwüchsig kraftvollen, unkonventionellen symphonischen Denkens. Als versöhnliches „Bonbon" gab es hiernach Maurice Ravels „Alborada del Grazioso", dessen burleske Pikanterie sich mit allen delikaten Finessen moderner Orchestersprache mitteilte. Zum Schluß, unnachahmlich funkelnd in seinen kapriziösen Lichtern, Richard Straußens genialstes Konzertwerk: „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche".

Pierre Monteux, der Siebenundsiebzigjährige, dessen Name bereits der Musikgeschichte angehört in Verbindung mit den Uraufführungen der entscheidenden Frühwerke Strawinskys, strahlte die Ruhe überlegener Meisterschaft am Dirigentenpult aus. Dabei spürte man aber eine Antriebskraft von außerordentlicher Intensität, die im Hinblick auf die vorgerückten Jahre des Künstlers ganz besondere Bewunderung wecken mußte. Ein Konzertabend, den die Musikfreunde nicht so bald vergessen werden.

Hugo PUETTER

Pierre Monteux in Frankfurt

Pierre Monteux, der 77jährige französische Dirigent, landete auf dem Rhein-Main-Flughafen, um das Gastspiel des Bostoner Symphony Orchestra im Frankfurter Großen Haus zu dirigieren. (Photo: Fenzl)

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS

CHARLES KIESGEN

252, Rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré - PARIS-8e

Teég. et Câbles : Cledela-Paris Téléph. : WAG. 21-25 et la suite

Boston symphony orchestra

visite spéciale Toute

à Lyon

Monsieur Judd

[183]

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester

FRANKFURTER KONZERT UNTER PIERRE MONTEUX

Auf dem Podium des Großen Hauses von Frankfurt hat das Bostoner Symphonieorchester Platz genommen. Man sieht die altgewohnte deutsche Aufstellung, die zweiten Geigen vorn auf der rechten Seite vor den Bratschen, die Celli auf der linken hinter den ersten Geigen. Der Raum nimmt die Klänge dieses im Ruf des besten amerikanischen Orchesters stehenden, soignierten Tonkörpers ohne Ungleichwertigkeit der Tonwirkung, soweit sie nicht in der Partitur vorgezeichnet ist, auf. Alle berühmten Orchester der Welt haben ihre Geschichte. Sie müssen an Erfahrungen und Widerständen lernen, an sich selbst und am Dirigenten wachsen, sie müssen sich vervollkommnen und darum umgestalten. Jahrzehnte gehen vorüber, bis ein Kollektiv von besten Musikern die Kultur des Ausdrucks und die Reaktionsfähigkeit erreicht, die von einer internationalen Geltung verlangt wird. Higginson heißt der wohltätige Gründer des Bostoner Orchesters, Lehrmeister waren Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck und Max Fiedler, bevor Pierre Monteux und Sergej Koussevitzky die Leitung übernahmen, die 1950 an den Elsässer Charles Munch überging.

Monteux, der 77jährige sympathische Dirigent, Typ des freundlichen, kultivierten Franzosen, wird bei seinem Eintritt herzlich begrüßt. Mit unauffälliger Freude an der Musik ist er ganz Sachlichkeit. Seine Taktbewegungen gehen bei ruhiger Haltung auf in der Gesamtheit der Zeichengebung. Auch Monteux dirigiert überwiegend das Auf und Ab der Affektströme, Akzente und Markierungen. Er hat ein sehr wachsames Auge, ist bestimmt mit den Einsätzen, ohne damit zu posieren. Die Reife seiner orchestralen Führung hat etwas sehr Gewinnendes. Er beginnt mit der schwungvoll feurigen Ouvertüre zu der Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz. Sie wird mit messerscharfem Zuschnitt wiedergegeben. Die amerikanische Musikwelt liebt solche Höchstleistungen von taktlicher und rhythmischer Genauigkeit. Dadurch entstand der Kult der Präzisionsorchester. Deutsche Meisterdirigenten setzen die Präzision im allgemeinen voraus. Man muß das sauerböse Gesicht von Furtwängler gesehen haben, wenn im Orchester gelegentlich einmal nicht präzise genug gespielt wird. Eine Ueberbetonung der Präzision kann jedoch Ausdruck von diktatorischer Herrschsucht sein und musikfeindlich werden. Man denke an Mozart oder gar an Schubert, deren Musik Gewaltsames und Herrisches so fernliegt. In der Berliozschen Ouvertüre ist maschinengenaue Ausführung schon eher angebracht. Die Wiedergabe verliert darin nichts, wenn man das Bostoner Orchester ganz aus der Nähe hört. Auch bei den letzten Pultreihen der Streicher ist kaum ein kleiner Phasenunterschied im Zusammenspiel wahrzunehmen.

Erstaunlich bei dem Franzosen Monteux ist der hohe Grad seiner Einfühlung in die Brahmssche Welt, und dazu noch in die am wenigsten populäre dritte Sinfonie. Aus der Sucht, Etikettierungen an Sinfonien anzubringen, entstand für sie der Beiname „heroisch". Er paßt kaum zu dieser F-dur-Sinfonie, wenn auch Gegensätzliches genug darin auftritt. Monteux' Realisation trug keine Zeichen der Uebersteigerung oder Ueberhitzung an sich. Sie war milde bewegt in den Mittelsätzen, reif, wie es zu Brahms gehört. — Als Neuheit für Frankfurt erklang die Sinfonie Nr. 3 von William Schumann, gelehrte Musik aus zwei Teilen mit Passacaglia und Fuge, Choral und Toccata, aber doch auch mehr noch und in einer Instrumentation, die dem amerikanischen Klangbedürfnis entspricht, hart, blendend, schmetternd von Blechbläsern und Schlageffekten und viel wechselnd in der Farbe. Im Choral geht es frömmer und nicht so wild weltlich zu. — Ein Vergnügen eigener Art wurde „Alborada del Grazioso" von Ravel aus dem Zyklus „Miroirs", der die Freude des Komponisten widerspiegelt. Geistreiche, ungehemmt losknallende Tollheiten in witzigster Instrumentation, sehr amüsant und brillant ausgeführt. — Als Abschluß noch Straußens „Till Eulenspiegel", auch von den Bostonern virtuos vorgetragen, etwas derber und temperamentvoller im Ausdruck als von deutschen Dirigenten, die der Schelmenweise in Rondoform gerne den Zug des Märchenhaften lassen. — Begeistert feierte man die amerikanischen Gäste. Viele bekannte Persönlichkeiten des deutschen Musiklebens aus dem Westen und Süden hatten sich eingefunden.

Fritz Brust.

Famed Orchestra Arrives

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown arriving in Frankfurt for EC concerts. Three members were born in Germany and shook their heads at the war ruins in Frankfurt. Story Page 2. —S&S Photo

Stars & Stripes
May 14 52

FEUILLETON

(Neue Presse)

Jubel um das „Boston Symphony Orchestra"

Frankfurter Gastspiel unter Pierre Monteux im Großen Haus

Am Schluß des Konzertes, nach dem zündend glanzvoll gespielten „Till Eulenspiegel", verharrten die faszinierten Besucher noch lange auf den Plätzen. Begeisterter Beifall rief Pierre Monteux, den Dirigenten, immer wieder auf das Podium. Mit liebenswerter Bescheidenheit und Bonhomie wies der berühmte französische Seniormeister des Taktstocks die Ovationen der Orchester zu, schließlich auch dessen jetzigem ständigem Leiter, Charles Münch, der im Publikum saß.

Ein glanzvolles musikalisches und gesellschaftliches Ereignis war dieses erste deutsche Gastspiel des viel genannten amerikanischen Elite-Orchesters. Man kannte den herrlichen Klangkörper, der mit den zwei Tage zuvor hier gehörten Berliner Philharmonikern die fast gleichaltrige Tradition (70 Jahre) hat, hierzulande bisher nur von Schallplatten. Seine fast unwahrscheinliche Vollkommenheit der Spielpräzision, der klanglichen Kultur — Ergebnis kontinuierlicher Erziehungsarbeit durch Spitzendirigenten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Kussewitzky, um nur die hervorstechendsten Namen zu nennen —, diese Qualitäten offenbarten sich am Dienstagabend in Frankfurt hinreißend. Schnittig und federnd elastisch „kam" das Rhythmische, musterhaft durchsichtig bot sich das Klangbild im beweglichen Wechsel- und Zusammenspiel der Instrumentalgruppen. Die Aufzählung der Orchestermitglieder im Programmheft verriet deren Abkunft aus aller Herren Länder. Ein einducksvolles Beispiel, wie im „Schmelztiegel" Amerika sich aus dem Beitrag verschiedenster Nationen eine eigene amerikanische Kulturleistung konsolidiert hat.

Die Ouvertüre zur Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" von Hector Berlioz — an sich ein schon etwas verblaßtes, nur noch in seinen impetuosen Allegro-Teilen noch stärker fesselndes Stück — wurde hier zum elektrisierenden Auftakt in der brillanten Art, wie sie durch Monteux und das Orchester klingendes Leben erhielt. Die Dritte Symphonie (F-dur) von Brahms, in Frankfurt lange nicht mehr gehört, erstand mit einer bei uns ungewohnten, gleichsam lateinischen Klarheit und Eleganz des Klanglichen, die aber in der Zurückdrängung des norddeutsch Schwerblütigen, Grüblerischen sehr ansprechen konnte. Als eine gewisse „pièce de résistance" erschien vielen Hörern wohl die Dritte Symphonie des Amerikaners William Schuman. Ein Werk von oft recht harter Linearität und in aggressiven, grellen Farben ausklingend, doch — wenn auch nicht bruchlos im formalen Aufbau — Aeußerung eines urwüchsig kraftvollen, unkonventionellen symphonischen Denkens. Als versöhnliches „Bonbon" gab es hiernach Maurice Ravels „Alborada del Grazioso", dessen burleske Pikanterie sich mit allen delikaten Finessen moderner Orchestersprache mitteilte. Zum Schluß, unnachahmlich funkelnd in seinen kapriziösen Lichtern, Richard Straußens genialstes Konzertwerk: „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche".

Pierre Monteux, der Siebenundsiebzigjährige, dessen Name bereits der Musikgeschichte angehört in Verbindung mit den Uraufführungen der entscheidenden Frühwerke Strawinskys, strahlte die Ruhe überlegener Meisterschaft am Dirigentenpult aus. Dabei spürte man aber eine Antriebskraft von außerordentlicher Intensität, die im Hinblick auf die vorgerückten Jahre des Künstlers ganz besondere Bewunderung wecken mußte. Ein Konzertabend, den die Musikfreunde nicht so bald vergessen werden.

Hugo PUETTER

Pierre Monteux in Frankfurt

Pierre Monteux, der 77jährige französische Dirigent, landete auf dem Rhein-Main-Flughafen, um das Gastspiel des Bostoner Symphony Orchestra im Frankfurter Großen Haus zu dirigieren. (Photo: Fenzl)

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester

FRANKFURTER KONZERT UNTER PIERRE MONTEUX

Auf dem Podium des Großen Hauses von Frankfurt hat das Bostoner Symphonieorchester Platz genommen. Man sieht die altgewohnte deutsche Aufstellung, die zweiten Geigen vorn auf der rechten Seite vor den Bratschen, die Celli auf der linken hinter den ersten Geigen. Der Raum nimmt die Klänge dieses im Ruf des besten amerikanischen Orchesters stehenden, soignierten Tonkörpers ohne Ungleichwertigkeit der Tonwirkung, soweit sie nicht in der Partitur vorgezeichnet ist, auf. Alle berühmten Orchester der Welt haben ihre Geschichte. Sie müssen an Erfahrungen und Widerständen lernen, an sich selbst und am Dirigenten wachsen, sie müssen sich vervollkommnen und darum umgestalten. Jahrzehnte gehen vorüber, bis ein Kollektiv von besten Musikern die Kultur des Ausdrucks und die Reaktionsfähigkeit erreicht, die von einer internationalen Geltung verlangt wird. Higginson heißt der wohltätige Gründer des Bostoner Orchesters, Lehrmeister waren Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck und Max Fiedler, bevor Pierre Monteux und Sergej Koussevitzky die Leitung übernahmen, die 1950 an den Elsässer Charles Munch überging.

Monteux, der 77jährige sympathische Dirigent, Typ des freundlichen, kultivierten Franzosen, wird bei seinem Eintritt herzlich begrüßt. Mit unauffälliger Freude an der Musik ist er ganz Sachlichkeit. Seine Taktbewegungen gehen bei ruhiger Haltung auf in der Gesamtheit der Zeichengebung. Auch Monteux dirigiert überwiegend das Auf und Ab der Affektströme, Akzente und Markierungen. Er hat ein sehr wachsames Auge, ist bestimmt mit den Einsätzen, ohne damit zu posieren. Die Reife seiner orchestralen Führung hat etwas sehr Gewinnendes. Er beginnt mit der schwungvoll feurigen Ouvertüre zu der Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz. Sie wird mit messerscharfem Zuschnitt wiedergegeben. Die amerikanische Musikwelt liebt solche Höchstleistungen von taktlicher und rhythmischer Genauigkeit. Dadurch entstand der Kult der Präzisionsorchester. Deutsche Meisterdirigenten setzen die Präzision im allgemeinen voraus. Man muß das sauerböse Gesicht von Furtwängler gesehen haben, wenn im Orchester gelegentlich einmal nicht präzise genug gespielt wird. Eine Ueberbetonung der Präzision kann jedoch Ausdruck von diktatorischer Herrschsucht sein und musikfeindlich werden. Man denke an Mozart oder gar an Schubert, deren Musik Gewaltsames und Herrisches so fernliegt. In der Berliozschen Ouvertüre ist maschinengenaue Ausführung schon eher angebracht. Die Wiedergabe verliert darin nichts, wenn man das Bostoner Orchester ganz aus der Nähe hört. Auch bei den letzten Pultreihen der Streicher ist kaum ein kleiner Phasenunterschied im Zusammenspiel wahrzunehmen.

Erstaunlich bei dem Franzosen Monteux ist der hohe Grad seiner Einfühlung in die Brahmssche Welt, und dazu noch in die am wenigsten populäre dritte Sinfonie. Aus der Sucht, Etikettierungen an Sinfonien anzubringen, entstand für sie der Beiname „heroisch". Er paßt kaum zu dieser F-dur-Sinfonie, wenn auch Gegensätzliches genug darin aufritt. Monteux' Realisation trug keine Zeichen der Uebersteigerung oder Ueberhitzung an sich. Sie war milde bewegt in den Mittelsätzen, reif, wie es zu Brahms gehört. — Als Neuheit für Frankfurt erklang die Sinfonie Nr. 3 von William Schumann, gelehrte Musik aus zwei Teilen mit Passacaglia und Fuge, Choral und Toccata, aber doch auch mehr noch und in einer Instrumentation, die dem amerikanischen Klangbedürfnis entspricht, hart, blendend, schmetternd von Blechbläsern und Schlageffekten und viel wechselnd in der Farbe. Im Choral geht es frömmer und nicht so wild weltlich zu. — Ein Vergnügen eigener Art wurde „Alborada del Grazioso" von Ravel aus dem Zyklus „Mioirs", der die Freude des Komponisten widerspiegelt. Geistreiche, ungehemmt losknallende Tollheiten in witzigster Instrumentation, sehr amüsant und brillant ausgeführt. — Als Abschluß noch Straußens „Till Eulenspiegel", auch von den Bostonern virtuos vorgetragen, etwas derber und temperamentvoller im Ausdruck als von deutschen Dirigenten, die der Schelmenweise in Rondoform gerne den Zug des Märchenhaften lassen. — Begeistert feierte man die amerikanischen Gäste. Viele bekannte Persönlichkeiten des deutschen Musiklebens aus dem Westen und Süden hatten sich eingefunden.

Fritz Brust.

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS

CHARLES KIESGEN

252, Rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré - PARIS-8e

Télég. et Câbles : Cledela-Paris Téléph. : WAG. 21-25 et la suite

Boston symphony orchestra
Première spéciale donnée
à Lyon
Maurice Judd

Famed Orchestra Arrives

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown arriving in Frankfurt for EC concerts. Three members were born in Germany and shook their heads at the war ruins in Frankfurt. Story Page 2. —S&S Photo

Stars & Stripes
may 14 52

[182]

Triumph orchestraler Brillanz

Bostoner Symphonieorchester in Frankfurt (Vorbericht)

Ein glanzvolles musikalisches Ereignis gestern abend im vollbesetzten Großen Haus. Mit den ersten, in scharf rhythmisiertem Brio intonierten Takten der einleitenden Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz hatte das berühmte amerikanische Spitzenorchester schon die Hörer auf seiner Seite. Desgleichen der Gastdirigent Pierre Monteux, der mit der Gelassenheit meisterlicher Souveränität und zugleich höchst intensiver Antriebskraft den klingenden Ablauf steuerte, trotz seiner 77 Jahre physisch bewundernswert unerschüttert. Wir werden über das bedeutende Konzert, das weiterhin an der Dritten Symphonie von Brahms, der Dritten Symphonie des Amerikaners William Schuman, dem Scherzo „Alborada del Grazioso" von Ravel und dem „Till Eulenspiegel" von Richard Strauß die blendende Spielkultur dieses Orchesters zeigte, in der nächsten Ausgabe noch ausführlich berichten.

H. P.

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 14 1952

German Critic Praises Boston Symphony

FRANKFURT, May 14 (AP).—A West German music critic lavished praise Wednesday on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here Tuesday night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

Triumph virtuoser Orchesterkunst

Pierre Monteux mit den „Bostonern" in Deutschland

Frankfurt, 14. Mai. — Das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters auf deutschem Boden im Frankfurter Großen Haus (nach einem weiteren für Angehörige der amerikanischen Armee werden die Bostoner noch in Berlin konzertieren) gestaltete sich vor einem erlesenen deutsch-amerikanischen Publikum zu einem triumphalen Erfolg für die Gäste aus Uebersee. In Pierre Monteux, dem in Europa unvergessenen Leiter des Pariser Conservatoire, des Concertgebouw- und schließlich lange Jahre hindurch des San Francisco-Orchesters, stand zugleich eine Persönlichkeit am Pult, die den hervorragenden Klangkörper in wahrhaft souveräner Weise zu führen wußte.

Man kennt den spezifischen Klang amerikanischer Orchester bei uns nur von Schallplatten her. Dieser erste direkte Eindruck bestätigte das vorherrschende Moment einer technischen und klanglichen Brillanz, die sich jedoch nie im rein Virtuosen erschöpft. Der satte Glanz der Streicher, der nicht nur auf die Mahlerschen Ausmaße der Besetzung zurückgeht, sondern offensichtlich besonders angestrebt ist, (die Orchesteraufstellung weicht wohl hauptsächlich deshalb etwas von der bei uns inzwischen eingebürgerten ab), das betonte Brio des Blechs (ganz hervorragend die Trompeten) im Gegensatz zu den „schlanken", ungemein beweglichen Holzbläsern — das waren die hervorstechenden Kennzeichen einer Vereinigung, die keine Wünsche mehr offen ließ.

Dieses Instrument ganz und gar in den Dienst der Werke zu stellen, war die besondere Leistung des Gastdirigenten Pierre Monteux (der auf der Europa-Tournee mit dem ständigen Leiter des Orchesters, Charles Münch, alterniert). Bewundernswert allein die Gedächtnisleistung des 77-jährigen, der das umfangreiche und mit „technischen" Schwierigkeiten vollgepfropfte Programm auswendig dirigierte. Monteux zeichnet den klanglichen Ablauf mit sparsamen, eindeutigen, klaren Schlägen vor, die ein wenig an Richard Strauß erinnern, er balanciert ihn förmlich auf der Spitze des Taktstockes und weiß mit einem Minimum an allerdings temperamentgeladener Gebärde die ganze Skala der Nuancen sichtbar zu machen.

So erstand, nach Berlioz' klangprächtiger Benvenuto Cellini-Ouvertüre, die „Dritte" von Brahms, wohl die konziseste seiner Symphonien, in gradezu klassischer Rundung, ausgewogen in ihrer wechselnden Dur-Moll-Haltung, voll Schwermut ohne Pathos, durch ungewöhnlich ruhige Zeitmaße den Ausgleich der beiden Welten unterstreichend.

Zum ersten Male in Westdeutschland erklang die von der New Yorker Kritiker-Vereinigung 1942 preisgekrönte Symphonie Nr. 3 von William Schuman. Das zweiteilige Werk, das mit den Sätzen Passacaglia — Fuge und Choral — Toccata die symphonische Ordnung nur noch im kompositorischen Zuschnitt anerkennt — thematische Bindungen halten es zusammen —, überzeugte vor allem im ersten Satz, der sich über einem ausdrucksvollen Thema in erfindungsreichen Variationen entwickelt. Fuge und Choral (beide mehr „Haltungen" als strenge Form andeutend) sind zu wenig gestrafft, die glanzvolle Toccata allzu sehr nach außen gewendet und wenig wählerisch in den Mitteln: sehr „gekonnte" Musik, aber noch ohne den Stempel letzter Notwendigkeit.

Mit Ravels „Alborado del Gracioso" (aus den „Miroirs") und Straußens „Eulenspiegel" schlossen zwei Werke das Programm, die noch einmal die virtuosen Möglichkeiten des Orchesters erkennen ließen. Besonders dem letzteren gab Monteux eine unnachahmliche weltmännische Eleganz mit, ohne der „volksliedhaften" Süße etwa des Epilogs etwas schuldig zu bleiben. Der stürmische Jubel des ausverkauften Hauses lohnte eine ungewöhnliche Leistung.

Günter Engler

Boston Symphony Orchestra begeisterte im Großen Haus

Es war wohl einer der großartigsten Konzertabende dieses Winters, den das Frankfurter Amerikahaus mit einem Gastkonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra einem musikinteressierten Publikum darbot. Das weite Rund des Hauses war bis auf den letzten Platz von einem in größter Eleganz erschienenen Auditorium besetzt.

Der 77jährige Gastdirigent Pierre Monteux wurde mit herzlichem Beifall empfangen, den er sofort auf das Orchester ablenkte. Es erscheint uns kaum möglich, die Leistung dieses Klangkörpers mit den üblichen Adjektiven einer kritischen Betrachtung zu würdigen. Das war alles von einer derartigen Geschlossenheit des Gesamteindruckes, daß man es einfach nicht zerpflücken darf. Von Hector Berlioz (Benvenuto Cellini-Ouvertüre) über Johannes Brahms (III. Symphonie), Maurice Ravel (Alborada del Grazioso) und Richard Strauß (Till Eulenspiegel) führte die Vortragsfolge zu William Schuman (Symphonie Nr. 3), einem amerikanischen Komponisten, dessen Werk trotz vieler Aeußerlichkeiten doch eine starke Substanz aufweist.

Es war vielleicht noch nicht einmal so sehr das „Was" sondern das „Wie" des Musizierens, das das Publikum zu ungeahnten Beifallsstürmen hinriß.

Nach dem Konzert empfing Hochkommissar McCloy das Orchester in engstem Kreise im Foyer des Großen Hauses. Im Rahmen dieses Empfanges überreichte ein Vertreter der Regierung von Rheinland-Pfalz eine künstlerisch ausgeführte Adresse für einen der Mitbegründer des Boston Symphony Orchestra, den heute 82jährigen Geiger Daniel Kuntz, der als junger Musiker von Oberstabsarzt bei Kusel (Pfalz) nach Boston auswanderte und dort zu den Männern gehörte, die das Boston Symphony Orchestra ins Leben riefen.

wwgg.

Abendpost Seite 5
Nr. 112 — Mittwoch, 14. Mai 1952

Boston Symphony In EC; Trio Recall Prewar Frankfurt

By HOWARD KENNEDY
Staff Correspondent

FRANKFURT, May 13 (S&S)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Frankfurt today, and its three members who were born in Germany took one look at the bomb-torn and partially reconstrutced city and shook their heads sadly.

"Not much like the old days when I knew Frankfurt as a beautiful old town," muttered violinist Emil Kornsand, who fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

"These ruined buildings are terribly depressing," agreed 68-year-old Max Polster, who spent his early years playing with a dozen different musical organizations in Germany and Western Europe, and who is completing 29 years with the Boston Symphony as a percussionist.

Alfred Krips, born in Berlin and now the Boston's second violinist, was too mournful to talk.

The German-born trio, who arrived with 103 other members of the Boston Symphony by train from Brussels, had only a couple of hours to sightsee before preparing for their first public concert tonight in Frankfurt's Grosses Haus, with guest conductor Pierre Monteux wielding the baton.

Tomorrow, at 3 pm, the orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will present a special concert exclusively for EUCOM military personnel and their guests, and will leave on the U.S. Army duty train tomorrow night for a second public concert at 8 pm Thursday in Berlin's Titania Palast.

Kornsand, who was born in Karlsruhe, said he knew Frankfurt well "in the old days." His father's brother ran a large printing plant here. He himself played with the Berlin Staatsoper for 13 years.

LE PROGRES

14-5-52

Composé de virtuoses de premier rang

LE MEILLEUR ORCHESTRE AMÉRICAIN se fera entendre lundi 19 mai, au Grand-Théâtre

Pierre Monteux, chef associé de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, conduisant l'célèbre ensemble américain, qu'il dirigera le 19 mai à l'Opéra de Lyon

L[illegible]ston Symphony Orchestra » [illegible] en train d'obtenir à Paris [illegible] plus grand succès. Il ira [illegible] Amsterdam, à Francfort, à [illegible] avant de se faire entendre [illegible] Bruxelles, où il s'embarquera [illegible] Amérique. Il s'arrêtera le [illegible] mai, à Lyon et donnera un [illegible] au Grand-Théâtre.

[illegible] Progrès » a déjà signalé, le [illegible] que ce sera la première fois [illegible] grand orchestre symphonique [illegible] se fera entendre à Lyon. [illegible] avait été annoncé, il y a [illegible] trente ans, mais on ne put [illegible] une grève générale des [illegible] de fer ayant interrompu la [illegible]

[illegible]ette de Boston, le plus nom[illegible] de tous peut-être — il réunit [illegible] exécutants apparaît com[illegible] meilleur d'Amérique, c'est-à-[illegible] du monde. C'est que, au moins [illegible]ent, les grandes troupes [illegible]ques des Etats-Unis réunis[illegible]sorte de société des na[illegible]représentants de l'Améri[illegible]Europe : beaucoup de [illegible]ennent de Belgique et [illegible] bas », c'est-à-dire les [illegible]s clarinettes et bas[illegible]ies surtout par des Fran[illegible]vres », par des Alle[illegible]résultat instrumental est [illegible]oix des artistes étant [illegible]xtrême, chacun des sym[illegible]ens est un virtuose [illegible]. Cette primauté sur [illegible] d'Europe, dont chaque [illegible]rique dans son propre [illegible]e ? Ce n'est pas sûr, [illegible] les syndicats améri[illegible]musiciens auront achevé [illegible]progressive des étran[illegible]ral que beaucoup d'Eu[illegible]eux de faire partie du [illegible]estre abandonnent leur [illegible]riginelle pour adopter [illegible]es naturalisations suc[illegible] chez nous surprennent, [illegible] normales en Amérique ; [illegible] un artiste un professeur, [illegible] ayant réussi là-bas, qui n'ait été sollicité de devenir citoyen des Etats-Unis.

Le « Boston Symphony Orchestra » compte aujourd'hui, parmi ses cent dix membres, vingt-deux Français. Parmi ces derniers, figurent le harpiste et le violoncelliste Zighera, frères du violoniste et chef d'orchestre souvent entendu au concert et à la radio. Il y a une vingtaine d'années, on pouvait y remarquer le violoncelliste solo Jean Bedetti, ancien lauréat de notre Conservatoire, fils du violoncelliste ancien professeur de cette école ; le flûtiste Bladet, qui enseigna aussi à Lyon ; le trompette Perret, qui aujourd'hui fait partie de l'orchestre de la radio lyonnaise.

En attendant une transformation nationaliste imminente, les orchestres américains se maintiennent au premier rang. Nous pourrons en juger lundi prochain en assistant au concert que donnera au Grand-Théâtre le « Boston Symphony Orchestra », sous la direction de notre compatriote Pierre Monteux, aussi célèbre en Amérique qu'en France.

Le programme que nous entendrons unira à Berlioz et à Ravel, à Brahms et à Richard Strauss, le nom, encore inconnu, de William Schuman, compositeur américain, que nous présenterons bientôt.

L. V.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
MAY 14 1952

Boston's Symphony Praised in Germany

Frankfurt, Germany, May 14 (AP).- A West German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here Tuesday night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,600 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston Orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

Last night's concert was for the German public. The orchestra will play here this afternoon for American soldiers, then leave by train for a concert in Berlin.

German 'Alumnus' To Hear Symphony

FRANKFURT, May 13 (S&S)—Tomorrow will be a great day for Johannes Warnke, 80, of Neckar-Gemuend in Wuerttemberg, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 31 years, from 1908 to 1939.

Warnke, who is a pensioner of the Boston Symphony pension fund, wrote to the Boston Symphony saying his greatest wish would be to listen once more to this wonderful orchestra. The Special Services officer for Frankfurt Military Post, who is handling local details for tomorrow's concert for U.S. Armed Forces, sent Warnke two tickets.

Frankfurter Rundschau

Mittwoch, 14. Mai 1952

Eleganz und Solidität

Begeisterung für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester in Frankfurt

Boston Symphony Orchestra — für die Amerikaner Inbegriff vom Reichtum der Orchestermusik, für die Europäer bisher nur der Klang eines Namens, der irgendwie mit märchenhaften Schönheiten zu tun hatte, vielleicht auch von manchen als eine Art verchromter Apoll beargwöhnt; nun kam der Klang selber nach Europa (von wo er einst auszog) — Festival in Paris, Begeisterung in Holland und Belgien. Erstes Konzert in Deutschland. Galastimmung im Frankfurter Großen Haus. Anwesenheit von hohen, höheren und höchsten Persönlichkeiten aus allen Zweigen des öffentlichen Lebens. Kaskaden von Beifall. Verbeugungen. Wieder Beifall.

Das gäbe allein schon Stoff für eine fällige Lobeshymne. Aber, abgesehen davon, war diese Begegnung doch so ernsthaft, daß sie — und das ist mehr als eine Lobeshymne — eine sachliche Würdigung verdient.

In den letzten Wochen haben wir in Frankfurt verschiedene bedeutende Orchester gehört, das Pariser Rundfunkorchester, die Berliner Philharmoniker. Vergleiche drängen sich auf. Und am ehesten wären die Bostoner mit den Franzosen zu vergleichen. Nicht allein, weil an diesem Abend Pierre Monteux vor dem Orchester stand. Dieses Orchester hat die aggressive Leichtigkeit, die wir an den Franzosen bewunderten, Durchsichtigkeit des Klanges und jene rhythmische Eleganz, die ihren Impuls nicht aus dem Metrum, sondern aus der melodischen Phrase bezieht. Es hat dazu auch eine Perfektion, die manchmal an Politur erinnert. Die Delikatesse mischt sich aufs eigenartigste mit einer fast handfesten Solidität.

Die Ankündigung besagte, daß die Bostoner, in deren Reihen Solisten — und welche Solisten! — aller europäischen Abstammungen sitzen, auch ältere deutsche und französische Musik spielen würden. Diese bestand aus der Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz und der dritten Symphonie von Brahms und wurde in der ersten Programmhälfte absolviert. Nicht eigentlich absolviert. Dafür sorgte die Musikalität der Musiker und des Dirigenten, dessen Zeichengebung zwar präzise sparsam war, aber doch geeignet, Impulse freiwerden zu lassen.

Nach der Pause gab es ein mit einem amerikanischen Kritikerpreis ausgezeichnetes Werk: die dritte Symphonie des noch jungen William Schumann. Sie benutzt alte Formen, Passacaglia, Fuge, Choral und Toccata und erinnert an eine kontrapunktische Zeichnung, worin auch die großen Klangflächen mit hartem Bleistift koloriert wurden. Virtuosität schloß sich an: „Alborado del Grazioso" von Ravel und „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" von Richard Strauß. Es war Virtuosität und Schönheit der Virtuosität in jedem Sinne.

Heinz Enke

[illegible]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

TRAVEL SYMPHONY
Down to "Gay Maxim's"

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS—The flow of life in The City of Light is so varied and so strong that nothing surprises, and incongruities fit together. It is possible, as I discovered last night, to begin an evening at a family restaurant, go on to a chic concert by Bruno Walter and the Paris Opera Orchestra, have a drink afterward at the Plaza Athenee bar, drop in at Maxim's, and then talk for hours in a Montparnasse cafe until the streetwalkers come in toward dawn. In Paris that all seems a reasonable continuity.

* * *

That family restaurant, in a side street near my hotel, is a modest place, although not exactly inconspicuous since the facade is painted light blue.

No trimmings here, just plain but solid family food. Vegetable soup, a nicely rare steak with French fried potatoes and a garnish of watercress, a bit of excellent Camembert cheese and a wedge of Brie, plus an abundance of good wine, ordinary but pleasant, at a cost of but $2—yes, count in a vermouth, too, for appetizer.

Quite different from the altitudinous prices of the bigger and better-known Paris restaurants. Papa cooks in the tiny kitchen, and mama and another woman wait on the customers, cheerful and obliging to all.

I have 'cellist Bernard Parronchi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to thank for this discovery, for in two visits to this section I had not noticed the Restaurant Bleu. But he had!

* * *

Next, to the bright lights and the chi-chi of the Theatre de Champs-Elysees, where Bruno Walter led the Paris Opera Orchestra through a longish program of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Mahler's great meditation upon the futility of the world, "Das Lied von der Erde." This concert was yet another in the Festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The audience was part intellectual, part tourist, part ordinary native, in which proportions it would be hard to tell. But the packed house cheered and clapped Mr. Walter to a fare-thee-well.

Since this is a theatre, and not a concert hall, the orchestra—or at least the strings—sat upon an extended apron of the stage, which meant that they were out of the "sounding box" of the stage, and too far front. There was a definite loss of resonance, and you could not tell the real capabilities of this band, which is well spoken of when in the pit of the Paris Opera. The wind and brass tone was too light, almost superficial, for Mahler, and there seemed to be places where the musicians didn't quite know what the score was all about.

People were saying this was but the second performance in Paris of a work going on 40 years old! Of the soloists, contralto Kathleen Ferrier sang most intelligently, but for my taste her voice is emotionally cold and lacking in color. The tenor, Lorenz Fehenberger, sang loud.

* * *

In the softly, goldenly-lighted bar of the Relais Plaza, next door to the theatre, you sit lengthily over a brandy and watch part of the world of fashion go by, together with a segment of upper-income bracket tourists.

In Maxim's, on the Rue Royale, the famed Maxim's of "The Merry Widow," is more and higher fashion, a title or two, and people representing a blend of aristocracy and industrial wealth joined by the carefully planned marriages by which those shrewd French preserve and amalgamate money and social position.

From Maxim's to a somewhat "jointy" cafe in Montparnasse is not the wrench, in Paris, that it would be in New York or Boston. Here in this left bank cafe, French and Anglo-Saxon youth and middle age meet upon a distinctly sordid ground. Lots of young Americans, living in Paris, go there, and around the bar counter you hear as much English as French.

These are not the student Americans, or the people who have business or professional occupations in Paris, but the floaters who somehow hang on here for a stretch of easy and loose living.

Suddenly, the magic of the night is gone! Home quickly to bed!

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAY 14 1952

German Critics Praise Boston Symphony Concert

By the Associated Press

FRANKFURT, Germany, May 14.—A West German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteaux's direction here last night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

"Guest Conductor Monteaux led with a masterful sovereignty and tensity. Despite his 77 years, he was marvelously untouched physically," the newspaper commented.

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
MAY 14 1952

Music Delights Dutch

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 13 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 14 1952

HUB SYMPHONY IN REICH

Frankfurt, Germany (Reuters)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first postwar concert in Germany here last night and received an ovation from a mixed German and American audience.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAY 15 1952

Frankfurt Critic Praises Monteux, Boston Symphony

FRANKFURT, May 14 (AP)—A West German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here last night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German-born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

This Clipping From
LATROBE, PA.
BULLETIN

DOLLARS of Americans too long have been accused of treating art treasures of Europe as pillage and decoying to this country outstanding artists in many fields, of whom Caruso in his long sojourn in the U. S. was a prime example.

There never was a better time for individuals and representative institutions of this country to demonstrate their feeling that beauty, in its appeal to any of the senses, belongs to all who can appreciate it than now when the Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations is being held this year in Paris.

It is, therefore, both astonishing and heartening to note that on the evening of the very day paintings by European artists from American collections were exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing for the first time in Europe, achieved an unforgettable triumph at the Paris Opera. It was a gala event, with President Auriol, Robert Schuman, diplomats, notable composers, society and just plain music lovers in the throng, which responded fervently to a long program divided between American and French music.

Conductor Charles Muench and the orchestra had to give their hearers for a second time the finale of one of Ravel's fine compositions. To such an exposition of the arts as Paris planned and is staging it is well that Americans are unselfishly contributing. In an increasing technological age, humans dare not become automats. Sanity prescribes an increasing love of beauty as one of the great preventatives.

This Clipping From
CHELSEA, MASS.
EVENING RECORD

Musical Ambassadors

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris recently was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city. The program of French and American music was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

This Clipping From
WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES-LEADER NEWS

Musical Ambassadors

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearances of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

N.Y. Ballet, Hub Orch Wow Paris

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
MAY 14 1952

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Germans Praise Boston Orchestra

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 15 1952

THE ROV EYE

By RUDOLPH E

(Mr. Eye is in Europe on tour Symphony Orchestra)

Cryptic Englishm Happy Frenchmo

Good old Gaston LaTou there in the upper bunk in he's sound asleep. He's sno gentle baritone of fine nas dreaming, I suspect, of tr fois grass, timbales de ho cotelets de veaux and may LaTouche.

Gaston, a mountain of a an abundance of black hair sticks out over his collar, wi ing a collar, which isn't ver my three bunk mates France's elegant cabin cla two are interesting and which is too amazing for plate as under these circum ally draw one who goes t one who gets up at six and stand the smell of smoke.

Cryptic English

One is a singularly cryp lishman of about 25. All En tic, I suppose, but Lawrenc ing (the two small ff's ar tells me), is neo-cryptic. Th in reply to such a question you're way back to Engla 'Presumably.' He is very h English way, which is hands any standard; he is a gra bridge, a connoisseur of b lent ping pong player, an ex can jazz, sea birds, mens' coat hangers (which he coll (which he adores). He is for the fact that he can g fully on no sleep at all fo he frequently does, and is appearing either into first with such a protective coi seems to belong in both

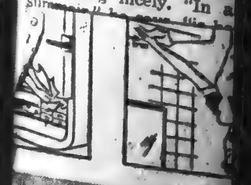
The other member—exc —is Dr. Guilermo Sanche physician-in-attendance of Symphony orchestra. Dr. S perhaps 25 or 27, and a g Harvard Medical school, Guatemala. Although not (five feet nine, perhaps), dark and handsome, and a social and intellectual comes, I take it, from a Central American family, delightful as a companion tionalist, but as interpreto of the scene. Currently gastro-intestinal affairs Sanchez speaks four or with equal fluency, thou accent in English is very in fine, with his social p particular knowledge of st the perfect medical attend involved not only with tra sea but with a largely which requires a certain apparatus and someone heroic.

It is this heroic appara sets Gaston LaTouche ap is a French chef, and one enthusiasm bot for his products of his labors. G born in Southern France ago, also enjoys an exist to me to be a paradise o lofty measure: He works year in an outrageously dining club and vacations months in his Chateau i no so bad, eh?" he chu twelve t'ousan' dollarr a to home."

Actually, of course, to be such a haul at that. of the club, membership $560 with dinners $10 a p and had a staff of about 1 additional responsibilities And his wife always goes returned a month early t travel expenses reduce his $6000.

Sampling Cuisine

But Gaston, who serve the French army during W spent two years in a Ger gets along nicely. "In a



This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 14 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Down to "Gay Maxim's"

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS—The flow of life in The City of Light is so varied and so strong that nothing surprises, and incongruities fit together. It is possible, as I discovered last night, to begin an evening at a family restaurant, go on to a chic concert by Bruno Walter and the Paris Opera Orchestra, have a drink afterward at the Plaza Athenee bar, drop in at Maxim's, and then talk for hours in a Montparnasse cafe until the streetwalkers come in toward dawn. In Paris that all seems a reasonable continuity.

* * *

That family restaurant, in a side street near my hotel, is a modest place, although not exactly inconspicuous since the facade is painted light blue.

No trimmings here, just plain but solid family food. Vegetable soup, a nicely rare steak with French fried potatoes and a garnish of watercress, a bit of excellent Camembert cheese and a wedge of Brie, plus an abundance of good wine, ordinary but pleasant, at a cost of but $2—yes, count in a vermouth, too, for appetizer.

Quite different from the altitudinous prices of the bigger and better-known Paris restaurants. Papa cooks in the tiny kitchen, and mama and another woman wait on the customers, cheerful and obliging to all.

I have 'cellist Bernard Parronchi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to thank for this discovery, for in two visits to this section I had not noticed the Restaurant Bleu. But he had!

* * *

Next, to the bright lights and the chi-chi of the Theatre de Champs-Elysees, where Bruno Walter led the Paris Opera Orchestra through a longish program of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Mahler's great meditation upon the futility of the world, "Das Lied von der Erde." This concert was yet another in the Festival, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The audience was part intellectual, part tourist, part ordinary native, in which proportions it would be hard to tell. But the packed house cheered and clapped Mr. Walter to a fare-thee-well.

Since this is a theatre, and not a concert hall, the orchestra—or at least the strings—sat upon an extended apron of the stage, which meant that they were out of the "sounding box" of the stage, and too far front. There was a definite loss of resonance, and you could not tell the real capabilities of this band, which is well spoken of when in the pit of the Paris Opera. The wind and brass tone was too light, almost superficial, for Mahler, and there seemed to be places where the musicians didn't quite know what the score was all about.

People were saying this was but the second performance in Paris of a work going on 40 years old! Of the soloists, contralto Kathleen Ferrier sang most intelligently, but for my taste her voice is emotionally cold and lacking in color. The tenor, Lorenz Fehenberger, sang loud.

* * *

In the softly, goldenly-lighted bar of the Relais Plaza, next door to the theatre, you sit lengthily over a brandy and watch part of the world of fashion go by, together with a segment of upper-income bracket tourists.

In Maxim's, on the Rue Royale, the famed Maxim's of "The Merry Widow," is more and higher fashion, a title or two, and people representing a blend of aristocracy and industrial wealth joined by the carefully planned marriages by which those shrewd French preserve and amalgamate money and social position.

From Maxim's to a somewhat "jointy" cafe in Montparnasse is not the wrench, in Paris, that it would be in New York or Boston. Here in this left bank cafe, French and Anglo-Saxon youth and middle age meet upon a distinctly sordid ground. Lots of young Americans, living in Paris, go there, and around the bar counter you hear as much English as French.

These are not the student Americans, or the people who have business or professional occupations in Paris, but the floaters who somehow hang on here for a stretch of easy and loose living.

Suddenly, the magic of the night is gone! Home quickly to bed!

This Clipping From
LATROBE, PA.
BULLETIN
MAY 14 1952

DOLLARS of Americans too long have been accused of treating art treasures of Europe as pillage and decoying to this country outstanding artists in many fields, of whom Caruso in his long sojourn in the U. S. was a prime example.

There never was a better time for individuals and representative institutions of this country to demonstrate their feeling that beauty, in its appeal to any of the senses, belongs to all who can appreciate it than now when the Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations is being held this year in Paris.

It is, therefore, both astonishing and heartening to note that on the evening of the very day paintings by European artists from American collections were exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing for the first time in Europe, achieved an unforgettable triumph at the Paris Opera. It was a gala event, with President Auriol, Robert Schuman, diplomats, notable composers, society and just plain music lovers in the throng, which responded fervently to a long program divided between American and French music.

Conductor Charles Muench and the orchestra had to give their hearers for a second time the finale of one of Ravel's fine compositions. To such an exposition of the arts as Paris planned and is staging it is well that Americans are unselfishly contributing. In an increasing technological age, humans dare not become automats. Sanity prescribes an increasing love of beauty as one of the great preventatives.

This Clipping From
CHELSEA, MASS.
EVENING RECORD
MAY 14 1952

Musical Ambassadors

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris recently was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city. The program of French and American music was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAY 14 1952

German Critics Praise Boston Symphony Concert

By the Associated Press

FRANKFURT, Germany, May 14.—A West German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteaux's direction here last night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

"Guest Conductor Monteaux led with a masterful sovereignty and at the same time a dynamic intensity. Despite his 77 years, he was marvelously untouched physically," the newspaper commented.

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

This Clipping From
WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES-LEADER NEWS
MAY 15 1952

Musical Ambassadors

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearances of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
MAY 14 1952

Music Delights Dutch

THE HAGUE, The Netherlands, May 13 (AP)—Seven curtain calls and thunderous bravos greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its first performance in this country last night. Queen Juliana was in the audience and later met Conductor Charles Munch at a reception.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 14 1952

HUB SYMPHONY IN REICH

Frankfurt, Germany—(Reuters)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first postwar concert in Germany here last night and received an ovation from a mixed German and American audience.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAY 15 1952

Frankfurt Critic Praises Monteux, Boston Symphony

FRANKFURT, May 14 (AP)—A West German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here last night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German-born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

[185]

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 1[illegible] 1952

N.Y. Ballet, Hub Orch Wow Paris

Paris, May 13

Two of America's three major participants in the current Paris festival, tabbed here "Twentieth Century Masterpieces" have displayed their wares in the fest's first week, with both socko. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, performing for the first time in Europe, gave a concert at the Opera Tuesday (6) under its conductor, Charles Munch, with the concert hailed as an outstanding event.

Then the N. Y. City Ballet appeared Saturday night (10)—the first time a foreign dance troupe has given a full-evening show on the Paris Opera stage—and wowed a packed house.

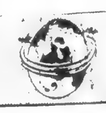
The Boston orch's concert was so strongly received that Munch had to reprise the third movement of the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, something rarely done by symphony orchs. French press has been acclaiming the extreme virtuosity of the BSO, admitting it's never heard such brilliance, and pointing with pride to the fact that the conductor and 23 of the players are French.

The N. Y. City Ballet, under direction of George Balanchine, staged four of its best-known works. Balanchine's "Swan Lake," "La Valse" and "Bourree Fantasque," and Jerome Robbins' "The Cage." Paris, with a great ballet tradition of its own, was simply bowled over. Dancers took 29 curtain calls. Maria Tallchief, in "Swan Lake," and Nora Kaye, in "The Cage," got eight curtain calls each. Troupe gives five more shows for the fest, returning for its own season later.

Third major U. S. entry, the legit opera "Four Saints in Three Acts," will be presented during the exposition's final week, May 25-31.

Festival, organized by the Congress of Cultural Freedom, to show the Reds the strength of western culture, and backed mainly by U.S. coin raised by Julius Fleischmann, officially opened May 2 with a fine performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzek." A so-so concert of the Paris Opera House Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, followed.

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
MAY 14 1952



Ne

A WEST GERMAN [illegible] critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction at Frankfurt Tuesday night. The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfurt Opera house heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

* * *

A CONVICT'S SHOE

[illegible] some excitement

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Germans Praise Boston Orchestra

FRANKFURT [illegible] German music critic lavished praise today on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here last night. The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 1[illegible] 1952

THE ROV EYE

By RUDOLPH [illegible]

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour Symphony Orchestra)

Cryptic Englishm Happy Frenchma

Good old Gaston LaTou there in the upper bunk in he's sound asleep. He's sno gentle baritone of fine nas dreaming, I suspect, of tr fois grass, timbales, de ho cotelets de veaux and may LaTouche.

Gaston, a mountain of a an abundance of black hair sticks out over his collar, wi ing a collar, which isn't ver of my three bunk mates Franco's elegant cabin cla two are interesting and which is too amazing for plate as under these circum ally draw one who goes to one who gets up at six and stand the smell of smoke.

Cryptic English

One is a singularly cryp lishman of about 25. All En tic, I suppose, but Lawrenc ing (the two small ff's ar tells me), is neo-cryptic. Thi in reply to such a question you're way back to Engla 'Presumably.' He is very h English way, which is hands any standard; he is a gra bridge, a connoisseur of b lent ping pong player, an ex can jazz, sea birds, mens' coat hangers (which he coll (which he adores). He is a for the fact that he can ge fully on no sleep at all for he frequently does, and is appearing either into first with such a protective colo seems to belong in both

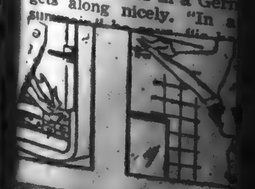
The other member—exc —is Dr. Guillermo Sanche physician-in-attendance of Symphony orchestra. Dr. S perhaps 25 or 27, and a g Harvard Medical school, Guatemala. Although not (five feet nine, perhaps), dark and handsome, and a social and intellectual comes, I take it, from a Central American family, a delightful as a companion tionalist, but as interpreto of the scene. Currently gastro-intestinal affairs Sanchez speaks four or with equal fluency, thoug accent in English is very in fine, with his social p particular knowledge of st the perfect medical attend involved not only with tra sea but with a largely which requires a certain apparatus and someone heroic.

It is this heroic appara sets Gaston LaTouche ap is a French chef, and one enthusiasm both for his products of his labors. G born in Southern France ago, also enjoys an exist to me to be a paradise o lofty measure. He works year in an outrageously dining club and vacations months in his Chateau i no so bad, eh?" he chu twelve t'ousan' dollarr a go home."

Actually, of course, to be such a haul at that. of the club, membership $500 with dinners $10 a p and had a staff of about 1 additional responsibilities And his wife always goes returned a month early t travel expenses reduce hi $6000.

Sampling Cuisine

But Gaston, who serv the French army during W spent two years in a Germ gets along nicely. "In a



This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 14 1952

Y. Ballet, Hub Orch Wow Paris

Paris, May 13.
o of America's three major eipants in the current Paris al, tabbed here "Twentieth ry Masterpieces," have dis-d their wares in the fest's week, with both socko. The n Symphony Orchestra, per-ng for the first time in Eu-gave a concert at the Opera
ay (6) under its conductor, es Munch, with the concert
as an outstanding event.
n the N. Y. City Ballet apd Saturday night (10)—the ime a foreign dance troupe iven a full-evening show on aris Opera stage—and wowed ked house.
Boston orch's concert was ongly received that Munch reprise the third movement
Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" something rarely done by ony orchs. French press has acclaiming the extreme vir-of the BSO, admitting it's heard such brilliance, and g with pride to the fact that nductor and 23 of the play-French.
N. Y. City Ballet, under di-of George Balanchine, four of its best-known Balanchine's "Swan Lake," alse" and "Bourree Fantas-and Jerome Robbins' "The Paris, with a great ballet n of its own, was simply over. Dancers took 29 cur-alls. Maria Tallchief, in Lake," and Nora Kaye, in Cage," got eight curtain calls troupe gives five more shows fest, returning for its own later.
l major U. S. entry, the legit
'Four Saints in Three Acts," presented during the expo-final week, May 25-31.
val, organized by the Con-
Cultural Freedom, to show ds the strength of western and backed mainly by U.S.
ised by Julius Fleischmann,
y opened May 2 with a fine
nance of Alban Berg's "Woz-
A so-so concert of the Paris
House Orchestra, under Bruter, followed.

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
MAY 14 1952

Ne

WEST GERMAN music
lavished praise today
Boston Symphony ora for its concert under Monteux's direction at furt Tuesday night. The furter Neue Presse said ll-out audience of 1,800
Frankfurt opera house
"a brilliant musical which revealed the playing culture of mous American orches-

• • •

VICT'S SHOUT—"Let's excitement"—touched

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
MAY 14
mans Praise
on Orchestra
NKFURT (AP) A West
music critic lavished
oday on the Boston Sym-Orchestra for its concert ierre Monteux's direction
st night.
Frankfurter Neue Presse
sellout audience of 1800
Frankfurt Opera House
a brilliant musical event revealed the blended playure of this famous Ameri-hestra."
03-member Boston orches-e first American symphony
o play in Germany since

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLF [illegible]

Boston

Cryptic English
Happy Frenchman

[illegible] and [illegible] nice
[illegible]y and [illegible] de
[illegible]lambe,
[illegible]Mme.
[illegible]h such [illegible]t even [illegible]s wear-
[illegible] is on-
[illegible]'s de
[illegible] other
[illegible]. too,
[illegible]them-
[illegible]. I usu-
[illegible]seven,
[illegible]can't

Cryptic English

[illegible] cryptic young Eng-
[illegible] about 25. A [illegible] cryp-
[illegible] [illegible] much-Spald[illegible] small [illegible] authentic, he [illegible]o say that [illegible] are you or [illegible]he replies
[illegible]ome in the [illegible]edson, enough by graduate of Cam
[illegible] a connoisseur of ballet, an excel
[illegible], an expert on Ameri
[illegible] jazz, a bores, mens' evening clothes
[illegible] (cravats which he collects) and Texas
[illegible] he adores. He is also remarkable [illegible] that he can get along beauti
[illegible] on no sleep at all for days on end, a [illegible] dresser does, and is capable of dis
[illegible] into first or tourist class
[illegible] such a protective coloration that he [illegible] seems to belong in both simultaneously
[illegible] other members excepting Gaston
[illegible] Dr. Guillermo Sanchez, the officia
[illegible] physician in attendance of the Boston [illegible] Symphony orchestra. Dr. Sanchez, who is [illegible] perhaps 25 or 27, and a graduate of the [illegible] Harvard Medical school, is a native o
[illegible] Panama. Although not especially tal [illegible] for nine, perhaps), he is certainly [illegible] fast and handsome, and a man of extreme [illegible] social and intellectual sensitivity. He [illegible] is, I take it, from a very prominen [illegible] Central American family, and is not only [illegible] employed as a companion and conversa-
[illegible]tional, but as interpretor and evaluator [illegible] to the [illegible]. Currently researching in [illegible] Latin-American affairs in Boston, Dr.
[illegible] Sanchez speaks four or five languages
[illegible] with equal fluency, though his primary [illegible] accent in English is very English. He is [illegible] a man with his social presence and his [illegible] particular knowledge of stomach disorders
[illegible] the perfect medical attendant for a group [illegible] traveling not only with travel by land and [illegible] sea but with a largely French cuisine
[illegible] which requires a certain heroic digestive [illegible] apparatus and someone to help keep it [illegible] going.

It is this heroic apparatus that, indeed,
[illegible] Gaston LaTouche apart. For Gaston
[illegible] is a French cook [illegible] one with a colossal [illegible] [illegible] for his work and the [illegible] rewards of his labors. Gaston, who was [illegible] born in Southern France 50 or so years [illegible] ago, [illegible] existence that seems [illegible] to be a paradise on an incalculably
[illegible] high measure. He works four months a [illegible] year in an outrageously smart Florida
[illegible] Club and vacations the other eight [illegible] on his Chateau in Lorraine. "Ees ten,
[illegible] eleven," he chuckles. "Ees ten, [illegible]
[illegible] dollarr after taxes, an I
[illegible]

[illegible], of course, it doesn't prove [illegible] a great chef at that. He was head chef
[illegible] at the Colony Club, membership to which costs [illegible] $100 a year, dinners $10 a plate beyond that,
[illegible] for a staff of about 17 under him with [illegible] social responsibilities as steward, too.
[illegible] Mrs. Gaston always goes with him (she'd [illegible] been with a month early this time), so the [illegible] expense account [illegible] his take perhaps to [illegible] $60).

Sampling Cuisine

[illegible] served as a major in [illegible] the French army during World War II and [illegible] spent [illegible] months in a German prison camp, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a chair I sit all [illegible] day. It is happy."
[illegible] He is happy, however, sampling the [illegible] cuisine of the Ile de France. "Ees good [illegible] [illegible] he says, [illegible] an ample finger [illegible] [illegible] down [illegible]. I am bettair, oui, [illegible] but less rich." He eats only once [illegible] a day, [illegible] and brioche for [illegible] breakfast, [illegible] is a tremendous [illegible] [illegible] at noon, eating every [illegible] thing in sight.

[illegible] [illegible] portions, maybe," he explains, "but most, sair." And on the Ile de France, even in cabin class, this is a formidable undertaking. In first class it is an impossible undertaking as I learned to my own cost, for, invited up to luncheon one day, I was stupefied to find no less than 16 courses with 72 items to choose from.

So Gaston has just come in from his dinner, not the captain's dinner or anything special like that (for they are incredible), just the ordinary evening meal.
He took off his clothes, gazed pensively out the port hole a moment, climbed up the ladder to his top bunk for his nap before bedtime, and said, "Oui, was good. Tomorrow maybe I go down and tell chef I like.
For him, what more compliment ees there than for me to tell him Gaston LaTouche es veree, veree happy?"

Beifall in Frankfurt für Bostons Symphoniker

Frankfurt. — Im Stimmengewirr des Foyers im Großen Haus in Frankfurt herrschte die englische Sprache. Für die Amerikaner bedeutete der Besuch des Bostoner Orchesters einen Gruß aus der Heimat und eine Manifestation eigenen Kulturlebens im fremden Lande.

Der Ruf, der diesem Orchester von Paris vorausgeeilt war, erfüllte das deutsche Publikum mit Spannung. Die Programmgestaltung hielt sich, abgesehen von der Schuman-Symphonie, die in Deutschland erst einmal aufgeführt wurde, und Ravels selten gespielter „Alborada del grazioso" im Rahmen des Herkömmlichen.

Mancher versuchte, ehe Pierre Monteux den Auftakt zur Ouvertüre der Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" gab, sich noch einmal den Klang der Berliner Philharmoniker unter Furtwängler ins Gedächtnis zurückzurufen, die am 11. Mai in Frankfurt gastierten, aber in einem warmen und anhaltenden Empfangsbeifall ging alles unter, außer einer gespannten Erwartung auf den ersten Klang, der geübten Ohren Wesen und Art eines Orchesters in plötzlicher Einsicht offenbart.

Homogen und doch selbständig

Schon in diesem Werk aus einer Stilperiode, die vergangener ist als Bach, Mozart und Beethoven, bewiesen sich die außerordentlichen Qualitäten dieses homogenen und doch in den einzelnen Instrumentengruppen äußerst selbständigen Klangkörpers. Diese Selbständigkeit, die besonders bei der Gleichzeitigkeit verschiedenartiger rhythmischer Bewegungen zutage tritt, ist ein wichtiges Kennzeichen dieses Orchesters, das auf Grund günstiger wirtschaftlicher Verhältnisse imstande war, die besten Solisten der ganzen Welt zu engagieren und die weiten Spannungen eigenwilliger Künstlerpersönlichkeiten unter dem Stab großer Dirigenten zu vereinigen.

Ohne Zweifel birgt die technische Vollkommenheit eines Orchesters ihre Gefahren, die auch an den Bostonern nicht spurlos vorübergegangen sind. Für sie existieren keine Schwierigkeiten, und es ist denkbar, daß dabei die Konzentration nachläßt. Darum bedarf es einer fast übermenschlichen Konzentration, die immer wieder neu vom Dirigenten ausstrahlen muß, um hohe Spannungen zu erzeugen, ehe man ihnen erlaubt, sich in der Harmonie der Klänge aufzulösen.

Brahms 3. Symphonie brachte einige Überraschungen. Deutsche Musikfreunde quittierten mit leisem Kopfschütteln, das sich jedoch, keineswegs gegen die Technik richtete, die an jeder Stelle von höchster Vollkommenheit war. Ein Bläserklang wie dieser — geschmeidig und stählern, mit seinen zart verhauchenden Pianissimi der Flöten, seinen Einwürfen von prickelnder Delikatesse und dem schmetternden Aufschreien der Blechinstrumente — ist wohl selten in europäischen Konzertsälen erklungen. Dem Deutschen Brahms jedoch mit seiner herben Romantik und seiner verträumten Abseitigkeit ist mit diesen Mitteln allein nicht beizukommen. Andante — maßvolles Vorwärtsschreiten eines Themas ohne Extreme und Effekte ist eine deutsche Gangart. Die Bostoner aber sind Meister der Extreme und Effekte. Wenn einmal nichts passiert — kein aufstrahlendes Crescendo, kein flirrendes Pianissimo der Streicher, keine rhythmische Veränderung, die sich leise aber unmißverständlich anbahnt, dann hat man ab und zu den Eindruck, daß sie sich nicht ganz darüber im klaren sind, was bis zum nächsten Höhepunkt geschehen soll. Das Thema des 3. Satzes flog etwas zu rasch vorbei, um seine sehnsüchtige Fülle ganz zu entfalten.

Schumanns 3. Symphonie fand warmen Beifall, der wohl vor allem durch die interessante Rhythmik des letzten Satzes „Toccata" und die schwellenden Harmonien der Streicherkadenz ausgelöst wurde.

Dem Kenner moderner Musik brachte sie nicht viel Neues. Die Anlehnung an die strengen Formen der Barockmusik verlieh dem Werk den herben Reiz klarer und durchsichtiger Konstruktion.

Verve und rhythmische Klarheit

Ravel jedoch mit dem bezaubernden Suitensatz „Alborada del grazioso" und der Eulenspiegel von Strauß versetzten das Auditorium in hellstes Entzücken. Hier entfaltete das Orchester die schillernde Vielfalt seiner fast unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten, der Dirigent die Verve und rhythmische Klarheit seines gallischen Temperamentes. Ravels verzaubertes Spiel mit den Klängen wurde auf eine atemberaubende Weise Wirklichkeit, und das nicht nur durch die Exaktheit und technische Beherrschung, sondern darüber hinaus durch die geistvolle, bis in den letzten Einwurf hinein verstandene und erfühlte Gestaltung.

Das gleiche gilt für Till Eulenspiegel, den Seiltanz des Narren zwischen Tragik und Schelmerei. Seine Themen, das unbekümmert schreitende und das drohend-unheimliche und der frech-traurige Pfiff, der sich verloren über den Schicksalsschritt der Schergen schwingt, erklangen in all ihrer sinnlich-strömenden Fülle und dramatischen Eindringlichkeit.

Achtmal erschien Monteux unter rauschendem Beifall auf dem Podium und schüttelte beide Hände dankend gegen Charles Munch, der vom 1. Rang applaudierte.

In den allgemeinen Sturm des Beifalls mischte sich die besondere Freude und Dankbarkeit eines einzelnen: Johannes Warnke aus Neckar-Gmünd hatte, als er von dem bevorstehenden Konzert hörte, einen Brief an die Bostoner gerichtet, in dem er sie bat, noch einmal „sein" Orchester hören zu dürfen. Unerkannt inmitten der Zuhörer saß der achtzigjährige Pensionär der Bostoner Symphoniker, dem bei den Klängen der Musik die Erinnerung an jene drei Jahrzehnte aufstieg, da er selbst noch diesem großen Orchester angehörte. (NZ)

Der Abend
7. JAHR · Nr. 113 DONNERSTAG 15. Mai 1952

TUSCH für BOSTON

Zweite Station der Deutschland-Tournee: Berlin

Auf dem Flughafen Tempelhof traf in zwei Sonderflugzeugen das Bostoner Symphonie - Orchester zu seinem ersten Nachkriegskonzert im Titania-Palast ein. Herzlich Willkommen! (DA)

STEHT SEINEN MANN: und keiner sieht ihm die 78 an. Pierre Monteux dirigiert heute im Titania-Palast. Foto: DA Amerikas Symphonie-Orchester sind keine sonderlich alten Einrichtungen. Kurz vor der Mitte des vorigen Jahrhunderts wurde in New York das überhaupt erste große Orchester in den Staaten gegründet. Und ein Menschenalter später trat daneben noch ein zweites.

Außerhalb dieses Brennpunktes amerikanischen Lebens war es das traditionsreiche und kulturell betonte Boston, in dem sich der Wunsch nach einem eigenen Orchester durch die großzügige finanzielle Hilfe seines Gründers Henry Lee Higginson verwirklichen ließ.

Das war 1881. Also ein Jahr vor Gründung des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters.

Bis zum Ende des ersten Weltkrieges lag die künstlerische Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in den Händen deutscher Musiker. Georg Henschel als Sänger und Komponist Schüler der Berliner Hochschule, war der erste Dirigent des Orchesters. Ihm folgten Emil Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur und Carl Muck, den für einige Jahre Max Fiedler ablöste. Das alles sind sehr vertraute Namen von bestem Klang. Sie vertreten zugleich, wenn auch ohne feste Bindung, recht verschiedene Stilrichtungen und verhalfen dadurch dem Orchester zu seinem künstlerischen Aufstieg. Es waren ja nicht Gastdirigenten, die kamen und gingen, sondern sie walteten stets mehrere Jahre hindurch über dem ihnen anvertrauten Ensemble.

Auch die Musikerschaft selbst setzte sich — wie in jenen Jahren ganz allgemein — überwiegend aus deutschen Künstlern zusammen. Heute freilich gehören nur noch zwei Deutsche dem Orchester an: der Geiger Alfred Krips und der Schlagzeuger Max Polster. Denn inzwischen haben es die amerikanischen Orchester gelernt, sich aus den Musikern des eigenen Landes zu versorgen.

Eine entscheidende Wandlung vollzog sich nach Schluß des ersten Weltkrieges. Als Carl Muck abgetreten war, ging die Leitung des Orchesters sehr bald in die Hände von Pierre Monteux über, der mit Aufführungen von Ravel und Strawinsky bei Diaghilews Ballett im heimatlichen Paris seinen Ruhm als Dirigent begründet hatte. Zu der klassischen und romantischen Linie gesellte sich damit die neuzeitliche.

Bei dem Berliner Konzert steht wieder Pierre Monteux an der Spitze des Orchesters. Er hat es sich trotz seiner 78 Jahre nicht nehmen lassen, das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, das seinem Wirken so wesentliche Züge verdankt, bei diesem Gastkonzert selbst zu dirigieren. L. Bd.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
MAY 15 1952

Symphony Wins Germany

FRANKFURT, Germany (AP) —A West German music critic lavished praise on the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux's direction here Tuesday night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1800 at the Frankfurt Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

"Guest Conductor Monteux led ith a masterful sovereignty and at the same time a dynamic intensity. Despite his 77 years, he was marvelously untouched physically," the newspaper commented. The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 15 1952

Eight Curtain Calls For Pierre Monteux In Frankfurt Theater

Frankfurt, Germany—(UP)—A capacity crowd of more than 1,500 persons wildly applauded the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night and called back guest conductor Pierre Monteux for eight curtain calls.

The audience of Germans and U. S. servicemen at the Frankfurt Municipal Theater was particularly enthusiastic about the Orchestra's rendition of William Schuman's Third Symphony.

A special delegation from the small town of Oberstauffenbach, birthplace of the Boston Symphony's original concertmaster Daniel Kuntz, attended the performance and presented a plaque to the orchestra.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAY 15 1952

Bostonians Win Praise

FRANKFURT, May 14 (AP) A West German music critic lavished praise Wednesday on the Boston Symphony orchestra for its concert under Pierre Monteux' direction here Wednesday night.

The Frankfurter Neue Presse said the sell-out audience of 1800 at the Frankfurt opera house heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Three of its musicians are German born, one having fled Nazi persecution in 1938.

Tuesday's night's concert was for the German public. The orchestra will play here Wednesday afternoon for American soldiers, then leave by train for a concert in Berlin.

[186]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 15 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAILED

Frankfort Critic Praises Concert by U.S. Group Under Monteux

FRANKFORT, Germany, May 14 (AP)—A West German music critic praised today the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert here last night under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

The review said the sell-out audience of 1,800 at the Frankfort Opera House heard "a brilliant musical event which revealed the blended playing culture of this famous American orchestra."

"Guest conductor Monteux led with a masterful sovereignty and at the same time a dynamic intensity. Despite his 77 years, he was marvelously untouched physically," the critic commented.

The 103-member Boston orchestra is the first American symphony group to play in Germany since the war. Last night's concert was for the German public. The orchestra will play here this afternoon for American soldiers, then leave by train for a concert in Berlin.

UNE DÉCLARATION DE NICOLAS NABOKOV

Secrétaire général du Congrès pour la Liberté de la Culture.

Au mois de mai Stravinsky

et les plus grands orchestres du monde seront à Paris

L'ASSOCIATION des Amis de la Liberté est un organisme qui s'est formé il y a près d'un an. Il fut lancé par un mouvement de divers intellectuels de toutes les opinions, de différents pays. Ils se sont réunis en congrès à Berlin et ensuite dans des congrès ultérieurs en Belgique et aux Indes également. Ils ont formé une organisation permanente dont le siège central est très naturellement Paris.

Nous avons un comité français qui s'appelle les Amis de la Liberté : c'est une organisation autonome française. Nous avons aussi une organisation américaine ainsi qu'une organisation italienne dont le célèbre écrivain Ignazio Silone est le président, et des organisations dans divers autres pays. C'est donc un mouvement qui a l'intérêt de réunir de vastes classes intellectuelles du monde entier.

La politique du mouvement peut se définir d'une façon très simple. Nous sommes contre toute oppression de la liberté, qu'elle vienne de droite ou de gauche. Nous sommes une organisation antitotalitaire et nous sommes fiers de l'être. Le comité exécutif du congrès, dont le président est mon ami Denis de Rougemont et dont je suis le secrétaire général, m'a chargé de préparer une manifestation artistique tout à fait spéciale : ce ne sera pas exactement un festival. Ce que nous organisons à Paris au mois de mai ne pourra pas être répété. Cette manifestation ne peut être comparée aux festivals d'Edimbourg, de Salzbourg, d'Aix-en-Provence, etc. Nous sommes une exposition internationale qui veut mettre en relief tout ce qui s'est passé dans le domaine de la création des esprits libres dans le monde.

(Lire la suite en page 9.)

Nicolas Nabokov.

Vollendung im Uebermaß

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

Um es gleich vorwegzunehmen: der Abend im Titania-Palast war Sensation, war — das Wort in seiner echten Bedeutung gebraucht — phänomenales Ereignis. Berlin bedurfte seiner, um sein musikalisches Weltbild zu runden, um Anschauung zu gewinnen von einem Interpretationsideal, das es bisher nur vom Hörensagen, von Schallplatten oder aus dem Lautsprecher kannte. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra ist genau so alt wie das Philharmonische Orchester und wie dieses in den siebzig Jahren seines Bestehens durch wenige, aber ausschließlich europäische Dirigentenhände gegangen. Das Verzeichnis der Spieler weist in vielen Fällen auf Europa, auf Italien, Südosteuropa hin. Unter den ersten Geigen sitzen Mitglieder der früheren Berliner Staatskapelle. Dennoch — welche Gegensätze des Aufführungsstiles!

Die Lockerheit der Haltung auf dem Podium fällt sofort ins Auge bei aller verblüffenden Disziplin. Das Niveau der spieltechnischen Perfektion des einzelnen, erreicht durch kurzfristige Verträge, durch regelmäßigen Platzwechsel in den Streichergruppen, aber auch durch ein Minimum an „Dienst", liegt höher als bei uns. Charakteristisch der strahlend geschärfte und doch völlig ausgeglichene Blechbläserklang mit dem weiten Vibrato der Trompeten, der sehr schlanke Ton des Holzes, die Homogenität der stark besetzten Streicher. Großartig die kammermusikalische Genauigkeit des Riesenensembles, die Präzision der Einsätze, staunenerregend die Skala der Klangnuancen.

Es ist fast Vollendung im Uebermaß. Vor der Glätte, der Unfehlbarkeit, vor der noblen Unpersönlichkeit kapituliert, für unsere Begriffe, das, was zwischen den Noten steht, die Emotion, das Unwägbare. Das fällt nicht so auf bei Berlioz' „Benvenuto-Cellini"-Ouvertüre, obwohl auch sie noch mehr spontanen Elan verträgt. Auch nicht bei William Schumans Dritter Symphonie, die man, in Erinnerung an Celibidaches Interpretation, als ein viel emphatischeres Stück im Ohr hatte. Das wird aber problematisch bei Hindemiths „Mathis"-Symphonie, in der man bei so gleißender Gestalt vergeblich nach der Grünewald-Vision sucht, und das ist vollends fremd für uns bei einem so „deutschen" Stück wie Brahms' Dritter Symphonie.

Am Pult stand, in früheren Jahren ständiger Leiter, der siebenundsiebzigjährige Pierre Monteux, der erste Dirigent von Strawinskys „Sacre". Noch heute von erstaunlicher Genauigkeit des Schlages, deutet er nur an — mehr braucht es nicht, um diesen Klang-„Apparat" — auch dieses Wort mit allem Bedacht ausgesprochen — anzutreiben. Das festlich gestimmte Publikum ließ sich gefangennehmen von der glänzenden Leistung und war dankbar für dieses Geschenk Amerikas.

E. M.

16-1-52

LA MUSIQUE

A propos du beau programme établi par le congres pour la liberté de la culture

L'E...

W.-L. LANDOWSKI

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
JAN 16 1952

A Blow for Culture

It should come as a distinct pleasure to Americans to learn that German critics have been lavish in their acclaim of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the West German republic as a part of its European tour.

In Frankfurt the opera house was sold out for the orchestra's performance under the baton of Pierre Monteux, director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and the Frankfurter Neue Presse called it a "brilliant musical event."

It is praise indeed from the land of symphony music and of great symphonic composers. Despite the solidity of the Boston Symphony's reputation, it is good to hear the German reaction. This first appearance of an American symphonic group in Germany since the war should be followed by other cultural visitations.

We have been judged too long by the conduct of soldiers and tourists, neither of whom is intrinsically bad but who manage too often to leave thoroughly bad impressions of America and Americans. The exhibition of our attainments in art, music, and letters, however, will go far toward bringing the foreign impression of American culture more into balance with the facts.

The sending of the Boston Symphony to Europe is one of the finest moves in this direction that we have made. It refutes the common European charge that we are cultural barbarians, incapable of anything beyond bebop and B movies.

"SUITE DE LA UNE"

STRAWINSKY A PARIS (LES DÉCLARATIONS DE N. NABOKOV ET DE M. JUDD)

Naturellement, nous nous bornons à ce que l'on peut appeler la civilisation occidentale. Ne figurent pas dans notre exposition les œuvres des civilisations hindoue ou nègre, etc. Nous voulons donner un aperçu de notre propre civilisation dans les œuvres de ses artistes du vingtième siècle.

Nous avons choisi les œuvres qui ont le plus marqué la pensée et la culture occidentale du XX^e^ siècle. Particulièrement dans le domaine musical, nous avons pensé à des chefs-d'œuvre qui sont admis comme tels dans le monde entier. Dans le domaine littéraire, nous avons pensé à toutes les fonctions que la littérature occidentale a exercées dans ce siècle. Dans le domaine pictural, nous avons pensé aux chefs-d'œuvre esentiels de n'importe quel pays. Ainsi nous essayons de nous borner à peu de choses et, malgré cela, nous allons déjà jouer les œuvres de 39 compositeurs au moins. Ceci par des concerts symphoniques, des ballets, des œuvres lyriques, en plus des programmes qui seront donnés à l'Opéra.

Tout ceci sera terminé le 1er juin. J'ai le plaisir d'annoncer que le directeur de l'Opéra, M. Lehmann, ne fera jouer que des œuvres modernes, c'est-à-dire des œuvres marquantes comme Pelléas et Mélisande, spécialement dans le cadre de notre manifestation. Il s'agissait aussi d'avoir des organismes qui représentent ce qu'il y a de mieux à notre époque, tels que l'Opéra et l'orchestre philharmonique de Vienne qui présenteront Woyzek (qui n'a jamais été donné à Paris), l'œuvre d'Alban Berg sur le livret célèbre de Büchner.

Nous entendrons toute l'Academia Romana, le célèbre chœur de la chapelle Sixtine et l'orchestre de l'Académie, sous la direction de M. Rossi. On verra M. Ernest Ansermet diriger l'orchestre de la Suisse romande. Tout ceci, bien sûr, comprenant des programmes internationaux. Nous ne voulons pas que notre manifestation soit seulement nationale. Nous aurons aussi un jeune orchestre berlinois sous la direction d'un chef hongrois, ainsi qu'un concert de musique russe comprenant des œuvres de Dimitri Chostakovitch et de Serge Prokofieff. Nour aurons aussi le très grand plaisir de faire venir à Paris le New-York City Ballet avec Georges Balanchine, Igor Stravinsky viendra diriger ses propres œuvres. Pour la première fois, il présentera, avec la collaboration de Jean Cocteau et dans une mise en scène de ce dernier, Œdipus Rex.

Maintenant, j'ai à côté de moi M. Judd, qui est le manager depuis 1918 du Boston Symphony Orchestra, orchestre qui joue depuis toujours en Amérique le rôle de pionnier de la musique contemporaine de tous les pays, et particulièrement de la France. Il vous parlera mieux que moi du Boston Symphony Orchestra, qui viendra également à Paris.

M. JUDD. — J'ai pensé, quand nous avons été invités pour la première fois par le congrès pour la liberté de la culture, à venir en France, que c'était un grand compliment et un grand hommage que l'on faisait à l'orchestre symphonique de Boston. Puis j'ai revu à quel point nos rapports avaient été étroits avec la musique française.

» En 1918, Henri Rabeau vint à nous pour un temps assez court, en attendant la disponibilité de M. Monteux, qui était alors attaché à l'Opéra de New-York. Ce fut un grand service qu'il nous rendit, car c'était un homme remarquable, un grand compositeur qui fut par la suite à la tête de votre Conservatoire et qui ne cessa jamais de s'intéresser à l'orchestre de Boston, pendant tout le temps qu'il vécut. Ensuite M. Monteux vint et resta avec nous durant cinq brillantes années.

» Nous avons eu quelques pertes parmi les éléments de l'orchestre durant la guerre, et c'est M. Monteux qui en fit le remplacement d'une excellente façon. Nous n'oublions d'ailleurs pas que c'est de votre pays qu'est venu M. Monteux avant d'adopter le nôtre, ou plus exactement de nous permettre de l'adopter. Après M. Monteux, nous eûmes un chef qui n'était pas un Français, mais à propos duquel nous avons cependant à remercier Paris, car il possédait quelques-unes des qualités les plus éminemment françaises, M. Koussevitzky. Il fut avec nous pendant vingt-cinq ans et, durant cette période, il mit à ses programmes, comme il en avait pris l'habitude dans ses concerts à Paris, beaucoup de musique de son temps. Je crois qu'il préférait la musique contemporaine à ce qu'on pourrait appeler la musique moderne. La musique contemporaine française y fut beaucoup représentée et pour le cinquantième anniversaire de l'orchestre, en 31, M. Koussevitzky persuada les directeurs de monter beaucoup d'œuvres nouvelles, dont la plupart étaient de compositeurs français.

» Durant cette période, comme sous M. Monteux, de même qu'à présent sous M. Münch, nous avons amené en Amérique la plupart de vos artistes français. Des compositeurs furent également nos hôtes, et beaucoup conduisirent leurs propres œuvres (par exemple MM. Ravel et Milhaud). Nous avons eu également beaucoup de vos compositeurs français dans nos facultés, en particulier M. Honegger, qui fut à Tanglewood pendant un été à la classe de composition. Nous avons seulement regretté que sa santé ne lui permît pas de revenir l'année suivante.

Outre les chefs d'orchestre et les compositeurs, nous avons mis à contribution beaucoup d'éléments de votre Conservatoire. Beaucoup de membres de notre orchestre vinrent de France aux Etats-Unis et, parmi eux, il y en a beaucoup plus d'origine française que de toute autre nationalité, excepté l'Amérique. Et nous espérons qu'ils continueront à venir à nous, M. Münch en est, comme vous le savez maintenant, à sa troisième saison, mais nous le connaissons depuis bien plus ven... lon... tions... ele... poli... dialogue... gens de... saisissent... dites et... demi mot.

J. DUTOURD

Le critique... dans l'arène... lin a ver... petit che... devant M... partie au... pourrions M. B... de sui... de plus... d'un bon... ève et... des cap...

Imagine... bert Ken... M. Mar... l'altier... rasse, dépo... de cette... de se colleter... cinq romanciers... les maisons d'... ses lancent sur le... Je voudrais bien... endurance. Qui... critique de... rifable athlète de la pensée moderne ?

AUS BOSTO...

Berlin ist begeistert von...

Das mit 111 ganz ... Musikern besetzte Orchester liefert ... wohnte Klangbilder. Mit fast ... Fertigkeit beherrscht jeder einzelne ... Mann sein Instrument. So einhaltlich ... kein Strich sieht man nur selten Stir... Vielen. Das erzeugt eine fast krist... Klarheit des Tones. Dazu gesellt sich ... strahlend lichter und leuchtender ... Violinenklang, ein auffallend weich ins ... des Holz und ein Schlagzeug, das ... mit ritter rhythmischer Präzision ... Orchesters. Seine Ensemblekunst ist ... Ergebnis einer geradezu fanatischen ... Feinarbeit sein, die jede Nuance ... der festlegt, die Führung der Stim... die dynamischen Schattierungen, die ...

So ergibt sich ein in seiner techn... Ausführung bewundernswertes ... Ganzen, dessen klangliche Bezau... doch durch die abweichende ...

*

Franzosen: sehr hei...

Gastspiel in der Tribüne

Mit „Sincèrement" (etwa: „Imm... der Wahrheit bleiben") von Michel ... schloß das kurze Gastspiel der „Com... des 4" in der Tribüne.

Der Inhalt: ein Ehepaar sucht nac... die Wahrheit auf. Ob aufrichtig od... unrichtig, das wird hier die Frage... Nun raten Sie mal, was alsbald ge... richtig geraten! Der Dritte also, der ... ihre eindringt, bietet nicht Wahrh... sondern amüsante Illusionen. Das ... ein französischer Stoff, daß man ... Französische übersetzen müßte, wäre ... ursprünglich in Deutsch geschrieben ... Die Gespräche werden serviert wi...

Berühm...

Die Bostone...

Schallplatten gaben davon ... daß die amerikanische O... kultur in den letzten Jah... einen hohen Grad erre... Deshalb gehörte der Ab... dem ein Spitzenorchester ... im Titania-Palast zu hö... zu den interessantesten ... missen der Musiksaison. D... des Bostoner Symphonie... ist mit dem Namen Serge ... vitzky verbunden. Jet... Charles Munch an der Sp... Berliner Konzert leitet... Pierre Monteux, ein Diri... sich in Europa und der... einen Namen gemacht h...

An klanglicher Kultur ... zision des Zusammenspiel... sich nur wenige Orch... den Bostonern messen. ... zu rühmen ist die Ausg... heit und Einheitlichkeit d... körpers. Den Interpr... des Orchesters, charak...

UNE DÉCLARATION DE NICOLAS NABOKOV

Secrétaire général du Congrès pour la Liberté de la Culture.

Au mois de mai Stravinsky

et les plus grands orchestres du monde seront à Paris

L'ASSOCIATION des Amis de la Liberté est un organisme qui s'est formé il y a près d'un an. Il fut lancé par un mouvement de divers intellectuels de toutes les opinions, de différents pays. Ils se sont réunis en congrès à Berlin et ensuite dans des congrès ultérieurs en Belgique et aux Indes également. Ils ont formé une organisation permanente dont le siège central est très naturellement Paris.

Nous avons un comité français qui s'appelle les Amis de la Liberté : c'est une organisation autonome française. Nous avons aussi une organisation américaine ainsi qu'une organisation italienne dont le célèbre écrivain Ignazio Silone est le président, et des organisations dans divers autres pays. C'est donc un mouvement qui a l'intérêt de réunir de vastes classes intellectuelles du monde entier.

La politique du mouvement peut se définir d'une façon très simple. Nous sommes contre toute oppression de la liberté, qu'elle vienne de droite ou de gauche. Nous sommes une organisation antitotalitaire et nous sommes fiers de l'être. Le comité exécutif du congrès, dont le président est mon ami Denis de Rougemont et dont je suis le secrétaire général, m'a chargé de préparer une manifestation artistique tout à fait spéciale : ce ne sera pas exactement un festival. Ce que nous organisons à Paris au mois de mai ne pourra pas être répété. Cette manifestation ne peut être comparée aux festivals d'Edimbourg, de Salzbourg, d'Aix-en-Provence, etc. Nous sommes une exposition internationale qui veut mettre en relief tout ce qui s'est passé dans le domaine de la création des esprits libres dans le monde.

(Lire la suite en page 9.)

Nicolas Nabokov.

Vollendung im Uebermaß

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

Um es gleich vorwegzunehmen: der Abend im Titania-Palast war Sensation, war — das Wort in seiner echten Bedeutung gebraucht — phänomenales Ereignis. Berlin bedurfte seiner, um sein musikalisches Weltbild zu runden, um Anschauung zu gewinnen von einem Interpretationsideal, das es bisher nur vom Hörensagen, von Schallplatten oder aus dem Lautsprecher kannte. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra ist genau so alt wie das Philharmonische Orchester und wie dieses in den siebzig Jahren seines Bestehens durch wenige, aber ausschließlich europäische Dirigentenhände gegangen. Das Verzeichnis der Spieler weist in vielen Fällen auf Frankreich, auf Italien, Südosteuropa hin. Unter den ersten Geigen sitzen Mitglieder der früheren Berliner Staatskapelle. Dennoch — welche Gegensätze des Aufführungsstiles!

Die Lockerheit der Haltung auf dem Podium fällt sofort ins Auge bei aller verblüffenden Disziplin. Das Niveau der spieltechnischen Perfektion des einzelnen, erreicht durch kurzfristige Verträge, durch regelmäßigen Platzwechsel in den Streichergruppen, aber auch durch ein Minimum an „Dienst", liegt höher als bei uns. Charakteristisch der strahlend geschärfte und doch völlig ausgeglichene Blechbläserklang mit dem weiten Vibrato der Trompeten, der sehr schlanke Ton des Holzes, die Homogenität der stark besetzten Streicher. Großartig die kammermusikalische Genauigkeit des Riesenensembles, die Präzision der Einsätze, staunenerregend die Skala der Klangnuancen.

Es ist fast Vollendung im Uebermaß. Vor der Glätte, der Unfehlbarkeit, vor der noblen Unpersönlichkeit kapituliert, für unsere Begriffe, das, was zwischen den Noten steht, die Emotion, das Unwägbare. Das fällt nicht so auf bei Berlioz' „Benvenuto-Cellini"-Ouvertüre, obwohl auch sie noch mehr spontanen Elan verträgt. Auch nicht bei William Schumans Dritter Symphonie, die man, in Erinnerung an Celibidaches Interpretation, als ein viel emphatischeres Stück im Ohr hatte. Das wird aber problematisch bei Hindemiths „Mathis"-Symphonie, in der man bei so gleißender Gestalt vergeblich nach der Grünewald-Vision sucht, und das ist vollends fremd für uns bei einem so „deutschen" Stück wie Brahms' Dritter Symphonie.

Am Pult stand, in früheren Jahren ständiger Leiter, der siebenundsiebzigjährige Pierre Monteux, der erste Dirigent von Strawinskys „Sacre". Noch heute von erstaunlicher Genauigkeit des Schlages, deutet er nur an — mehr braucht es nicht, um diesen Klang-„Apparat" — auch dieses Wort mit allem Bedacht ausgesprochen — anzutreiben. Das festlich gestimmte Publikum ließ sich gefangennehmen von der glänzenden Leistung und war dankbar für dieses Geschenk Amerikas.

E. M.

16-1-52

LA MUSIQUE

A propos du beau programme établi par le congrès pour la liberté de la culture

Le mois de mai promet d'être riche en réalisations artistiques de haute qualité, grâce à la réunion [illegible] du Congrès pour la liberté de la culture. Le remarquable [illegible] M. Nabokov, [illegible] orchestres de Boston, M. [illegible] Monteux, [illegible] Condrus à Paris, [illegible] Boston, ayant créé de [illegible] partir d'un engagement [illegible] viendra tour à tour [illegible] trois concerts en France [illegible] tueront le principal [illegible] à ces fêtes. Ses [illegible] Monteux et Charles Münch [illegible] posent de monter [illegible] sur l'estrade du [illegible] pourra-t-on applaudir [illegible] troupe noire qui [illegible] Saints en trois actes [illegible] Virgil Thompson et Gertrude [illegible] que les Parisiens applaudissent [illegible] joie. La compagnie [illegible] Ballet [illegible] montera six spectacles [illegible] eux sera réservé aux danses de [illegible] winsky. Condura-t-il [illegible] représentations à Paris ? Depuis [illegible] le maître n'est pas venu dans [illegible] capitale, favorisée [illegible] présence de son fils Soulima.

Le comité qui comprend [illegible] ment les noms de Henri Rabaud, [illegible] Denise Tual, Julius [illegible] Sidney Hook, prend [illegible] présidence à Paris au printemps [illegible] quelques-uns des [illegible] plus symphoniques d'Amérique, [illegible] lie, de Suisse et de France. L'[illegible] de Vienne jouera « Wozzeck » [illegible] ban Berg, œuvre caractéristique [illegible] originale s'il en fut ! Elle est [illegible] pour plusieurs orchestres [illegible] trouve au parterre, l'autre [illegible] scène et comprend l'harmonium, [illegible] troisième est formé d'accordéons, [illegible] bombardes, cithares et [illegible] aussi la présence d'un [illegible] convient de deux [illegible] ment pendant la représentation. [illegible] Enfin, il faut un [illegible] de chambre... Trente-cinq [illegible] sont souvent nécessaires pour [illegible] reuse mise au point de cette [illegible] position.

Déjà, en Amérique [illegible] artistes travaillent et attendent [illegible] impatience le moment de [illegible] ques, en avril prochain, à destination de l'Europe.

W.-L. LANDOWSKI

AUS BOSTON

Berlin ist begeistert von

Das mit 111 ganz [illegible] Künstlern besetzte Orchester [illegible] phasie Klangbilder. Mit fast [illegible] Präzision beherrscht jeder einzelne [illegible] sein Instrument. So sicherheitlich [illegible] Strich sieht man nur selten [illegible] Violen. Das erzeugt eine fast [illegible] Klarheit des Tones. Dann [illegible] strahlend lichter und leuchtender [illegible] Streichklang, ein auffallend weich [illegible] Holz und ein Schlagwerk, [illegible] letzter rhythmischer Präzision [illegible] Dies die Klangelemente des [illegible] Orchesters. Seine Ensembleleistung [illegible] Ergebnis einer geradezu fanatisch [illegible] Einarbeit sein, die jede Nuance [illegible] fixiert festlegt, die Führung der [illegible] die dynamischen Schattierungen.

So ergibt sich ein in seiner [illegible] Ausführung bewundernswertes [illegible] Ganzen, dessen klangliche [illegible] doch durch die abweichende [illegible]

*

Franzosen: sehr [illegible]

Gastspiel in der Tribüne

Mit „Sincèrement" (etwa: „Im [illegible] der Wahrheit bleiben") von Michel [illegible] schloß das kurze Gastspiel der „Co[illegible] 4" in der Tribüne.

Der Inhalt: ein Ehepaar tauscht [illegible] die Wahrheit auf. Ob aufrichtig [illegible] aufrichtig, das wird hier die Frage [illegible] Nun raten Sie mal, was alsbald [illegible] Richtig geraten! Der Dritte also, [illegible] sie eindringt, bietet nicht Wahr[illegible] sondern amüsante Illusionen. Das [illegible] französischer Stoff, daß man [illegible] französische übersetzen müßte, wäre [illegible] ursprünglich in Deutsch geschrieben [illegible] die Gespräche werden serviert [illegible]

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
APR 16 1952

A Blow for Culture

It should come as a distinct pleasure to Americans to learn that German critics have been lavish in their acclaim of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the West German republic as a part of its European tour.

In Frankfurt the opera house was sold out for the orchestra's performance under the baton of Pierre Monteux, director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and the Frankfurter Neue Presse called it a "brilliant musical event."

It is praise indeed from the land of symphony music and of great symphonic composers. Despite the solidity of the Boston Symphony's reputation, it is good to hear the German reaction. This first appearance of an American symphonic group in Germany since the war should be followed by other cultural visitations.

We have been judged too long by the conduct of soldiers and tourists, neither of whom is intrinsically bad but who manage too often to leave thoroughly bad impressions of America and Americans. The exhibition of our attainments in art, music, and letters, however, will go far toward bringing the foreign impression of American culture more into balance with the facts.

The sending of the Boston Symphony to Europe is one of the finest moves in this direction that we have made. It refutes the common European charge that we are cultural barbarians, incapable of anything beyond bebop and B movies.

[157]

"SUITE DE LA UNE"

STRAWINSKY A PARIS

(LES DÉCLARATIONS DE N. NABOKOV ET DE M. JUDD)

Naturellement, nous nous bornons à ce que l'on peut appeler la civilisation occidentale. Ne figurent pas dans notre exposition les œuvres des civilisations hindoue ou nègre, etc. Nous voulons donner un aperçu de notre propre civilisation dans les œuvres de ses artistes du vingtième siècle.

Nous avons choisi les œuvres qui ont le plus marqué la pensée et la culture occidentale du XX^e^ siècle. Particulièrement dans le domaine musical, nous avons pensé à des chefs-d'œuvre qui sont admis comme tels dans le monde entier. Dans le domaine littéraire, nous avons pensé à toutes les fonctions que la littérature occidentale a exercées dans ce siècle. Dans le domaine pictural, nous avons pensé aux chefs-d'œuvre esentiels de n'importe quel pays. Ainsi nous essayons de nous borner à peu de choses et, malgré cela, nous allons déjà jouer les œuvres de 39 compositeurs au moins. Ceci par des concerts symphoniques, des ballets, des œuvres lyriques, en plus des programmes qui seront donnés à l'Opéra.

Tout ceci sera terminé le 1er juin. J'ai le plaisir d'annoncer que le directeur de l'Opéra, M. Lehmann, ne fera jouer que des œuvres modernes, c'est-à-dire des œuvres marquantes comme Pelléas et Mélisande, spécialement dans le cadre de notre manifestation. Il s'agissait aussi d'avoir des organismes qui représentent ce qu'il y a de mieux à notre époque, tels que l'Opéra et l'orchestre philharmonique de Vienne qui présenteront Woyzek (qui n'a jamais été donné à Paris), l'œuvre d'Alban Berg sur le livret célèbre de Büchner.

Nous entendrons toute l'Academia Romana, le célèbre chœur de la chapelle Sixtine et l'orchestre de l'Académie, sous la direction de M. Rossi. On verra M. Ernest Ansermet diriger l'orchestre de la Suisse romande. Tout ceci, bien sûr, comprenant des programmes internationaux. Nous ne voulons pas que notre manifestation soit seulement nationale. Nous aurons aussi un jeune orchestre berlinois sous la direction d'un chef hongrois, ainsi qu'un concert de musique russe comprenant des œuvres de Dimitri Chostakovitch et de Serge Prokofieff. Nour aurons aussi le très grand plaisir de faire venir à Paris le New-York City Ballet avec Georges Balanchine, Igor Stravinsky viendra diriger ses propres œuvres. Pour la première fois, il présentera, avec la collaboration de Jean Cocteau et dans une mise en scène de ce dernier, Œdipus Rex.

Maintenant, j'ai à côté de moi M. Judd, qui est le manager depuis 1918 du Boston Symphony Orchestra, orchestre qui joue depuis toujours en Amérique le rôle de pionnier de la musique contemporaine de tous les pays, et particulièrement de la France. Il vous parlera mieux que moi du Boston Symphony Orchestra, qui viendra également à Paris.

M. JUDD. — J'ai pensé, quand nous avons été invités pour la première fois par le congrès pour la liberté de la culture, à venir en France, que c'était un grand compliment et un grand hommage que l'on faisait à l'orchestre symphonique de Boston. Puis j'ai revu à quel point nos rapports avaient été étroits avec la musique française.

» En 1918, Henri Rabeau vint à nous pour un temps assez court, en attendant la disponibilité de M. Monteux, qui était alors attaché à l'Opéra de New-York. Ce fut un grand service qu'il nous rendit, car c'était un homme remarquable, un grand compositeur qui fut par la suite à la tête de votre Conservatoire et qui ne cessa jamais de s'intéresser à l'orchestre de Boston, pendant tout le temps qu'il vécut. Ensuite M. Monteux vint et resta avec nous durant cinq brillantes années.

» Nous avons eu quelques pertes parmi les éléments de l'orchestre durant la guerre, et c'est M. Monteux qui en fit le remplacement d'une excellente façon. Nous n'oublions d'ailleurs pas que c'est de votre pays qu'est venu M. Monteux avant d'adopter le nôtre, ou plus exactement de nous permettre de l'adopter. Après M. Monteux, nous eûmes un chef qui n'était pas un Français, mais à propos duquel nous avons cependant à remercier Paris, car il possédait quelques-unes des qualités les plus éminemment françaises, M. Koussevitzky. Il fut avec nous pendant vingt-cinq ans et, durant cette période, il mit à ses programmes, comme il en avait pris l'habitude dans ses concerts à Paris, beaucoup de musique de son temps. Je crois qu'il préférait la musique contemporaine à ce qu'on pourrait appeler la musique moderne. La musique contemporaine française y fut beaucoup représentée et, pour le cinquantième anniversaire de l'orchestre, en 31, M. Koussevitzky persuada les directeurs de monter beaucoup d'œuvres nouvelles, dont la plupart étaient de compositeurs français.

» Durant cette période, comme sous M. Monteux, de même qu'à présent sous M. Münch, nous avons amené en Amérique la plupart de vos artistes français. Des compositeurs furent également nos hôtes, et beaucoup conduisirent leurs propres œuvres (par exemple MM. Ravel et Milhaud). Nous avons eu également beaucoup de vos compositeurs français dans nos facultés, en particulier M. Honegger, qui fut à Tanglewood pendant un été à la classe de composition. Nous avons seulement regretté que sa santé ne lui permît pas de revenir l'année suivante.

Outre les chefs d'orchestre et les compositeurs, nous avons mis à contribution beaucoup d'éléments de votre Conservatoire. Beaucoup de membres de notre orchestre vinrent de France aux Etats-Unis et, parmi eux, il y en a beaucoup plus d'origine française que de toute autre nationalité, excepté l'Amérique. Et nous espérons qu'ils continueront à venir à nous, M. Münch en est, comme vous le savez maintenant, à sa troisième saison, mais nous le connaissons depuis bien plus longtemps, parce que la première fois qu'il a dirigé [illegible] hôte de l'orchestre de B[illegible] où il fit la plus magnifique impression. On l'invita de nouveau et il vint encore une autre fois à Boston pour y diriger son propre orchestre. Je crois qu'il désire beaucoup, après avoir amené à Boston l'orchestre national de la Radiodiffusion française, revenir en France avec l'orchestre de Boston. Et naturellement nous étions très favorables à ce projet, mais nous avons d'abord à [illegible] conditions qui [illegible] possible en ma[illegible]

J. DUTOURD

[illegible] leurs livres [illegible] critiques, et [illegible] leurs articles pour [illegible]. C'est un dialogue charmant, entre gens de bonne compagnie, qui saisissent les allusions [illegible] dites et se comprennent à demi-mot.

Le critique de cinéma, jeté dans l'arène, attaqué [illegible] lin à vent, pris [illegible] petit chat, se [illegible] devant Messaline [illegible] patte au Roi de [illegible] pourfend M. Ra[illegible] de suite sous les [illegible] de plaisir ou de [illegible] d'un formidable [illegible] lève et baisse le [illegible] des caprices impérieux [illegible].

Imaginez un peu M. Robert Kemp, par exemple, ou M. Maurice Nadeau, dont l'altier dédain est une [illegible] rasse, dépouillé tout à coup de cette cuirasse et obligé de se colleter avec les vingt cinq romanciers mensuels que les maisons d'édition français ses lancent sur le marché ? Je voudrais bien voir leur endurance. Qui dira que le critique de cinéma est le véritable athlète de la pensée moderne ?

Berühm

Die Bostone

Schallplatten gaben dav[illegible] daß die amerikanische [illegible] kultur in den letzten Jah[illegible] einen hohen Grad erre[illegible] Deshalb gehörte der A[illegible] dem ein Spitzenorchester [illegible] im Titania-Palast zu h[illegible] zu den interessantest[illegible] lissen der Musiksaison. [illegible] des Bostoner Symphonie[illegible] ist mit dem Namen Serg[illegible] witzky verbunden.

Charles Münch an der S[illegible] Berliner Konzert leitet[illegible] Pierre Monteux, ein Di[illegible] sich in Europa und de[illegible] einen Namen gemacht h[illegible]

An klanglicher Kultur[illegible] zision des Zusammensp[illegible] sich nur wenige Or[illegible] den Bostonern messen. [illegible] zu rühmen ist die A[illegible] heit und Einheitlichkeit [illegible] körpers. Den Interp[illegible] des Orchesters, chara[illegible]

Le Parisien

16-1-52

LA MUSIQUE

A propos du beau progra... établi par le congrès ... pour la liberté de la cult...

Le mois de mai promet d'être ... tile en réalisations artistiqu... haute qualité, grâce à la rayonn... activité du Congrès pour la li... de la culture. Le secrétaire gé... M. Nabokov et l'administrateur ... l'orchestre de Boston, M. Juda... noncent officiellement le thèm... les variations de ces manifesta... consacrées à « l'Œuvre du XX... ole ». Elles se dérouleront dan... cadre du Théâtre des Champs... sées. Les principaux ouvrages ... notre époque y seront présen... aussi bien les pages de musique ... que les ballets et pièces théât... diverses. L'orchestre symphoniqu... Boston, ayant créé de nombre... partitions étrangères aux Etats... viendra tout naturellement do... trois concerts en France qui co... stueront le principal apport amér... à ces fêtes. Ses animateurs, P... Monteux et Charles Munch, se... posent de monter l'un et l'autre ... sur l'estrade du chef. Sans do... pourra-t-on applaudir aussi ... troupe noire qui jouera « Qu... Saints en trois actes », opéra ... Virgil Thompson et Gertrude S... que les Parisiens applaudiront ... joie. La compagnie « New-York ... Ballet », dirigée par Balanc... montera six spectacles. L'un d'... eux sera réservé aux danses de ... winsky. Conduira-t-il lui-même ... représentations à Paris ? Depuis ... le maître n'est pas venu dans ... capitale, favorisée pourtant par ... présence de son fils Soulima.

Le comité qui comprend not... ment les noms de Henri Dupa... Denise Tual, Julius Fleischman... Sidney Hook prévoit également ... présence à Paris au printemps ... quelques-uns des meilleurs en... dies symphoniques d'Autriche, d... lie, de Suisse et de France. L'O... de Vienne jouera « Wozzeck », ... ban Berg, œuvre caractéristiqu... originale s'il en fut ! Elle est é... pour plusieurs orchestres. L'au... trouve au parterre, l'autre su... scène et comprend l'harmoniu... troisième est formé d'accordé... bombardes, crinorins, et nécess... aussi la présence d'un piano ... convient de désaccorder comp... ment pendant la représentati... Enfin, il faut un dernier orch... de chambre... Trente-sept répéti... sont souvent nécessaires pour l... reuse mise au point de cette ... position.

Déjà, en Amérique, de nomb... artistes travaillent et attendent ... impatience le moment de s'... ques, en avril prochain à destin... de l'Europe.

W.-L. LANDOWS...

...NE"

...ARATIONS DE ... ET DE M. JUDD)

...emps, parce que la première ...qu'il a dirigé, c'était comme ...de l'orchestre de Boston où ... la plus magnifique impres... On l'invita de nouveau et il ...encore une autre fois à Bos... pour y diriger son propre or... ... Je crois qu'il désire ...roup, après avoir amené à ... l'orchestre national de la ...diffusion française, revenir ...rance avec l'orchestre de ... Et naturellement nous ... très favorables à ce projet, ...nous avons dû attendre les ...ions qui vont le rendre ...le en mai prochain.

DUTOURD

...leurs livres pour les cri... , et ceux-ci leurs arti... pour ceux-là. C'est un ...gue charmant, entre ...de bonne compagnie, qui ...sent les allusions éru... et se comprennent à ...mot.

...critique de cinéma, jeté ...l'arène, attaque un mou... vent, puis caresse un ...chat, se voile la face ...t Messaline, donne la ... au lion de Samson, ...end M. Richebé, et ainsi ...ite sous les hurlements ...isir ou de réprobation ...ormidable auditoire qui ...t baisse le pouce selon ...aprices imprévisibles.

...ginez un peu M. Ro... Kemp, par exemple, ou ...aurice Nadeau, dont ...r dédain est une cui... dépouillé tout à coup ...tte cuirasse et obligés ...colleter avec les vingt... ...manciers mensuels que ...isons d'édition françai... ...ncent sur le marché ? ...udrais bien voir leur ...ance. Qui dira que le ...e de cinéma est le vé... ...athlète de la pensée ...ne ?

AUS BOSTON kamen Hundertelf

Berlin ist begeistert von Pierre Monteux und seinen Musikern

Das mit 111 ganz hervorragenden Musikern besetzte Orchester liefert ungewöhnlich klangschöne, mit fast artistischer Fertigkeit gespielte, in der einzelne Musiker sein Instrument. So einheitlich exakt wie sich stets nur selten Streicher im Strich spielen. Das erzeugt eine fast kristallene Klarheit des Tones. Dazu gesellt sich ein strahlend lichter und leuchtender Trompetenklang, ein auffallend weich intonierendes Holz und ein Schlagzeug, das mit letzter rhythmischer Präzision einsetzt.

Dies die Klangelemente des Bostoner Orchesters. Seine Ensemblekunst muß das Ergebnis einer geradezu fanatischen Probenarbeit sein, die jede Nuance unabdingbar festlegt, die Führung der Stimmen, die dynamischen Schattierungen, die Tempi.

So ergibt sich ein in seiner technischen Ausführung bewundernswertes Musizieren, dessen klangliche Besonderheit noch durch die abweichende Besetzung der Streicher mit dem Übergewicht der ersten Geigen betont wird.

Darüber aber liegt eine bisweilen ernüchternde Sachlichkeit, die mit Routine gepaart ist. Auf den improvisatorischen, aus dem Moment geborenen Impuls muß man bis zu einem gewissen Grade verzichten. Glanzvoll die „Benvenuto Cellini"-Ouvertüre von Berlioz. Ein glücklicher Start. Die 3. Sinfonie von Brahms und Hindemiths Orchester-Sätze aus „Mathis der Maler" in ihrer wenig romantischen Haltung befremdend. Bemerkenswert als virtuose Orchesterleistung des Amerikaners Schuman 3. Sinfonie.

Pierre Monteux dirigiert mit distinguierten Bewegungen. Es ist mehr ein Verständigen, ein Bestätigen getroffener Vereinbarungen.

Der Erfolg war groß, sowohl für das außergewöhnliche Orchesterspiel wie für den Dirigenten. L. Bd.

* * *

Franzosen: sehr heiter

Gastspiel in der Tribüne

M.: „Sincèrement" (etwa: „Immer bei der Wahrheit bleiben") von Michel Duran schloß das kurze Gastspiel der „Compagnie des 4" in der Tribüne.

Der Inhalt: ein Ehepaar tischt sich stets die Wahrheit auf. Ob aufrichtig oder ob unrichtig, das wird hier die Frage. Denn nun raten Sie mal, was alsbald geschieht. Richtig geraten! Der Dritte also, der in die Ehe eindringt, bietet nicht Wahrheiten, sondern amüsante Illusionen. Das ist ein so französischer Stoff, daß man ihn ins Französische übersetzen mußte, wäre er ursprünglich in Deutsch geschrieben worden. Die Gespräche werden serviert wie ein galantes Souper, vom appetitanregenden Kosthäppchen bis zur auffüllenden Nachspeise, und jeder Bissen (lies: Wort) zergeht genießerisch auf der Zunge.

Claia — diesen Ulk spielen die Darsteller aus, comme çi, comme ça. Die Damen Santa Relli und Anne Alexandre kokett (in Kleidern aus enormem Stoff), die Herren Jacques Thiéry (kräftig ins Parkett hinein) und Pierre Ringel (mit gedämpfteren Tönen). Und das Publikum lachte schallend.

Solche Gastspiele bleiben begrüßenswert, solange es dem Berliner so schwer ist, selbst Gast in anderen Städten zu sein. Bis zum nächsten. Gerhard Grindel Wiedersehen mit seinem alten Orchester feierte der 80jährige Johannes Warnke (im hellen Mantel), als er am 14. Mai Mitglieder des weltberühmten Boston-Symphony-Orchesters in Frankfurt begrüßen konnte. Warnke, der in Neckargemünd wohnt, gehörte dem Orchester 31 Jahre lang an

Photo: AP

Berlin bejubelt Boston

Höchster Wohllaut — höchste Spieldisziplin

Der Besuch des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters war uns doppelt wertvoll. Dieses Orchester, das im vorigen Jahr seinen 70. Geburtstag feiern konnte, verdankt die Anfänge seines Ruhms deutschen Lehrmeistern. Der bedeutendste unter ihnen war Karl Muck. Ihn lösten französische Dirigenten ab, unter ihnen Pierre Monteux, bis 1924 der Russe Serge Koussewitzky in Boston einzog und das Orchester, das nun seine deutschen Mitglieder nach und nach (bis auf ein halbes Dutzend) einbüßte, zu dem machte, was es heute ist: ein Klangkörper von fast beispielloser spieltechnischer Vollendung und Tonschönheit.

In Berlin hat man die Bostoner, die unter Monteux als Gastdirigenten kamen, überaus herzlich empfangen. Gleich beim Vortrag der Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz traten ihre Vorzüge in helles Licht: die wundervoll gerundete Klanggebung der einzelnen Gruppen, ihr virtuoses Ineinandergreifen, die unbedingte Zucht des Zusammenspielens, der Glanz der Streicher, der Adel der Bläser, voran des Blechs. Es muß ein Glück bedeuten, mit einem so vollkommenen Orchester zu musizieren, und Monteux, der 77jährige, tat es mit überlegener Ruhe, mit der Klarheit und Eleganz des Franzosen. Mag sein, daß er manches Zwielicht der dritten Sinfonie von Brahms mied, um so schöner rundete sich ihm alles zum Ganzen. William Schumans dritte Sinfonie, deren erste Bekanntschaft uns vor einiger Zeit Celibidache vermittelte, erstand unter Monteux Händen mit dem ganzen Ernst ihrer männlich herben, kunstvoll kontrapunktierten und beziehungsreichen Tonsprache, ein Werk, das alles Gerede von jungamerikanischer musikalischer Impotenz Lügen straft. Paul Hindemiths Sinfonie „Mathis der Maler" endlich erschien mit ihrer zart verklärten und machtvoll sich aufschwingenden Musik in einer klanglichen Schönheit, die tief beglückte.

Eingangs wurde gesagt, daß der Besuch der Bostoner uns doppelt wertvoll wäre. Berlin war einmal eine Weltstadt der Musik, und um es wieder zu werden, sind Besuche wie dieser nötig. Sie knüpfen neue Bande. Sie bieten Vergleichsmöglichkeiten, die zu aufrüttelnden Selbsterkenntnissen führen. Erwin Kroll

Berühmtes Orchester aus Amerika

Die Bostoner Symphoniker gastierten zum erstenmal in Berlin

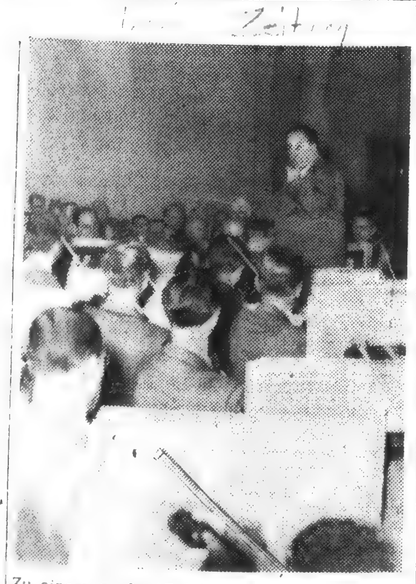
Schallplatten gaben davon Kunde, daß die amerikanische Orchesterkultur in den letzten Jahrzehnten einen hohen Grad erreicht hat. Deshalb gehörte der Abend, bei dem ein Spitzenorchester aus USA im Titania-Palast zu hören war, zu den interessantesten Ereignissen der Musiksaison. Der Ruhm des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters ist mit dem Namen Serge Koussewitzky verbunden. Jetzt steht Charles Munch an der Spitze; das Berliner Konzert leitete jedoch Pierre Monteux ein Dirigent, der sich in Europa und den Staaten einen Namen gemacht hat.

An klanglicher Kultur, an Präzision des Zusammenspiels können es nur wenige Orchester mit den Bostonern messen. Besonders zu rühmen ist die Ausgeglichenheit und Leichtigkeit des Streicherkörpers. Den Interpretationsstil des Orchesters charakterisieren volle, saftige Klanggebung und eine unproblematische und unsentimentale Musizierart. Es geht um den Willen des Komponisten, nicht um eine besondere feinschmeckerische Auffassung. Ein tüchtiger Schuß gesunder Vitalität verhindert das Abgleiten ins Akademische.

Pierre Monteux, nur wenige Jahre jünger als Leo Blech, gehört zu der Generation, die noch nichts von Pultvirtuosen wußte. Da er selbst viele Jahre im Orchester gesessen hat, verzichtet er auf ein publikumwirksames Spiel der Hände; sein Dirigieren ist vom Willen zur Sachlichkeit bestimmt. Bei der Probe konnte man sich von seiner minuziösen Kleinarbeit überzeugen.

Die schwungvoll musizierte Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz bildete den Auftakt. In der dritten Symphonie von Brahms ging es Monteux darum, die musikantischen Energien zum Leben zu erwecken, allerdings vermißten wir hier die tiefere Bedeutsamkeit. Das neue amerikanische Schaffen repräsentierte im zweiten Teil des Abends die dritte Symphonie von William Schuman. Glänzend instrumentiert und mit überlegenem satztechnischem Können gearbeitet, scheint sie sich doch häufig an äußere kontrapunktische Wirkungen zu verlieren. Der nachhaltigste Eindruck ging von Hindemiths grandioser und grandios gebrachter Symphonie „Mathis, der Maler" aus. Die amerikanischen Gäste wurden lebhaft gefeiert. RIAS hatte den bedeutungsvollen Abend über den Äther seinen Hörern zugänglich gemacht. K. R.

FREITAG, 16. MAI 1952



Zu einem großen Erfolg wurde gestern abend das Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters. — Dirigent Pierre Monteux bei der Probe im Titania-Palast. (Schubert).

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester: Die ersten GEIGEN

Mit dem Boston-Symphony-Orchestra ist erstmalig seit Kriegsende ein amerikanisches Orchester nach Berlin gekommen. Die „Bostoner" sehen auf eine 70jährige Geschichte zurück. Unter ihren Erziehern waren Dirigenten wie Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussewitzky und Charles Munch. In größter Besetzung besiedeln sie das blumengeschmückte Podium des Titania-Palastes, das ihre Fülle gerade noch zu fassen vermag. Gleich der Anfang der Ouvertüre zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz ist charakteristisch für dieses Ensemble: er kommt „wie aus der Pistole geschossen". Die Perfektion des Zusammenspiels bestimmt auch weiterhin den Eindruck. Eine rhythmisch so exakte Entfesselung aller Klanggruppen vom Schlagzeug bis zu den Streichern wie in der Toccata der 3. Sinfonie von William Schuman, die wir bereits durch die Philharmoniker unter Celibidache kennen lernten, hatten wir bisher nur bei Jazz-Orchestern vermutet. Diese faszinierende Hybris der mechanischen Präzision ist das eine Kennzeichen. Das andere ist der sehr helle Klang, der in den eng mensurierten Holz- und Blasinstrumenten begründet ist. Diesem Klangideal fügen sich auch die Streicher, deren Klang bei aller aufrauschenden Fülle in der „Versuchung des heiligen Antonius" aus Hindemiths „Mathis"-Sinfonie und im 4. Satz der Sinfonie von Schuman immer wieder gläßend und schneidend-glänzend ist. Doch jeder Vorzug hat seine Schattenseiten. Die Artistik, mit der das Klanggebäude aufgerichtet wird, hat etwas Unnahbares, Undurchdringliches. Wie sich die einzelnen Musiker jeglicher persönlicher Willensbekundung zugunsten des Ganzen zu entäußern scheinen, das fasziniert und bestürzt, aber es lädt nicht ein, sich in die F-dur-Sinfonie von Brahms einzufühlen. Der Hörer wird vor die Musik, nicht in sie versetzt, denn dieses Orchester musiziert nicht, sondern es stellt eine sinfonische Schöpfung hin, um sie dann allein zu lassen. An Einzelheiten gab es genug zu bewundern, obwohl Pierre Monteux, einst Chef-, jetzt nur noch Gastdirigent des Orchesters, sich auf die notwendigsten Zeichen, die kaum über das Rhythmische hinausgehen, beschränkt. Monteux, heute ein Mann von 77 Jahren, an dessen Namen die Pariser Uraufführung von Strawinskys „Sacre" geknüpft ist, durfte mit dem Orchester die herzlichsten Ovationen des Berliner Publikums entgegennehmen.

Kurt Westphal

[188]

Hohe Schule des Orchesterklangs

Berlin grüßt Bostons Symphonie-Orchester unter Pierre Monteux

Es ist oft darüber diskutiert worden, ob das Niveau des Orchesterspiels während der letzten hundert Jahre gestiegen sei. Was das Technische angeht, die Virtuosität von Gruppen, ihr Zusammenspiel, die Verschmelzung ihrer Farben, so möchte ich die Frage schon für die letzten dreißig bis vierzig Jahre bejahen.

Nietzsche hat einmal ganz richtig gesagt, Wagner habe den Orchestermusiker „erlöst", indem er ihm Aufgaben stellte. Dieser Prozeß geht weiter in der nachwagnerischen Symphonik. Er tritt bei Gustav Mahler in ein Stadium der Krise, erreicht seinen äußeren Höhepunkt bei Richard Strauß, verläuft seit Strawinsky und Schönberg in zwei Strömen.

Der in solchem Sinne „erlöste" Spieler, wichtiges Rad in einem Uhrwerk, das ohne ihn nicht funktioniert, hat das Gesicht der neuen Orchester geformt. Seit etwa dreißig Jahren sind die der Neuen Welt an dieser Formwerdung maßgebend beteiligt. In ihrer ersten Reihe steht das Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sein erster Berliner Besuch im festlich geschmückten Titania-Palast war ein starker Erfolg, der in gleichem Maße der Gesamtheit des Ensembles wie seinem greisen Dirigenten Pierre Monteux galt.

Klein, füllig, im Knopfloch die Rosette der Ehrenlegion, unter schwarzem Haar das Gesicht eines freundlichen Bonvivants mit weißem Robbenbart, tritt er aufs Podium. Seine Bewegungen sind klein, gemessen, mit höchster Ökonomie auf das Notwendige beschränkt. Monteux ist das Gegenteil des modernen Schaudirigenten. Er ist fürs Orchester da.

Sein Programm umfaßt Werke eines Zeitraums von rund hundert Jahren, von Hector Berlioz' „Cellini"-Ouvertüre (1838) bis zu William Schumans 3. Symphonie (1941). Das Berliozstück zeigt schon die Bravour des Orchesters an einigen Details. Da ist, bald nach dem Beginn, die von Celli und Kontrabässen gezupfte Stelle, und man erschrickt fast über den sonoren, hallenden, schönen und gleichsam beseelten Klang dieses Pizzicato. Überhaupt die Kontrabässe! Sie treten wirklich als Gruppe, als farbgebendes Element hervor, nicht nur als dumpf wahrgenommener Bestandteil der tiefsten Oktave. Vielleicht hängt es damit zusammen, daß die Bostoner mehr als 25 Jahre von einem ehemaligen Kontrabassisten dirigiert wurden, von Sergej Kussewitzky?

Aber nun merke ich schon, daß eigentlich jede Gruppe solche Hervorhebung verdient. Denn gegen Ende der Berlioz-Ouvertüre entwickeln die Blechbläser eine eherne Schlankheit des Tons, die aus den Spitzenerfahrungen deutscher und französischer Blastechnik gewonnen ist. Nicht zu reden von den unerhört tonkräftigen und dabei differenzierten und ausdrucksvoll spielenden Streichern. Übrigens sitzt das Orchester nicht in der „französischen" Anordnung, mit den Celli rechts, sondern in der traditionellen Weise.

Brahms war das Problem des Abends. Monteux musiziert ihn ganz anders, als wir ihn gewöhnt sind, sehr antisentimental, unter fast völligem Verzicht auf Rubato, und mit einer marmorn-kühlen Phrasierung und Dynamik. Es ist kein romantisch „erlebter", sondern ein aus klassizistischer Beruhigung gestalteter Brahms. Natürlich ist das alles meisterlich gespielt, und die durchbrochene Polyphonie der Holzbläser im ersten Satz mit den wundervollen Nüancierungen von Flöte, Oboe und Klarinette wird in solcher Interpretation zu einem artistischen Genuß. Man erlebt dabei das Phänomen, über das der amerikanische Kritiker Virgil Thomson einmal berichtet hat und das bei ihm zum ernsthaften Argument gegen eine zu große Perfektion des Orchesterspiels wird: man achtet weniger auf das, was gespielt wird als darauf, wie gespielt wird. Die Lust am schönen Klang einer Gruppe, eines Solos, eines Crescendos übertrifft das Interesse an der Musik.

Nach der Pause, in der man viel Diskussion über so ungewöhnliches Brahmsspiel hörte, kam der moderne Teil. William Schumans dritte Symphonie ist Kussewitzky gewidmet, der sie 1941 mit den Bostonern aus der Taufe hob. In Berlin führte sie Sergiu Celibidache bei den vorigen Fes[illegible] harmonischen Orche[illegible] Stück sympathisch wi[illegible] beinahe naive Freude [illegible] phonie-Schema zu üb[illegible] stellt zwei Doppelformen [illegible] aus der barocken Orgelm[illegible] sacaglia plus Fuge, Choral u[illegible] Vision dieser Musik [illegible] der Steigerung zu H[illegible] stark, mitunter genial[illegible] hinter ihr zurück. So [illegible] und Vernebelungen der Kontra[illegible] heitlichsten ist die Toccata, [illegible] der barocken Urform [illegible] instrument dreierlei [illegible] kanonische, akkordische [illegible] Streicher-Akkordstelle, [illegible] ginnend und sich allmäh[illegible] Gruppe ausbreitend, [illegible] wechselnden Drei- und V[illegible] gestiv und zeigt, daß Schuman se[illegible] Sprache redet.

Hindemiths Symphonie „Mathis der M[illegible] bildete den Schluß. Hier [illegible] des Orchesters ihren Hö[illegible] menschliche Präzision des Zusamm[illegible] die vollendete Reinheit der Stimmun[illegible] Skala der Stärkegrade von den Au[illegible] des Versuchungssatzes bis zu den ätherisch[illegible] Pianissimi der „Grablegung" — all das ist einzigartig und wohl nicht zu übertr[illegible] Aber es ist darüber hinaus mit einer musikalischen Geistigkeit gestaltet, die das Technische nie Selbstzweck werden läßt. Monteux baut die drei Sätze aus einer sehr persönlichen Anschauung der Tempi auf. Er beginnt langsam, läßt das Des-dur des Engel[illegible] breit strömen und setzt dann das Allegro des konzertanten Teils scharf dagegen. Die Versuchung wird zum entscheidenden Eindruck des ganzen Abends. Wie das Blech sich da zu Chören von makelloser Eintracht verbindet, wie die Geigen eine Melodie hinlegen, die Holzbläser brillieren und [illegible] lieren, das Schlagzeug ein Crescendo und ein Diminuendo steigen und fallen läßt, das wird als Vorbild allen in Erinnerung bleiben [illegible] das Konzert gehört haben.

Immer neue Beifalls-Salven [illegible] Monteux, dankten den überseeischen Gästen. Wir möchten sie wiederhören!

H. H. Stuckenschmidt

LES DERNIERES NOUVELLES D'ALSACE

CHARLES MUNCH

ce soir, au Palais des Fêtes de Strasbourg

Charles Munch devant l'antique fontaine du presbytère d'Eckwersheim où notre critique musical — dont on trouvera l'article en page 20 — s'est entretenu hier avec lui.

(Dernouvel)

Triumphant Tour

Ovations for Boston's Music Continue

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

These notes were written from Lausanne, Switzerland, after Mr. Rosenfeld temporarily left the European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The musicians then proceeded on to Berlin. Mr. Rosenfeld will rejoin the musicians in London.

QUEEN Juliana was quite bewildered by the reception her subjects gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at The Hague. She didn't seem to know whether etiquette provided that a reigning monarch should continue to stand while such cheering went on or not. In any case, she joined in genuinely as the Boston Orchestra under Munch made the first stop on its European tour after the tremendously successful Paris debut.

The city of Amsterdam furnished the men of the orchestra and the wives of some who accompanied them a tour of the canals in the morning, a conducted bus tour of the tulip fields on the way to The Hague concert. At Amsterdam the following afternoon, under Pierre Monteux, it was again a carbon copy of the preceding day.

* * *

THE FAMED Concertgebouw (the concert building) has an orchestra which takes its name from the building and is world-renowned.

The seats are on a level but the stage is nearly seven feet above the audience so that from the front of the hall the wind players are all hidden behind the music on their desks. Behind the percussion on one side and the double-basses on the other there are fan-shaped sections for auditors, which, too, were filled. Some of the musicians were disconcerted by the propinquity of people practically reading their music with them.

After the concert the men of the Concertgebouw Orchestra gave the Boston men a reception at which, in addition to food, gallant gestures and speeches were made. For the Bostonians, Boaz Piller, contrabassoon, a native Hollander, responded in their language. In his happiness he unconsciously injected a couple of "you know's" in English which amused the audience considerably. At the Paris reception the response for his colleagues was made by cellist Alfred Zighera.

* * *

IN BRUSSELS the next day the audience was amazed at the sonority and brilliance of the orchestra. It was a gala affair. The concert had been sponsored by the state chamber of commerce, a cabinet level event, and the notices read "Evening dress; medals." The whole diplomatic corps was there and many a manly breast sported whole rows of indications of honorable, heroic and hereditary achievements.

The handsome but slight young King Baudouin arrived in ample time for the concert. It is courteous to be in the hall before the King arrives and [illegible] mal audience of the host [illegible] was in its place very early. Mon[illegible] played the Belgian national anthem at a brisk pace and the lonely 21-year-old monarch in military uniform, stood at attention valiantly.

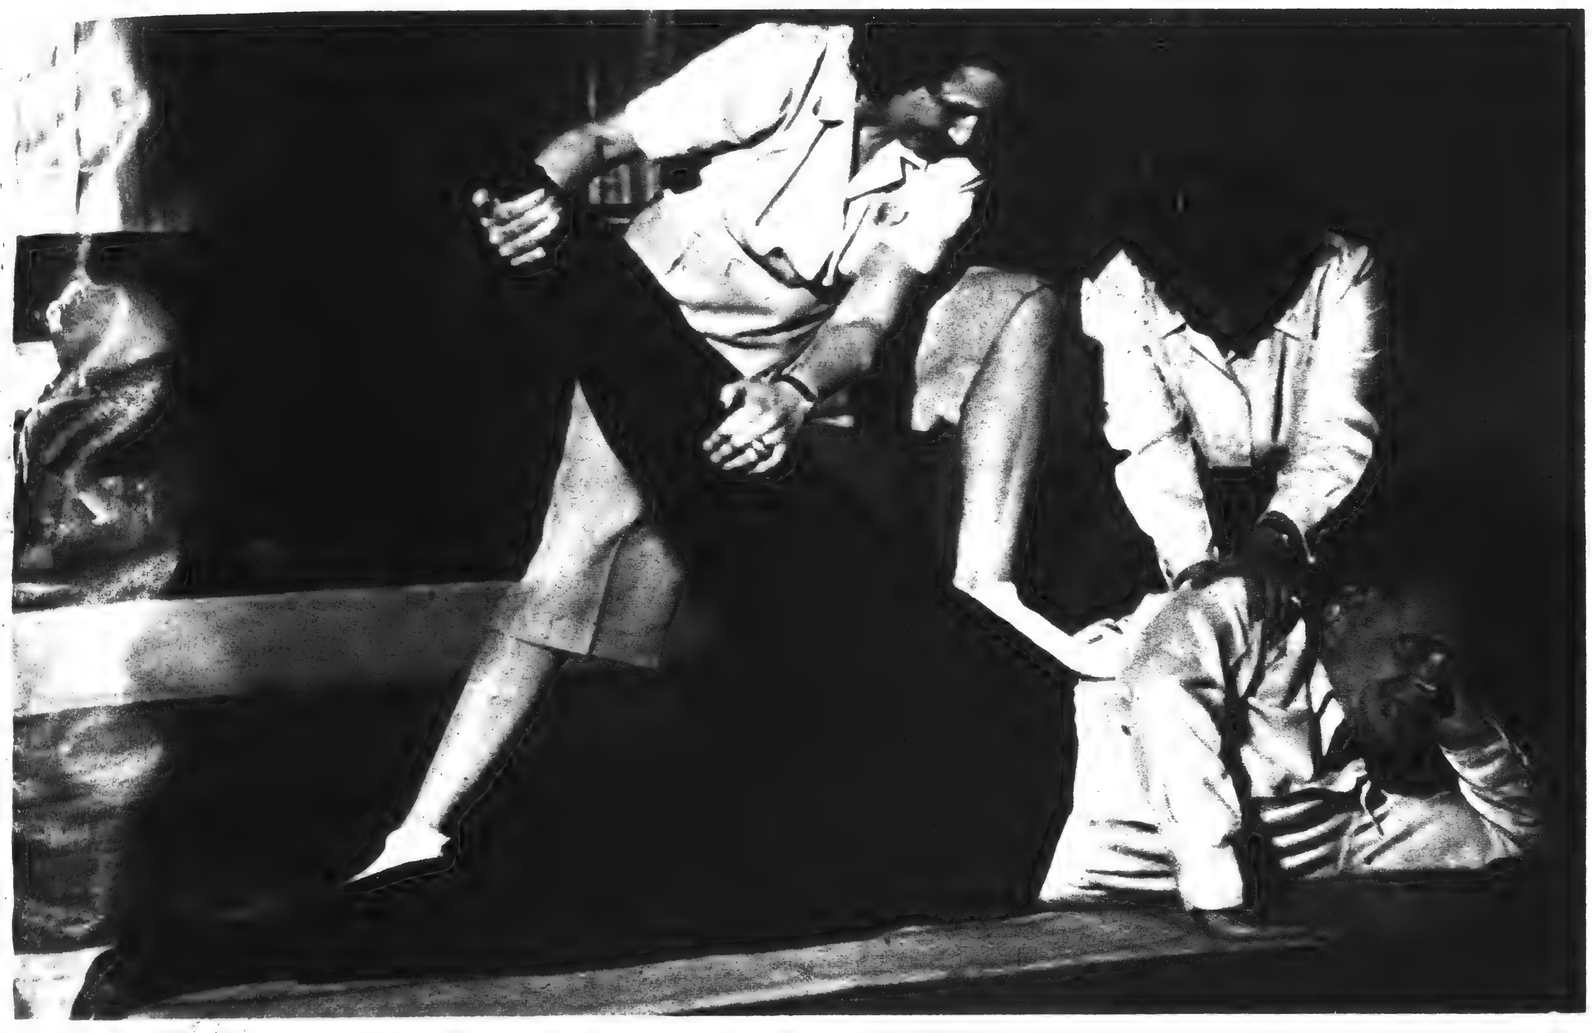
* * *

AFTER MANY [illegible] end of the concert [illegible] thought Munch was [illegible] leave the stage again [illegible] but, without w[illegible] ly jumped up and [illegible] repeat 'La Brabanç[illegible] men did not have [illegible] their portfolios [illegible] sheets they had [illegible] put [illegible] or their [illegible] when off [illegible] an incontrovertible [illegible] 102 men of the BSO [illegible] the Belgian national anthem [illegible] memory. The [illegible] cation of the [illegible] be misinterpreted [illegible] out was indeed a [illegible] N[illegible] anthem. Everyone [illegible] seemed, what [illegible] fingers or lips. The [illegible] was a melange of "La Brabançonne" "The Star Spangled Banner" "God Save the King," Hatikvah and probably many others.

The concert ended near midnight. A notice was [illegible] vising 6 o'clock [illegible] o'clock train to Germany. A little grumbling about [illegible] was far outweighed [illegible] fication every man [illegible] from the unbelievable [illegible] every audience has [illegible]

Eagle 5/17/52

Le Match de Paris



CHARLES MUNCH PRATIQUE DEPUIS VINGT ANNEES UN ENTRAINEMENT PHYSIQUE SEVERE QUI A PREPARE SON CORPS POUR UN METIER OU IL FAUT ALLIER LA TECHNIQUE ET LA SEDUCTION.

Charles Münch : lendemain de victoire

CHARLES MUNCH a obtenu cette semaine, à l'Opéra, le triomphe le plus rare qui puisse récompenser un musicien : cinq secondes de silence. A la dernière note de Daphnis et Chloé, les applaudissements n'éclatèrent pas tout de suite. Le chef d'orchestre se retourna et salua la salle muette. Pendant cinq secondes frémissantes, aucune main ne se leva. A la sixième, ce fut le déchaînement : le Président de la République, les ministres, 2.000 spectateurs acclamaient Charles Münch souriant, rivé au podium, dominant la masse noire et blanche, étincelante de cuivres et hérissée d'archets des 104 musiciens de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston. Paris, ce soir-là, a fait à Münch l'accueil passionné qu'il réserve à ses généraux victorieux. Il y a trois ans, en effet, Münch partait à la conquête du trône de la musique aux Etats-Unis, le pupitre de chef d'orchestre au Symphony Hall de Boston.

Aujourd'hui le héros, plus heureux que tous les chefs qui l'ont précédé à ce poste, est revenu avec sa conquête. Pour la première fois depuis 1881, les musiciens de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston ont traversé l'Atlantique et ont fait à Münch la plus glorieuse des escortes d'honneur, celle que composent 104 musiciens parmi les meilleurs du monde. Cet instrument dont le moteur porte un nom alsacien, celui de Charles Münch, dont les rouages viennent de chaque coin du globe, d'Italie, de Russie, d'Egypte et de France, et qui est capable d'assurer deux cents concerts chaque année aux auditeurs des Etats-Unis, fut fondé en 1881 pour son plaisir et celui de ses compatriotes par un amateur de musique, M. Henry Lee Higginson. Assumant tout seul les dépenses de l'orchestre à son origine, il se fia à son goût pour le choix des musiciens et de leur chef. Une véritable institution nationale était créée par ses soins. Un chef d'orchestre allemand, George Henschell, la conduisait. Mais jusqu'en 1949 neuf autres directeurs musicaux allaient se succéder. Parmi ceux-ci on devait voir les plus grands noms étrangers, comme ceux d'Arthur Nikish, de Mück, de Serge Koussevitzky. Mais dès 1918, la France, après la défaite allemande, devait prendre une avance en déléguant à Boston Henri Rabaud et Pierre Monteux. A la fin de la guerre, Higginson étant plus qu'octogénaire, l'orchestre fut administré par un comité qui s'efforça d'élargir son audience. En trente ans celle-ci allait devenir si considérable que le Boston Symphony Orchestra dut acheter deux salles : le Symphony Hall, de 2.600 places, pour les concerts d'hiver, et l'immense auditorium de Tanglewood qui peut contenir 6.000 spectateurs dans son enceinte, et 6.000 autour, répartis sur 85 hectares de prairies où les auditeurs populaires apportent leurs couvertures et leur panier-repas. Ce haut-lieu de la musique en Amérique possède une atmosphère unique. Münch l'a traduite ; « Ils n'ont pas la cathédrale de Strasbourg, mais ils ont la ferveur... »

Cette ferveur du peuple américain n'est pas toujours partagée par les producteurs de radio. Las de se voir parcimonieusement accorder des quarts d'heure de musique comprimés entre deux vagues de publicité tapageuse, le comité du B.S.O. se paya d'audace en tentant une opération unique dans l'histoire de la musique. Il s'associa avec cinq autres institutions artistiques et scientifiques pour souscrire l'achat d'une chaîne de radiodiffusion.

L'organisation a pris depuis lors son rythme harmonieux, commandé par les saisons : la saison principale d'octobre à mai est de 100 concerts — entièrement loués à l'avance. En mai et juin ont lieu 60 concerts populaires : « les pops ». En juillet l'orchestre se divise en deux groupes : l'un d'eux reste à Boston pour présenter des concerts gratuits, l'autre se déplace de 250 kilomètres à l'ouest pour commencer les six semaines de concerts du Festival Berkshire à Tanglewood.

Le B.S.O. dirige parallèlement à son activité artistique au centre pédagogique : le Berkshire Music Center dont les cours de composition sont assurés par d'illustres compositeurs, comme Honegger et Milhaud pendant la guerre.

Grâce au B.S.O. l'Amérique entière s'est prise d'une fringale de musique qui ne manque pas d'étonner les Français pour qui cet art demeure encore une denrée de luxe. Nous imaginons mal que toutes les émissions du B.S.O. — même les programmes les plus « modernes » — soient enregistrées et livrées au commerce sous forme de disques qui constituent le quart des « best sellers » musicaux des Etats-Unis.

Le résultat est étonnant si l'on considère que les trois autres quarts représentent les enregistrements de jazz, de be-bop, de chansons, d'orchestres exotiques, et toutes les autres formes de musique.

Quand le B.S.O. se déplace, il est assuré pour 1 million de dollars. Le minimum de salaire pour les musiciens est de 120 dollars par semaine. L'or-

VOIR PAGES SUIVANTES

Reportage Gilbert GRAZIANI - Walter CARONE

Le Match de Paris

CHARLES MUNCH PRATIQUE DEPUIS VINGT ANNEES UN ENTRAINEMENT PHYSIQUE SEVERE QUI A PREPARE SON CORPS POUR UN METIER OU IL FAUT ALLIER LA TECHNIQUE ET LA SEDUCTION.

Charles Münch : lendemain de victoire

CHARLES MUNCH a obtenu cette semaine, à l'Opéra, le triomphe le plus rare qui puisse récompenser un musicien : cinq secondes de silence. A la dernière note de Daphnis et Chloé, les applaudissements n'éclatèrent pas tout de suite. Le chef d'orchestre se retourna et salua la salle muette. Pendant cinq secondes frémissantes, aucune main ne se leva. A la sixième, ce fut le déchaînement : le Président de la République, les ministres, 2.000 spectateurs acclamaient Charles Münch souriant, rivé au podium, dominant la masse noire et blanche, étincelante de cuivres et hérissée d'archets des 104 musiciens de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston. Paris, ce soir-là, a fait à Münch l'accueil passionné qu'il réserve à ses généraux victorieux. Il y a trois ans, en effet, Münch partait à la conquête du trône de la musique aux Etats-Unis, le pupitre de chef d'orchestre au Symphony Hall de Boston.

Aujourd'hui le héros, plus heureux que tous les chefs qui l'ont précédé à ce poste est revenu avec sa conquête. Pour la première fois depuis 1881, les musiciens de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston ont traversé l'Atlantique et ont fait à Münch la plus glorieuse des gardes d'honneur, celle que composent 104 musiciens parmi les meilleurs du monde. Cet instrument dont le moteur porte un nom alsacien, celui de Charles Münch, dont les rouages viennent de chaque coin du globe, d'Italie, de Russie, d'Egypte et de France, et qui est capable d'assurer deux cents concerts chaque année aux auditeurs des Etats-Unis, fut fondé en 1881 pour son plaisir et celui de ses compatriotes par un amateur de musique, M. Henry Lee Higginson. Assumant tout seul les dépenses de l'orchestre à son origine, il se fia à son goût pour le choix des musiciens et de leur chef. Une véritable institution nationale était créée par ses soins. Un chef d'orchestre allemand, George Henschell, la conduisait. Mais jusqu'en 1949 neuf autres directeurs musicaux allaient se succéder. Parmi ceux-ci on devait voir les plus grands noms étrangers, comme ceux d'Arthur Nikish, de Mück, de Serge Koussevitzky. Mais dès 1918, la France, après la défaite allemande, devait prendre une avance en déléguant à Boston Henri Rabaud et Pierre Monteux. A la fin de la guerre, Higginson étant plus qu'octogénaire, l'orchestre fut administré par un comité qui s'efforça d'élargir son audience. En trente ans celle-ci allait devenir si considérable que le Boston Symphony Orchestra dut acheter deux salles : le Symphony Hall, de 2.600 places, pour les concerts d'hiver, et l'immense auditorium de Tanglewood qui peut contenir 6.000 spectateurs dans son enceinte, et 6.000 autour, répartis sur 85 hectares de prairies où les auditeurs populaires apportent leurs couvertures et leur panier-repas. Ce haut-lieu de la musique en Amérique possède une atmosphère unique. Münch l'a traduite ; « Ils n'ont pas la cathédrale de Strasbourg, mais ils ont la ferveur... »

Cette ferveur du peuple américain n'est pas toujours partagée par les producteurs de radio. Las de se voir parcimonieusement accorder des quarts d'heure de musique comprimés entre deux vagues de publicité tapageuse, le comité du B.S.O. se paya d'audace en tentant une opération unique dans l'histoire de la musique. Il s'associa avec cinq autres institutions artistiques et scientifiques pour souscrire l'achat d'une chaîne de radiodiffusion.

L'organisation a pris depuis lors son rythme harmonieux, commandé par les saisons : la saison principale d'octobre à mai est de 100 concerts — entièrement loués à l'avance. En mai et juin ont lieu 60 concerts populaires : « les pops ». En juillet l'orchestre se divise en deux groupes : l'un d'eux reste à Boston pour présenter des concerts gratuits, l'autre se déplace de 250 kilomètres à l'ouest pour commencer les six semaines de concerts du Festival Berkshire à Tanglewood.

Le B.S.O. dirige parallèlement à son activité artistique au centre pédagogique : le Berkshire Music Center dont les cours de composition sont assurés par d'illustres compositeurs, comme Honegger et Milhaud pendant la guerre.

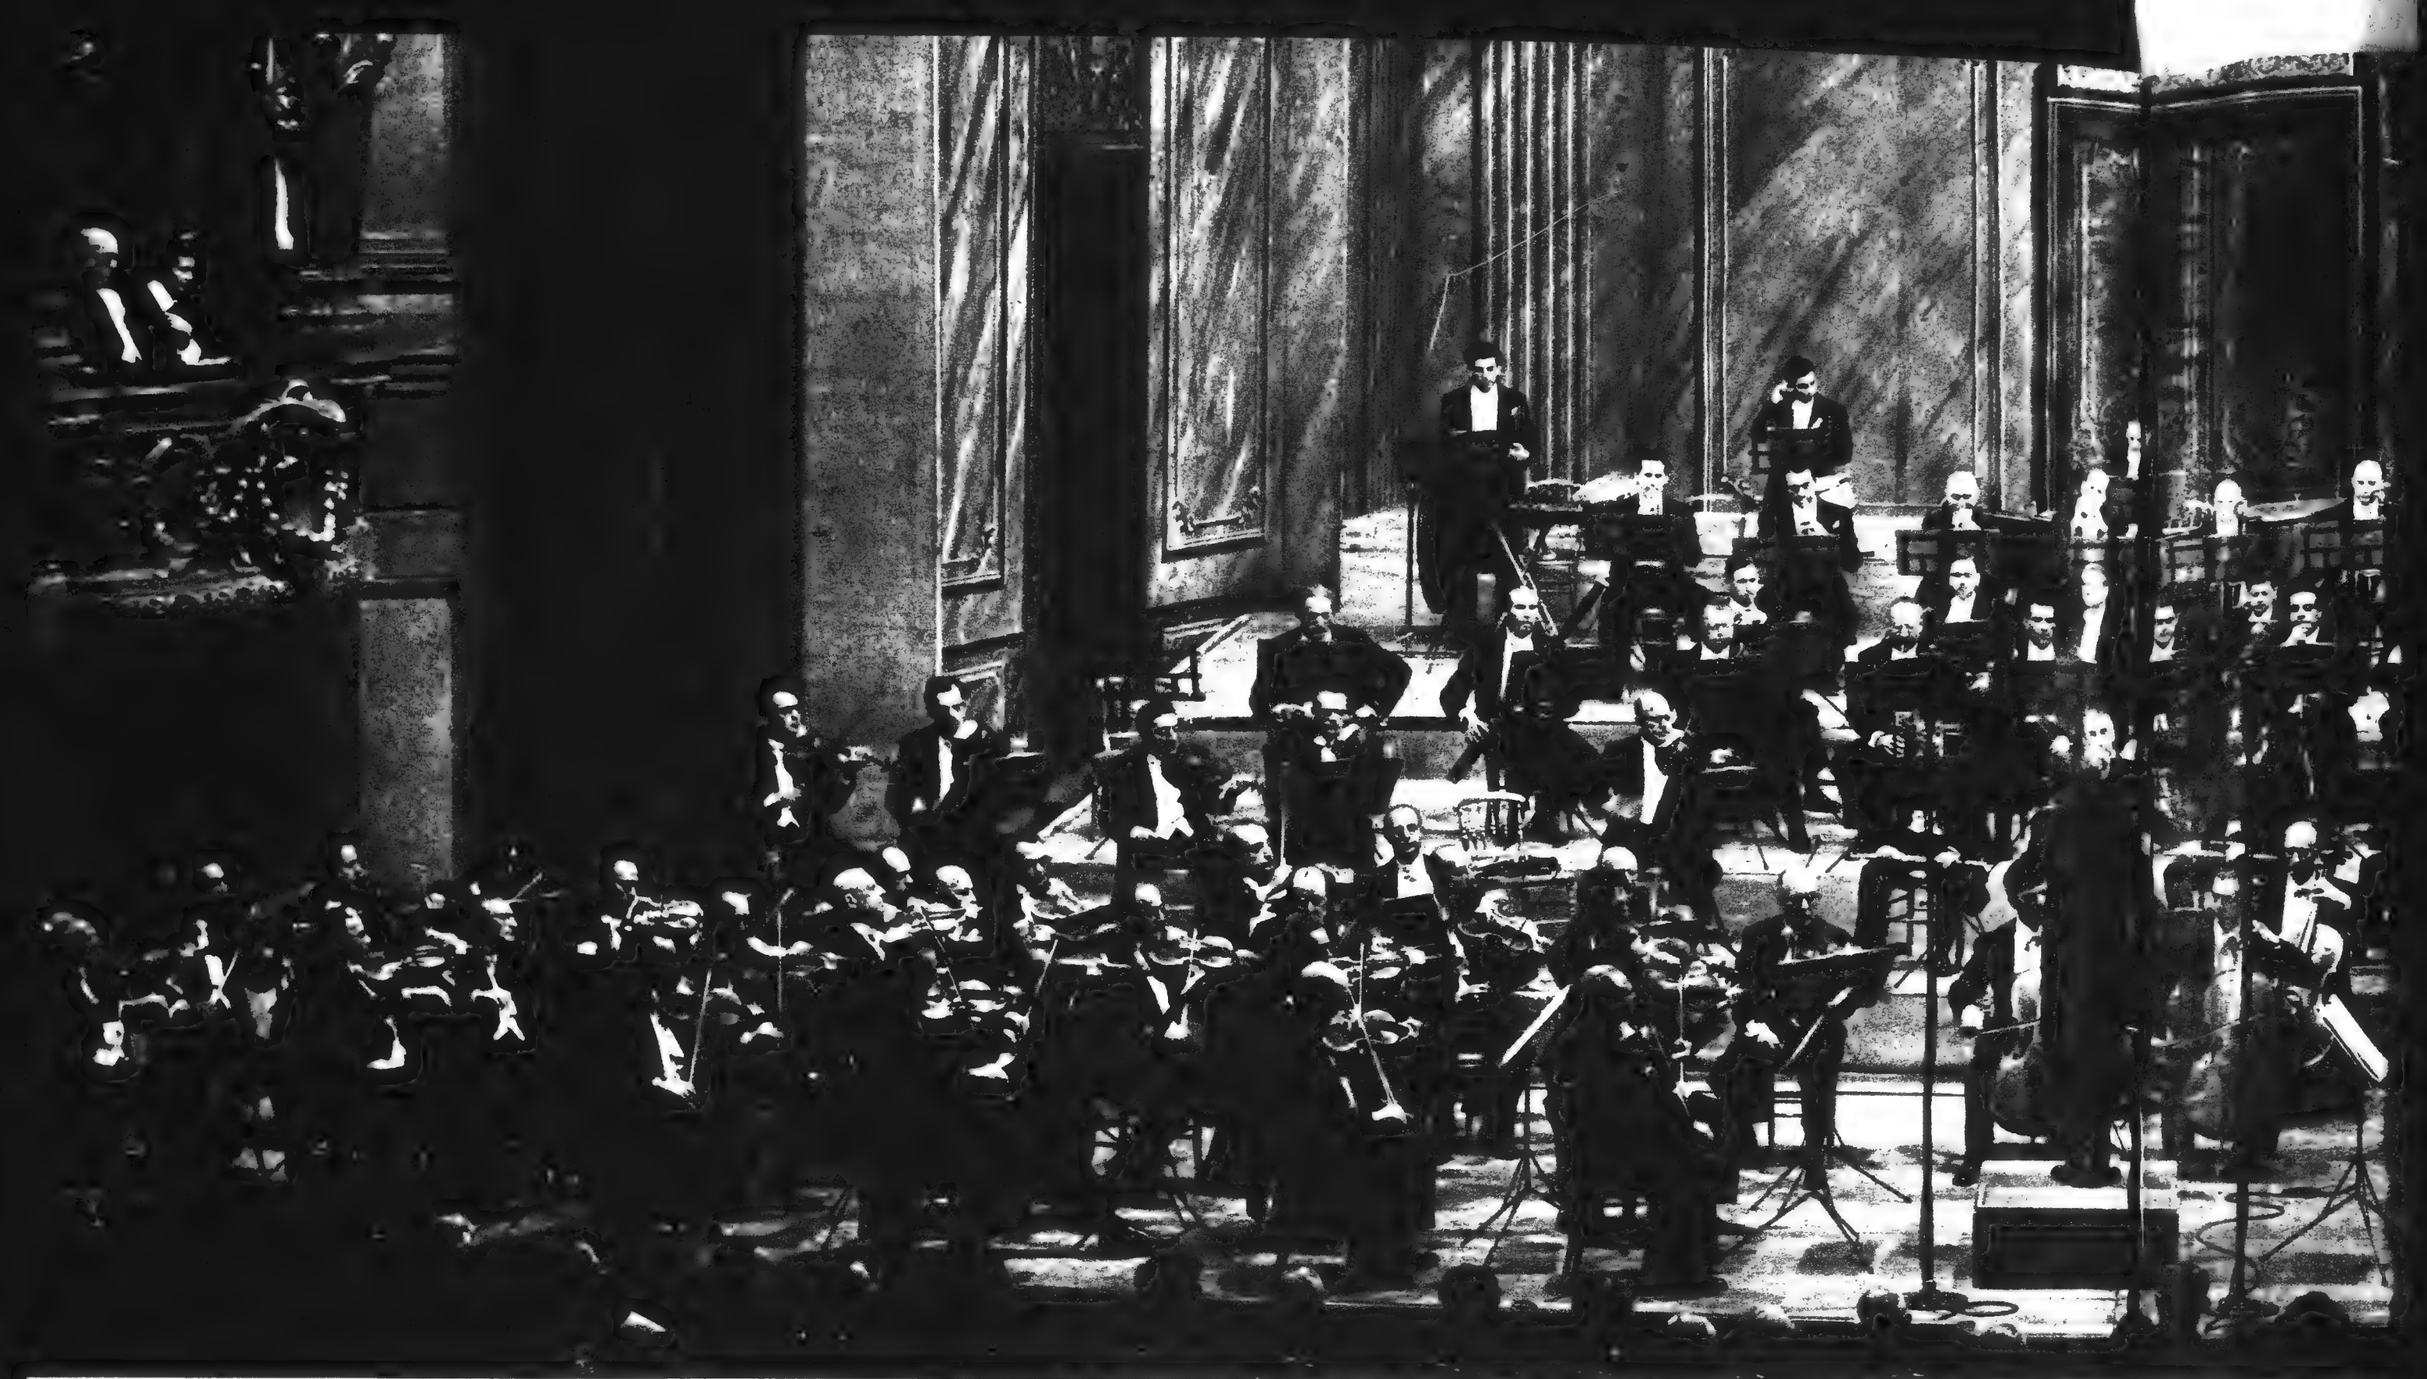
Grâce au B.S.O. l'Amérique entière s'est prise d'une fringale de musique qui ne manque pas d'étonner les Français pour qui cet art demeure encore une denrée de luxe. Nous imaginons mal que toutes les émissions du B.S.O. — même les programmes les plus « modernes » — soient enregistrées et livrées au commerce sous forme de disques qui constituent le quart des « best sellers » musicaux des Etats-Unis.

Le résultat est étonnant si l'on considère que les trois autres quarts représentent les enregistrements de jazz, de be-bop, de chansons, d'orchestres exotiques, et toutes les autres formes de musique.

Quand le B.S.O. se déplace, il est assuré pour 1 million de dollars. Le minimum de salaire pour les musiciens est de 120 dollars par semaine. L'or-

VOIR PAGES SUIVANTES

Reportage Gilbert GRAZIANI - Walter CARONE



SUR LA SCENE DE L'OPERA, EN PRESENCE DU PRESIDENT DE LA REPUBLIQUE ET DE Mme JACQUELINE AURIOL (A G.), CHARLES MUNCH DIRIGE LES 104 MUSICIENS DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON, POUR LE

Dans le plus célèbre orchestre américain vingt et un musiciens français

chestre n'a jamais connu de crise financière et n'a jamais fait appel au public. M. Nabokov, secrétaire de l'Œuvre du XX^e^ siècle, a dit que le Boston Symphony Orchestra était une institution américaine au même titre que les frigidaires et les gratte-ciel. Les mêmes places sont louées depuis plus de vingt ans aux mêmes familles, chaque saison. Depuis le début du siècle, l'orchestre a créé plus de 169 œuvres. Pour fêter son cinquantième anniversaire, le B.S.O. a créé dans sa saison, en 1943, la 1^re^ Symphonie d'Honegger, la 4^e^ Symphonie de Prokofiev, la Symphonie en sol mineur de Roussel et la Symphonie des Psaumes de Stravinsky.

Quand il prit possession de son pupitre, Münch sut gagner l'affection des musiciens et leur respect. Dans un anglais pénible — il le parlait à peine — il s'engagea à faire de son mieux pour maintenir l'orchestre de Boston à son niveau élevé. « Charly » Münch, comme on l'appelle maintenant à Boston, sut conquérir, comme il a conquis son « équipe », les vieilles familles de la ville par sa courtoisie. Pendant les répétitions, il s'adresse à ses musiciens dans un mélange cocasse de français, d'anglais et d'allemand. Souvent il se fait comprendre par gestes. C'est ainsi qu'il lui est arrivé, au cours d'une exécution, de s'agenouiller devant les violoncelles pour en obtenir plus d'expression sans craindre le ridicule, car son principe est de tout sacrifier pour son orchestre et son art. Il est un des derniers musiciens romantiques.

Charles Münch, qui a aujourd'hui soixante et un ans, débarqua de Strasbourg en 1912, son violon sous le bras. Il loue un petit appartement dans l'île de la Cité et s'inscrit au cours de Lucien Capet. La vie de Paris épanouit le jeune Alsacien. Quand il rentre chez lui, son père, Ernst Münch, professe au Conservatoire de Strasbourg, protestant austère, le complimente : « Maintenant, tu es le plus français de nous tous ! » Nous tous c'est la famille Münch — quatre fils et deux filles. Charles était le cinquième enfant. Dans la maison la vie était consacrée à la musique : le dimanche toute la famille chantait des cantates de Bach. Souvent un jeune ami, organiste, venait leur rendre visite et participait aux concerts : Albert Schweitzer. La maison résonnait du matin au soir, on y jouait tellement de musique que les voisins la baptisèrent « la boîte à musique ». Dans cette ambiance harmonieuse, Charles aurait pu commencer une carrière sans histoire. La guerre va bouleverser cette existence paisible. La mobilisation allemande surprend en Alsace les quatre fils Münch. Charles est gazé à Péronne et blessé à Verdun.

Démobilisé à Cologne, il entre comme violon à l'orchestre de Strasbourg.

En 1921 il est à Berlin où il perfectionne sa technique sous la direction des grands maîtres : Bruno Walter, Furtwaengler, Toscanini.

Mais l'heure du choix est arrivée. Münch, qui est français, ne peut continuer à jouer à Berlin s'il n'opte pas pour la nationalité allemande. Brusquement il quitte sa place de violoniste et rentre à Paris. Il lui faudra attendre l'âge de quarante et un ans pour réaliser son ambition : diriger un orchestre.

Cet homme modeste et passionné qui déclare non sans humour : « Je suis chef d'orchestre parce que je suis trop bête pour faire autre chose » a conquis l'Amérique comme il avait conquis la France : par sa fougue, la beauté de sa plastique, et, naturellement, sa science musicale. Quand, en 1946, on organise un référendum, il se voit classé parmi les cinq grands chefs d'orchestre du monde. Sa popularité est telle que dans un concours organisé par un hebdomadaire féminin il est désigné par 10.000 Parisiennes comme l'homme avec qui elles aimeraient dîner un soir, si elles en avaient le choix. Münch arrivait à la deuxième place après Winston Churchill et avant Jean Marais.

En Amérique il n'était pas un inconnu. Il y fut invité pour la première fois au cours de la saison 1946-1947. Sa distinction un peu hautaine de germain, corrigée par sa douceur latine, enchanta. Ce fut la gloire dès le premier contact. Pourtant sa nomination au pupitre du B.S.O. éclata comme une bombe. Elle étonna tous les Américains mélomanes, sauf le compositeur et critique Virgil Thomson qui avait déclaré quinze ans plus tôt en le voyant jouer à Paris : « Münch est naturellement désigné pour diriger l'orchestre de Boston. Il n'a pas de ventre, ses tempes sont argentées et il déchaîne un enthousiasme hystérique, surtout chez les femmes qui ont dépassé la cinquantaine. »

Mais le président du comité du B.S.O., Henri Cabot, entouré des 14 administrateurs, savait bien qu'il avait trouvé l'homme qu'il cherchait après le départ de Serge Koussevitzki : un génie musical, doublé d'un athlète qui serait capable de diriger au moins 60 concerts dans l'année, et qui séduirait d'abord, avant le public, les auditeurs les plus difficiles : ses musiciens.

Quand Charles Münch saisit sa baguette pour diriger sa première répétition devant le B.S.O., il ne dit qu'une phrase : « Et maintenant... relax !... » L'orchestre attaqua Le Corsaire, de Berlioz, avec son premier nouveau chef d'orchestre depuis vingt-cinq ans. Il était conquis.

Bernard Albert, n
Colombes (Seine),
1^er^ prix du Cons
toire de Paris en

Fourel Georges,
Grenoble. Alto. 1^
de Conservatoire
Croix de guerre

Speyer Louis. Né
ris. Hautbois et anglais. Fut auss
la création du S

SUR LA SCENE DE L'OPERA, EN PRESENCE DU PRESIDENT DE LA REPUBLIQUE ET DE Mme JACQUELINE AURIOL (A G.), CHARLES MUNCH DIRIGE LES 104 MUSICIENS DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON. POUR LE

Dans le plus célèbre orchestre américain vingt et un musiciens français

chestre n'a jamais connu de crise financière et n'a jamais fait appel au public. M. Nabokov, secrétaire de l'Œuvre du XX^e^ siècle, a dit que le Boston Symphony Orchestra était une institution américaine au même titre que les frigidaires et les gratte-ciel. Les mêmes places sont louées depuis plus de vingt ans aux mêmes familles, chaque saison. Depuis le début du siècle, l'orchestre a créé plus de 169 œuvres. Pour fêter son cinquantième anniversaire, le B.S.O. a créé dans sa saison, en 1943, la 1^re^ Symphonie d'Honegger, la 4^e^ Symphonie de Prokofiev, la Symphonie en sol mineur de Roussel et la Symphonie des Psaumes de Stravinsky.

Quand il prit possession de son pupitre, Münch sut gagner l'affection des musiciens et leur respect. Dans un anglais pénible — il le parlait à peine — il s'engagea à faire de son mieux pour maintenir l'orchestre de Boston à son niveau élevé. « Charly » Münch, comme on l'appelle maintenant à Boston, sut conquérir, comme il a conquis son « équipe », les vieilles familles de la ville par sa courtoisie. Pendant les répétitions, il s'adresse à ses musiciens dans un mélange cocasse de français, d'anglais et d'allemand. Souvent il se fait comprendre par gestes. C'est ainsi qu'il lui est arrivé, au cours d'une exécution, de s'agenouiller devant les violoncelles pour en obtenir plus d'expression sans craindre le ridicule, car son principe est de tout sacrifier pour son orchestre et son art. Il est un des derniers musiciens romantiques.

Charles Münch, qui a aujourd'hui soixante et un ans, débarqua de Strasbourg en 1912, son violon sous le bras. Il loue un petit appartement dans l'île de la Cité et s'inscrit au cours de Lucien Capet. La vie de Paris épanouit le jeune Alsacien. Quand il rentre chez lui, son père, Ernst Münch, professe au Conservatoire de Strasbourg, protestant austère, le complimente : « Maintenant, tu es le plus français de nous tous ! » Nous tous c'est la famille Münch — quatre fils et deux filles. Charles était le cinquième enfant. Dans la maison la vie était consacrée à la musique : le dimanche toute la famille chantait des cantates de Bach. Souvent un jeune ami, organiste, venait leur rendre visite et participait aux concerts : Albert Schweitzer. La maison résonnait du matin au soir, on y jouait tellement de musique que les voisins la baptisèrent « la boîte à musique ». Dans cette ambiance harmonieuse, Charles aurait pu commencer une carrière sans histoire. La guerre va bouleverser cette existence paisible. La mobilisation allemande surprend en Alsace les quatre fils Münch. Charles est gazé à Péronne et blessé à Verdun.

Démobilisé à Cologne, il entre comme violon à l'orchestre de Strasbourg.

En 1921 il est à Berlin où il perfectionne sa technique sous la direction des grands maîtres : Bruno Walter, Furtwaengler, Toscanini.

Mais l'heure du choix est arrivée. Münch, qui est français, ne peut continuer à jouer à Berlin s'il n'opte pas pour la nationalité allemande. Brusquement il quitte sa place de violoniste et rentre à Paris. Il lui faudra attendre l'âge de quarante et un ans pour réaliser son ambition : diriger un orchestre.

Cet homme modeste et passionné qui déclare non sans humour : « Je suis chef d'orchestre parce que je suis trop bête pour faire autre chose » a conquis l'Amérique comme il avait conquis la France : par sa fougue, la beauté de sa plastique, et, naturellement, sa science musicale. Quand, en 1946, on organise un référendum, il se voit classé parmi les cinq grands chefs d'orchestre du monde. Sa popularité est telle que dans un concours organisé par un hebdomadaire féminin il est désigné par 10.000 Parisiennes comme l'homme avec qui elles aimeraient dîner un soir, si elles en avaient le choix. Münch arrivait à la deuxième place après Winston Churchill et avant Jean Marais.

En Amérique il n'était pas un inconnu. Il y fut invité pour la première fois au cours de la saison 1946-1947. Sa distinction un peu hautaine de germain, corrigée par sa douceur latine, enchanta. Ce fut la gloire dès le premier contact. Pourtant sa nomination au pupitre du B.S.O. éclata comme une bombe. Elle étonna tous les Américains mélomanes, sauf le compositeur et critique Virgil Thomson qui avait déclaré quinze ans plus tôt en le voyant jouer à Paris : « Münch est naturellement désigné pour diriger l'orchestre de Boston. Il n'a pas de ventre, ses tempes sont argentées et il déchaîne un enthousiasme hystérique, surtout chez les femmes qui ont dépassé la cinquantaine. »

Mais le président du comité du B.S.O., Henri Cabot, entouré des 14 administrateurs, savait bien qu'il avait trouvé l'homme qu'il cherchait après le départ de Serge Koussevitzki : un génie musical, doublé d'un athlète qui serait capable de diriger au moins 90 concerts dans l'année, et qui séduirait d'abord, avant le public, les auditeurs les plus difficiles : ses musiciens.

Quand Charles Münch saisit sa baguette pour diriger sa première répétition devant le B.S.O., il ne dit qu'une phrase : « Et maintenant... relax !... » L'orchestre attaqua Le Corsaire, de Berlioz, avec son premier nouveau chef d'orchestre depuis vingt-cinq ans. Il était conquis.

Bernard Albert, Colombes (Seine). 1^er^ prix du Conservatoire de Paris en

Fourel Georges, Grenoble. Alto. 1 de Conservatoire Croix de guerre

Speyer Louis. Né ris. Hautbois et anglais. Fut auss la création du S

DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON POUR LE FESTIVAL DU XX· SIECLE, ILS SONT VENUS JOUER A PARIS POUR LA PREMIERE FOIS. PARMI EUX, 21 MUSICIENS D'ORIGINE FRANÇAISE, NATURALISES AMERICAINS.

éricain ais

s de la saison 1946-1947.
un peu hautaine de ger-ée par sa douceur latine.
fut la gloire dès le pre-
Pourtant sa nomination
B.S.O. éclata comme une étonna tous les Américains auf le compositeur et cri-
Thomson qui avait dé-ans plus tôt en le voyant s : « Münch est naturelné pour diriger l'orchestre
Il n'a pas de ventre, ses rgentées et il déchaine un hystérique, surtout chez ui ont dépassé la cinquan-résident du comité du i Cabot, entouré des 14

rs, savait bien qu'il avait ne qu'il cherchait après le rge Koussevitzki : un gé-doublé d'un athlète qui de diriger au moins 90
l'année, et qui séduirait
t le public, les auditeurs iles ; ses musiciens.
arles Münch saisit sa ba-diriger sa première répéle B.S.O., il ne dit qu'une t maintenant... relax !... » ttaqua Le Corsaire, de Bern premier nouveau chef depuis vingt-cinq ans. Il

Bernard Albert, né à Colombes (Seine), alto. 1er prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1925.

Cauhapé Jean, né à Toulouse. Alto. Engagé à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston, en 1926.

Lauga Norbert, né à Aix-les-Bains. Violon. N'était pas venu en France depuis 17 ans.

Elcus Gaston, né à Paris. Violon. Prix du Conservatoire en 1904. Joua à l'Opéra-Comique.

Mayer Pierre, né à Paris. Violon, croix de guerre 1914-1918. En Amérique depuis 1926.

Artières Louis, né à Lyon. Alto. Sa fille est danseuse au Metropolitan Opera de New-York.

Leibovici Joseph. Origine roumaine. Né à Paris. Violon. Engagé par S. Koussevitzki en 1926.

Fourel Georges, né à Grenoble. Alto. 1er prix de Conservatoire, 1913. Croix de guerre 1914.

Schermansky Roger, né à Paris. Violon. Prix du Conservatoire, 1939. Engagé par Münch en 47.

Zighera Alfred. Né à Paris. Violoncelle. Croix de guerre 1914. Il fut engagé en 1925.

Moleux Georges, né à Boulogne. Contrebasse. Joua chez Pasdeloup. Sa femme est américaine.

Marjolet Jean. Né à Châlons - sur - Marne. Violoncelle. Engagé par Monteux en 1920.

Droeghmans Hippolyte. Né à Liège. Violoncelle. Premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris, 1904.

Girard Henri, né à Montlhéry. Contrebasse. Création du Sacre du Printemps, en 1913.

Speyer Louis. Né à Paris. Hautbois et cor anglais. Fut aussi de la création du Sacre.

Allard Raymond, né à Sin - le - Noble (Nord). Basson. Engagé par P. Monteux en 1922.

Laurent Georges. Né à Paris. Flûte solo. Engagé en 1919. Doyen de ses compatriotes.

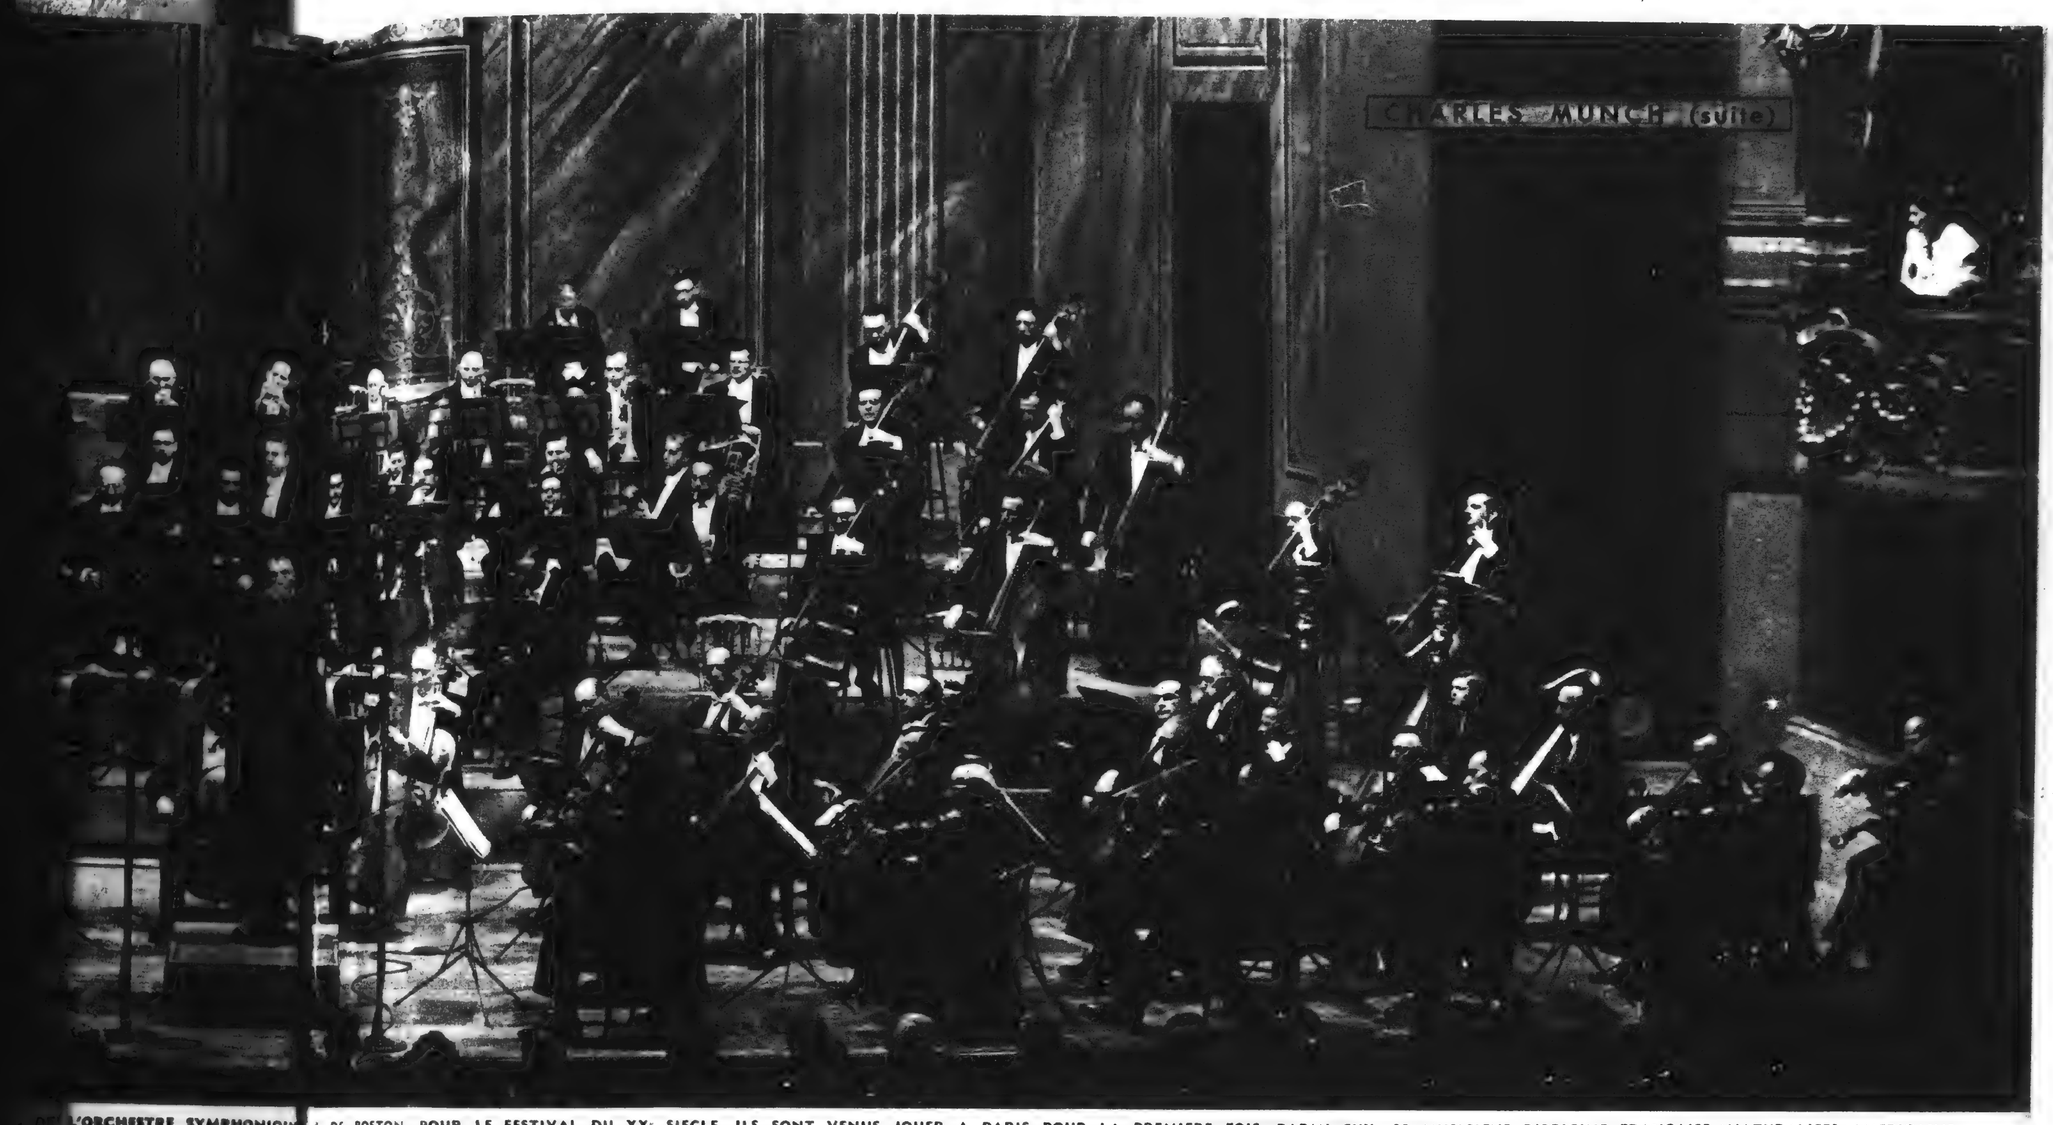
De Vergie Louis. Né à Marseille. Hautbois. Un de ses fils est ingénieur à «U.S. Atomic Energy»

Voisin Roger, né à Angers. Trompette solo. Elève de son père, il lui succéda dans l'orchestre.

Lafosse Marcel, né à Marly - le - Roi. Trompette. Premier prix de Conservatoire en 1914.

Zighera Bernard. Né à Paris. Première harpe solo. Professeur au Conservatoire de Boston.

[190]



DE BOSTON. POUR LE FESTIVAL DU XX[e] SIECLE, ILS SONT VENUS JOUER A PARIS POUR LA PREMIERE FOIS. PARMI EUX, 21 MUSICIENS D'ORIGINE FRANÇAISE, NATURALISES AMERICAINS.

Bernard Albert, né à Colombes (Seine), alto, 1er prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1925.

Cauhapé Jean, né à Toulouse. Alto. Engagé à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston, en 1926.

Lauga Norbert, né à Aix-les-Bains. Violon. N'était pas venu en France depuis 17 ans.

Elcus Gaston, né à Paris. Violon. Prix du Conservatoire en 1904. Joua à l'Opéra-Comique.

Mayer Pierre, né à Paris. Violon, croix de guerre 1914-1918. En Amérique depuis 1926.

Artières Louis, né à Lyon. Alto. Sa fille est danseuse au Metropolitan Opera de New-York.

Leibovici Joseph. Origine roumaine. Né à Paris. Violon. Engagé par S. Koussevitzki en 1926.

Fourel Georges, né à Grenoble. Alto. 1er prix de Conservatoire, 1913. Croix de guerre 1914.

Schermansky Roger, né à Paris. Violon. Prix du Conservatoire, 1939. Engagé par Münch en 47.

Zighera Alfred. Né à Paris. Violoncelle. Croix de guerre 1914. Il fut engagé en 1925.

Moleux Georges, né à Boulogne. Contrebasse. Joua chez Pasdeloup. Sa femme est américaine.

Marjolet Jean. Né à Châlons - sur - Marne. Violoncelle. Engagé par Monteux en 1920.

Droeghmans Hippolyte. Né à Liège. Violoncelle. Premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris, 1904.

Girard Henri, né à Montlhéry. Contrebasse. Création du Sacre du Printemps, en 1913.

Speyer Louis. Né à Paris. Hautbois et cor anglais. Fut aussi de la création du Sacre.

Allard Raymond, né à Sin - le - Noble (Nord). Basson. Engagé par P. Monteux en 1922.

Laurent Georges. Né à Paris. Flûte solo. Engagé en 1919. Doyen de ses compatriotes.

De Vergie Louis. Né à Marseille. Hautbois. Un de ses fils est ingénieur à «U.S. Atomic Energy»

Voisin Roger, né à Angers. Trompette solo. Elève de son père, il lui succéda dans l'orchestre.

Lafosse Marcel, né à Marly - le - Roi. Trompette. Premier prix de Conservatoire en 1914.

Zighera Bernard. Né à Paris. Première harpe solo. Professeur au Conservatoire de Boston.

[190]

Une Eau de Cologne extrêmement fine...
qui devient un Parfum étonnamment tenace...
c'est l'extraordinaire propriété de

l'Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ÉCUSSON

l'Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ÉCUSSON
unit les qualités du Parfum à celles de l'Eau de Cologne :

- Sitôt répandue, elle apporte une sensation de fraîcheur délicieuse ;
- Employée en friction, elle enveloppe le corps d'un halo troublant ;
- Quelques gouttes dans le bain constituent un suprême raffinement ;
- Enfin, très vite, elle devient un parfum de distinction, frais et tenace.

Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ÉCUSSON
90

Indistinctement utilisée par MONSIEUR et par MADAME,

Jean d'Albret

CRÉATEUR DES PRODUITS DE BEAUTÉ "ORLANE"

Meilleures Parfumeries
& Grands Magasins

12, Faubourg St-Honoré
PARIS

DANSE

Le triomphe de Balanchine

A LA FIN DE LA REPRESENTATION, GEORGE BALANCHINE VINT SALUER TROIS FOIS.

A 5.000 kilomètres de Broadway, celui que les Américains ont surnommé « L'Einstein de la Danse » vient de disposer ses plus précises équations sur l'immense plateau de l'Opéra de Paris : c'est George Balanchine, animateur du New-York City Ballet, et maître d'une nouvelle école, celle de la pureté.

Balanchine, qui est aujourd'hui considéré outre-Atlantique comme le chorégraphe du siècle, n'a jamais été un brillant danseur. Au temps où il s'appelait encore Georgi Mélitonovitch Balanchivadzé, il usait ses premiers chaussons de petit rat sur la scène du Théâtre Impérial de Saint-Pétersbourg. La discipline, qu'il devait exiger par la suite de sa compagnie, lui sembla si dure qu'il s'enfuit. Mais ses parents le rattrapèrent dans les quarante-huit heures et le remirent au régime sec des jetés et des battus à l'Ecole des Ballets. Il a dix-huit ans quand il décide de quitter la Russie. Une troupe de « danseurs de l'Etat soviétique » prépare une tournée pour l'Europe. Il s'y engage et sitôt franchie la frontière, l'abandonne. Il ne remettra jamais les pieds dans son pays. Serge de Diaghilev, qui vient de former son génial « Ballet russe de Monte-Carlo » le prend pour maître de ballet. Balanchine est son confident, son conseiller et son héritier spirituel. C'est à lui que Diaghilev confie son élève préféré, Serge Lifar. Sa chorégraphie du « Chant du rossignol » remporte à Paris un triomphe. Quand Diaghilev meurt brusquement en 1933, il va s'installer aux États-Unis. Un mécène new-yorkais, Lincoln Kirstein, l'a invité à fonder à New-York l'école du ballet américain. Il ne dansera plus que pour indiquer les pas et les attitudes à ses élèves. A propos de la mazurka traditionnelle russe, qu'il a su rajeunir, il recommande à ses sujets : « Vous courez tout le temps comme un fou. » Et un soir, le souffle haletant, il se laisse emporter par le dieu qui l'habite et enlace sa partenaire, Vida Brown. Le cœur lui monte à la gorge. Avec un brio endiablé il danse une mazurka échevelée. Quand la variation se termine, les spectateurs hurlent debout, pendant sept minutes d'affilée. Après le baisser du rideau, il déclara, encore essoufflé : « Il faut de temps en temps donner de petites nouveautés au public. »

C'est à partir de ce soir-là qu'il se met à supprimer les décors et faire danser devant des rideaux noirs. Il excelle dans les ballets abstraits. « La musique, c'est du geste », dit-il. C'est ce geste qu'il apprend au New-York City Ballet fondé en 1948. Car Balanchine, musicien de classe, emprunte souvent la baguette de son ami Igor Stravinsky pour conduire son orchestre. « Le ballet est comme un papillon : il ne doit vivre qu'une saison. Que diriez-vous d'un papillon de l'année dernière ? » Et il crée dix ballets par an.

Deux moments des Ballets de New-York : en haut, La Valse, de Maurice Ravel, montée en 1928 par Ida Rubinstein pour Diaghilev qui la refusa. En bas, le ballet « abstrait » Les Quatre Tempéraments, de Paul Hindemith.

Une Eau de Cologne extrêmement fine...
qui devient un Parfum étonnamment tenace...
c'est l'extraordinaire propriété de

l'Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ÉCUSSON

l'Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ÉCUSSON
unit les qualités du Parfum à celles de l'Eau de Cologne :

- Sitôt répandue, elle apporte une sensation de fraicheur délicieuse ;
- Employée en friction, elle enveloppe le corps d'un halo troublant ;
- Quelques gouttes dans le bain constituent un suprême raffinement ;
- Enfin, très vite, elle devient un parfum de distinction, frais et tenace.

Eau de Cologne Parfumée
ECUSSON
90°

Indistinctement utilisée par MONSIEUR et par MADAME,

Jean d'Albret

CRÉATEUR DES PRODUITS DE BEAUTÉ "ORLANE"

Meilleures Parfumeries
& Grands Magasins

12, Faubourg St-Honoré
PARIS

DANSE

Le triomphe de Balanchine

A LA FIN DE LA REPRESENTATION, GEORGE BALANCHINE VINT SALUER TROIS FOIS.

A 5.000 kilomètres de Broadway, celui que les Américains ont surnommé « L'Einstein de la Danse » vient de disposer ses plus précises équations sur l'immense plateau de l'Opéra de Paris : c'est George Balanchine, animateur du New-York City Ballet, et maître d'une nouvelle école, celle de la pureté.

Balanchine, qui est aujourd'hui considéré outre-Atlantique comme le chorégraphe du siècle, n'a jamais été un brillant danseur. Au temps où il s'appelait encore Georgi Mélitonovitch Balanchivadzé, il usait ses premiers chaussons de petit rat sur la scène du Théâtre Impérial de Saint-Pétersbourg. La discipline, qu'il devait exiger par la suite de sa compagnie, lui sembla si dure qu'il s'enfuit. Mais ses parents le rattrapèrent dans les quarante-huit heures et le remirent au régime sec des jetés et des battus à l'Ecole des Ballets. Il a dix-huit ans quand il décide de quitter la Russie. Une troupe de « danseurs de l'Etat soviétique » prépare une tournée pour l'Europe. Il s'y engage et sitôt franchie la frontière, l'abandonne. Il ne remettra jamais les pieds dans son pays. Serge de Diaghilev, qui vient de former son génial « Ballet russe de Monte-Carlo » le prend pour maitre de ballet. Balanchine est son confident, son conseiller et son héritier spirituel. C'est à lui que Diaghilev confie son élève préféré, Serge Lifar. Sa chorégraphie du « Chant du rossignol » remporte à Paris un triomphe. Quand Diaghilev meurt brusquement en 1933, il va s'installer aux Etats-Unis. Un mécène new-yorkais, Lincoln Kirstein, l'a invité à fonder à New-York l'école du ballet américain. Il ne dansera plus que pour indiquer les pas et les attitudes à ses élèves. A propos de la mazurka traditionnelle russe, qu'il a su rajeunir, il recommande à ses sujets : « Vous courez tout le temps comme un fou. » Et un soir, le souffle haletant, il se laisse emporter par le dieu qui l'habite et enlace sa partenaire, Vida Brown. Le cœur lui saute à la gorge. Avec un brio endiablé, il danse une mazurka échevelée. Quand la variation se termine, les spectateurs hurlent debout, pendant sept minutes d'affilée. Après le baisser du rideau, il déclara, encore essoufflé : « Il faut de temps en temps donner de petites nouveautés au public. »

C'est à partir de ce soir-là qu'il se met à supprimer les décors et faire danser devant des rideaux noirs. Il excelle dans les ballets abstraits : « La musique, c'est du geste », dit-il. C'est ce geste qu'il apprend au New-York City Ballet fondé en 1948. Car Balanchine, musicien de classe, emprunte souvent la baguette de son ami Igor Stravinsky pour conduire son orchestre. « Le ballet est comme un papillon : il ne doit vivre qu'une saison. Que diriez-vous d'un papillon de l'année dernière ? » Et il crée dix ballets par an.

Deux moments des Ballets de New-York : en haut, La Valse, de Maurice Ravel, montée en 1928 par Ida Rubinstein pour Diaghilev qui la refusa. En bas, le ballet « abstrait » Les Quatre Tempéraments, de Paul Hindemith.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MAY 17 1952

Rejected 40 Years Ago

"LE SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" by Igor Stravinsky presented by Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Pierre Monteaux in Paris, was final vindication of true masterpiece.

Stravinsky Masterpiece Wins Wild Paris Cheers

By CYRUS DURGIN

PARIS—Those of us who were lucky enough to be in the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, last night, were witness to an historic occasion in the long story of music. Outwardly, this was but the second concert in Paris by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, and including as the last number "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Igor Stravinsky. But actually it was the final vindication of a great masterpiece, nearly 40 years after a premiere which caused one of Paris' famed scandals.

At the Theatre des Champs-Elysees in 1913, the same Pierre Monteux conducted the world premiere of "Le Sacre du Printemps" as a production of the Diaghileff Russian Ballet. He had gone only a few bars when the trouble began. People whistled, hissed, yelled, fighting broke out, and the discordant music was all but lost in the din. Stravinsky himself, then a comparatively young man of 31, is said to have escaped through a window.

* * *

A year later, Mr. Monteux gave the first concert performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps" and that time it was accepted, at least. There was no riot. Over the years, the score came to be recognized, first by musicians, and later by the more receptive segments of the public, as a great masterpiece of modern music, one of the trickiest and most difficult works, rhythmically, in existence.

That must have been solace to Stravinsky. But what he felt last night, a man now 70, wizened and bald, sitting out front listening to a truly magnificent performance of his work, only he can tell. But here is a clew:

When the performance was over, the applause and the cheers burst out in a second, and went on for minutes. Mr. Monteux accepted the tribute, then with a gesture tried to locate the composer in the audience. Finally Stravinsky was nudged to stand up. As he did so, pandemonium broke loose, a terrific yell as if Paris were trying to make up in 1952 the humiliation it caused him 39 years ago.

He made his way backstage and then, I am told, suddenly determined not to go out and take a bow.

But Mr. Monteux, who by that time had reached the wings, and conductor Charles Munch, who had heard the entire concert from backstage, took Stravinsky by both arms and pushed him out upon the stage. The composer bowed just once, smiled, kissed Mr. Monteux on both cheeks and disappeared.

When he emerged behind the scenes again, I am told, tears were streaming down his face. And still, out front, the yelling was stronger than ever. In such fashion, after 39 years, Igor Stravinsky and his masterpiece were receiving the affection and the apology of a great capital of the world.

* * *

There were two men who played in this performance who had been members of the ballet orchestra in 1913. They were Louis Speyer, the incomparable English horn of the Boston Symphony, and Henri Girard, double-bass. Mr. Speyer gave me a new light on the original failure of "Le Sacre du Printemps."

"The music must have been very strange to the public of that time, but I think the dancing and the settings and costumes were as much responsible," said Mr. Speyer. "The dancing, that is, the choreography, was not good, and the colors of the settings and costumes were so badly chosen that they made you feel sick."

That is a point which I never had heard made before. And still another, gathered from the spoken opinion of numerous members of the orchestra, who had played "La Sacre du Printempts" under other conductors, including Bernstein and Koussevitzky, was that this performance, by the Boston Symphony, on the 8th of May, 1952, in Paris' Theatre des Champs-Elysees, conducted by Pierre Monteux, was the greatest performance they had experienced. They meant it, too.

This Clipping From
BUTTE, MONT.
STANDARD

MAY 17 1952

Musical Ambassadors From U. S. to Europe

So much of our relationship with Europe is devoted to the major interests of economic betterment and military alignment, with their far-reaching concomitants, that we are apt to overlook some of our other contacts. Our cultural relations may not have the world-shaking importance of the others, but they are also important in cementing friendships.

In point is the European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of America's finest musical groups. Its appearance in Paris recently was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city, celebrated for its artistic tastes. The program of French and American music was heard by many French notables, including some of the highest officials in the government. It also attracted a large audience of music-lovers of no official station.

Too many Europeans regard the United States as a nation of materialists whose interests are directed almost entirely to the fields of business and commerce. To them our culture is thought of as immature and unimportant.

Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

UN EVENEMENT MUSICAL SENSATIONNEL A STRASBOURG

UNE HEURE AVEC CH. MUNCH ... A ECKWERSHEIM

Il est inadmissable, mais une fois que vous le tenez, quel plaisir ! C'est à Eckwersheim que nous l'avons rejoint hier sur le coup de midi. Il y était, depuis quelques heures, l'hôte de son frère Fritz Munch qui habite provisoirement le presbytère de cette commune en attendant que soit reconstruite la conservatoire qu'il dirige.

Ainsi nous accueille. Il est inséparable de Charles Munch : il le conduit partout. Sans escorte. Mais peut-être est-il inutile de préciser qui est Roger. C'est le chauffeur du patron, et depuis plus de vingt ans. Comme lui habite à Boston, une villa attenante à celle du Maître.

Mais voici que surgit Charles Munch. Allons-nous refaire ici les grandes lignes de son portrait ? A quoi bon ? Un regard, un seul, et nous retrouvons sa vision particulière, sa poignée de main, son effusion.

Cet homme, arrivé au sommet de la gloire, a emmagasiné en lui des richesses incorruptibles ; il en jouit ; il les distribue ; il aide à en produire d'autres. Quelle joie de sentir près de soi cette force de la nature, cette amitié si fidèle, cette ingénuité, cette modestie innées.

⁂

Ce qu'il fait à Eckwersheim ?

Il rêve... Car, là-bas, en Amérique, c'est impossible. Les U.S.A. vous enserrent, ils vous accaparent, ils vous ceignent d'inventer des images aussi douces que les nôtres. Et celles que l'Alsace offre à Charles Munch sont des minutes hors du temps, apaisantes et sans prix. L'Alsace est une fraction de lui-même...

Quelle que soit la conversation, vous êtes immédiatement de plain-pied avec lui. S'il vous parle de l'Orchestre de Boston avec amour, il n'est pas moins chaud pour l'Orchestre national de Paris dont la tournée aux Etats-Unis fut étourdissante de brio.

— « Nos musiciens ont montré là-bas ce dont ils sont capables » et Charles Munch ajoute : « Le souvenir de cette tournée est infiniment cher à mon cœur : il est inoubliable. »

— Je crois pouvoir ajouter que le concert de ce soir, dans votre ville natale, ne le sera pas moins.

A ces mots, Charles Munch, de son regard fascinant, me répond :

— « Oui, me retrouver au Palais des Fêtes dans une telle circonstance, c'est un événement qui comptera dans ma carrière. »

Il trouve des mots touchants, d'une qualité tout à fait rare, pour développer sa pensée.

L'arc de triomphe qu'on lui dressera ce soir est assez haut pour qu'il puisse y passer, la tête haute et le cœur pur.

Il nous parle de Pierre Monteux qui dirige en Europe et avec lui la tournée du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pour ce confrère, qu'il admire et qu'il aime, Charles Munch ne tarit point d'éloges.

Dans le feu de la conversation...
Charles Munch s'entretient avec notre critique musical ; à gauche son frère Fritz.
De quoi parle-t-on ?
De musique, parbleu...
Charles Munch évoque des souvenirs... (Dernouvel)

Au fait, lui serait-il possible de médire ? Ce serait bien la première fois. Charles Munch exprime de nobles sentiments : un amour chaste et constant pour cette musique, qu'il a dans le sang ; un désir de communion avec la nature ; une inquiétude devant son mystère — je ne sais quoi encore : un suave mélange de voluptueuse et grave langueur.

Rien ne pouvait être plus doux et plus cher à son cœur que la manifestation de sympathie dont il a été l'objet récemment, à Boston, lorsqu'il reprit la baguette, après une maladie de plusieurs mois. La salle tout entière se leva : trois mille personnes l'acclamèrent pendant de longues minutes. Le maire de la ville de Boston lui offrit une baguette royale, cet instrument magique qu'il manie comme personne...

...Tout à coup, à brûle-pourpoint, il nous avoue qu'il rêve de diriger aux Etats-Unis... devinez quoi ?...

..., La Garde républicaine !

Parfaitement. Et ce désir, exprimé par lui, n'est nullement saugrenu. On s'écraserait, là-bas, pour assister à un spectacle aussi éminemment français.

Le prestige de la Garde républicaine... celui de Charles Munch, quelle conjonction !

⁂

Nous quittons l'artiste, nous prenons congé de l'élu. Charles Munch a toujours aimé la vie et tout ce qu'elle apporte aux sens. Mais le sexagénaire qu'il est, ou qu'il sera dans quelques jours, aboutit, par métamorphoses, au spirituel.

Ayant épuisé toutes les formes de la gloire humaine, il n'est qu'indulgence et douceur. Il y a dans la transparence ingénue de ses yeux — des yeux pareils à ceux d'un enfant — la candeur d'un rêve inviolé...

H. W.

Le voici avec « Puck » dans un « allegro agitato ». Lequel aura raison de l'autre ? On se connait depuis peu, mais on sympathise déjà. On est ami. (Dernouvel)

CE SOIR AU PALAIS DES FETES

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

L'événement musical de l'année est, sans conteste, la venue à Strasbourg du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Il y aura foule ce soir au Palais des Fêtes, pour applaudir Charles Munch, le prestigieux interprète.

Le brillant passé de cet orchestre et ses activités sont trop connues pour qu'il soit nécessaire d'y revenir. Les plus grands chefs d'orchestre se sont succédés au pupitre du « Boston Symphonic ». Les plus fameux d'entre eux furent Arthur Nikisch, de 1889 à 1893; Karl Muck, de 1906 à 1908 et de 1912 à 1918; Pierre Monteux de 1919 à 1924; Serge Koussevitzky, de 1924 à 1949.

Charles Munch a succédé à ce dernier au lendemain de sa mort. Rarement interprète aura connu aux Etats-Unis une vogue aussi unanime que celle de notre concitoyen.

Le programme du concert comprend, en plus de la quatrième symphonie de Brahms, une ouverture du compositeur américain Samuel Barber, « The School for scandal », la deuxième suite de Bacchus et Ariane de Roussel et la symphonie à cordes de M. Arthur Honegger.

Ce que sera ce concert, il est facile de le deviner : une manifestation extraordinaire qui s'inscrira dans les annales de notre cité.

Les musiciens français de l'orchestre de Boston

Les musiciens français de l'orchestre de Boston sont triés sur le volet. On en compte plus de vingt. Voici par ordre alphabétique leur « curriculum » abrégé :

Bernard Albert, né à Colombes (Seine), alto, premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1925.

Cauhapé Jean, né à Toulouse, alto, engagé à l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston en 1926.

Lauga Norbert, né à Aix-les-Bains, violon. N'était pas venu en France depuis 17 ans.

Elcus Gaston, né à Paris, violon, prix du Conservatoire en 1904. Joua à l'Opéra comique.

Mayer Pierre, né à Paris, violon, croix de guerre 1914-1918. En Amérique depuis 1926.

Artières Louis, né à Lyon, alto. Sa fille est danseuse au Metropolitan Opera de New York.

Leibovici Joseph, origine roumaine, né à Paris, violon. Engagé par S. Koussevitzky en 1926.

Fourel Georges, né à Grenoble, alto, premier prix du Conservatoire en 1913, croix de guerre 1914.

Schermansky Roger, né à Paris, violon, prix du Conservatoire en 1939. Engagé par Munch en 1947.

Zighera Alfred, né à Paris, violoncelle, croix de guerre 1914. Il fut engagé en 1925.

Moleux Georges, né à Boulogne, contrebasse, joua chez Pasdeloup. Sa femme est Américaine.

Marjolet Jean, né à Châlons-sur-Marne, violoncelle. Engagé par Monteux en 1920.

Droeghmans Hippolyte, né à Liége, violoncelle, premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1904.

Girard Henri, né à Monthéry, contrebasse. Création du Sacre du printemps en 1913.

Speyer Louis, né à Paris, hautbois et cor anglais. Fut aussi de la création du Sacre.

Allard Raymond, né à Sin-le-Noble (Nord), basson. Engagé par P. Monteux en 1922.

Laurent Georges, né à Paris, flûte solo, engagé en 1919. Doyen de ses compatriotes.

De Vergie Louis, né à Marseille, hautbois. Un de ses fils est ingénieur à « U.S. Atomic Energy ».

Voisin Roger, né à Angers, trompette solo, élève de son père, il lui succéda dans l'orchestre.

Lafosse Marcel, né à Marly-le-Roi, trompette, premier prix du Conservatoire en 1914.

Zighera Bernard, né à Paris, première harpe solo, professeur au Conservatoire de Boston.

Ce sont des artistes étonnants ; on devine quelle joie fut la leur lorsqu'ils apprirent que l'orchestre de Boston donnerait plusieurs concerts en France, leur patrie.

JEUNES !

Venez nombreux au Festival du bois

organisé par

l'Entr'aide par les Jeunes

le 18 mai

Rendez-vous à 8 h. 30 Station BAGGERSEE

(Tram 16)

Cette journée sera une des plus importantes de l'année, avec le concours de la Radio-Diffusion Française et d'une Camera pour le film de l'Entr'Aide.

Vous y trouverez sandwich et boisson !

Pour ceux qui ont froid en hiver, venez nombreux couper du bois !

Remise d'un diplôme à un vieil artisan

Hier vendredi, M. Widmer, président de section de la Chambre de métiers d'Alsace, entouré de MM. Burel, secrétaire, Sandrin, président de la corporation des maitres ferblantiers-couvreurs, Keil, membre du comité de ladite corporation, et Bieth, secrétaire, a remis au cours d'une cérémonie tout intime, un diplôme d'honneur à M. F. Hilgert, maitre ferblantier-couvreur, demeurant à la Robertsau, en commémoration de ses 40 années de maitrise. M. Widmer, au cours d'une allocution, a souligné les rares qualités artisanales et les multiples mérites du jubilaire, qui a passé son examen de maitrise à Metz, le 26 août 1912, et dont les deux fils ont continué les traditions artisanales.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 17 1952

TO PLAY IN LONDON

London — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Britain at the Royal festival hall May 24. The program, which will be broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation, will comprise modern American and French music.

Ville de Strasbourg
Palais des Fêtes
Sous le Patronage du Collège de l'Europe libre et de la S.A.M.S. Strasbourg
Samedi
17 Mai 1952 à 20 h. 30
Boston
Symphony Orchestra
Direction Ch. Münch
Loge 94
Carte d'Honneur

Sous le Patronage du Collège de l'Europe libre et de la S. A. M. S. Strasbourg

PALAIS DES FÊTES
Samedi 17 Mai 1952 à 20 heures 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Direction Charles Münch

Carte d'Honneur
Loge 102 A

Timbre de quitt. payé sur états - Aut. du 30-10-45

UN EVENEMENT MUSICAL SENSATIONNEL A STRASBOURG

UNE HEURE AVEC CH. MUNCH ... A ECKWERSHEIM

Il est insaisissable, mais une fois que vous le tenez, quel plaisir ! C'est à Eckwersheim que nous l'avons rejoint hier, sur le coup de midi. Il y était, depuis quelques heures, l'hôte de son frère Fritz Munch, qui habite provisoirement le presbytère de cette commune en attendant que soit reconstruit le conservatoire qu'il dirige.

Roger nous accueille. Il est inséparable de Charles Munch : il le conduit partout, il l'escorte. Mais peut-être n'est-il pas inutile de préciser qui est Roger. C'est le chauffeur du patron, et depuis plus de vingt ans. Comme lui, il habite, à Boston, une villa attenante à celle du Maître.

Mais voici que surgit Charles Munch. Allons-nous refaire ici les grandes lignes de son portrait ? A quoi bon ? Un regard, un seul, et nous retrouvons sa vision particulière, sa poignée de main, son effusion.

Cet homme, arrivé au sommet de la gloire, a emmagasiné en lui des richesses incorruptibles ; il en jouit ; il les distribue ; il aide à en produire d'autres. Quelle joie de sentir près de soi cette force de la nature, cette amitié si fidèle, cette ingénuité, cette modestie innées.

⁂

Ce qu'il fait à Eckwersheim ?

Il rêve... Car, là-bas, en Amérique, c'est impossible. Les U.S.A. vous enserrent, ils vous accaparent, ils vous défient d'inventer des images aussi douces que les nôtres. Et celles que l'Alsace offre à Charles Munch sont des minutes hors du temps, apaisantes et sans prix. L'Alsace est une fraction de lui-même...

Quelle que soit la conversation, vous êtes immédiatement de plain-pied avec lui. S'il vous parle de l'Orchestre de Boston avec amour, il n'est pas moins chaud pour l'Orchestre national de Paris, dont la tournée aux Etats-Unis fut étourdissante de brio.

— « Nos musiciens ont montré là-bas ce dont ils sont capables » et Charles Munch ajoute : « Le souvenir de cette tournée est infiniment cher à mon cœur : il est inoubliable. »

— Je crois pouvoir ajouter que le concert de ce soir, dans votre ville natale, ne le sera pas moins.

A ces mots, Charles Munch, de son regard fascinant, me répond :

— « Oui, me retrouver au Palais des fêtes dans une telle circonstance, c'est un événement qui comptera dans ma carrière. »

Il trouve des mots touchants, d'une qualité tout à fait rare, pour développer sa pensée.

L'arc de triomphe qu'on lui dressera ce soir est assez haut pour qu'il puisse y passer, la tête haute et le cœur pur.

Il nous parle de Pierre Monteux qui dirige en Europe et avec lui la tournée du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pour ce confrère, qu'il admire et qu'il aime, Charles Munch ne tarit point d'éloges.

Dans le feu de la conversation...
Charles Munch s'entretient avec notre critique musical ; à ... gauche son frère Fritz.
De quoi parle-t-on ?
De musique, parbleu...
Charles Munch évoque des souvenirs... (Dernouvel)

Au fait, lui serait-il possible de médire ? Ce serait bien la première fois. Charles Munch exprime de nobles sentiments : un amour chaste et constant pour cette musique, qu'il a dans le sang ; un désir de communion avec la nature ; une inquiétude devant son mystère — je ne sais quoi encore : un suave mélange de voluptueuse et grave langueur.

Rien ne pouvait être plus doux et plus cher à son cœur que la manifestation de sympathie dont il a été l'objet récemment, à Boston, lorsqu'il reprit la baguette, après une maladie de plusieurs mois. La salle tout entière se leva : trois mille personnes l'acclamèrent pendant de longues minutes. Le maire de la ville de Boston lui offrit une baguette royale, cet instrument magique qu'il manie comme personne...

... Tout à coup, à brûle-pourpoint, il nous avoue qu'il rêve de diriger aux Etats-Unis... devinez quoi ?...

..., La Garde républicaine !

Parfaitement. Et ce désir, exprimé par lui, n'est nullement saugrenu. On s'écraserait, là-bas, pour assister à un spectacle aussi éminemment français.

Le prestige de la Garde républicaine... celui de Charles Munch, quelle conjonction !

⁂

Nous quittons l'artiste, nous prenons congé de l'élu. Charles Munch a toujours aimé la vie et tout ce qu'elle apporte aux sens. Mais le sexagénaire qu'il est, ou qu'il sera dans quelques jours, aboutit, par métamorphoses, au spirituel.

Ayant épuisé toutes les formes de la gloire humaine, il n'est qu'indulgence et douceur. Il y a dans la transparence ingénue de ses yeux — des yeux pareils à ceux d'un enfant — la candeur d'un rêve inviolé...

H. W.

Le voici avec « Puck » dans un « allegro agitato ». Lequel aura raison de l'autre ? On se connait depuis peu, mais on sympathise déjà. On est ami. (Dernouvel)

CE SOIR AU PALAIS DES FETES

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

L'événement musical de l'année est, sans conteste, la venue à Strasbourg du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Il y aura foule ce soir au Palais des Fêtes, pour applaudir Charles Munch, le prestigieux interprète.

Le brillant passé de cet orchestre et ses activités sont trop connues pour qu'il soit nécessaire d'y revenir. Les plus grands chefs d'orchestre se sont succédés au pupitre du « Boston Symphonic ». Les plus fameux d'entre eux furent Arthur Nikisch, de 1889 à 1893; Karl Muck, de 1906 à 1908 et de 1912 à 1918; Pierre Monteux de 1919 à 1924; Serge Koussevitzky, de 1924 à 1949.

Charles Munch a succédé à ce dernier au lendemain de sa mort. Rarement interprète aura connu aux Etats-Unis une vogue aussi unanime que celle de notre concitoyen.

Le programme du concert comprend, en plus de la quatrième symphonie de Brahms, une ouverture du compositeur américain Samuel Barber, « The School for scandal », la deuxième suite de Bacchus et Ariane de Roussel et la symphonie à cordes de M. Arthur Honegger.

Ce que sera ce concert, il est facile de le deviner : une manifestation extraordinaire qui s'inscrira dans les annales de notre cité.

Les musiciens français de l'orchestre de Boston

Les musiciens français de l'orchestre de Boston sont triés sur le volet. On en compte plus de vingt. Voici par ordre alphabétique leur « curriculum » abrégé :

Bernard Albert, né à Colombes (Seine), alto, premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1925.

Cauhapé Jean, né à Toulouse, alto, engagé à l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston en 1926.

Lauga Norbert, né à Aix-les-Bains, violon. N'était pas venu en France depuis 17 ans.

Elcus Gaston, né à Paris, violon, prix du Conservatoire en 1904. Joua à l'Opéra comique.

Mayer Pierre, né à Paris, violon, croix de guerre 1914-1918. En Amérique depuis 1926.

Artières Louis, né à Lyon, alto. Sa fille est danseuse au Metropolitan Opera de New York.

Leibovici Joseph, origine roumaine, né à Paris, violon. Engagé par S. Koussevitzky en 1926.

Fourel Georges, né à Grenoble, alto, premier prix du Conservatoire en 1913, croix de guerre 1914.

Schermansky Roger, né à Paris, violon, prix du Conservatoire en 1939. Engagé par Munch en 1947.

Zighera Alfred, né à Paris, violoncelle, croix de guerre 1914. Il fut engagé en 1925.

Moleux Georges, né à Boulogne, contrebasse, joua chez Pasdeloup. Sa femme est Américaine.

Marjolet Jean, né à Châlons-sur-Marne, violoncelle. Engagé par Monteux en 1920.

Droeghmans Hippolyte, né à Liége, violoncelle, premier prix du Conservatoire de Paris en 1904.

Girard Henri, né à Monthéry, contrebasse. Création du Sacre du printemps en 1913.

Speyer Louis, né à Paris, hautbois et cor anglais. Fut aussi de la création du Sacre.

Allard Raymond, né à Sin-le-Noble (Nord), basson. Engagé par P. Monteux en 1922.

Laurent Georges, né à Paris, flûte solo, engagé en 1919. Doyen de ses compatriotes.

De Vergie Louis, né à Marseille, hautbois. Un de ses fils est ingénieur à « U.S. Atomic Energy ».

Voisin Roger, né à Angers, trompette solo, élève de son père, il lui succéda dans l'orchestre.

Lafosse Marcel, né à Marly-le-Roi, trompette, premier prix du Conservatoire en 1914.

Zighera Bernard, né à Paris, première harpe solo, professeur au Conservatoire de Boston.

Ce sont des artistes étonnants ; on devine quelle joie fut la leur lorsqu'ils apprirent que l'orchestre de Boston donnerait plusieurs concerts en France, leur patrie.

JEUNES !

Venez nombreux au Festival du bois

organisé par

l'Entr'aide par les Jeunes

le 18 mai

Rendez-vous à 8 h. 30 Station BAGGERSEE

(Tram 16)

Cette journée sera une des plus importantes de l'année, avec le concours de la Radio-Diffusion Française et d'une Camera pour le film de l'Entr'Aide.

Vous y trouverez sandwich et boisson !

Pour ceux qui ont froid en hiver, venez nombreux couper du bois !

Remise d'un diplôme à un vieil artisan

Hier vendredi, M. Widmer, président de section de la Chambre de métiers d'Alsace, entouré de MM. Burel, secrétaire, Sandrin, président de la corporation des maitres ferblantiers-couvreurs, Keil, membre du comité de ladite corporation, et Bieth, secrétaire, a remis au cours d'une cérémonie tout intime, un diplôme d'honneur à M. F. Hilgert, maitre ferblantier-couvreur, demeurant à la Robertsau, en commémoration de ses 40 années de maitrise. M. Widmer, au cours d'une allocution, a souligné les rares qualités artisanales et les multiples mérites du jubilaire, qui a passé son examen de maitrise à Metz, le 26 août 1912, et dont les deux fils ont continué les traditions artisanales.

Ville de Strasbourg
Palais des Fêtes
Sous le Patronage du Collège de l'Europe libre et de la S.A.M.S. Strasbourg
Samedi
17 Mai 1952 à 20 h. 30
Boston
Symphony Orchestra
Direction Ch. Münch
Loge 9A
Carte d'Honneur

Sous le Patronage du Collège de l'Europe libre et de la S. A. M. S. Strasbourg

PALAIS DES FÊTES
Samedi 17 Mai 1952 à 20 heures 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Direction Charles Münch

Carte d'Honneur
Loge No 2 A
Timbre de quitt. payé sur états - Aut. du 30-10-45

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 17 1952

TO PLAY IN LONDON

London — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Britain at the Royal festival hall May 24. The program, which will be broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation, will comprise modern American and French music.

UN INOUBLIABLE CONCERT AU PALAIS DES FETES

CHARLES MUNCH dirige le Boston Symphony Orchestra

TEL arbre, tel fruit...
Tel orchestre, tel chef.

Il faut avoir vécu cette soirée : il faut avoir vu et entendu ce qui s'est passé dès que Charles Munch fit son apparition. Après le concert, on eût dit que la salle, toute frémissante de la joie qu'elle venait d'éprouver, voulait semer de roses le chemin qu'emprunterait Charles Munch, pour rentrer chez lui : elle eut voulu poser sur son front la couronne d'Iphigénie.

Devant cette allégresse, l'interprète cherchait à dominer son émotion, mais il suffisait de le regarder d'un peu près pour se convaincre que cet accueil le touchait au plus profond de lui-même. Charles Munch est plus grand que jamais : il s'est surpassé, hier soir.

***

Quel fulgurant orchestre ! Pour le décrire, dans le feu de l'enthousiasme, vous devez pousser plusieurs exclamations à la fois. Vous pouvez dire « Ces cordes, ces bois, ces cuivres ; cette cohésion, ce fondu, cet ensemble ! ».

Ceux qui ne le connaissent que par ouï-dire pourraient croire que cet orchestre est foncièrement américain et cela parce qu'il est gigantesque, mais ce n'est même pas une odeur américaine que la sienne. Le vieux continent y est éloquemment représenté. Vous avez là toute la puissance, toute l'expérience et toute la virtuosité ; la crème des instrumentistes : incontestablement ils sont les meilleurs « in the world ». Vingt-trois Français y tiennent des pupitres de choix. Rien que des vedettes. Là encore, il faut s'expliquer, car il y a les super et les hyper-vedettes.

Une telle formation est splendide. Demandez à M. Arthur Honegger s'il est possible de mieux traduire sa symphonie à cordes, s'il existe au monde un interprète plus qualifié que Charles Munch, s'il se trouve sur toute la planète un trompettiste aussi phénoménal que Roger Voisin. Et Laurent, le flûtiste. Et Allar, le basson. Et Joseph de Pasquale l'altiste. Et Speyer, le cor anglais !

Albert Roussel connaissait l'orchestre de Boston pour l'avoir entendu ; il savait comment « sonnait » sa 2e suite de Bacchus et d'Ariane lorsqu'elle était confiée aux instrumentistes de Boston.

Samuel Barber qui composa la savoureuse ouverture de « The School for Scandal », une page d'un musicien qui n'est pas le premier venu, sait bien lui aussi que la récompense suprême pour un compositeur consiste à se faire adopter par Charles Munch et les siens.

***

Jamais auteurs ne furent mieux compris. Cet orchestre donnerait des muscles aux œuvres les plus chétives ; il chargerait de sonorité la réplique la plus pauvre.

Et que dire que la « quatrième » de Brahms, de cette apothéose, sinon que Charles Munch l'alluma comme une fusée. Nous en sommes encore tout éblouis. Le dernier accord tombé, une grandeur s'éteignait.

Fou de musique, notre concitoyen ne ressemblait à personne qu'à lui-même. Il était le plus frémissant, le plus rayonnant des interprètes. Sans doute les ressources quasi inépuisables de l'orchestre permettent d'éclairer « a giorno » le chef-d'œuvre de Brahms.

Charles Munch est toujours aussi ivre de la joie que lui verse la musique. Il se livre entièrement. Il étreint tous ses rôles. C'est un amant de la musique. Il se situe déjà dans l'histoire de l'interprétation contemporaine.

Le puissant attrait qu'il exerce sur tous ceux qui le connaissent — musiciens ou auditeurs — aucun artiste ne le possède au même degré. Il y a d'une part son aspect physique, de l'autre, son magnétisme qui est irrésistible. La part immense des dons naturels s'augmente chez lui d'un pouvoir de suggestion qui vous empoigne, vous soulève et vous envahit. Charles Munch est un séducteur, un fougueux idéaliste. Il traîne tous les cœurs après lui. Et quelle sensibilité ! Elle est si violente qu'elle crée des secousses. Cette façon d'exploser comme une torpille serait choquante chez d'autres. Mais la nature l'ayant pourvu d'un pouvoir mystérieux qui échappe à l'analyse, tout lui est permis.

***

Depuis trois semaines qu'il est de retour des Etats-Unis, tous les journaux, toutes les gazettes, toutes les revues sont pleines de lui. Mitraillé sous toutes ses faces, il est l'homme du jour. On peut le voir sur tous les écrans, tantôt avec le président de la République, tantôt avec Strawinsky, avec Monteux et bien d'autres encore. C'est un ambassadeur extraordinaire qui fascine, non seulement les musiciens qu'il dirige, mais les foules des deux continents, qu'il subjugue.

Cette gloire qui monte jusqu'au zénith n'a jamais troublé la clairvoyance de l'être délicieux et simple qu'il est resté. En vérité, à un ensemble aussi vertigineux que celui de Boston, il fallait un chef de cette trempe, dont les artères battent avec violence.

Sa présence à la tête de cette éblouissante formation n'est pas un effet du hasard. Les Américains n'auraient pu trouver un musicien plus intense, plus ivre du bonheur que lui verse la musique.

Ce soir, j'ai le privilège et l'honneur de dire à mon vieil ami, un immense merci où se mêle je ne sais quelle affectueuse gratitude. Car Charles Munch reflète là-bas, de l'autre côté de l'Atlantique, le prestige d'une grandeur, née au cœur même de Strasbourg, sa ville natale. Tous, nous avons le droit d'être fiers de lui. Nous le lui avons prouvé, du mieux que nous le pûmes...

Le concert qu'il vient de nous donner est absolument unique. Nos mémoires et nos cœurs l'ont enregistré ... pour toujours.

La soirée a pris fin sous les ovations d'une salle transportée. On applaudissait ; on criait ; on trépignait d'aise. On acclamait follement Charles Munch et son orchestre milliardaire.

C'est égal : si le « Boston Symphonic » porte l'estampille « Made in U.S.A. » son chef suprême est bel et bien « von hie ».

Par l'effet d'une mystérieuse synchronie, je voyais son père, l'inoubliable Ernest Munch tressaillant de bonheur, dans sa tombe, et s'en relevant pour chanter avec nous le triomphe de son foudroyant Charry...

ZED.

Hier soir au Palais des Fêtes... (Dernouvel)

***

A l'issue du concert, une réception a été donnée par le comité de la Société des amis de la musique en l'honneur de l'orchestre et de son chef. De nombreuses personnalités y assistaient, notamment M. Pierre Pflimlin, ministre de la France d'outre-mer, M. Paul Demange, préfet du Bas-Rhin, le général Pique-Aubrun, gouverneur militaire, les membres du corps consulaire, M. Camille Paris, secrétaire général du Conseil de l'Europe, et de nombreuses personnalités de Strasbourg et du département, ainsi que les organisateurs américains de ce concert.

M. le professeur Pautrier se fit l'interprète des « Amis de la Musique » pour remercier les artistes du mémorable concert dont nous leur sommes redevables.

En anglais, M. Louis Martin, directeur de l'orchestre de Radio Strasbourg, parla dans le même sens.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

1952

A LIVING MEMORIAL

Serge Koussevitzky's Ideals Realized Through Commissions of Native Works

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Two years ago Serge Koussevitzky created the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which has as its broad purpose the encouragement of the world's musical culture. On March 12, 1942 the first meeting of the foundation's board took place and the first of a series of commissions was commissioned.

In a few weeks the foundation will announce a fresh group of commissions and the chances are excellent that music of merit will result. For the Koussevitzky Foundation has a remarkable record of achievement. In ten years it has helped create an extraordinary body of music. It would be difficult to find any contemporary organization that has served so wisely and well in support of the living composer.

In many parts of the country as well as in cities abroad there will be an opportunity during the month of June to hear some of the works commissioned by the organization. Mr. Koussevitzky died on June 4, 1951, and there will be a great many broadcasts of memorial programs.

At Tanglewood the Berkshire Music Center, which Mr. Koussevitzky brought into being, will observe its tenth anniversary this summer, and here, too, is a living reminder of the creative vision that the conductor brought to his work as musician and public-spirited citizen. But his most enduring memorial, in the long run, is likely to be the corpus of music commissioned by the foundation.

The foundation has prepared a media brochure quietly setting forth its accomplishments of the past ten years, and as you glance down the list of commissioned works you realize what an impressive job it has done. Mr. Koussevitzky's approach to commissions was based on the theory that established composers must be encouraged to enrich the repertoire and that new voices must be granted a chance to be heard, and the wisdom of this twofold aim may be judged by the compositions that have been composed.

Two of the best operas to reach the stage in the past decade were commissioned by the foundation—Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes," ordered in 1942, and Marc Blitzstein's "Regina," ordered in 1946.

'Grimes' and 'Regina'

The fate of these two operas is worth pausing over. "Peter Grimes" had widespread success. It was presented not only at Tanglewood but also at the Metropolitan Opera where, despite some differences of opinion over its qualities, it evoked interest and curiosity.

In Europe it was performed in a number of countries. It was perhaps the first new opera to have any extensive vogue in the opera theatres of Europe after the war's end.

"Regina" opened on Broadway, under the sponsorship of Cheryl Crawford and the direction of Robert Lewis. It had one of the most elegant productions ever lavished on an opera. It was a performance that was bright and integrated, altogether credible in its visual aspects and sensitive and accomplished in its musical aspects.

And "Regina" struck some of us, being a minority at the time, as one of the best operas ever written by an American. It had to make its way in the difficult Broadway setup where you are almost sure to lose and you are not an immediate success out. The production was much too expensive to be carried along until it found its audience.

Were we wrong, those of us who admired "Regina" so strongly? There will be a chance on June 1 to check on our findings. The Y.M.H.A. Symphonic Workshop and Chorus, conducted by Maurice Levine, will put on most of the opera in concert form at Ninety-second Street "Y," with many members of the original cast, and Lillian Hellman on whose "The Little Foxes" the opera was based will tie together with twenty-two excerpts with a commentary.

Jane Pickens, Brenda Lewis, Priscilla Gillette, Clarice Crawford, William Wilderman, David Thomas, Russell Nype and Kayton Nesbitt will be back in their original roles, and Randolph Symonette and Joseph James will be newcomers.

If "Regina" stands up on rehearing, would it be too much to hope for a revival at a theatre like the City Center?

To return to the Koussevitzky Foundation's commissions of operas, Arthur Lourié, Tadeusz Kassern and Virgil Thomson were invited to write operas in 1949, and Mr. Kassern has completed his, a piece called "The Anointed."

Last year two additional operas were commissioned—one by Alexander Tcherepnin and the other by Darius Milhaud. The latter work saw the foundation take another progressive step forward. Recognizing that librettos can be a serious headache for the composer who would write a stageworthy opera, it commissioned Armand Lunel to collaborate with Milhaud by preparing a text and by working in closest cooperation with him. This work is designed for the King David Festival to be held in Israel.

Significant Works

Some notable orchestral works have been produced at the foundation's behest. In 1943 Béla Bártok was commissioned to do a piece, and Concerto for Orchestra has become one of the most durable new items of the entire repertoire. Aaron Copland's Third Symphony which stemmed from a 1944 grant, and Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, composed for a 1949 commission, may also be considered pieces of major significance.

If the foundation were responsible for nothing else, it would deserve a "well done." But let us take its commissions year by year, and the scope of its sympathies will become readily apparent.

The 1942 commissions resulted in Nikolai Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony and Bohuslav Martinu's First. Samuel Barber was requested to do an opera but could not find a satisfactory libretto and has now been asked to do an orchestral work instead.

In 1943 there were grants for quartets by William Bergsma and Robert Palmer, William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Stravinsky's Ode for Symphony Orchestra.

In 1944 there were commissions for Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Concertino for Orchestra, Milhaud's Second Symphony and Burrill Phillips' "Tom Paine" Overture.

For 1945 the record shows David Diamond's Fourth Symphony, Messiaen's "Turangalila" Symphony, Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto, Heitor Villa-Lobos' "Madona" for Orchestra and works by Lukas Foss, Alexei Haieff, Nicolas Nabokov and Harold Shapero.

In 1946 there was a grant for Walter Piston's Third Symphony.

The 1947 grants brought Malipiero's Fourth Symphony, Schoenberg's "Survivor From Warsaw," chamber works by Earl George and Blas Galindo, with a symphony by Roy Harris that has just been completed.

Randall Thompson is completing a symphony commissioned in 1948.

Commissions in 1949 were for string quartets by Peter Mennin and Irving Fine.

In 1950 Dallapiccola, Jerzy Fitelberg, Camargo Guarnieri, Jacques Ibert, Louis Mennini and Roger Sessions (the last has an orchestral work in progress) received commissions, and last year Leonard Bernstein and Leon Kirchner got grants. In addition the foundation helped a London group in 1948 to commission new symphonies by P. Racine Fricker and Iain Hamilton.

No doubt the foundation will continue on the broad, constructive course and in the wide-ranging international spirit established by the founder. The good works of Serge Koussevitzky live on after him.

Voyageant en autorail spécial

Les 110 musiciens du "BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA"

ont été accueillis en gare de Metz

Fatigué, Ch. Munsch est venu par la route

UN autorail spécial s'arrêtait hier matin en gare de Metz, à 10 h. 40 très exactement. Il amenait dans notre ville, où ils devaient donner le soir même à l'Hôtel des Mines un brillant concert, les 110 musiciens composant le célèbre « Boston Symphony Orchestra » qui connaît actuellement en Europe et en France notamment un succès considérable.

Dans le courant de la matinée, le maître Charles MUNSCH, qui dirige l'importante formation, avait prévenu que, fatigué, il viendrait dans le courant de l'après-midi, par la route.

Ce contre-temps désorganisa quelque peu l'accueil en gare qui avait été prévu avec un certain éclat. La courte réception dans le grand salon d'honneur de la gare fut décommandée et sur le quai, à l'arrivée de l'autorail, on ne remarquait que quelques personnalités messines : M. GRAEBERT, le sympathique directeur du Conservatoire ; M. MARICHAL, chef du service de l'Information, représentant M. Dubois, inspecteur général de l'Administration ; M. RICHARD, chef de la Sûreté, qu'accompagnait le secrétaire FONTAINE

Tous les musiciens, parmi lesquels quelques femmes, valise à droite et appareil photo en bandoulière, s'enquirent immédiatement à leur arrivée de leurs hôtels respectifs. Les organisateurs avaient, en effet, prévu à leur intention un certain nombre de chambres dans les hôtels de la place de la Gare.

En fait, la cérémonie d'accueil par suite de l'absence du maître Charles MUNSCH avait été réduite à sa plus simple expression.

Mais ceci n'empêcha pas, le soir, à l'Hôtel des Mines, le splendide orchestre de soulever une véritable ovation. Nous aurons d'ailleurs l'occasion de rendre compte de ce que fut cette soirée de gala, pour les mélomanes venus de Metz, mais aussi du département et même de la région.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 1952

TO PLAY IN LONDON

London — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Britain at the Royal festival hall May 24. The program, which will be broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation, will comprise modern American and French music.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MAY 1952

First London Concert by Symphony May 26

LONDON, May 17 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Britain at the Royal Festival Hall May 26, it was announced today.

The London program, which will be broadcast, will consist of modern American and French music.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MAY 18 1952

Boston Symphony Given Ovation in Munch Birthplace

STRASBOURG, France, May 17 (Reuters)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, continuing its first European tour, was given a triumphal reception when it played tonight in Strausbourg, birthplace of Conductor Charles Munch.

The audience applauded an overture by American composer Samuel Barber, Arthur Honegger's Symphony for Strings, the Second Suite from Albert Roussel's "Baccaus and Ariadne," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 18 1952

Bostonians to Play in London

LONDON, May 17 (UP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert in Great Britain on May 26 at the Royal Festival Hall at London, it was announced today. The orchestra is touring Europe.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAY 18 1952

Special Broadcasts Honor Koussevitzky

Special broadcasts honoring the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, have been scheduled by major networks and independent stations throughout the country, for the week of June 4, the first anniversary of his death.

These programs, also marking the tenth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will include recordings conducted by Koussevitzky and works commissioned by the Foundation which he created to carry into the future his unmatched record for encouraging and supporting composers throughout the world.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony in a memorial concert at Tanglewood Aug. 9 during the Berkshire Music Festival, including Copland's Symphony No. 3, commissioned by the Foundation. A number of major conductors here and abroad will honor Koussevitzky by including in their Fall programs works commissioned by the Foundation. Among them are Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy.

LE LORRAIN

LE PLUS GRAND ÉVÉNEMENT MUSICAL DE LA SAISON

Metz a réservé un accueil triomphal à l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston

PLUS de deux mille spectateurs ont acclamé hier soir, à l'hôtel des Mines, les musiciens du célèbre orchestre symphonique de Boston et leur chef, M. Charles Munch, qui a fait triompher dans le monde entier le prestige musical français.

Un imposant service d'ordre avait été mis sur pied pour recevoir les musiciens de l'Orchestre symphonique, attendus en gare de Metz à 10 h. 38 du matin. Une réception avait également été prévue dans le salon d'honneur, à laquelle devaient assister M. Dubois, inspecteur général de l'Administration, ainsi que différentes personnalités.

A l'heure prévue, un autorail spécial venant de Strasbourg, où l'Orchestre avait donné son concert la veille au soir, stoppa au quai 1, libérant musiciennes et musiciens encombrés de valises et d'instruments.

Malheureusement, le maître Charles Munch n'était pas du voyage et ne devait arriver à Metz qu'en fin d'après-midi, sans aucun apparat.

Ce contretemps devait avoir pour effet la suppression pure et simple de la réception et ce furent MM. Graebert, directeur du Conservatoire, et Marichal, attaché de cabinet, qui accueillirent nos invités, bientôt abandonnés à eux-mêmes.

Il est dommage qu'une brève cérémonie n'ait pas permis de leur rendre l'honneur auquel ils étaient en droit de s'attendre. La journée devait par ailleurs se dérouler normalement pour ces virtuoses fatigués de leur soirée strasbourgeoise et soucieux de prendre quelque repos avant de satisfaire les mélomanes messins. Quelques-uns eurent la curiosité de visiter l'hôtel des Mines et d'en vérifier l'acoustique, tandis que d'autres flânaient dans les artères messines baignées de soleil.

Après un repas pris dans leurs hôtels respectifs, les musiciens du Boston Symphony Orchestra arrivèrent dans la salle de concert déjà encombrée de fervents admirateurs. L'enchantement allait commencer...

Encombrés de valises, gênés par leurs impédimenta, les instruments sont nombreux et lourds, les musiciens sortent de la gare centrale.

M. GRAEBERT, directeur du Conservatoire, et M. MARICHAL, attaché de cabinet à la préfecture, accueillent les membres de l'orchestre et serrent quelques mains.

Sous la baguette de Charles MUNCH la Symphonie Fantastique de Berlioz

Charles MUNCH

est l'une des figures les plus connues et les plus admirées du monde musical. Pendant la guerre, à la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris, il a conquis l'élite artistique, ainsi que toute la jeunesse étudiante de la capitale. Il ne pouvait apparaître sans susciter au palais de Chaillot de délirantes ovations, et la décision qu'il prit de quitter Paris pour l'Amérique chagrina tous ses admirateurs qui se consolèrent en pensant qu'il travaillerait ainsi au rayonnement de la France à l'étranger.

On sent chez lui la sincérité du geste, l'émotion contenue dans une crispation du visage, avec une autorité extraordinaire que reflètent les réactions de l'orchestre. Un simple regard, un mouvement du poignet, et les artistes, médusés, obéissent immédiatement. Peut-on nier, après cela, l'influence considérable que peut exercer un chef sur ses musiciens ?

Dynamisme, autorité, lyrisme enflammé, telles sont les qualités de Charles Munch qui font dire de lui à un grand critique new-yorkais : « Il est l'homme le plus extraordinaire que j'aie rencontré ».

Le programme était de choix et l'exécution fut hors pair. Les artistes du « Boston Symphony » commencèrent par la « Symphonie fantastique » de Berlioz, dont ils surent exprimer l'âme tumultueuse et les sublimes aspirations, enlevant l'œuvre avec un brio inégalé.

Puis venait « Bacchus et Ariane », la suite symphonique d'Albert Roussel, tirée du ballet en deux actes du même nom, qui suscita les applaudissements sans fin de l'auditoire.

Mais ce fut la « Quatrième Symphonie » de Brahms qui marqua véritablement l'apogée de ce concert, l'orchestre ayant traduit avec un fondu et une maîtrise uniques la sincérité et la foi dédaigneuse de toute concession du grand compositeur. Comme à Paris, le Boston Symphony Orchestra remporta à Metz le succès le plus éclatant. La salle debout acclamait, à la fin du concert, le chef et son merveilleux orchestre. Depuis la venue en notre cité des orchestres Damrosch, Gabriel Pierné et Paul Paray, jamais nous n'avions vu les Messins, pourtant si calmes d'ordinaire, montrer autant d'exubérance dans la joie et la reconnaissance.

Remercions M. Dubois, inspecteur de l'administration; M. H. Graebert et son comité de l'Association des Concerts du Conservatoire de nous avoir donné l'occasion d'entendre cet ensemble unique au monde.

⁂

Après le concert, les artistes du « Boston Symphony » assistèrent à une réception offerte en leur honneur dans les salons de l'hôtel de la préfecture par M. Dubois, inspecteur de l'administration.

M. Munch et ses musiciens ont quitté Metz ce matin, se rendant à Lyon par train spécial. Ils joueront ensuite à Paris, où la salle est, d'ores et déjà, entièrement louée, puis à Bordeaux et à Londres avant de repartir pour les Etats-Unis à la fin de ce mois.

Les personnalités

Parmi les personnalités qui assistaient au concert, on notait : MM. Robert Schuman, ministre des Affaires étrangères, Dubois, préfet de la Moselle, Mgr Heintz, évêque de Metz, Mgr Louis, vicaire général, le général Zeller, le général Chenet, MM. Driant, Mondon, Goulon, Saffroy, Judd, Evarts, Kiesgen, organisateur de la tournée européenne du « Boston Symphony », le colonel Lynch, commandant des troupes américaines à Metz.

LES A-CÔTÉS

La plus grande manifestation musicale de l'année

LE concert donné hier soir à l'hôtel des Mines a été sans conteste la plus grande manifestation musicale de l'année et elle s'inscrit à jamais dans les annales de notre cité. Le brillant passé de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston et ses activités sont si connues qu'il est à peine nécessaire d'y revenir. Rappelons cependant que les plus grands chefs d'orchestre se sont succédés à son pupitre. Les plus fameux d'entre eux furent Arthur Nikisch, de 1889 à 1893, Karl Muck, de 1906 à 1908 et de 1912 à 1918, Pierre Monteux de 1919 à 1924 et Serge Koussevitzky de 1924 à 1949, après la mort de ce dernier, Charles Munch.

102 exécutants dont 23 français

LE « Boston Symphony » est l'orchestre étranger qui compte le plus de Français dans ses rangs : Vingt trois en tout sur cent deux exécutants. Le reste est composé d'artistes originaires de tous les points du globe : Russes, Allemands, Italiens, Grecs, Américains, Autrichiens.

Parmi les Français, le violoniste Devargie, est Marseillais, Canhape est de Toulouse. Tous sont installés depuis de longues années aux U.S.A. Le doyen, Georges Laurent, arriva à Boston en 1916, avec André Messager. Quant à Louis Speyer, le cor anglais, il débarqua en Amérique en 1918 comme membre d'une musique militaire qu'on avait pompeusement appelée « Garde Républicaine ».

« Après un concert à Boston, où je jouais en soliste, raconte-t-il, le Boston Symphony me fit des offres. Ce fut toute une histoire. Finalement, le ministère de la Guerre me libera au titre de la propagande nationale. »

Louis Speyer est l'un des rares musiciens qui peuvent se vanter d'avoir « inventé » Stravinsky en France. Il jouait en 1913 dans l'orchestre qui créa « Le Sacre du Printemps », au théâtre des Champs Elysées, dans un chahut indescriptible.

« Quelle tuerie ! » s'écrie-t-il lyriquement quand il évoque la bataille rangée que se livrèrent ce soir-là les spectateurs.

Une famille de musiciens

LES frères Zighera sont les plus jeunes « Bostoniens ». C'est Koussevitzky qui les fit venir en 1925-26 :

« Je peux l'avouer, aujourd'hui, dit Bernard Zighera : J'ai pratiquement déserté pour aller à Boston. Quand Koussevitzky me convoqua, je faisais mon service militaire. Je devais débuter en octobre à Boston, mais mon temps ne finissait qu'en décembre. Tout s'arrangea, grâce à un sergent complaisant qui fit disparaître toutes mes permissions pour permettre d'obtenir mon congé libérable.

Les deux Zighera qui sont l'un pianiste, l'autre violoncelliste, ont un troisième frère, le célèbre violoniste parisien Léon Zighera, que les Messins ont eu l'occasion d'applaudir aux concerts Soudant, cet hiver.

Pourquoi ils sont venus à Metz

SAIT-ON que c'est à l'initiative personnelle de M. Dubois, préfet de la Moselle, que Metz doit d'avoir été l'une des étapes du circuit effectué en Europe par le « Boston Symphony » ?

Au cours d'un récent séjour dans la capitale, M. Dubois rencontrait, en effet, son ami de longue date, M. Nabokoff, président du comité directeur de l'orchestre en Europe.

« Vous vous arrêtez à Strasbourg ? fit M. Dubois. Et pourquoi pas à Metz ? »

L'idée fit vite son chemin et c'est ainsi que notre ville est devenue à son tour métropole musicale de l'Est de la France.

Des violons de 7.000 dollars

LES musiciens de l'orchestre de Boston n'ont pas moins de 95 malles transatlantiques qui les suivent dans leur triomphale tournée à travers l'Europe.

Mais leurs bagages les plus précieux sont sans conteste leurs instruments qui, pour la plupart, sont des pièces uniques.

Les violons notamment sont signés des plus grands luthiers, de Stradivarius à Guarnerius Etats-Unis, pour une valeur de et il y fallu les assurer, aux 7.900 dollars chacun.

[195]

LE LORRAIN

LE PLUS GRAND ÉVÉNEMENT MUSICAL DE LA SAISON

Metz a réservé un accueil triomphal à l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston

PLUS de deux mille spectateurs ont acclamé hier soir, à l'hôtel des Mines, les musiciens du célèbre orchestre symphonique de Boston et leur chef, M. Charles Munch, qui a fait triompher dans le monde entier le prestige musical français.

Un imposant service d'ordre avait été mis sur pied pour recevoir les musiciens de l'Orchestre symphonique, attendus en gare de Metz à 10 h. 38 du matin. Une réception avait également été prévue dans le salon d'honneur, à laquelle devaient assister M. Dubois, inspecteur général de l'Administration, ainsi que différentes personnalités.

A l'heure prévue, un autorail spécial venant de Strasbourg, où l'Orchestre avait donné son concert la veille au soir, stoppa au quai 1, libérant musiciennes et musiciens encombrés de valises et d'instruments.

Malheureusement, le maître Charles Munch n'était pas du voyage et ne devait arriver à Metz qu'en fin d'après-midi, sans aucun apparat.

Ce contretemps devait avoir pour effet la suppression pure et simple de la réception et ce furent MM. Graebert, directeur du Conservatoire, et Marichal, attaché de cabinet, qui accueillirent nos invités, bientôt abandonnés à eux-mêmes.

Il est dommage qu'une brève cérémonie n'ait pas permis de leur rendre l'honneur auquel ils étaient en droit de s'attendre. La journée devait par ailleurs se dérouler normalement pour ces virtuoses fatigués de leur soirée strasbourgeoise et soucieux de prendre quelque repos avant de satisfaire les mélomanes messins. Quelques-uns eurent la curiosité de visiter l'hôtel des Mines et d'en vérifier l'acoustique, tandis que d'autres flânaient dans les artères messines baignées de soleil.

Après un repas pris dans leurs hôtels respectifs, les musiciens du Boston Symphony Orchestra arrivèrent dans la salle de concert déjà encombrée de fervents admirateurs. L'enchantement allait commencer...

Encombrés de valises, gênés par leurs impédimenta, les instruments sont nombreux et lourds, les musiciens sortent de la gare centrale.

M. GRAEBERT, directeur du Conservatoire, et M. MARICHAL, attaché de cabinet à la préfecture, accueillent les membres de l'orchestre et serrent quelques mains.

Sous la baguette de Charles MUNCH
la Symphonie Fantastique de Berlioz

Charles MUNCH est l'une des figures les plus connues et les plus admirées du monde musical. Pendant la guerre, à la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris, il a conquis l'élite artistique, ainsi que toute la jeunesse étudiante de la capitale. Il ne pouvait apparaître sans susciter au palais de Chaillot de délirantes ovations, et la décision qu'il prit de quitter Paris pour l'Amérique chagrina tous ses admirateurs qui se consolèrent en pensant qu'il travaillerait ainsi au rayonnement de la France à l'étranger.

On sent chez lui la sincérité du geste, l'émotion contenue dans une crispation du visage, avec une autorité extraordinaire que reflètent les réactions de l'orchestre. Un simple regard, un mouvement du poignet, et les artistes, médusés, obéissent immédiatement. Peut-on nier, après cela, l'influence considérable que peut exercer un chef sur ses musiciens ?

Dynamisme, autorité, lyrisme enflammé, telles sont les qualités de Charles Munch qui font dire de lui à un grand critique new-yorkais : « Il est l'homme le plus extraordinaire que j'aie rencontré ».

Le programme était de choix et l'exécution fut hors pair. Les artistes du « Boston Symphony » commencèrent par la « Symphonie fantastique » de Berlioz, dont ils surent exprimer l'âme tumultueuse et les sublimes aspirations, enlevant l'œuvre avec un brio inégalé.

Puis venait « Bacchus et Ariane », la suite symphonique d'Albert Roussel, tirée du ballet en deux actes du même nom, qui suscita les applaudissements sans fin de l'auditoire.

Mais ce fut la « Quatrième Symphonie » de Brahms qui marqua véritablement l'apogée de ce concert, l'orchestre ayant traduit avec un fondu et une maîtrise uniques la sincérité et la foi dédaigneuse de toute concession du grand compositeur. Comme à Paris, le Boston Symphony Orchestra remporta à Metz le succès le plus éclatant. La salle debout acclamait, à la fin du concert, le chef et son merveilleux orchestre. Depuis la venue en notre cité des orchestres Damrosch, Gabriel Pierné et Paul Paray, jamais nous n'avions vu les Messins, pourtant si calmes d'ordinaire, montrer tant d'exubérance dans la joie et la reconnaissance.

Remercions M. Dubois, inspecteur de l'administration; M. H. Graebert et son comité de l'Association des Concerts du Conservatoire de nous avoir donné l'occasion d'entendre cet ensemble unique au monde.

⁂

Après le concert, les artistes du « Boston Symphony » assistèrent à une réception offerte en leur honneur dans les salons de l'hôtel de la préfecture par M. Dubois, inspecteur de l'administration.

M. Munch et ses musiciens ont quitté Metz ce matin, se rendant à Lyon par train spécial. Ils joueront ensuite à Paris, où la salle est, d'ores et déjà, entièrement louée, puis à Bordeaux et à Londres avant de repartir pour les Etats-Unis à la fin de ce mois.

Les personnalités

Parmi les personnalités qui assistaient au concert, on notait : MM. Robert Schuman, ministre des Affaires étrangères, Dubois, préfet de la Moselle, Mgr Heintz, évêque de Metz, Mgr Louis, vicaire général, le général Zeller, le général Chenet, MM. Driant, Mondon, Goulon, Saffroy, Judd, Evarts, Kiesgen, organisateur de la tournée européenne du « Boston Symphony », le colonel Lynch, commandant des troupes américaines à Metz.

LES A-COTÉS

La plus grande manifestation musicale de l'année

LE concert donné hier soir à l'hôtel des Mines a été sans conteste la plus grande manifestation musicale de l'année et elle s'inscrit à jamais dans les annales de notre cité. Le brillant passé de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston et ses activités sont si connues qu'il est à peine nécessaire d'y revenir. Rappelons cependant que les plus grands chefs d'orchestre se sont succédés à son pupitre. Les plus fameux d'entre eux furent Arthur Nikisch, de 1889 à 1893, Karl Muck, de 1906 à 1908 et de 1912 à 1918, Pierre Monteux de 1919 à 1924 et Serge Koussevitzky de 1924 à 1949, après la mort de ce dernier, Charles Munch.

102 exécutants dont 23 français

LE « Boston Symphony » est l'orchestre étranger qui compte le plus de Français dans ses rangs : Vingt trois en tout sur cent deux exécutants. Le reste est composé d'artistes originaires de tous les points du globe : Russes, Allemands, Italiens, Grecs, Américains, Autrichiens.

Parmi les Français, le violoniste Devargie, est Marseillais, Canhape est de Toulouse. Tous sont installés depuis de longues années aux U.S.A. Le doyen, Georges Laurent, arriva à Boston en 1916, avec André Messager. Quant à Louis Speyer, le cor anglais, il débarqua en Amérique en 1918 comme membre d'une musique militaire qu'on avait pompeusement appelée « Garde Républicaine ».

« Après un concert à Boston, où je jouais en soliste, raconte-t-il, le Boston Symphony me fit des offres. Ce fut toute une histoire. Finalement, le ministère de la Guerre me libéra au titre de la propagande nationale. »

Louis Speyer est l'un des rares musiciens qui peuvent se vanter d'avoir « inventé » Stravinsky en France. Il jouait en 1913 dans l'orchestre qui créa « Le Sacre du Printemps », au théâtre des Champs Elysées, dans un chahut indescriptible.

« Quelle tuerie ! » s'écrie-t-il lyriquement quand il évoque la bataille rangée que se livrèrent ce soir-là les spectateurs.

Une famille de musiciens

LES frères Zighera sont les plus jeunes « Bostoniens ». C'est Koussevitzky qui les fit venir en 1925-26 :

« Je peux l'avouer, aujourd'hui, dit Bernard Zighera : J'ai pratiquement déserté pour aller à Boston. Quand Koussevitzky me convoqua, je faisais mon service militaire. Je devais débuter en octobre à Boston, mais mon temps ne finissait qu'en décembre. Tout s'arrangea, grâce à un sergent complaisant qui fit disparaître toutes mes permissions pour permettre d'obtenir mon congé libérable.

Les deux Zighera qui sont l'un pianiste, l'autre violoncelliste, ont un troisième frère, le célèbre violoniste parisien Léon Zighera, que les Messins ont eu l'occasion d'applaudir aux concerts Soudant, cet hiver.

Pourquoi ils sont venus à Metz

SAIT-ON que c'ets à l'initiative personnelle de M. Dubois, préfet de la Moselle, que Metz doit d'avoir été l'une des étapes du circuit effectué en Europe par le « Boston Symphony » ?

Au cours d'un récent séjour dans la capitale, M. Dubois rencontrait, en effet, son ami de longue date, M. Nabokoff, président du comité directeur de l'orchestre en Europe.

« Vous vous arrêtez à Strasbourg ? fit M. Dubois. Et pourquoi pas à Metz ? »

L'idée fit vite son chemin et c'est ainsi que notre ville est devenue à son tour métropole musicale de l'Est de la France.

Des violons de 7.000 dollars

LES musiciens de l'orchestre de Boston n'ont pas moins de 95 malles transatlantiques qui les suivent dans leur triomphale tournée à travers l'Europe.

Mais leurs bagages les plus précieux sont sans contexte leurs instruments qui, pour la plupart, sont des pièces uniques.

Les violons notamment sont signés des plus grands luthiers, de Stradivarius à Guarnerius Etats-Unis, pour une valeur de et il y fallu les assurer, aux 7.000 dollars chacun.

Symphony at Strasbourg

By Reuters

Strasbourg, France

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, continuing its first European tour, was given a triumphal reception when it played Saturday night in Strasbourg, birthplace of conductor Charles Munch.

The audience applauded an overture by American composer Samuel Barber, Arthur Honegger's Symphony for Strings, the Second Suite from Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.

Since 1793 Europeans have had few kind words for American ventures in the arts, and since 1945 few kind words on any score. Last week, however, they had a great many. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Paris for an arts festival, gave two performances which left listeners dazed with awe. Critics unanimously used the word "extraordinary," and phrases like, "Is there another orchestra which could interpret modern music with such brilliance?" "Performance unparalleled in finesse and dynamism."

[195]

Travel Symphony

Amsterdam Has Old Look but Few Wooden Shoes

By CYRUS DURGIN

but its people suffered intensely under the Nazi occupation. Let a young, blond newspaperman, about 6 feet 5, former infantry officer and now literary editor of the biggest daily, tell it:

"We can't stand the sight or the sound of Germans anymore. When I even hear German spoken, it affects me in the stomach. You have no idea what it means to be abused and humiliated by the German, to have your two cousins shot merely because they were Dutchmen resisting, to see children starve to death before your eyes.

"Before the war there was a Jewish population of 110,000. Today 10,000 are left. The rest, those who didn't die of starvation or escaped being beaten to death in the streets, were taken off to the gas chambers. That is war, I suppose, but those things you can't forget. Today we still have to do business with the Germans. Our economy depends upon it. But we don't like it."

★ ★ ★

This and more pleasant information came over a substantial lunch of bread, cheese, salad and good Dutch beer at the Hotel Polen. Information about the considerable Chinese and Indonesian population of Amsterdam, which grew up in the days of the now vanished East Indies trade. I gather the Dutch don't feel very good about the American and U.N. share in depriving them of their colonial interests, but they don't stress it, except to say, resignedly: "It is all gone, now."

After dark, Amsterdam lights up: the concealed illumination of the greenery in parks and along some canals, the garish display outside the Lido, that well-known eatery and drinkery, and many another spot in this historic capital of the Netherlands. This Bostonian, new to the Dutch, has found them not altogether as the conventional fancy has it. Busy and business-like, they surely are, but not all of them stolid and short of humor. Many are tall and thin, some light, some dark, all with sharp eyes, but most of them amiable, and a good many fond of having fun when the day's work is over. Proof? Just look in at the cafes and the places where there is music for dancing. Good people. Dependable as all get-out.

UN ÉVÉNEMENT SENSATIONNEL

L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON à Lyon

Un événement sensationnel qui marquera dans les annales artistiques lyonnaises, vient de se produire avec le consert donné par le « Boston Symphony Orchestra » au cours de la tournée entreprise actuellement en France par ce fameux orchestre américain.

Sous la baguette de Pierre Monteux, français de naissance, formé au Conservatoire de Paris, qui devint un des chefs les plus célèbres du nouveau monde, où il se fixa, il y a déjà bien des années, un groupe de plus de cent instrumentistes de grand talent s'est voué à l'exécution des chefs-d'œuvre de la musique, avec une discipline et une recherche de perfection exemplaires.

Beau programme comprenant l'ouverture de « Benvenuto Ollini », de Berlioz, une symphonie de Brahms (le clou du concert) une symphonie d'un jeune compositeur américain, William Schuman, encore peu connu en France (œuvre qui ne manque pas d'un certain attrait, malgré son impersonnalité), et des pages de Ravel et Richa d Strauss.

Succès formidable et mérité pour le prodigieux orchestre de Boston, aux sonorités d'une cohésion inégale ; et pour Pierre Monteux, qui, malgré ses 77 ans, reste un animateur aussi zélé qu'il y a un demi-siècle ! Les auditeurs de ce concert ont pu jouir là d'une aubaine inespérée qui, malheureusement, ne se renouvelera pas de si tôt, et pour cause !

MAURICE REUCHSEL.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD

Max Polster, 68, Boston Symphony Orchestra percussionist, reads menu at family reunion in hotel in Berlin West Sector. His brothers, Max and Albert, whom he hadn't seen for 21 years, made two-day trip from Russian zone with families for reunion. L to r., Arndt, Gerda, Oskar, Max, Edeltraut, Gerda, Albert Polster.

LE PROGRÈS

LA MUSIQUE

Le « Boston Symphony Orchestra »

EN sortant d'un concert magnifique, dont le succès fut d'un extraordinaire éclat, il paraîtra paradoxal de noter qu'une partie du public a d'abord éprouvé une déception. Une déception ? Oui ! La plupart des auditeurs sont habitués à l'entraînant spectacle de chefs-vedettes, de ceux que déjà, au début de ce siècle, Maurice Barrès qualifiait « gymnastes en sueur » et dont la pantomime s'est largement développée depuis une trentaine d'années ; ils ont été surpris par l'allure bonhomme de M. Pierre Monteux, par la simplicité de son attitude, par ce fait, devenu étonnant, qu'il se contente de marquer la mesure avec le moins possible de gestes et de gestes réduits.

Tous les grands chefs ou presque, les petits aussi, sont devenus des mimes à la gesticulation outrancière et parfois éloquente. Les uns, les vrais, extériorisent avec excès mais spontanément leur ardente sensibilité ; les autres jouent une comédie muette qu'ils croient expressive. Quelques-uns des meilleurs sont capables de pratiquer deux méthodes différentes, selon qu'ils sont ou non en vue. La malicieuse fille de Siegfried Wagner, la petite-fille du grand Richard, raconte dans son livre intitulé « Héritage de feu » que l'un des grands maîtres allemands de l'orchestre, connu par sa noble mise en scène, se contente, quand il dirige « Tristan » ou « La Tétralogie » à Bayreuth, de battre modestement la mesure... C'est que là l'orchestre est invisible, le chef aussi !

Sans mimique exégétique, M. Pierre Monteux obtient des musiciens à la tête desquels il se trouve tout ce qu'il veut ; le travail est préparé au cours de répétitions minutieuses ; l'équilibre est assuré d'avance ; tout est réglé ; tout ira sans le moindre incident ; inutile de battre l'air avec de grands gestes ou des moulinets d'une évidente vanité (dans les deux sens de ce dernier mot).

La réserve de M. Monteux, convenable et louable, n'est pas aussi heureuse pour toutes les œuvres ; sa calme interprétation, dans une ouverture de Berlioz, ne dissimule guère la platitude de certaines mélodies ; dans une symphonie de Brahms, elle n'allège pas la lente lourdeur de ce maître ; elle sembla parfaite dans l' « Alborada del gracioso » de Maurice Ravel, jouée, comme « Till Eulenspiegel », d'étincelante façon ; elle réalisa exactement le style qu'il fallait établir dans une symphonie de William Schuman.

L'œuvre de ce musicen américain à peine quadragénaire constituait la seule nouveauté du concert de Boston. Elle a obtenu naguère un prix décerné par un cercle de critiques des Etats-Unis. On ne peut être surpris de cette récompense. La troisième symphonie de ce nouveau Schuman est un prodige d'habileté dans la recherche sonore. On ne peut imaginer partition de plus riche contrepoint, d'écriture plus fermement et plus durement classique. Quatre morceaux, groupés deux par deux, portent des titres, Passacaille, Fugue, Choral, Toccata, qui en laissent prévoir la rigueur formelle, mais ne permettent pas de deviner avec quelle audacieuse puissance l'auteur rénovera les vieux moules et y glissera, en une atmosphère polytonale, des rythmes inédits, des mélodies parfois spontanées et toujours larges ; le tout orchestré avec une nouveauté déconcertante, notamment grâce à l'original emploi des cuivres, d'une batterie presque jazzante et des oppositions les plus neuves entre les divers groupes instrumentaux. Eminemment discutable, la troisième symphonie de William Schuman ne peut pas ne pas provoquer, comme on dit en Amérique, une sensation.

Fait curieux : son originalité volontaire, ses outrances bien organisées, son caractère çà et là déchirant n'ont pas déconcerté le public qui, souvent surpris, se retrouvait à certains moments, notamment avec le « Choral », dans un climat harmonique un peu debussyste, donc familier.

Quant à la qualité du « Boston Symphony Orchestra », elle est telle que l'on n'en peut rien dire. La troupe se composant de virtuoses du plus haut rang, entraînés par des répétitions incessantes, l'orchestre que nous avons entendu apparaît comme le premier du monde. Les froids Lyonnais l'ont bien compris ; ils ont assuré aux musiciens et à leur chef le succès le plus bruyant, le plus prolongé qu'on ait connu jusqu'à présent. »

L. V.

Le Syndicat d'initiative, en la personne de M. Gouttenoire, a accueilli hier soir, après le magnifique concert donné à l'Opéra, Pierre Monteux, le prestigieux chef de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, ainsi qu'un grand nombre de musiciens de la célèbre phalange. MM. Lavison, représentant le maire de Lyon ; Trillat, directeur du conservatoire ; le chef d'orchestre Jean Witkowski, Chadburn, vice-consul des Etats-Unis, et Mme. assistaient à cette réception, au cours de laquelle une écharpe de soie de Lyon fut offerte à notre hôte

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra

Que deviendrions-nous, si, dans le prosaïsme inévitable de toute existence, des lueurs flamboyantes ne venaient pas, durant quelques heures, illuminer notre cœur et notre esprit. Hier soir, l'animateur de cette bienfaisante évasion spirituelle, le Boston Symphony Orchestra s'est généreusement appliqué à créer, en nous, un certain état de félicité, qui nous a tous plus ou moins touchés.

Alors que venait de s'achever sur une éblouissante exécution du Till Eulenspiegel *de Richard Strauss, le concert, chacun se demandait quelle avait été la meilleure interprétation, quels étaient les groupes d'instruments les plus remarquables de cet orchestre de 110 musiciens. En fait, les cordes, aussi bien les seconds violons que les premiers, aussi bien les altos que les basses, les bois si fins, les cuivres tantôt puissants, tantôt d'une sonorité comme veloutée, sont tous joués par de véritables virtuoses. Nous nous rappellerons le basson dans l'*Alborada del Gracioso, la légèreté, la sûreté du cor dans l'œuvre de Strauss, l'aisance des trompettes dans le registre suraigu que William Schumann leur impose, au cours de sa Symphonie, où certaines audaces d'écriture dissimulent à peine le manque d'originalité vraie.

Mais il y avait mieux ; d'abord la Troisième Symphonie, *débordante d'un lyrisme souvent émouvant, digne de celui que les Allemands rangent au nombre des trois grands B : Bach, Beethoven, Brahms ; ensuite l'*Alborada del Gracioso, ses subtiles délicatesses, ses frénésies rythmiques.

Mais ici, comme d'ailleurs d'un bout à l'autre de cette magnifique séance, un chef, un très grand chef, a tout imprégné de sa puissante autorité. Pierre Monteux, aux gestes si simples et manifestement si efficaces, s'est depuis toujours imposé comme un technicien d'une souveraine maîtrise, clarifiant les textes les plus complexes. C'est pourquoi nous aurions été si heureux de voir figurer dans le programme, le Sacre du Printemps de Strawinsky. Car tous les musiciens s'accordent pour considérer Pierre Monteux comme l'exégète le plus authentique de cette œuvre révolutionnaire et d'une extrême difficulté.

E. M.

Une belle soirée artistique au profit des vieux du 3e arrondissement

Samedi soir, dans la salle des fêtes de la mairie du 3e arrondissement, il y avait foule pour applaudir les artistes des Ponts et Chaussées, qui s'étaient mis gracieusement à la disposition du Comité central de coordination d'aide aux vieillards pour donner une soirée artistique.

Ce joyeux « Cabaret en mairie », animé et présenté par le fantaisiste Bleg, nous permit d'applaudir MM. A. Pichou, directeur artistique de l'A. S. P. E. C. ; Jack Seymour, Louis Merle, André Nurbert et Mmes Matyté, Dany Daniel et Aimée Roux.

MM. Jules-Julien, ancien ministre Sylvestre, conseiller général ; Combes et Ramassot, adjoints, honoraient cette soirée de leur présence, ainsi, naturellement, que M. Rulière, président du Comité de coordination qui en fut l'organisateur dévoué

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 21 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Ovations in Paris ---39 Years Apart

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

There was a second or two of stunned silence as the music came to an end in a gigantic avalanche of sound. Then, from every quarter of the house came an uproar of noise as people sprang to their feet, clapping, cheering and yelling "Bravo!"

Pierre Monteux, his dark eyes twinkling, his great white walrus mustache twitching, turned around on the conductor's stand of the Champ Elysees theater to face the audience, whose demonstration increased in the infectious excitement of mass communication. The lights in the auditorium blazed up and Monteux stretched out an arm as if beckoning someone to rise.

Neighbors Find Him

The audience quieted a second in the search for the object of the conductor's gesture. For moments no one responded. At last, all but hoisted to his feet by neighbors, a short, slim, spider-like figure with glasses, long thin arms, a curiously stooped carriage, stood up, clasped both hands and waved them at the conductor. The response from the thronged theater was indescribable.

Prodded on by friends, the little man in the audience left his place in the loge of the theater and hurried out a rear door. Minutes passed before he appeared back stage, and the ovation during those minutes never slackened. He turned up backstage at last looking uncertain, bewildered, even shaky. Monteux, meantime, who had left the uproar in the auditorium to find the little man, clasped him with both hands and drew him toward the stage. "No, no," cried the little man, "I can't."

Monteux, however, joined by Charles Munch, who had sat at a peep-hole behind the scene watching the entire event, all but forcibly escorted the little man to the stage entrance. At last, with a shrug of mingled despair and fright, he ran out on to the stage. At the sight of him there the audience, the musicians, the stage hands, everybody, broke into renewed cheers and bravos.

He bowed deeply with a wide-spread gesture of his long thin hands, grasped Monteux, who had followed him on the stage, kissed him on both cheeks, waved to the men of the orchestra and ran off the stage. He never stopped, but dashed out the rear door of the theater and into the street. He was all alone, and he was crying.

Terrific Impact

So it was, on the night of May 8, 1952, in Paris, that Igor Stravinsky, the greatest living composer, once again heard his masterpiece "The Rites of Spring." He heard it conducted by the same man who had conducted the premiere 39 years ago almost to the night. He heard it in certainly the greatest performance it has ever been given and he heard with it one of the most exciting and extraordinary tributes ever given a living composer.

The ovation continued for ten minutes after Stravinsky had darted out of the theater much as he had darted out 39 years ago, only then it was in terror on the heels of the riot his music had caused, but he never reappeared.

It was clear from the morning rehearsal of Stravinsky's masterpiece in the theater that the event would be of terrific impact. The men of the Boston Symphony, keyed up by the overwhelming reception they had received two nights before on the occasion of its European debut on the Opera House under Charles Munch, was in incredible form.

Augmented by eight or ten of the best musicians in Paris, for the Stravinsky work calls for added percussion as well as bass clarinets, horns, flutes, oboes and whatnot, the orchestra occupied every inch of the vast stage of the theater. The rehearsal had been thrown open to students of French conservatories, and even they had gone wild at the conclusion of the work.

For the evening performance the theater had long since been sold out, and as on the previous occasion, it was a smart sophisticated audience in full dress in the lower parts of the house. The first three works on the program were received with enthusiasm for the orchestra though apparently less for the music; the Parisians obviously found the Schuman Symphony contrived and unimportant (as indeed the critics suggested in the papers the next day), the tricks of Milhaud unconvincing, the beauties of Vaughan Williams' variation on a theme by Thomas Tallis too English.

But the Stravinsky was obviously an occasion; every one in Paris knows the story of its disastrous premiere when, within a minute or two of its beginning, the house was thrown into an uproar ending in a riot calling for a corps of gendarmes. The orchestra had so completely demonstrated its capacity in the first three pieces the audience returned to its seats after the interval in anticipation, for, in that swift Parisian grapevine, it knew that Stravinsky himself was somewhere in the audience.

Uses No Score

The performance itself, from the first weird notes of the bassoon at the very top of its range, was no less than ultimate. Monteux, standing like a rock in the middle of it all, stunned the audience by using no score at all. He beat every bar of this fantastically complicated work, that hardly has two consecutive measures in the same rhythm, with an exactitude defying description, cue-ing in each instrument in split second gestures.

It was certainly one of the very greatest feats of orchestral conducting ever achieved and it so liberated the individual musicians themselves from the stress of finding their own way through the intricacies of the music (for after 39 years this still remains the most difficult of all orchestral things to play), they actually astonished themselves.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
MAY 21 1952

(AP Photo)

SYMPHONY MUSICIAN IN FAMILY REUNION — Max Polster, 69-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra percussionist, reads a menu at a family reunion in a hotel in the western sector of Berlin, Germany. His brothers, Oskar and Albert, whom he hadn't seen since he left Germany 21 years ago, made a two-day trip from the Russian zone with their families for the gathering. Left to right: Nephew Arndt Polster; his wife, Gerda; Max's oldest brother, Oskar; Max Polster; his grandniece, Edeltraut; Ida Polster, and her husband, Albert, Max's other brother.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
21 1952

New Players For Symphony

Contracts received Tuesday by the Dallas Symphony Orchestra management practically completed the personnel for 1952-53.

They included that of a new assistant first horn, Leonard Rivenburg, of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Harold Gottlieb was added to the double basses. Third clarinet and bass clarinet player will be Jerome Goldstein.

Lawrence Ihorstenberg, from the Boston Symphony, has been engaged as first oboe.

A question mark is Robert Gotthofer, first trumpet, who may have to be replaced. He was critically ill toward the end of last season and may not rejoin the orchestra. This will mean the loss, too, of the harpist, Catherine Johnk, who is Mrs. Gotthofer.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 21 1952

Boston Symphony In Paris Tonight

Paris—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Paris for a concert tonight.

The 105-piece orchestra, led by Charles Munch, has been received favorably on its first European tour. The orchestra has played in The Hague and Amsterdam, the Netherlands; Frankfurt and Berlin, Germany and Strassbourg, Metz and Lyon, France.

Friday and Saturday the orchestra will play at the annual Bordeaux Music Festival and next Monday it makes its final appearance in a Covent Garden concert in London.

Tonight's concert, which includes Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony Number 4, will be under the auspices of the Anti-Communist Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The French Free Trade Unions will be co-sponsors and workmen will be permitted to purchase seats at prices starting at 43 cents and up.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 21 1952

Boston Symphony In Paris for Concert

Paris—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Paris for a concert tonight.

The 105-piece orchestra, led by Charles Munch, has been received favorably on its first European tour. The orchestra has played in the Hague and Amsterdam, the Netherlands; Frankfurt and Berlin, Germany, and Strasbourg, Metz and Lyon, France.

Friday and Saturday the orchestra will play at the annual Bordeaux music festival and next Monday it makes its final appearance in a Covent Garden concert in London.

Tonight's concert, which includes Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony Number 4, will be under the auspices of the Anti-Communist Congress for Cultural Freedom.

The French free trade unions will be co-sponsors and workmen will be permitted to purchase seats at prices starting at 43 cents and up.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 21 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Men Ride Amsterdam Canals

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

The sight-seeing boats [illegible] with glass roofs, [illegible] alongside the quay in an Amsterdam canal, small American flags flying from [illegible] in front.

On the stone quay above [illegible] in a wild assortment of [illegible] sports jackets, sun glasses and [illegible] men of the Boston Symphony [illegible] sprinkling of wives and entourage [illegible] of cameras dangling from [illegible]. The sun was bright, the [illegible] scene of Amsterdam itself [illegible] buildings, its colorful facades, its canals swarming with barges loaded down with everything from flowers to coal, was new and exciting. And the occasion, a ramble around Amsterdam in sight-seeing boats as guests of the mayor of Amsterdam, was enough to encourage so gay a holiday mood that even the sober Dutchmen of the town stood around to watch the embarkation.

Presently a young man of about [illegible] peared and began herding the musicians into the boats. He was [illegible] dark for a Dutchman, [illegible] means all blonds but not quite as [illegible] he, and he was rather [illegible] foot-three-inch. Dutchmen seem [illegible] dime a dozen. In [illegible] Spaniard, with dazzling black eyes [illegible] of thick black hair and such [illegible] gave the impression he had twice as [illegible] as everybody else.

Once he got all his charges loaded into the leading boat, a task complicated by the fact that for every two he got in one got out to take a picture of something they'd just spotted, he gave a signal to a blond Dutchman in a nautical outfit, leaning comfortably against a post overlooking the scene. He spoke in Dutch, but he neatly conveyed the idea "come on, let's get out of here before these guys scatter again." The captain—for it was he—came aboard, some boys on the quay cast off, and the sight-seeing barge, a brand new boat in immaculate shape, moved off up the canal.

The guide began his spiel. "What language shall I speak," he asked in [illegible] English through the sound system. "English, German, French, Spanish or Dutch?" The tourists [illegible] "English."

You'll be sorry, chirped the guide who explained he was a student at Amsterdam University who worked as a guide on the canal boats during its summer. That he spoke so many languages proved to be nothing unusual at all, [illegible] are his specialty. For it is rare for the English-speaking tourist to encounter anyone in Amsterdam who does not speak English. The language is [illegible] from the beginning to the [illegible] scenes and even their less well concealed [illegible] usually speak enough English to get [illegible]

The guide started off with statistics as the captain maneuvered his 60-foot boat through the canals with [illegible] skill. "It's only [illegible] since the city confided as the [illegible] turned at right angle into a canal [illegible] wider than the boat and [illegible] six inches of [illegible] to the

Rivals Venice

To get the picture of Amsterdam [illegible] out, he said [illegible] a half moon. The straight [illegible] the principal [illegible] way of the city [illegible] canal in a [illegible] circles around the [illegible] important [illegible] ing at the [illegible] are intersected [illegible] spokes across [illegible] more than 70 [illegible] network.

Although [illegible] Holland, which [illegible] and much [illegible] this city [illegible] anything but [illegible] handsome [illegible] bicycles [illegible] and cars and [illegible] canals swarm [illegible] wedding parties [illegible] cruisers, to give [illegible] stamp as Venice [illegible]

It was a surprise [illegible] Hans Brinker [illegible] tion does not [illegible] said the canals [illegible] short period [illegible] the Dutchmen [illegible] either, for all the [illegible] said the guide [illegible]

By this time the musical tourists, who had shot pictures of everything, been dowsed by spray as the two sight-seeing boats raced each other down the main canal, and had been dragged in from the deck by the harassed guide just in time to miss having their heads banged on one of the city's 400-odd low bridges, arrived at the city hall for a reception with the mayor and city council of Amsterdam.

The men of the orchestra stood around in the vast, imposing chamber and took pictures of the assistant burgomaster and his uniformed attendant as the sun streamed through the mullioned windows and talked about the official's speech. They couldn't get over it; here, they said in awe, was a politician who had heard of Beethoven. They were obviously more impressed by this than by the curious beauty of Amsterdam itself.

It didn't look to me as if dropping into an Amsterdam canal would be much fun in any case. The water, which is brackish, is a dirty green with things floating in it although the canals are not used for sewerage. By means of a series of locks, they are flushed out every night, but it still leaves a lot to be desired in the way of pure sparkling water, as it were.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 22 1952

estra Hailed
on Symphony Applauded
Return Paris Concert

[illegible]—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under [illegible] Munch made a triumphant [illegible] to Paris last night before a [illegible]ng crowd at the Theatre des [illegible]ps Elysees.

[illegible] enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch [illegible]0 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
MAY 22 1952

[illegible]cert for 43 Cents

[illegible]RIS, May 22—(UP)—The [illegible]on Symphony Orchestra ar[illegible] in Paris for a concert to[illegible]. The French Free Trade [illegible]ns will be co-sponsors and [illegible]rkmen will be permitted to [illegible]hase seats at prices starting [illegible] cents and up.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAY 22 1952

n Symphony Triumph

[illegible] May 21 (AP) — The Boston [illegible]y Orchestra under Conductor [illegible]unch made a triumphant [illegible]to Paris tonight before a [illegible] crowd at the Theatre des [illegible] Elysees. It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and [illegible]s Symphony No. 4. The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAY 22 1952

Again Welcomes
on Symphony

[illegible] May 21, (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under [illegible]or Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre Des Camps Elysees. It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

[illegible] enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

[illegible] concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The [illegible]o were in the Masterpieces of Twentieth Century [illegible].

[illegible]r giving them, the 110-piece orchestra toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in [illegible]'s native city of Strasbourg.

[illegible]ORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY 22 1952

[illegible]is Acclaims
o Symphony

[illegible]RIS, Thursday (AP) — The [illegible] Symphony orchestra under [illegible]or Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des [illegible]s Elysees.

[illegible]ayed the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms [illegible]ony No. 4.

[illegible] enthusiastic audience, [illegible]g and applauding, called [illegible] back 20 times during the [illegible].

[illegible] concert was third the orchestra has given in Paris. The [illegible]wo were in the "Masters [illegible] of Twentieth Century [illegible].

[illegible]r giving them, the 110-piece orchestra toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in [illegible]'s native city of Strasbourg.

TIGHT BINDING

Herald – May 21

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

ohony Men Ride terdam Canals

Elie is in Europe on tour with ton Symphony Orchestra.)

ight-seeing boats long, low affairs lass roofs, lay alongside the an Amsterdam canal, small Amer s flying from their m'zz'nm'sts up

e stone quay above, milling around assortment of berets, sports jacks glasses and slacks, stood the 10 the Boston Symphony with g of wives, all entangled in masses as dangling from their shoulders was bright, the air bracing, the Amsterdam itself with its strange , its colorful facades, its canals g with barges loaded down with g from flowers to coal, was new ting. And the occasion, a trip Amsterdam in sight-seeing boats of the mayor of Amsterdam, was encourage so gay a holiday mood the sober Dutchmen of the town und to watch the embarkation. ly a young man of about 22 ap- d began herding the musical tour- the boats. He was exceptionally a Dutchman, for they are by no blonds but not quite as dark as e was rather shorter, too, for six- -inch Dutchmen seem to be a ozen. In fact, he looked like a with dazzling black eyes, a shock lack hair and such white teeth he impression he had twice as many ody else.

e got all his charges loaded into ng boat, a task complicated by that for every two he got in one to take a picture of something t spotted, he gave a signal to a tchman in a nautical outfit, omfortably against a post over- he scene. He spoke in Dutch, atly conveyed the idea "come on, out of here before these guys gain!" The captain—for it was aboard, some boys on the quay and the sight-seeing barge, a w boat in immaculate shape, f up the canal.

de began his spiel. "What lan- l I speak," he asked in excellent rough the sound system. "Eng- an, French, Spanish or Dutch?" ts roared, "English!"

e sorry, chirped the guide, who he was a student at Amsterdam who worked as a guide in the s during the summer. That he many languages proved to be usual at all, though language ecialty. For it is rare for the eaking tourist to encounter any- nsterdam who does not speak he language is taught most from ing in the public schools, and less well educated Dutchmen ak enough English to get by on. e started off with statistics as n maneuvered his 60-foot boat e canals with truly incredible only routine stuff," the guide the captain turned at right a canal not more than two feet the boat and didn't come within of hitting the piles.)

enice

he picture of Amsterdam's lay- d, you had to visualize a half- straight edge, then would be l canal, the main water high- city. Leading out of this main series of concentric circles half-moon, were about a dozen anals, each beginning and end- main canal. All of these canals eted by others radiating like ss them, to make a total of 70 canals forming a complete everyone associates canals with hich is as flat as a pool table reener, it is not until you visit u realize that the canals are t a romantic antiquity. The reets swarm with phalanxes of ys and girls ride arm in arm) d trucks, to be sure, but the m equally with barges, boats, rtles bedecked in flowers, and give this fine city as unique a nice itself.

urprise to me to learn that the r and the Silver Skates situa- t exist very much the guide als freeze up only for a fairly and sometimes not at all. And en are no great swimmers, l the water. "They swim, sir," ie, "if they drop in."

ook to me as if dropping into am canal would be much fun

The water, which is brack- y green with things floating h the canals are not used for y means of a series of locks, shed out every night, but it lot to be desired in the way tling water, as it were.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Orchestra Hailed

Boston Symphony Applauded In Return Paris Concert

Paris — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
MAY 22 1952

Concert for 43 Cents

PARIS, May — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, where the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

The orchestra is leaving for Bordeaux to play concerts May 23 and May 24 and then will go to London where it is scheduled to give a concert in the festival music hall May 26.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston from 1919 to 1924 and recently retired as conductor of San Francisco Symphony is associate conductor on this trip.

The orchestra's tour—first time it has crossed the Atlantic since it was founded 71 years ago—has been an enormous success. It has played to packed houses all along the route.

Tonight's concert attracted a capacity house of French music lovers anxious to hear it play a classical program. Its two previous performances were of works by twentieth century composers.

The orchestra demonstrated its superb quality in both compositions.

The Symphonie Fantastique was written in 1830 for an English actress, Henriette Smithson, whom Berlioz was wooing without success. Miss Smithson was cold at the first playing in 1831, but a year later, at its second, she gave in. He married her.

[19

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

ton Symphony Triumph

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

ris Again Welcomes ton Symphony

PARIS, May 21, (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

ris Acclaims ub Symphony

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 22 1952

20 Curtain Calls for Charles Munch As Symphony Plays Again in Paris

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theater des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

The orchestra is leaving for Bordeaux to play concerts May 23 and May 24 and then will go to London where it is scheduled to give a concert in the festival music hall May 26.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston from 1919 to 1924 and recently retired as conductor of San nFrancisco Symphony is associate conductor on this trip.

The orchestra's tour—first time is has crossed the Atlantic since it was founded 71 years ago—has been an enormous success. It has played to packed houses all along the route.

Tonight's concert attracted a capacity house of French music lovers anxious t ohear it play a classical program. Its two previous performances were of works by twentieth century composers.

The orchestra demonstrated its superb quality in both compositions.

The Symphonie Fantastique was written in 1830 for an English actress, Henriette Smithson, whom Berlioz was wooing without success. Miss Smithson was cold at the first playing in 1831, but a year later, at its second, she gave in. He married her.

[19

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 22 1952

"BRAVO!"—Conductor Pierre Monteux bows after members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first such performance of its kind, end concert in theater of SS Ile de France for Seamen's Fund. Symphony is on tour in Europe.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
MAY 22 1952

A Work Of Permanence

By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

THE Boston Orchestra played in Paris on May 6 under Charles Munch and again on May 8 under Pierre Monteux. My wife and I were fortunate enough to receive copies of some of the comments that were occasioned by the two concerts. The gist of them all seemed to be the incomparable wonders of the Boston Orchestra.

For conductors and orchestra we discovered nothing less than full blown praise. And, although in the matter of the comparable qualities of orchestras, we are not consumed by any unchanging nationalistic pride, it was pleasant to note that some Frenchmen regarded this as the finest orchestra that had played in France for many years, perhaps even the most finished ensemble that was ever heard in that country.

* * *

FOR a good number of years both of us have been for several reasons close to the Boston Orchestra. And as we were discussing these manifestations at some length I remarked upon that strange pattern of history that seems to dictate that the gods of yesterday are today and tomorrow in the general opinion only very hazy recollections. After all, we could remember quite vividly when these incomparable wonders were much more incomparable that they have appeared to be in the last two seasons. Twenty years ago, 10, five, then the precision, the suavity, and the finish of the Boston Orchestra were qualities not consistently approached by other orchestras. So it seemed passingly strange, but true to the pattern of history nonetheless, that the French reviewers should have forgotten that Koussevitzky, Russian by birth but French by inclination, had conducted a more incomparable Boston Orchestra for all of 25 years.

Koussevitzky died last June 4. And it is normal that many of us should have forgotten him by now. Music did not die with him. Neither did the Boston Orchestra, however much he had seemed on occasion to be an indispensible part of it.

But from the point of view of the cultivation and nurturing of music Koussevitzky's death was not like that of many another musician. The plans on which he labored with such intensity and affection are still alive, active, vigorous, and still marked with a kind of indelible intelligence.

In summer when we were married we visited Koussevitzky at Lenox for several days. The Berkshire Festival was under way and under his expert and justifiably prejudiced guidance we saw it work. Rehearsals, classes, concerts, we saw them all from bottom to top. And from him we heard again and again his unflagging belief that music must not be for a few. It must exist within the reach of all people so that they can become an audience that is constantly growing, constantly gaining stature in musical intelligence and understanding.

* * *

LAST week the Koussevitzky Music Foundations issued a modest little pamphlet. Since 1942, when the first Foundation was established, there has been nothing modest about its accomplishments.

From 1942 to 1946 the Berkshire Festival was temporarily shelved because of the war. But the Berkshire Music Center, which is the school of which the Festival is a part, was active throughout the war years. And it was in 1942 that the Koussevitzky Music Foundation took over the Music Center in its entirety. Perhaps we might better say that the marriage of the two was legally consummated in that year, since the relationship of Koussevitzky's ideas and the Music Center had always been extremely close.

The broad purpose of the Foundation, as the pamphlet suggests, is "the encouragement of the growth of musical culture, and in the fulfillment of that purpose it regularly commissions new works and aids in the development of musical talent through widely varied activities." In January, 1950, the Music Foundation established a permanent endowment in the Library of Congress "with the more specific purpose of assisting in the development of creative music talent."

The widely varied activities of the Foundations are well enough known by now. What is not so well known is the number and the quality of the works which the Foundations have commissioned.

* * *

SINCE 1942, under direct commission from these Foundations there have been produced 21 orchestral works, three operas, 11 pieces in the medium of chamber music. And, as of this writing, there are 13 more in progress representing a variety of musical forms. If I name only some of the composers, for example, Barber, Britten, Martinu, Bartok, Stravinsky, Copland, Milhaud, Hansen, Villa-Lobos, Blitzstein, Piston, Harris, Malipiere, Schoenberg, Honegger, and Sessions one is impressed that this was a plan which was conceived on a permanent basis. Many of the works have been heard. And in the large measure they are durable. They are a lasting addition to the perpetual musical treasury.

And from those whose names I have not mentioned, one expects—and in many cases, has received—as much.

There was always a great lot of debate—I still hear it now and again among musicians—about Koussevitzky's conducting, his program making, his considerations of the works of various composers. But about the catholicity of his musical tastes there was never debate of any kind. There was no grounds for it. It was indicative of that kind of taste that it was he who gave the first all-Debussy program and not, in Paris but in Moscow. He, too, it was who gave the first concert in Paris of works by American composers. And when he came to this country his espousal of new works by composers of all nationalities was endless but highly perceptive nonetheless.

In many ways he was an autocrat. But there was nothing autocratic in his ideas about who should hear music. And never once, in the time I knew, did he falter in his determination that, since each generation and each era of civilization should be enabled to express itself musically, composers must be given opportunity to produce in the musical climate of their times.

It is quite a piece of work that he began. It will endure. And, at bottom, it will endure because he believed in music. He foresaw the end of his conducting, perhaps indeed, the end of himself. And he never lost his awareness of the fact that long after his demise, long after the earthly disintegration of every other performing artist of his time, there would still be music. And that was the thing to be nurtured and developed.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 22 1952

Orchestra Hailed

Boston Symphony Applauded In Return Paris Concert

Paris — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 22 1952

Symphony Again Delights Parisians

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" Festival.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAY 22 1952

Triumphant Return

Paris, May 21—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonic Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 22 1952

NEW TRIUMPH FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under conductor Charles Munch, made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

TIGHT BINDING

Herald - May 22

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

ohony Men Ride terdam Canals

Elie is in Europe on tour with ton Symphony Orchestra.)

ight-seeing boats long, low affair lass roofs, lay alongside the an Amsterdam canal, small Amer s flying from their m'zz'nm'sts u

e stone quay above, milling around assortment of berets, sports jack glasses and slacks, stood the 10 the Boston Symphony with g of wives, all entangled in masse as dangling from their shoulders was bright, the air bracing, th Amsterdam itself with its strang its colorful facades, its canal with barges loaded down with from flowers to coal, was new ting. And the occasion, a trip Amsterdam in sight-seeing boat of the mayor of Amsterdam, wa encourage so gay a holiday mood the sober Dutchmen of the town and to watch the embarkation. ly a young man of about 22 ap d began herding the musical tour the boats. He was exceptionally a Dutchman, for they are by no blonds but not quite as dark a was rather shorter, too, for six -inch Dutchmen seem to be ozen. In fact, he looked like with dazzling black eyes, a shock lack hair and such white teeth h impression he had twice as many ody else.

e got all his charges loaded into ng boat, a task complicated by that for every two he got in one to take a picture of something t spotted, he gave a signal to a tchman in a nautical outfit, omfortably against a post over- he scene. He spoke in Dutch, atly conveyed the idea "come on, out of here before these guys gain!" The captain—for it was aboard, some boys on the quay and the sight-seeing barge, a w boat in immaculate shape, f up the canal.

de began his spiel. "What lan I speak," he asked in excellent rough the sound system. "Eng an, French, Spanish or Dutch?" ts roared. "English!"

e sorry, chirped the guide, who he was a student at Amsterdam who worked as a guide in the s during the summer. That he many languages proved to be usual at all, though languages ecialty. For it is rare for the aking tourist to encounter any- sterdam who does not speak he language is taught most from ing in the public schools, and less well educated Dutchmen ak enough English to get by on. e started off with statistics as n maneuvered his 60-foot boat e canals with truly incredib only routine stuff," the guide the captain turned at right a canal not more than two feet the boat and didn't come within of hitting the piles.)

enice

he picture of Amsterdam's lay- d, you had to visualize a half- straight edge, then, would be l canal, the main water high- city. Leading out of this main series of concentric circles half-moon, were about a dozen anals, each beginning and end- main canal. All of these canals ted by others radiating like ss them, to make a total of 70 canals forming a complete everyone associates canals with nich is as flat as a pool table reener; it is not until you visit u realize that the canals are t a romantic antiquity. The reets swarm with phalanxes of ys and girls ride arm in arm) d trucks, to be sure, but the m equally with barges, boats, ties bedecked in flowers, and give this fine city as unique a nice itself.

urprise to me to learn that the r and the Silver Skates situa- t exist very much; the guide als freeze up only for a fairly and sometimes not at all. And en are no great swimmers, the water. "They swim, sir," e, "if they drop in."

ook to me as if dropping into m canal would be much fun

The water, which is brack- y green with things floating h the canals are not used for y means of a series of locks, shed out every night, but it lot to be desired in the way kling water, as it were.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Orchestra Hailed

Boston Symphony Applauded In Return Paris Concert

Paris—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
MAY 22 1952

Concert for 43 Cents

PARIS, May 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Paris for a concert tonight. The French Free Trade Unions will sponsor the event and workers will be permitted to purchase seats at prices starting at 43 cents and up.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

ton Symphony Triumph

Paris, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees. It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4. The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

ris Again Welcomes ton Symphony

Paris, May 21, (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

ris Acclaims ub Symphony

Paris, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 22 1952

"BRAVO!"—Conductor Pierre Monteux bows after members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in first such performance of its kind, end concert in theater of SS Ile de France for Seamen's Fund. Symphony is on tour in Europe.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
MAY 22 1952

A Work Of Permanence

By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

THE Boston Orchestra played in Paris on May 6 under Charles Munch and again on May 8 under Pierre Monteux. My wife and I were fortunate enough to receive copies of some of the comments that were occasioned by the two concerts. The gist of them all seemed to be the incomparable wonders of the Boston Orchestra.

For conductors and orchestra we discovered nothing less than full blown praise. And, although in the matter of the comparable qualities of orchestras, we are not consumed by any unchanging nationalistic pride, it was pleasant to note that some Frenchmen regarded this as the finest orchestra that had played in France for many years, perhaps even the most finished ensemble that was ever heard in that country.

* * *

FOR a good number of years both of us have been for several reasons close to the Boston Orchestra. And as we were discussing these manifestations at some length I remarked upon that strange pattern of history that seems to dictate that the gods of yesterday are today and tomorrow in the general opinion only very hazy recollections. After all, we could remember quite vividly when these incomparable wonders were much more incomparable that they have appeared to be in the last two seasons. Twenty years ago, 10, five, then the precision, the suavity, and the finish of the Boston Orchestra were qualities not consistently approached by other orchestras. So it seemed passingly strange, but true to the pattern of history nonetheless, that the French reviewers should have forgotten that Koussevitzky, Russian by birth but French by inclination, had conducted a more incomparable Boston Orchestra for all of 25 years.

Koussevitzky died last June 4. And it is normal that many of us should have forgotten him by now. Music did not die with him. Neither did the Boston Orchestra, however much he had seemed on occasion to be an indispensible part of it.

But from the point of view of the cultivation and nurturing of music Koussevitzky's death was not like that of many another musician. The plans on which he labored with such intensity and affection are still alive, active, vigorous, and still marked with a kind of indelible intelligence.

In summer when we were married we visited Koussevitzky at Lenox for several days. The Berkshire Festival was under way and under his expert and justifiably prejudiced guidance we saw it work. Rehearsals, classes, concerts, we saw them all from bottom to top. And from him we heard again and again his unflagging belief that music must not be for a few. It must exist within the reach of all people so that they can become an audience that is constantly growing, constantly gaining stature in musical intelligence and understanding.

* * *

LAST week the Koussevitzky Music Foundations issued a modest little pamphlet. Since 1942, when the first Foundation was established, there has been nothing modest about its accomplishments.

From 1942 to 1946 the Berkshire Festival was temporarily shelved because of the war. But the Berkshire Music Center, which is the school of which the Festival is a part, was active throughout the war years. And it was in 1942 that the Koussevitzky Music Foundation took over the Music Center in its entirety. Perhaps we might better say that the marriage of the two was legally consummated in that year, since the relationship of Koussevitzky's ideas and the Music Center had always been extremely close.

The broad purpose of the Foundation, as the pamphlet suggests, is "the encouragement of the growth of musical culture, and in the fulfillment of that purpose it regularly commissions new works and aids in the development of musical talent through widely varied activities." In January, 1950, the Music Foundation established a permanent endowment in the Library of Congress "with the more specific purpose of assisting in the development of creative music talent."

The widely varied activities of the Foundations are well enough known by now. What is not so well known is the number and the quality of the works which the Foundations have commissioned.

* * *

SINCE 1942, under direct commission from these Foundations there have been produced 21 orchestral works, three operas, 11 pieces in the medium of chamber music. And, as of this writing, there are 13 more in progress representing a variety of musical forms. If I name only some of the composers, for example, Barber, Britten, Martinu, Bartok, Stravinsky, Copland, Milhaud, Hansen, Villa-Lobos, Blitzstein, Piston, Harris, Malipiere, Schoenberg, Honegger, and Sessions one is impressed that this was a plan which was conceived on a permanent basis. Many of the works have been heard. And in the large measure they are durable. They are a lasting addition to the perpetual musical treasury.

And from those whose names I have not mentioned, one expects—and in many cases, has received—as much.

There was always a great lot of debate—I still hear it now and again among musicians—about Koussevitzky's conducting, his program making, his considerations of the works of various composers. But about the catholicity of his musical tastes there was never debate of any kind. There was no grounds for it. It was indicative of that kind of taste that it was he who gave the first all-Debussy program and not in Paris but in Moscow. He, too, it was who gave the first concert in Paris of works by American composers. And when he came to this country his espousal of new works by composers of all nationalities was endless but highly perceptive nonetheless.

In many ways he was an autocrat. But there was nothing autocratic in his ideas about who should hear music. And never once, in the time I knew, did he falter in his determination that, since each generation and each era of civilization should be enabled to express itself musically, composers must be given opportunity to produce in the musical climate of their times.

It is quite a piece of work that he began. It will endure. And, at bottom, it will endure because he believed in music. He foresaw the end of his conducting, perhaps indeed, the end of himself. And he never lost his awareness of the fact that long after his demise, long after the earthly disintegration of every other performing artist of his time, there would still be music. And that was the thing to be nurtured and developed.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 22 1952

20 Curtain Calls for Charles Munch As Symphony Plays Again in Paris

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theater des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonic Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" festival.

The 110-piece orchestra then toured European capitals, playing in Belgium, Holland, West Germany and in Munch's native city of Strasbourg.

The orchestra is leaving for Bordeaux to play concerts May 23 and May 24 and then will go to London where it is scheduled to give a concert in the festival music hall May 26.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston from 1919 to 1924 and recently retired as conductor of Sa nFrancisco Symphony is associate conductor on this trip.

The orchestra's tour—first time is has crossed the Atlantic since it was founded 71 years ago—has been an enormous success. It has played to packed houses all along the route.

Tonight's concert attracted a capacity house of French music lovers anxious t ohear it play a classical program. Its two previous performances were of works by twentieth century composers.

The orchestra demonstrated its superb quality in both compositions.

The Symphonic Fantastique was written in 1830 for an English actress, Henriette Smithson, whom Berlioz was wooing without success. Miss Smithson was cold at the first playing in 1831, but a year later, at its second, she gave in. He married her.

[198]

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 22 1952

Orchestra Hailed

Boston Symphony Applauded In Return Paris Concert

Paris—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris last night before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 22 1952

Symphony Again Delights Parisians

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

The concert was the third the orchestra has given in Paris. The first two were in the "Masterpieces of Twentieth Century" Festival.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAY 22 1952

Triumphant Return

Paris, May 21—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Charles Munch made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 22 1952

NEW TRIUMPH FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

PARIS, May 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under conductor Charles Munch, made a triumphant return to Paris tonight before a cheering crowd at the Theatre Des Champs Elysees.

It played the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

The enthusiastic audience, shouting and applauding, called Munch back 20 times during the evening.

Symphony Rides Across Europe On a Fast Wave of Anecdotes

(Continued from First Page)

trains were as pleasant in this regard. Indeed, when it comes to comfort, speed, smooth rails and all the rest, European trains are in every way the equal of American trains and often far better. The only thing they don't have that causes concern, to me at least, is drinking water; the next time I come to Europe my first piece of equipment will be a canteen.

The cars, as you doubtless know by now, consist of about ten compartments with sliding glass doors giving out on a two-foot wide corridor running the whole length of the car on one side. It is pleasant enough to stand in this corridor and hang out the window with one foot on a sort of bar near the floor for it not only gives the scenery a fine sense of intimacy, but it invariably leads to a conversation with the others leaning out of the window, too.

Marked Contrast

Weary of that, it is delightful to sit down in your compartment, which is about five feet one way, six or eight feet the other. Two sofa-like chairs face each other with arm rests between the places. In first class compartments there are places for six people; in second class for eight. This is about the only real difference between the two classes, though first class upholstery is likely to be a little better or, if it's an old car, a little fresher.

Even though you are a perfect stranger to all the others in the compartment, conversation is not only quite proper but inevitable; you never hesitate to speak to anyone, ever the best-looking women (I practically never draw them, however). This is in marked contrast to American trains where one might go from Boston to Denver and never speak to anyone. Naturally, you can draw a bore anywhere, but in European trains at least you can go hang out the window if you do.

Be that as it may, it is in these compartments the anecdote department of this wonderful expedition is now in high gear. "Did you hear what happened to Harry Dubbs the other night?" one of the men said the other morning. Nobody had heard what had happened to Harry Dubbs, one of the first violinists of the orchestra.

"Well," said the raconteur, lighting up a cigarette to develop the suspense, "it seems Harry and his wife went out on a late party in Amsterdam. They got in about four in the morning and went to bed. But Harry couldn't find the switch turning off the lights. He pushed this one and that on and finally he yanked a cord hanging down over the head of the bed. That didn't work, either, so he unscrewed the bulb.

"About ten minutes later just as they were falling asleep there was a rapping on the door, and in came a waiter pushing a wagon covered with a white cloth. 'Your breakfast, sir,' the waiter said." There was a mild laugh.

"I don't get it," said somebody in the compartment.

"You don't get it? cried the raconteur in dismay, "why the cord over the bed called the waiter, see?

Tired of French

Everybody roared. "Well did you hear what happened to Clarence Knudson," began another, referring to the first second violinist of the orchestra. Nobody had.

"Well, he went out to dinner in Paris with a bunch of the boys who speak French," the story teller said, "and by the time they were ready for dessert he was tired of all the French. So he said 'you should hear me speak French.' 'Go ahead,' they said, 'you order the dessert.'

"So Clarence called the waiter over and he said, 'Garcon, voulez-vous bring us our deees-crrr.'

"'Deees-errrr?" cried the waiter, his mouth falling open, 'no, no, monsieur, not deees-errrr!'

"'Deees-errr,' repeated Clarence firmly," the story teller continued, "and the waiter went off shaking his head. And what do you think he brought back?"

Nobody could guess. He brought back TEN EGGS!" the story-teller bellowed triumphantly.

There was a laugh, then silence. "But why?" inquired one of the company.

"Why?" cried the story teller, "Dees-errr sounds like dix oeufs in French, and dix oeufs means ten eggs."

A brief silence. "Say," said someone, "did you hear the story of Charles Munch and the King of Belgium?"

A brief silence. "Say," said someone, "did you hear the story of Charles Munch and the King of Belgium?"

Everybody sat up electrified this was obviously a scoop. "Well," began the raconteur pleased at this special attention, "it seems that during the transmission of the concert in Brussels King Bowdoin or whatever his name is, sent one of his flunkies backstage to command Mr. Munch and one representative of the orchestra to come to his royal box. Mr. Munch said he would ed to take two alone. Burgin of the orches George Judd, the manage orchestra.

"I'm afraid that will not be sible," said the flunkie, His Majesty specified but two."

Mr. Munch jumped up all cited. "You tell His Majesty," he said, "that Boston is a very big city. It has Cambridge, and Harvard, and M. I. T. and Stop and Shop, too, and it should be represented by three people." So the three went up to see the King. How could he refuse the Stop and Shop?"

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Toast for Danny Kuntz

By CYRUS DURGIN

FRANKFURT — I hope that Danny Kuntz reads the Globe, for this piece just possibly may be the first word to him of a present he eventually will receive. That present is a handsome greeting to him from Oberstaufenbach, the southwestern Rhenish town where he was born 92 years ago. Large and thin, the greeting is bound in parchment and contains a picture of Danny as a young man, his violin upon his knees; a photograph of Oberstaufenbach, and an illuminated message to him from the people of the town, signed by the burgomeister and other public men.

Danny Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony back in 1881, when Major Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra. His service was long and illustrious, until he decided the time had come for him to retire as an active player.

But thereafter he still made his wide musicianship available to the orchestra, and for some time now he has assisted librarian Leslie Rogers in the preparation and correction of instrumental parts for performance. At 92, Danny Kuntz lives in Boston and from time to time may be seen around Symphony Hall.

The actual presentation had to be made by proxy, and it occurred in the lobby of the Grosses Haus at a party given for members of the orchestra by High Commissioner and Mrs. John J. McCloy, after the first concert played in Frankfurt.

The burgomeister got up on a hassock and made his speech in German, which was duly translated. As proxy for Mr. Kuntz, manager George E. Judd took his turn upon the hassock and said thank you in his usual brief, gracious and to-the-point style. Having a glass of good Mosel in hand, I drank my own silent toast to Danny Kuntz.

This party was the wind-up of an enthusiastic evening which marked yet another point in the triumphal progress of the Boston Symphony. The concert was given in the resonant auditorium of the Grosses Haus (Big House), which is the main theatre now in Frankfurt.

While the napalm bombs so thoroughly fused the steel girders of the Frankfurt Opera House so that it cannot be reconstructed, the Schauspielhaus was more fortunate.

Architect Adolph Linnebach worked out repairs that made a modern interior and a partly modern outside. So while the structure is an odd blend of old and new, exteriorly, the hall and its spacious lobbies are of a consistent style and most attractive. The stage has two revolving sections, one inside the other. It took $2,000,000 and 18 months of work before the theatre, renamed Grosses Haus, opened last Christmas Day.

A capacity audience, which here means 1450 people, said to be about 80 percent German (but my guess is about 50 percent) heard the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux with great enthusiasm. They even took noticeably well to William Schuman's Third Symphony, a work which, at first thought, might not appeal to what evidently is a conservative public. They applauded and cheered and obviously had a fine time.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The Boston Symphony under Charles Munch has given a triumphal performance at the Opera. In the theatre, President Auriol, the diplomatic corps, all the boulevard stars and the enthusiasts of novelties. The Boston Symphony, besides its French conductor, includes twenty-three French executants; so the enthusiasm of the evening was nourished from more than one source. In fact, it was an apotheosis in which all present took part with satisfaction.

LE MAI MUSICAL DE BORDEAUX

Double et éclatant succés de Pierre Monteux et de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston

L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON est un peu l'orchestre national américain; son train de vie fastueux, son recrutement universel, le nombre considérable de ses auditeurs familiers auraient cependant été insuffisants à lui donner le prestige d'une renommée mondiale, s'il ne s'était aussi imposé par d'éclatantes réussites, tant dans l'interprétation du répertoire traditionnel que dans la recherche et la promotion d'œuvres nouvelles.

Le programme que cet hôte de marque du Festival de Bordeaux présentait pour le premier de deux concerts successifs, relevait de cette double ligne de conduite puisque aussi bien, il comprenait la symphonie « Jupiter », de Mozart, et en seconde partie, la « Troisième symphonie », de Schumann... (William), ainsi que la suite symphonique de « Mathis-le-peintre », d'Hindenith.

Cette seconde partie s'identifiait manifestement mieux au génie propre de cette phalange dynamique, d'un équilibre parfait et qui est un peu un orchestre-virtuose.

La symphonie de W. Schumann est, en effet, un morceau de virtuosité pour orchestre, un brillant exercice de musique délibérément scientifique, expérimentale, systématique; où chaque groupe de l'orchestre affronte, à son tour, des effets rythmiques ou des combinaisons de timbres agencées avec une froideur implacable.

Les thèmes sont vraiment soumis à rude épreuve dans ces variations impitoyables, ces accélérations soudaines, ces alanguissements, ces gargouillis et ces percussions.

Cette apothéose du fracas, car tout cela est construit avec une infaillible précision, a permis du moins à l'admirable mécanique que constitue l'orchestre de Boston de montrer combien le fonctionnement de ses rouages est souple et bien réglé.

A l'issue de cette tonnante symphonie, la triptyque de « Mathis-le-peintre », qui n'est cependant pas précisément de la musique enfantine, procurait une bienfaisante sensation d'aération, de pause.

Ici encore, l'orchestre de Boston a reproduit avec une incomparable virtuosité le dur langage de cette suite sévère, mais riche d'une expérience et émouvante beauté.

Avant d'en venir aux symphonies... déconcertantes, il convient de dire que de la symphonie « Jupiter » de Mozart, une interprétation n'est pas apparue qui ait exploité à fond leurs qualités. Peut-être l'effectif de l'orchestre est-il trop considérable pour respecter la fluidité mozartienne...

L'impassibilité de M. Pierre Monteux a paru paradoxale dans ses effets. Déchainer autant de forces sonores avec une telle modération et une telle simplicité pourrait paraître tenir du prodige, si cela ne signifiait pas, en fait, la valeur de l'orchestre et celle du chef.

M. Pierre Monteux a remporté personnellement un évident succès remercié l'auditoire en illuminant et les rappels — dont il a été donné la fin du concert d'une étincelante « Alborada del Gracioso » — rendaient aussi bien hommage au musicien qui venait de se manifester aussi brillamment [illegible] valeur de la musique française [illegible] nouveau continent.

Jean LAVOIRE.

SUD-OUEST

LE PRINTEMPS MUSICAL PARISIEN

De Verdi à Strawinsky

Ernest Ansermet et l'orchestre de la Suisse romande

LOUIS BEYDTS nous a prouvé la qualité de son goût musical en nous offrant, à l'Opéra-Comique, peu après la reprise de « Pelléas », celle de « Falstaff » qui n'avait pas, depuis longtemps, paru à l'affiche.

On sait avec quel éclat cette comédie lyrique, au vrai sens du terme, termina la glorieuse carrière de Giuseppe Verdi, avec quel bonheur le maître octogénaire sut y montrer son sens des réalités, ses facultés d'adaptation, son désir de renouvellement, sans rien perdre [illegible] trise technique, de son sens aigu du théâtre, de [illegible]

Nous l'avons retrouvée l'autre [illegible] soir, servie par une interprétation soignée, homogène, en tête [illegible] quelle M. Musy, comp[illegible]

digne de la classe internationale de son chef Ernest Ansermet, qui compte parmi les [illegible] génération. Tous se vraiment dans les « Rondes de Print[illegible]

Symphony Rides Across Europe On a Fast Wave of Anecdotes

(Continued from First Page)

trains were as pleasant in this regard. Indeed, when it comes to comfort, speed, smooth rails and all the rest, European trains are in every way the equal of American trains and often far better. The only thing they don't have that causes concern, to me at least, is drinking water; the next time I come to Europe my first piece of equipment will be a canteen.

The cars, as you doubtless know by now, consist of about ten compartments with sliding glass doors giving out on a two-foot wide corridor running the whole length of the car on one side. It is pleasant enough to stand in this corridor and hang out the window with one foot on a sort of bar near the floor for it not only gives the scenery a fine sense of intimacy, but it invariably leads to a conversation with the others leaning out of the window, too.

Marked Contrast

Weary of that, it is delightful to sit down in your compartment, which is about five feet one way, six or eight feet the other. Two sofa-like chairs face each other with arm rests between the places. In first class compartments there are places for six people; in second class for eight. This is about the only real difference between the two classes, though first class upholstery is likely to be a little better or, if it's an old car, a little fresher.

Even though you are a perfect stranger to all the others in the compartment, conversation is not only quite proper but inevitable; you never hesitate to speak to anyone, ever the best-looking women (I practically never draw them, however). This is in marked contrast to American trains where one might go from Boston to Denver and never speak to anyone. Naturally, you can draw a bore anywhere, but in European trains at least you can go hang out the window if you do.

Be that as it may, it is in these compartments the anecdote department of this wonderful expedition is now in high gear. "Did you hear what happened to Harry Dubbs the other night?" one of the men said the other morning. Nobody had heard what had happened to Harry Dubbs, one of the first violinists of the orchestra.

"Well," said the raconteur lighting up a cigarette to develop the suspense, "it seems Harry and his wife went out on a late party in Amsterdam. They got in about four in the morning and went to bed. But Harry couldn't find the switch turning off the lights. He pushed this one and that one and finally he yanked a cord hanging down over the head of the bed. That didn't work, either, so he unscrewed the bulb.

"About ten minutes later just as they were falling asleep there was a rapping on the door, and in came a waiter pushing a wagon covered with a white cloth. 'Your breakfast, sir,' the waiter said." There was a mild laugh.

"I don't get it," said somebody in the compartment.

"You don't get it? cried the raconteur in dismay, "why the cord over the bed called the waiter, see?

Tired of French

Everybody roared. "Well did you hear what happened to Clarence Knudson," began another, referring to the first second violinist of the orchestra. Nobody had.

"Well, he went out to dinner in Paris with a bunch of the boys who speak French," the story teller said, "and by the time they were ready for dessert he was tired of all the French. So he said 'you should hear me speak French.' 'Go ahead,' they said, 'you order the dessert.'

"So Clarence called the waiter over and he said, 'Garcon, voulez-vous bring us our deees-errr.'

" 'Deees-errrr?" cried the waiter, his mouth falling open, 'no, no, monsieur, not deees-errrr!'

" 'Deees-errr,' repeated Clarence firmly," the story teller continued, "and the waiter went off shaking his head. And what do you think he brought back?"

Nobody could guess. He brought back TEN EGGS!" the story-teller bellowed triumphantly.

There was a laugh, then silence. "But why?" inquired one of the company.

"Why?" cried the story teller, "Dees-errr sounds like dix oeufs in French, and dix oeufs means ten eggs."

A brief silence. "Say," said someone, "did you hear the story of Charles Munch and the King of Belgium?"

Everybody sat up electrified; this was obviously a scoop. "Well," began the raconteur, pleased at this special attention, "it seems that during the intermission of the concert in Brussels King Bowdoin or wnatever his name is, sent one of his flunkies backstage to command Mr. Munch and one representative of the orchestra to come to his royal box. Mr. Munch said he wanted to take two along, Richard Burgin of the orchestra, and George Judd, the manager of the orchestra.

"I'm afraid that will not be possible," said the flunkie, His Majesty specified but two."

Mr. Munch jumped up all excited. "You tell His Majesty," he said, "that Boston is a very big city. It has Cambridge, and Harvard, and M. I. T. and Stop and Shop, too, and it should be represented by three people." So all three went up to see the king. How could he refuse the Stop and Shop?"

Symphony Rides Across Europe On a Fast Wave of Anecdotes

Herald – May 24

By RUDOLPH ELIE

FRANKFURT—The anecdote department of the Boston Symphony orchestra on tour in Europe is now in full plenary session. It took this department a little time to get organized as the rigors of the shakedown period in hotels, on ships, on trains, in buses, stations, restaurants, concert halls and so forth were so severe that at first nobody had time to Listen to What Happened to Joe.

Now, however, in the wonderfully companionable trains of Europe as we pass through France, Belgium, Holland and Germany, the anecdotes are beginning to appear. "Did you hear what happened to Joe last night?" somebody always begins. Everybody settles back at this point to listen to what happened to Joe.

It is easy to settle back in European trains, actually, as they really offer the most sociable situations possible; I wish American

Continued on Page Twenty-seven

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 24 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Toast for Danny Kuntz

By CYRUS DURGIN

FRANKFURT — I hope that Danny Kuntz reads the Globe, for this piece just possibly may be the first word to him of a present he eventually will receive. That present is a handsome greeting to him from Oberstaufenbach, the southwestern Rhenish town where he was born 92 years ago. Large and thin, the greeting is bound in parchment and contains a picture of Danny as a young man, his violin upon his knees; a photograph of Oberstaufenbach, and an illuminated message to him from the people of the town, signed by the burgomeister and other public men.

Danny Kuntz was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony back in 1881, when Major Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra. His service was long and illustrious, until he decided the time had come for him to retire as an active player.

But thereafter he still made his wide musicianship available to the orchestra, and for some time now he has assisted librarian Leslie Rogers in the preparation and correction of instrumental parts for performance. At 92, Danny Kuntz lives in Boston and from time to time may be seen around Symphony Hall.

* * *

The actual presentation had to be made by proxy, and it occurred in the lobby of the Grosses Haus at a party given for members of the orchestra by High Commissioner and Mrs. John J. McCloy, after the first concert played in Frankfurt.

The burgomeister got up on a hassock and made his speech in German, which was duly translated. As proxy for Mr. Kuntz, manager George E. Judd took his turn upon the hassock and said thank you in his usual brief, gracious and to-the-point style. Having a glass of good Mosel in hand, I drank my own silent toast to Danny Kuntz.

This party was the wind-up of an enthusiastic evening which marked yet another point in the triumphal progress of the Boston Symphony. The concert was given in the resonant auditorium of the Grosses Haus (Big House), which is the main theatre now in Frankfurt.

While the napalm bombs so thoroughly fused the steel girders of the Frankfurt Opera House so that it cannot be reconstructed, the Schauspielhaus was more fortunate.

Architect Adolph Linnebach worked out repairs that made a modern interior and a partly modern outside. So while the structure is an odd blend of old and new, exteriorly, the hall and its spacious lobbies are of a consistent style and most attractive. The stage has two revolving sections, one inside the other. It took $2,000,000 and 18 months of work before the theatre, renamed Grosses Haus, opened last Christmas Day.

A capacity audience, which here means 1450 people, said to be about 80 percent German (but my guess is about 50 percent) heard the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux with great enthusiasm. They even took noticeably well to William Schuman's Third Symphony, a work which, at first thought, might not appeal to what evidently is a conservative public. They applauded and cheered and obviously had a fine time.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAY 23 1952

The Boston Symphony under Charles Munch has given a triumphal performance at the Opera. In the theatre, President Auriol, the diplomatic corps, all the boulevard stars and the enthusiasts of novelties. The Boston Symphony, besides its French conductor, includes twenty-three French executants; so the enthusiasm of the evening was nourished from more than one source. In fact, it was an apotheosis in which all present took part with satisfaction.

LE MAI MUSICAL DE BORDEAUX

May 24

Double et éclatant succès de Pierre Monteux et de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston

L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON est un peu l'orchestre national américain; son train de vie fastueux, son recrutement universel, le nombre considérable de ses auditeurs familiers auraient cependant été insuffisants à lui donner le prestige d'une renommée mondiale, s'il ne s'était aussi imposé par d'éclatantes réussites, tant dans l'interprétation du répertoire traditionnel que dans la recherche et la promotion d'œuvres nouvelles.

Le programme que cet hôte de marque du Festival de Bordeaux présentait pour le premier de deux concerts successifs, relevait de cette double ligne de conduite puisque aussi bien, il comprenait la symphonie « Jupiter », de Mozart, et en seconde partie, la « Troisième symphonie », de Schumann... (William), ainsi que la suite symphonique de « Mathis-le-peintre », d'Hindenith.

Cette seconde partie s'identifiait manifestement mieux au génie propre de cette phalange dynamique, d'un équilibre parfait et qui est un peu un orchestre-virtuose.

La symphonie de W. Schumann est, en effet, un morceau de virtuosité pour orchestre, un brillant exercice de musique délibérément scientifique, expérimentale, systématique; où chaque groupe de l'orchestre affronte, à son tour, des effets rythmiques ou des combinaisons de timbres agencées avec une froideur implacable.

Les thèmes sont vraiment soumis à rude épreuve dans ces variations impitoyables, ces accélérations soudaines, ces alanguissements, ces gargouillis et ces percussions.

Cette apothéose du fracas, car tout cela est construit avec une infaillible précision, a permis du moins à l'admirable mécanique que constitue l'orchestre de Boston de montrer combien le fonctionnement de ses rouages est souple et bien réglé.

A l'issue de cette tonnante symphonie, la triptyque de « Mathis le peintre », qui n'est cependant pas précisément de la musique enjouée, procurait une bienfaisante sensation d'aération, de paix.

Ici encore, l'orchestre de Boston a reproduit avec une incomparable virtuosité le dur langage de cette suite sévère, mais riche d'une mystérieuse et émouvante beauté.

Avant d'en venir à ces harmonies... déconcertantes, il avait donné de la symphonie « Jupiter », de Mozart, une interprétation où il n'est pas apparu que les cordes aient exploité à fond leurs qualités. Peut-être l'effectif de l'orchestre est-il trop considérable pour respecter la fluidité mozartienne...

L'impassibilité de M. Pierre Monteux a paru paradoxale dans ses effets. Déchainer autant de forces sonores avec une telle modération et une telle simplicité pourrait paraître tenir du prodige, si cela ne signifiait pas, en fait, la valeur de l'orchestre et celle du chef.

M. Pierre Monteux a remporté personnellement un évident succès remercié l'auditoire en illuminant et les rappels — dont il a d'ailleurs la fin du concert d'une étincelante « Alborada del Gracioso » — rendaient aussi bien hommage au musicien qui venait de se manifester aussi brillamment qu'à l'ambassadeur de la musique française sur le nouveau continent.

Jean LADOIRE.

SUD-OUEST

LE PRINTEMPS MUSICAL PARISIEN

De Verdi à Strawinsky

Ernest Ansermet et l'orchestre de la Suisse romande

LOUIS REYDTS nous a prouvé la qualité de son goût musical en nous offrant, à l'Opéra-Comique, peu après la reprise de « Pelléas », celle de « Falstaff » qui n'avait pas, depuis longtemps, paru à l'affiche.

On sait avec quel éclat cette comédie lyrique, au vrai sens du terme, termina la glorieuse carrière de Giuseppe Verdi, avec quel bonheur le maître octogénaire sut y montrer son sens des réalités, ses facultés d'adaptation, son désir de renouvellement, sans rien perdre [illegible] trise technique, de son sens aigu du théâtre, de [illegible]

digne de la classe internationale sous l'égide de son chef Ernest Ansermet, qui compte parmi les meilleurs de la génération. Tous se sont surpassés vraiment dans les « Gigues » [illegible] Rondes de Printemps [illegible]

Nous l'avons retrouvée l'autre [illegible] soir, servie par une interprétation soignée, homogène, en tête laquelle M. Musy [illegible]

[199]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Men Ride Amsterdam Canals

affairs
the Amer-
m'sts up
ng around sports jack-
the 104
with a in masses
uders.
ng, the strange canals
a with s new a trip ng boats am, was day mood of the town
ersation.
about 22 ap-
musical tour-
exceptionally
they are by no
quite as dark as ter, too, for six-seem to be a looked like a
black eyes, a shock
hair and such white teeth he impression he had twice as many anybody else.

Once he got all his charges loaded into the leading boat, a task complicated by the fact that for every two he got in one got out to take a picture of something they'd just spotted, he gave a signal to a blond Dutchman in a nautical outfit, leaning comfortably against a post overlooking the scene. He spoke in Dutch, but he neatly conveyed the idea "come on, let's get out of here before these guys scatter again." The captain—for it was he—came aboard, some boys on the quay cast off, and the sight-seeing barge, a brand new boat in immaculate shape, moved off up the canal.

He began his spiel. "What language I speak" he asked in excellent English through the sound system. "English, French, Spanish or Dutch?"

"English," said "English!"

I'm sorry, chirped the guide, who was a student at Amsterdam who worked as a guide in the during the summer. That he languages proved to be at all, though languages For it is rare for the tourist to encounter anyAmsterdam who does not speak language is taught most from in the public schools, and well educated Dutchmen enough English to get by on. started off with statistics as maneuvered his 60-foot boat canals with truly incredible routine stuff," the guide captain turned at right canal not more than two feet boat and didn't come within the piles.)

Rivals Venice

of Amsterdam's lay- to visualize a half- then, would be main water high- out of this main concentric circles were about a dozen each beginning and end- canal. All of these canals others radiating like to make a total of forming a complete canals with a pool table until you visit canals are antiquity. The phalanxes of arm in arm) sure, but the barges, boats, flowers, and as unique a urn that the kales situa- guide only for a fairly at all. And swimmers, swim, sir," drop in."

It didn't look to me as if dropping into an Amsterdam canal would be much fun in any case. The water, which is brackish, is a dirty green with things floating in it although the canals are not used for sewerage. By means of a series of locks, they are flushed out every night, but it still leaves a lot to be desired in the way of pure sparkling water, as it were.

By this time the musical tourists, who had shot pictures of everything, been dowsed by spray as the two sight-seeing boats raced each other down the main canal, and had been dragged in from the deck by the harassed guide just in time to miss having their heads banged on one of the city's 400-odd low bridges, arrived at the city hall for a reception with the mayor and city council of Amsterdam.

The men of the orchestra stood around in the vast, imposing chamber and took pictures of the assistant burgomaster and his uniformed attendant as the sun streamed through the mullioned windows and talked about the official's speech. They couldn't get over it; here, they said in awe, was a politician who had heard of Beethoven. They were obviously more impressed by this than by the curious beauty of Amsterdam itself.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 23 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Ghosts in German Ruins

By CYRUS DURGIN

FRANKFURT, Ger.—Well, here we are, Boston Symphony and newspapermen, in Germany. For me, this is the first visit since 1934.

Then despite the Nazis and their omni-present swastikas, Germany was still the land of Goethe and Wagner, of Rhine wine and Munich beer, art, song, story, legend and handsome, blond young people. That was the way it went; the war (though most of us didn't realize there would be one) was yet five years off; the Germans en masse might be military and tough, but they were nice people individually, and the casual traveler had fun.

So how would it be, seven years after a war which had brought Germany low and smashed a good deal of her cities? What would the feeling be? Speaking for myself, there wasn't much of any.

The war ruins, which for the most part the Germans have left as they were began about at Aachen, and got much worse in Cologne. Frankfurt is still badly smashed, though the new structures are plentiful. For all this evidence of devastation there was only one feeling: that of a sad and desolate wonderment that people can still be so idiotic as to have to engage in war.

There must be plenty of ghosts about these ruins; it takes only a little imagination to see in your mind's eye the thousands of human bodies left after the bombing runs.

* * *

Otherwise, coming back to Germany was a deliciously static experience, emotionally. The Rhineland, all the way from Bonn to Mainz is just as ruggedly beautiful as ever, but there was no quickening of the heart upon seeing it again. Around the railroad stations, the officials looked hard and not especially friendly. The uniforms are shabby, now, and oftentimes a uniform coat is worn with whatever trousers may be at hand. But the caps have that same arrogant peak, and it is not too difficult to see these men in Wehrmacht green-gray or SS black.

"Pleass remain in your comparrtments," barks the immigration man, spectacled and close-cropped but wearing no uniform. I thought back to the French, Belgian and Dutch officials who made their difficult way, with a smile and a shrug, through a train aisle filled with milling people, taking matters as they came.

Outside the train, in the Aachen station, the German officials strode and barked—at each other, to be sure, but they barked. Nor were they anything but coolly efficient as they spoke to us, except for an occasional "Gute reise" ("Have a good journey") when they handed back a passport.

* * *

You are bound to arrive at that old and unpleasant conclusion: "The Germans haven't changed. They can't and they won't change. The civilians, as you meet some of them in the ensuing eight to 10 hours, are more pleasant. They greet you politely, and sometimes with warmth. They may stare at you a little curiously, and you don't know what is in their minds. But the manners are good.

A short walk about Frankfurt increases the gloom. Block after block of total or partial destruction.

Eagle 5/24/52

OVATIONS FOR MUNCH: Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, waves his hand aloft at a Tanglewood rehearsal last year. The conductor and employes, now on a tour of Europe, haves cored whopping successes at all stops so far. Accompanied by Eagle Music Critic Jay Rosenfeld, the orchestra has received great receptions in France, Holland, Belgium and Germany.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC
MAY 25 1952

Broadcasts To Honor Memory Of Conductor

NEW YORK, May 24—Special radio broadcasts the week of June 4 will honor the late Serge [illegible] internationally and patron of [illegible] will mark the [illegible] of Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] will commemorate [illegible] ir of the Koussevitzky [illegible] oundation.

[illegible] ure recordings [illegible] famed musical [illegible] commissioned [illegible] on, which he [illegible] into the future [illegible] record for en- [illegible] pporting com- [illegible] the world.

[illegible] where Koussevitzky [illegible] his international career after leaving [illegible] ussia, the announcement observed in a [illegible] ast by Radio- [illegible] ise, and in a [illegible] Pascal String [illegible] he auspices of [illegible]. The ensemble [illegible] tets by William [illegible] Peter Mennin [illegible] issioned by the [illegible]

[illegible] itein will conduct [illegible] on Symphony [illegible] emorial concert [illegible] ugust 9, during [illegible] Music Festival. [illegible] in the program [illegible] "Symphony No. [illegible] by the foundation [illegible] f major symphony [illegible] ere and abroad [illegible] to the memory [illegible] ky by including [illegible] rograms works [illegible] the foundation. [illegible] conductor of the [illegible] iphony, has in- [illegible] dation his trib- [illegible] performances of [illegible] "Concerto for [illegible] urrill Phillip's [illegible] Overture," and [illegible] Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana."

THOR JOHNSON, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has chosen Heitor Villa-Lobos's "Madona," Nikolai Lopatnikoff's "Concertino for Orchestra," and the Bartok concerto.

Walter Hendl will conduct several works commissioned by the foundation at fall concerts of the Dallas Symphony.

Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy also have stated their intention of performing commissioned works in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

White-Tie Riot

Musical Paris Is Volatile

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

—PARIS.

"MONSIEUR STRAVINSKY and I," said Jean Cocteau, the eminent French film director, scenic artist and writer, "have worked on this," referring to the composition "Oedipus Rex," "with great respect for the public. We ask you for the same respect." The occasion was a manifestation of disapproval by a part of the audience during the second performance of the "Oedipus" revival in its new setting by Cocteau.

Violent expressions of disapproval in theatres are peculiar French demonstrations. A few whistles and "hooo's" evoke corresponding and doubly strong applause by the approving supporters and one faction tries to outcall or overpower the noise of the other. Cocteau, with dignity and composure, regained attention and quiet.

* * *

THE PERFORMANCE calls for a complete symphony orchestra, a half-dozen vocal soloists and a men's chorus. Cocteau himself was the narrator. At the back of the stage of the Theatre des Champs-Elysees a platform was erected on which moving and living tableaux, rather than ballet, complemented the music. It was new and daring, original and startling.

Cocteau wore evening dress of his own devising — a Shantung silk jacket with elbow-length sleeves and a revers at the collar resembling a ski-jacket. His diction was excellent but his stage deportment was as unpredictable as his stagecraft.

* * *

AS THE AUDIENCE and performers dispersed at the end of the evening, it was of interest to notice how some of the chorus and orchestra men, in black-tie tuxedos and white-tie tails, respectively, went off on motor bicycles. The prevalence of bicycles, foot-powered or motor-driven, is a European phenomenon and it is completely normal and usual to see dignified businessmen in Homburg hats and mature housewives in neat and becomingly stylish clothes going about their affairs on cycles of one kind or another.

The audiences at the concerts of this 20th Century Cultural Congress are a pleasant mixture of students, carriage trade and others less easy to place in categories. All languages are to be heard during intermissions and costumes of many lands are to be seen. Americans are represented in force, including some men in uniform, and it can be added to those who sometimes think the contrary, that our military men of all ranks deport themselves to their personal honor and our national credit.

Eagle 5/23/52

* * *

Boston Symphony Report

We had a talk backstage the other day with George Judd, the general manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Judd said he has been associated with the orchestra since 1915 and has been manager since 1936.

As manager he takes on responsibility for all the non-musical aches, pains and problems of the 104-piece ensemble.

Mr. Judd, a soft-spoken man who looks like Carl Sandburg, told us the Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of 103 men and one woman (a harpist). There are 57 American-born musicians and 47 foreign-born, comprising 14 nationalities. France leads the list of foreign musicians with 21.

We asked the manager what it felt like to take care of such a large group of musicians.

"In every orchestra of 104 men," he said, "there are always 103 who think they should be conductor. But I really can't complain. We have the cream of the crop. We're one of the oldest orchestras in America. We have the longest season, 46 weeks, of any symphony orchestra in the United States. Our minimum, and most of the men make a great deal more than the minimum, is $4,800 a year. We have turnover of about four men a year, usually caused by retirement or death, and there are usually 30 applications for each vacancy that takes place.

"As long as the men abide by our rules, which are only concerned with playing music, we are satisfied. We have developed the sharpest line between private and professional life, and since we take extreme pains in hiring a new man our personnel troubles are at a minimum."

This Clipping F
NORWICH, CO
RECORD
MAY 25 19

[illegible] The a[illegible] recently w[illegible] people of [illegible] was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Men Ride Amsterdam Canals

affairs
the Amer-
ns up around sports jack-
the 104
with a in masses shoulders.
the canals with is new a trip boats am, was lay mood
of the town
ckation.
p of about 22 ap-musical tour-
exceptionally are by no
as dark as too, for six-
m to be a
looked like a black eyes, a shock
such white teeth he he had twice as many

Once he got all his charges loaded into the leading boat, a task complicated by the fact that for every two he got in one got out to take a picture of something they'd just spotted, he gave a signal to a blond Dutchman in a nautical outfit, leaning comfortably against a post overlooking the scene. He spoke in Dutch, but he neatly conveyed the idea "come on, let's get out of here before these guys matter again." The captain—for it was he—came aboard, some boys on the quay cast off, and the sight-seeing barge, a brand new boat in immaculate shape, moved off up the canal.

began his spiel. "What language I speak?" he asked in excellent English through the sound system. "English, French, Spanish or Dutch?"

"I," I said, "English."

I'm sorry, chirped the guide, who I see was a student at Amsterdam University who worked as a guide in the summer boats during the summer. That he spoke many languages proved to be quite unusual at all, though languages were his specialty. For it is rare for the sightseeing tourist to encounter anyone in Amsterdam who does not speak English. The language is taught most from the beginning in the public schools, and Dutchmen are well educated Dutchmen to talk enough English to get by on.

The guide started off with statistics as the captain maneuvered his 60-foot boat through the canals with truly incredible ease. "It's only routine stuff," the guide said, as the captain turned at right angles into a canal not more than two feet wider than the boat and didn't come within inches of hitting the piles.)

Rivals Venice

To get the picture of Amsterdam's layout, you had to visualize a half-wheel. The straight edge, then would be the canals, the main water highways, and from this main hub, rippling out in a series of concentric circles like the moon, were about a dozen canals, each beginning and ending in the main canal. All of these canals were crossed by others radiating like spokes from the hub, to make a total of about 70 canals forming a complete

[illegible] canals with [illegible] a pool table
[illegible] not until you visit [illegible] canals are [illegible] antiquity. The [illegible] with phalanxes of [illegible] arm in arm)
[illegible] be sure, but the [illegible] with barges, boats,
[illegible] in flowers, and [illegible] ly as unique a

[illegible] learn that the [illegible] Skates situa-
[illegible] tech: the guide
[illegible] up only for a fairly [illegible] not at all. And [illegible] at swimmers,
[illegible] ey swim, sir," [illegible] drop in."

It didn't look to me as if dropping into an Amsterdam canal would be much fun in any case. The water, which is brackish, is a dirty green with things floating in it although the canals are not used for sewerage. By means of a series of locks, they are flushed out every night, but it still leaves a lot to be desired in the way of pure sparkling water, as it were.

By this time the musical tourists, who had shot pictures of everything, been doused by spray as the two sight-seeing boats raced each other down the main canal, and had been dragged in from the deck by the harassed guide just in time to miss having their heads banged on one of the city's 400-odd low bridges, arrived at the city hall for a reception with the mayor and city council of Amsterdam.

The men of the orchestra stood around in the vast, imposing chamber and took pictures of the assistant burgomaster and his uniformed attendant as the sun streamed through the mullioned windows and talked about the official's speech. They couldn't get over it; here, they said in awe, was a politician who had heard of Beethoven. They were obviously more impressed by this than by the curious beauty of Amsterdam itself.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 23 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Ghosts in German Ruins

By CYRUS DURGIN

FRANKFURT, Ger.—Well, here we are, Boston Symphony and newspapermen, in Germany. For me, this is the first visit since 1934.

Then despite the Nazis and their omni-present swastikas, Germany was still the land of Goethe and Wagner, of Rhine wine and Munich beer, art, song, story, legend and handsome, blond young people. That was the way it went; the war (though most of us didn't realize there would be one) was yet five years off; the Germans en masse might be military and tough, but they were nice people individually, and the casual traveler had fun.

So how would it be, seven years after a war which had brought Germany low and smashed a good deal of her cities? What would the feeling be? Speaking for myself, there wasn't much of any.

The war ruins, which for the most part the Germans have left as they were began about at Aachen, and got much worse in Cologne. Frankfurt is still badly smashed, though the new structures are plentiful. For all this evidence of devastation there was only one feeling: that of a sad and desolate wonderment that people can still be so idiotic as to have to engage in war.

There must be plenty of ghosts about these ruins; it takes only a little imagination to see in your mind's eye the thousands of human bodies left after the bombing runs.

* * *

Otherwise, coming back to Germany was a deliriously static experience, emotionally. The Rhineland, all the way from Bonn to Mainz is just as ruggedly beautiful as ever, but there was no quickening of the heart upon seeing it again. Around the railroad stations, the officials looked hard and not especially friendly. The uniforms are shabby, now, and oftentimes a uniform coat is worn with whatever trousers may be at hand. But the caps have that same arrogant peak, and it is not too difficult to see these men in Wehrmacht green-gray or SS black.

"Pleass remain in your comparrtments," barks the immigration man, spectacled and close-cropped but wearing no uniform. I thought back to the French, Belgian and Dutch officials who made their difficult way, with a smile and a shrug, through a train aisle filled with milling people, taking matters as they came.

Outside the train, in the Aachen station, the German officials strode and barked—at each other, to be sure, but they barked. Nor were they anything but coolly efficient as they spoke to us, except for an occasional "Gute reise" ("Have a good journey") when they handed back a passport.

* * *

You are bound to arrive at that old and unpleasant conclusion: "The Germans haven't changed. They can't and they won't change. The civilians, as you meet some of them in the ensuing eight to 10 hours, are more pleasant. They greet you politely, and sometimes with warmth. They may stare at you a little curiously, and you don't know what is in their minds. But the manners are good.

A short walk about Frankfurt increases the gloom. Block after block of total or partial destruction.

Eagle 5/24/52

OVATIONS FOR MUNCH: Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, waves his hand aloft at a Tanglewood rehearsal last year. The conductor and employes, now on a tour of Europe, haves cored whopping successes at all stops so far. Accompanied by Eagle Music Critic Jay Rosenfeld, the orchestra has received great receptions in France, Holland, Belgium and Germany.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC
MAY 25 1952

Broadcasts To Honor Memory Of Conductor

NEW YORK, May 24—Special radio broadcasts the week of June 4 will honor the late Serge Koussevitzky, internationally famed conductor and patron of music.

The programs will mark the first anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky's death and will commemorate the 10th year of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

They will feature recordings conducted by the famed musical leader and works commissioned by the foundation, which he created to carry into the future his unmatched record for encouraging and supporting composers throughout the world.

IN PARIS, where Koussevitzky established his international reputation after leaving revolutionary Russia, the anniversary will be observed in a memorial broadcast by Radiodiffusion Francaise, and in a concert by the Pascal String Quartet under the auspices of the U. S. Embassy. The ensemble will perform quartets by William Bergsma and Peter Mennin which were commissioned by the foundation.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a memorial concert at Tanglewood August 9, during the Berkshire Music Festival. He will include in the program Aaron Copland's "Symphony No. 3," commissioned by the foundation. A number of major symphony orchestras here and abroad will pay homage to the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky by including in their fall programs works commissioned by the foundation.

Antal Dorati, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, has informed the foundation his tribute will include performances of Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Burrill Phillip's "Tom Paine Overture," and Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana."

THOR JOHNSON, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has chosen Heitor Villa-Lobos's "Madona," Nikolai Lopatnikoff's "Concertino for Orchestra," and the Bartok concerto.

Walter Hendl will conduct several works commissioned by the foundation at fall concerts of the Dallas Symphony.

Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy also have stated their intention of performing commissioned works in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

Boston Symphony Report

We had a talk backstage the other day with George Judd, the general manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Judd said he has been associated with the orchestra since 1915 and has been manager since 1936.

As manager he takes on responsibility for all the non-musical aches, pains and problems of the 104-piece ensemble.

Mr. Judd, a soft-spoken man who looks like Carl Sandburg, told us the Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of 103 men and one woman (a harpist). There are 57 American-born musicians and 47 foreign-born, comprising 14 nationalities. France leads the list of foreign musicians with 21.

We asked the manager what it felt like to take care of such a large group of musicians.

"In every orchestra of 104 men," he said, "there are always 103 who think they should be conductor. But I really can't complain. We have the cream of the crop. We're one of the oldest orchestras in America. We have the longest season, 46 weeks, of any symphony orchestra in the United States. Our minimum, and most of the men make a great deal more than the minimum, is $4,800 a year. We have turnover of about four men a year, usually caused by retirement or death, and there are usually 30 applications for each vacancy that takes place.

"As long as the men abide by our rules, which are only concerned with playing music, we are satisfied. We have developed the sharpest line between private and professional life, and since we take extreme pains in hiring a new man our personnel troubles are at a minimum."

This Clipping F
NORWICH, CO
RECORD
MAY 25 19

The a recently w people of
was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

DAMS — Thirty-five gistered at the initial
the North Adams
Club held Wednesday
the YMCA building.
is being sponsored by family division of the s Community Chest. ill meet weekly in the 2 to 4 on Wednesday
t the "Y." Walfrid T.
the Pittsfield Golden cheduled to display his ection of miniature
the next meeting.

mp Rally Tomorrow ls' Club

p rally will be held to-
PM at the Girls' Club s who have attended during the past two those who have regis-
y register this summer.
is designed primarily to e campers with details
ed nut sale, which the b will sponsor to raise or improvements and t Witawentin.
will start next Wednes-d at 5 PM on Friday,
h girl who assists in the a commission on every lls, and will have a
in one of the 17 prizes
to the top salesgirls.
e will be $15 and sec-
here will be five awards nd 10 prizes of matinee
the water follies which Club will sponsor the of July.

The month sachusetts executives w
George F. S
of the Pittsf
Senator
dressed the a luncheon
Earlier, the legislative p local taxpa
The meet executives sentatives Federation

Milk-Ol Due Be

Milk and expire May newed befo
the items ported toda milk inspe thority for Sections 41
the Genera
to all store dealers wh of the item

Supe

Bokor Vs
The $30
Bokor of Smith was for neithe
ing. Mr. B for salary
1950. Atto represente ney Frede
for Mr. S

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Symphony Men Ride Amsterdam Canals

...ff ...rs
... the
... Amer-
...m'sts up
... around
... jack-
... with a
... masses
... the
... with
... new
... a trip
...ng boats
...im, was
... mood
... town
...ekation.
... about 22 ap-
... musical tour-
... exceptionally
... are by no
... quite as dark as
..., too, for six-
...m to be a
... looked like a
... eyes, a shock
... and such white teeth he
...pression he had twice as many
... as everybody else.

Once he got all his charges loaded into the leading boat, a task complicated by the fact that for every two he got in one got out to take a picture of something they'd just spotted, he gave a signal to a blond Dutchman in a nautical outfit, leaning comfortably against a post overlooking the scene. He spoke in Dutch, but he neatly conveyed the idea "come on, let's get out of here before these guys scatter again!" The captain—for it was he—came aboard, some boys on the quay cast off, and the sight-seeing barge, a brand new boat in immaculate shape, moved off up the canal.

The guide began his spiel. "What language shall I speak," he asked in excellent English through the sound system. "English, German, French, Spanish or Dutch?" The tourists roared, "English."

You'll be sorry, chirped the guide, who explained he was a student at Amsterdam University who worked as a guide in the canal boats during the summer. That he spoke so many languages proved to be nothing unusual at all, though languages were his specialty. For it is rare for the English-speaking tourist to encounter anyone in Amsterdam who does not speak English. The language is taught most from the beginning in the public schools, and even the less well educated Dutchmen usually speak enough English to get by on.

The guide started off with statistics as the captain maneuvered his 60-foot boat through the canals with truly incredible skill. "It's only routine stuff," the guide confided as the captain turned at right angles into a canal not more than two feet wider than the boat and didn't come within inches of hitting the piles.)

Rivals Venice

To get the picture of Amsterdam's layout, you had to visualize a half-wheel. The straight sides, then, would be the Amstel canal, the main water highway, while leading out of this main canal, in a series of concentric circles like half-moon, were about a dozen canals, each beginning and ending at the main canal. All of these canals were crossed by others radiating like spokes from the hub, to make a total of more than 70 canals forming a complete

...tes canals with
... pool table
...until you visit
... canals are
...ntiquity. The
...h phalanxes of
...rm in arm)
...ture, but the
...barges, boats,
...flowers, and
...as unique a

...urn that the
...kates situa-
...: the guide
... for a fairly
...of at all. And
... swimmers,
...y swim, sir,"
... drop in."

It didn't look to me as if dropping into an Amsterdam canal would be much fun in any case. The water, which is brackish, is a dirty green with things floating in it although the canals are not used for sewerage. By means of a series of locks, they are flushed out every night, but it still leaves a lot to be desired in the way of pure sparkling water, as it were.

By this time the musical tourists, who had shot pictures of everything, been dowsed by spray as the two sight-seeing boats raced each other down the main canal, and had been dragged in from the deck by the harassed guide just in time to miss having their heads banged on one of the city's 400-odd low bridges, arrived at the city hall for a reception with the mayor and city council of Amsterdam.

The men of the orchestra stood around in the vast, imposing chamber and took pictures of the assistant burgomaster and his uniformed attendant as the sun streamed through the mullioned windows and talked about the official's speech. They couldn't get over it; here, they said in awe, was a politician who had heard of Beethoven. They were obviously more impressed by this than by the curious beauty of Amsterdam itself.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 23 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Ghosts in German Ruins

By CYRUS DURGIN

FRANKFURT, Ger.—Well, here we are, Boston Symphony and newspapermen, in Germany. For me, this is the first visit since 1934.

Then despite the Nazis and their omni-present swastikas, Germany was still the land of Goethe and Wagner, of Rhine wine and Munich beer, art, song, story, legend and handsome, blond young people. That was the way it went; the war (though most of us didn't realize there would be one) was yet five years off; the Germans en masse might be military and tough, but they were nice people individually, and the casual traveler had fun.

So how would it be, seven years after a war which had brought Germany low and smashed a good deal of her cities? What would the feeling be? Speaking for myself, there wasn't much of any.

The war ruins, which for the most part the Germans have left as they were began about at Aachen, and got much worse in Cologne. Frankfurt is still badly smashed, though the new structures are plentiful. For all this evidence of devastation there was only one feeling: that of a sad and desolate wonderment that people can still be so idiotic as to have to engage in war.

There must be plenty of ghosts about these ruins; it takes only a little imagination to see in your mind's eye the thousands of human bodies left after the bombing runs.

* * *

Otherwise, coming back to Germany was a curiously static experience, emotionally. The Rhineland, all the way from Bonn to Mainz is just as ruggedly beautiful as ever, but there was no quickening of the heart upon seeing it again. Around the railroad stations, the officials looked hard and not especially friendly. The uniforms are shabby, now, and oftentimes a uniform coat is worn with whatever trousers may be at hand. But the caps have that same arrogant peak, and it is not too difficult to see these men in Wehrmacht green-gray or SS black.

"Pleass remain in your comparrtments," barks the immigration man, spectacled and close-cropped but wearing no uniform. I thought back to the French, Belgian and Dutch officials who made their difficult way, with a smile and a shrug, through a train aisle filled with milling people, taking matters as they came.

Outside the train, in the Aachen station, the German officials strode and barked—at each other, to be sure, but they barked. Nor were they anything but coolly efficient as they spoke to us, except for an occasional "Gute reise" ("Have a good journey") when they handed back a passport.

* * *

You are bound to arrive at that old and unpleasant conclusion: "The Germans haven't changed. They can't and they won't change. The civilians, as you meet some of them in the ensuing eight to 10 hours, are more pleasant. They greet you politely, and sometimes with warmth. They may stare at you a little curiously, and you don't know what is in their minds. But the manners are good.

A short walk about Frankfurt increases the gloom. Block after block of total or partial destruction.

Eagle 5/24/52

OVATIONS FOR MUNCH: Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, waves his hand aloft at a Tanglewood rehearsal last year. The conductor and employes, now on a tour of Europe, haves cored whopping successes at all stops so far. Accompanied by Eagle Music Critic Jay Rosenfeld, the orchestra has received great receptions in France, Holland, Belgium and Germany.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC
MAY 25 1952

Broadcasts To Honor Memory Of Conductor

NEW YORK, May 24—Special radio broadcasts the week of June 4 will honor the late Serge Koussevitzky, internationally famed conductor and patron of music.

The programs will mark the first anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky's death and will commemorate the 10th year of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

They will feature recordings conducted by the famed musical leader and works commissioned by the foundation, which he created to carry into the future his unmatched record for encouraging and supporting composers throughout the world.

IN PARIS, where Koussevitzky established his international reputation after leaving revolutionary Russia, the anniversary will be observed in a memorial broadcast by Radiodiffusion Francaise, and in a concert by the Pascal String Quartet under the auspices of the U. S. Embassy. The ensemble will perform quartets by William Bergsma and Peter Mennin which were commissioned by the foundation.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a memorial concert at Tanglewood August 9, during the Berkshire Music Festival. He will include in the program Aaron Copland's "Symphony No. 3," commissioned by the foundation. A number of major symphony orchestras here and abroad will pay homage to the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky by including in their fall programs works commissioned by the foundation.

Antal Dorati, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, has informed the foundation his tribute will include performances of Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Burrill Phillip's "Tom Paine Overture," and Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana."

THOR JOHNSON, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, has chosen Heitor Villa-Lobos's "Madona," Nikolai Lopatnikoff's "Concertino for Orchestra," and the Bartok concerto.

Walter Hendl will conduct several works commissioned by the foundation at fall concerts of the Dallas Symphony.

Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy also have stated their intention of performing commissioned works in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

Boston Symphony Report

We had a talk backstage the other day with George Judd, the general manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Judd said he has been associated with the orchestra since 1915 and has been manager since 1936.

As manager he takes on responsibility for all the non-musical aches, pains and problems of the 104-piece ensemble.

Mr. Judd, a soft-spoken man who looks like Carl Sandburg, told us the Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of 103 men and one woman (a harpist). There are 57 American-born musicians and 47 foreign-born, comprising 14 nationalities. France leads

...CITY BANK
...DAYS BANK on
...Switzerland.

This Clipping From NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
MAR 5 1952

Musical Ambassadors

The appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Paris recently was greeted with enthusiasm and appreciation by the people of that city. The program of French and American music was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

...DAMS — Thirty-five ...gistered at the initial ... the North Adams ... Club held Wednesday ... the YMCA building. ...is being sponsored by ... family division of the ...s Community Chest. ...ill meet weekly in the ... 2 to 4 on Wednesday ...t the "Y." Walfrid T. ..., the Pittsfield Golden ...cheduled to display his ...ection of miniature ... the next meeting.

...mp Rally ... Tomorrow ...ls' Club

...p rally will be held to... PM at the Girls' Club ...s who have attended ... during the past two ... those who have regis... register this summer. ...is designed primarily to ...e campers with details ...ed nut sale, which the ...b will sponsor to raise ...or improvements and ...t Witawentin. ...will start next Wednes... at 5 PM on Friday, ...h girl who assists in the ... a commission on every ...lls, and will have a ... in one of the 17 prizes ... to the top salesgirls. ...e will be $15 and sec... here will be five awards ...nd 10 prizes of matinee ... the water follies which ... Club will sponsor the ...of July.

The month... sachusetts ... executives w... George F. S... of the Pittsf... Senator ... dressed the ... a luncheon ... Earlier, the ... legislative p... local taxpa...

The meet... executives ...sentatives ... Federation ...

Milk-Ol... Due Be...

Milk and ... expire May ... renewed befo... the items ... ported toda... milk inspe... thority for ... Sections 41 ... the Genera... to all store... dealers wh... of the item...

Supe...

Bokor Vs...

The $30... Bokor of ... Smith was ... for neithe... ing. Mr. B... for salary ... 1950. Attor... represente... ney Frede... for Mr. S...

Dans le cadre du Festival de Bordeaux

L'Orchestre Philharmonique de Boston a joué du BERLIOZ et du HINDEMITH devant une salle en délire LE Festival de Bordeaux va décidément se terminer en apothéose.

La journée de vendredi, début du grand « rush » final qui verra la victoire définitive du Mai musical, a revêtu, en effet, la valeur d'une consécration.

Nous parlons, par ailleurs, du délicieux récital de musique de chambre qui fut donné au château de La Brède par Pierre Bernac et Francis Poulenc. Mais cette étincelante fête de l'esprit ne pouvait rester isolée. Il lui fallait un couronnement.

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Boston allait nous l'apporter.

Quand Pierre Monteux s'installa au pupitre et déchaîna, sans un geste inutile, le premier orage instrumental de la soirée (il s'agissait de l'ouverture de « Benvenuto Cellini »), nous savions déjà que la célèbre formation américaine méritait amplement sa réputation.

Les cordes, et singulièrement les violons, font preuve d'un dynamisme, d'un éclat, d'une richesse expressive absolument incomparables. Il est vrai que l'on a fait appel, pour former cette explosive (mais si équilibrée) phalange d'attaquants à de nombreux artistes slaves. Les Russes et les Polonais sont, en effet, les premiers archets du monde.

Martial BARDINET

Suite en page 3

LA NOUVELLE RÉPUBLIQUE

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston au Festival de Bordeaux

Suite de la page 1

Un prestigieux ensemble de solistes

Les bois et les cuivres, pour la plupart d'origine française, obtiennent des sonorités veloutées, enveloppantes, lumineuses, d'une pureté parfaite et d'une extrême finesse. Les autres membres de l'orchestre, Allemands, Italiens ou Américains, ont été visiblement recrutés parmi les plus remarquables représentants de leurs spécialités.

Bref, cette Association symphonique dont la discipline m'a fait rêver, est également l'un des plus prestigieux ensembles de solistes qu'il soit possible d'entendre à notre époque.

Mais que dire de Monteux lui-même ?

Tout simplement ceci : ce petit homme discret, à l'allure un peu massive de vieux Gaulois, au maintien simple et effacé, aux gestes mesurés, au comportement presque timide, est à l'heure actuelle l'un des plus grands chefs des deux continents.

C'est le triomphe de la méthode et de l'ordre classiques. La baguette de Monteux est cartésienne. Elle dispose plus qu'elle n'impose, rassemble plus qu'elle ne soumet, répartit plus qu'elle ne subordonne. Il semble bien que son secret soit de gouverner sans contraindre. L'exercice du pouvoir ramené à l'échelle humaine...

Un véritable mouvement d'horlogerie

Aussi est-il bien rare de voir un chef situer avec autant de précision les divers plans sonores d'une œuvre, et donner à chaque groupe instrumental le rôle exact qui lui revient. Qu'il s'agisse de l'ouverture de « Benvenuto », de la symphonie « Jupiter », de Mozart, de celle de William Schumann, ou de Mathis, le peintre d'Hindemith, tout était réglé comme un mouvement d'horlogerie. Les entrées se succédaient sans heurt, sans bavure, sans empiètement, sans empâtement, sans le moindre décalage; une sorte de ballet sans figure de danses, une perfection tournoyante subtilement agencée et sans cesse renouvelée.

Deux premières auditions : « La symphonie N. 3 » du compositeur américain William Schumann, et « Mathis le peintre », d'Indemith, étaient inscrites en seconde partie au programme du concert.

La symphonie débute par une « Passacaille » d'une réelle noblesse d'inspiration. La fugue qui la suit, conçue dans un style au fond très classique, révèle de la part de son auteur une grande dextérité d'écriture. L'ensemble est comme il se doit fortement charpenté, sans que cependant sa couleur orchestrale soit bien significative.

William Schumann continue par un choral d'un caractère assez méditatif. La Toccata finale constitue une brillante péroraison.

Au total, une œuvre intéressante, certes, et magistralement écrite, malheureusement gâtée par une une réthorique un peu trop voyante. Un usage aussi massif du contrepoint rigoureux finit par devenir accablant.

« Mathis le peintre » est une suite d'orchestre d'unn tout autre venue. Sa première partie, le « Concert des anges », est une page d'un lyrisme admirable, qui vient s'inscrire d'elle-même dans la grande tradition symphonique allemande. Tout se passe comme si Hindemith avait spontanément retrouvé et recréé, dans le langage si complexe et si tendu qui est le sien, le romantisme de ses illustres prédécesseurs.

La tristesse bouleversante du second mouvement, « Inhumation », et la véritable orgie rtyhmique de « La tentation de Saint Antoine » suffiraient, si Hindemith était encore à découvrir, à le placer au premier rang des compositeurs modernes.

Ce splendide concert prit fin sur l'« Alborada del Gracioso », de Maurice Ravel, que Pierre Monteux accepta de donner en « bis » devant l'enthousiasme de l'auditoire.

This Clipping From
MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS
MAY 23 1952

Sending Our Talent Abroad

The appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Paris recently was greeted with enthusiam and appreciation by the people of that city. The program of French and American music was heard by many French notables, including several of the highest officials in the government.

Too many Europeans regard America as a nation of materialists with a culture that is immature and unimportant. Appearance of American groups such as the Boston Symphony, a superb musical organization, could help to convince people that this notion is wrong. It is wise to show Europe, when occasion serves, that along with our skills as builders, producers and engineers we have made real cultural contributions to the world.

THE OBSERVER, MAY 25, 1952

Festival in Paris

By TERENCE KILMARTIN

PARIS in May is so rich in artistic entertainment that any additional display runs the risk of being submerged in the already vast programme of concerts, ballets, plays, films, operas, art exhibitions, etc. The much-advertised festival of "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" which is going on there throughout the month has been struggling manfully to keep its identity, but as far as I could see during a visit covering the first fortnight, the point of this cultural cavalcade seemed to be sadly lost on the Parisian public.

The festival is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, a sort of "Internationale" of liberal intellectuals. Its aim in Paris was the laudable and enterprising one of presenting an international symposium of twentieth-century art which would serve as an expression of faith in Western culture and a plea for intellectual freedom. But the show is very much an American one, financed by American money, run largely by American organisers, attended, it would seem, largely by American audiences, and in the context of the cold war it all looks to the hypersensitive and politically minded French like another American "invasion." There have been gibes about "Nato culture," "dollar imperialism" in a cultural disguise, and so on—all very silly, of course, but the festival organisers deserve some blame for allowing this impression to get around. The ideological basis of the festival should have been clarified in advance by the series of public debates and lectures, attended by an impressive panel of international literati, which in fact did not begin until half-way through.

*

But it would be churlish not to acknowledge that, however much it may have misfired as an ideological demonstration, the festival has offered a fascinating sample of the rich, febrile, controversial, and, when all is said and done, immensely stimulating output of twentieth-century artists. Opera and ballet have been the highlights: the festival appropriately opened with two superb performances of Berg's "Wozzeck" by the Vienna Opera and will close this week with "Billy Budd" and a new opera by the American composer Virgil Thomson, with a libretto by Gertrude Stein. In between these there have been "Don Perlimplin," a charming one-act opera by the Italian Vittorio Rieti on a theme of Garcia Lorca, and the Stravinsky-Cocteau opera-oratorio "Oedipus Rex."

Stravinsky, who personally conducted three concerts of his own works as well as his ballet "Orphée," has been one of the heroes of the festival. Another is George Balanchine. Apart from a couple of lightweight new, French pieces unspiringly performed by the Grands Ballets du Marquis de Cuevas, the ballet programme, which finished last week, was an all-Balanchine affair. His New York City Company, seen in London last year, must now be as good as any in the Western world. They have the American virtues of youth, precision and enthusiasm allied to Balanchine's European experience and style. Their performances in Paris during the second week of the festival ranged from Balanchine's version of "Swan Lake" to a gay little exercise in jive called "The Pied Piper," by Jerome Robbins.

*

The problem of presenting "L'Oeuvre du XXème Siècle" (the French title makes the festival sound even more ambitious) should have been most easily solved in the case of painting and sculpture, and one looked forward to seeing some of those spectacular masterpieces of the Ecole de Paris that have been spirited away across the Atlantic. A large proportion of the works selected do in fact emanate from American collections, and none of them is negligible; but apart from some superb Rousseaus and a handful of others, the general effect of the exhibition is curiously austere. The bare bones of modern painting are there, without the flesh and blood. This may have been a jaundiced personal impression; Londoners may judge for themselves, however, when the exhibition is brought to the Tate Gallery in July.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 25 1952

SHADOW OF THE PAST

Spirit of 19th Century Looms Over Works At 20th Century Exposition in Paris

By OLIN DOWNES

PARIS.

THE first days of the Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century Exposition held in this city have seen a plethora of significant music, and many more events than one observer, even if he could divide himself, could possibly attend. The first week was especially rich in orchestral music. Not all of it was twentieth century, nor was all that carried a twentieth-century dateline twentieth century in spirit.

For, if we seek what we could call a twentieth-century spirit in music, as distinguished from the viewpoint of the nineteenth century, it is questionable whether we find it—music with an unmistakably contemporaneous noté in its measures—until after the first decade of the century. Until then the whole attitude was nineteenth century. One work signalized the breaking down of the older order. It was Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

Mahler Song Cycle

Bruno Walter gave a concert with the orchestra of the Paris Opéra. His special piece, one that he interprets with the most exceptional insight and sympathy, was Mahler's "Lied von der Erde." There is little more nineteenth century than that! It is the acme of the older, more sentimental kind of romanticism, and so sincere and inspired that it may probably emerge in the perspective of time as Mahler's finest work. Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un faune" is by date, as well as creative spirit, nineteenth century. Strauss' "Don Juan" is far back of that—Strauss' earliest important symphonic poem dating from the Eighteen Eighties. No twentieth century there!

We fear that the nineteenth-century romanticism, and sentimentalism too, was warmly welcomed by Mr. Walter's audience as constituting an element of obvious melody and no less obvious emotional appeal, for which some modern persons were, perhaps, famished.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler was conducting a symphonic program with the Berlin Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on the same night that "Wozzeck" was being mounted at the Champs-Elysées Theatre. He found large audiences for two programs, one of which included Schumann's Fourth Symphony as its major item, with Honegger's Third Symphony (which is wholly twentieth century), the Weber "Oberon" Overture, the Ravel "Spanish Rhapsody" and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," still a mighty score if the conductor has power, which Furtwaengler possesses.

Familiar Program

The other program was Beethoven-Brahms, of the kind that perhaps every country, save Italy and France, are familiar with. At this concert, Joseph Szigeti and Pierre Fournier played the Brahms Double Concerto. Beethoven's "Great Fugue," in an orchestral arrangement, the "Egmont" Overture and Brahms' Second Symphony, completed a list which drew—twentieth century or no!

The Boston Symphony was fully abreast of the times in its programs, which were not entirely proportionate and just to the entire musical situation. The triumphs of the two conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, both Frenchmen, were stirring to behold, and eminently deserved. But the basis of their achievement was the orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky developed and perfected during a quarter of a century. This was the incomparable instrument that Koussevitzky put into the hands of those who used it with such authority and imagination. The concert took place on the stage of the historic Opéra, and it was a singular link to the past.

It was on this stage that the present writer first heard Koussevitzky conduct the last of the Koussevitzky Concerts which were his for seasons before going to America to the Boston Symphony. At that concert Igor Stravinsky was present as soloist, playing his own piano concerto. Prokofieff sat in a box, young and already bald and strange-looking, as Koussevitzky directed the first performance of his singular work for chorus and orchestra, "Sept, ils sont sept." It was this earlier that Koussevitzky gave the Boston Symphony the acme of tonal beauty and technical finish which had neither been preceded nor repeated by any conductor before or after him.

The two works, definitively of the twentieth century and uncompromising masterpieces in their respective forms, were Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck." Stravinsky attended the performance of "Wozzeck," which was new to him. He was, or professed to be, deeply impressed. Today he is fascinated, it seems, by Schoenberg, Berg and fellow atonalists. But this is noticeable: Stravinsky himself, with all his professed interest in the twelve-toners, is not turning that way at all, unless in scores not yet heard. He may think one way today, and another tomorrow; he remains in practice a neo-classicist who has not and never can have to do with Wagner's chromaticism, of which the Schoenberg school and the Berg opera are twentieth-century offshoots.

Stravinsky also observed that the opera, as he felt it, had a pronounced shortcoming: There was no really vocal music in it. The work is instrumental in very essence and has an underlying instrumental concept.

But here, in the Berg score, is certainly a new departure. The harmonic approach is genuinely new. Whether it leads in an important direction is something we cannot answer today. But its quality, where structure and balance of all elements are concerned, is that of a masterpiece.

Extra-Realistic

It is one of the most realistic and most fantastic of operas. The seen and the unseen, the dream and the sordid reality, have the closest affinity in its measures. This is also true of the musico-dramatic development. It is a truism that opera slows action: we must accept this cardinal fact as one of the principles of opera. But in "Wozzeck" the music is not held up an instant.

There are musical interludes, as there are in "Pelléas et Mélisande." But they are usually shorter and more decisive. They lead the drama on its way, tonally speaking. They seem to hasten the action rather than retard it. They are not exterior accompaniments of a pantomime as we do they suggest action. They communicate in the swiftest way, a mood. They seems to generate the action that follows.

It has been well said that a sudden, swift act may be the product of long and sleepless hours of meditation, even unconscious. Suddenly an inner impulse finds shape, and the next moment the drama is precipitated. The orchestra plays that inner role in "Wozzeck." The opera [illegible] lematic in the extreme. Of its ultimate value one [illegible] remains the most arresting and significant of operas composed in the last few generations.

[201]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 25 1952

MUSIC

r Critic's Report For the Week

WARREN STOREY SMITH

ile the Boston Symphony ha winning new laurels in Europ up of 80, mostly young an fore eager musicians, has bee in at the Pops. This Ma Orchestra, as it is now bein , has one more week, or fou ths of a week, to go; thi day through next Sunday that, the Symphony men, o portion of them that play i Pops, will carry on nightl gh June.

* * *

en Wilhelm Gericke too the Boston Symphony in 188 is to say at the beginnin s fourth season, he said t Higginson after two con "You have not an orchestr There are some musician It is hardly an orchestra is what might have been said gh no one said it publicly, c irst concert of the new Pop stra, that of May 1. The play themselves had been carefull ned by Arthur Fiedler an have since demonstrated con rely that he was a good picke on the opening night, whil played with abundant spir commendable precision, th orchestral values were miss The players in their nine co e hours of rehearsal had no learned to hear each othe brass was overenthusiasti on the blatant side. The strin was thin, and not only be there are fewer strings i group than we have been hav t the Pops of late years. Tim by the way, when only a littl than half the Symphony men ed in the Pops. The first chai have never done so and in th days a large number of th s betook themselves to vari ummer jobs. Now about nine s of the men play at the Pop they add up to a body of per ers larger and, it is hardly sary to say, more skilfull than verage symphony orchestra.

* * *

yway, it did not take Mr er long to get the substitute estra to a point where listen to it could be genuinely pleas le, as I discovered at the open oncert of the third week. A rted here at the time, ther a finish and a refinement i rmance, a tonal balance lack at the outset. It will be i ting to see how the real Pop estra sounds by comparison men have had a tough sche in Europe, 15 concerts in 2 in 10 cities of five countrie they will have had a brief re he ship. Moreover, they ar e habit of attacking the Pop et immediately after th phony season and of playin ay through May. There ha een the strain of travel an ecessity of trying to appe where at the top of the something they do not do. fraid, in the nightly routi e Pops, where most of t

F THE PAST

Looms Over Works
Exposition in Paris

WNES

zky directed the first perform-of his singular work for rus and orchestra, "Sept, ils sept." It was thereafter that ssevitzky gave the Boston phony the acme of tonal beau-and technical finish which had her been preceded nor repeated any conductor before or after

The two works, definitively of twentieth century and unques-ed masterpieces in their respecforms, were Stravinsky's cre du Printemps" and Alban g's opera, "Wozzeck." Straky attended the performance
"Wozzeck," which was new to
He was, or professed to be, ly impressed. Today he is fased, it seems, by Schoenberg, and fellow atonalists. But is noticeable: Stravinsky him-
, with all his professed interin the twelve-toners, is not ming that way at all, unless in ores not yet heard. He may nk one way today, and another morrow; he remains in practice neo-classicist who has not and er can have to do with Wag-
's chromaticism, of which the hoenberg school and the Berg ers are twentieth-century offoots.

Stravinsky also observed that opera, as he felt it, had a pro-nced shortcoming: There was really vocal music in it. The ic is instrumental in very es-ce and has an underlying in-mental concept.

ut here, in the Berg score, is tainly a new departure. The monic approach is genuinely
. Whether it leads in an imant direction is something we not answer today. But its qual-where structure and balance ll elements are concerned, is of a masterpiece.

re-Realistic is one of the most realistic most fantastic of operas. The and the unseen, the dream the sordid reality, have the st affinity in its measures.

is also true of the musicomatic development. It is a m that opera slows action; we accept this cardinal fact as of the principles of opera. But Vozzeck" the music is not held n instant.

ere are musical interludes, as are in "Pelléas et Mélisande," they are usually shorter and decisive. They lead the a on its way, tonally speak-
They seem to hasten the ac-rather than retard it. They not exterior accompaniments pantomime nor do they sug-action. They communicate, in swiftest way, a mood. This to generate the action that ys.

has been well said that a n, swift act may be the prod-f long and sleepless nights editation, even uncertainty.
nly an inner impulse takes
, and the next incident of the is precipitated. The music that inner role in "Woz-
The opera remains probic in the extreme. Of its ulti-value one is not sure. It ns the most arresting and cant of operas composed in t few generations.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report For the Week

WARREN STOREY SMITH

new laurels in Europe and has been Pops. This May being or four-20; this next Sunday.
Symphony men, or that play in ghosts

Boston Symphony in 1884, at the new young season, he said to after [illegible] connot an orchestra
some musicians.
orchestra."
said, music, from their point of view, relatively untaxing.

* * *

to this business of playing for all they are worth that makes the new Pops Orchestra a bit different from the regular one.
These young musicians—and, as I say, they are mostly that—plainly appreciate the honor and the experience that has come their way.
And the speed with which they have acquired the missing polish in performance, and the smooth and flexible ensemble, bears witness both to their native ability and to the skill of Mr. Fiedler.
Several years ago the latter organized a youth orchestra and in a short time had it playing like a bunch of veterans. That was largely an amateur group. This is not. Its members have all had orchestral experience, while a few of them are veterans in the true sense of the word, being either ex-Boston Symphony men or players of long experience in a variety of musical fields.

* * *

What it really amounts to is this: Ours is an orchestral age.
These players did not go into the respective American orchestras from which they came and to which, by and large, they will return next season, without having had both orchestral experience and an instinct for orchestral playing.
A large number got the former in the orchestra of the New England Conservatory. And they can easily have acquired the latter by listening to orchestral records and broadcasts. In Gericke's day, if you wished to hear a symphony orchestra, you had to go to one of the cities that boasted such a luxury and buy yourself a ticket.

* * *

Be that as it may, Mr. Fiedler's experiment has borne rich fruit, the Pops went on, if only for four nights a week and with a weekly rather than a nightly program.
And when the European invitation came it was immediately assumed that there would be no Pops during May. The man who saved the day was Arthur Fiedler.

The final program to be offered by the May Pops Orchestra contains one item of rare interest, the Concert Symphonique for piano orchestra, No. 4 in D minor, Op. 104, by Henry Charles Litolff (1818-91),
a composer who would be completely unknown to present-day
Bostonians but for the attention that Mr. Fiedler occasionally pays to his Overture, "Robespierre."

* * *

Litolff was a pioneer in the matter of the symphonic concerto, something of which Lszt took due note by dedicating his First Concerto to Litolff and by adopting the term "Concert Symphonique" for his Second. The pianist who will (presumably) introduce this work to Boston is Gerson Yessin.
Other numbers on the program are Schubert's Marche Militaire, the
"Egmont" Overture of Beethoven,
the Schubert-Wilhemj "Ave Maria," the Intermezzo from Pagliacci," Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and lighter numbers by Waldteufel, Gershwin and Anderson.

To get back to Litolff, few musicians can be unacquainted with the name. The Collection Litolff, started by Henry's adopted son
Theodore, was the first of a series of inexpensive editions of the classics. Of the symphony concertos Nos. 3, 4 and 5, Grove says melody and rhythm and for their wealth of original ideas in harmony, melody and rhythem and for their beautiful instrumentation." The Third has been twice heard at the Symphony concerts, in '89 and
'98, and the "King Lear" Overture was played in 1903.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MAY 25 1952

Danny Kuntz Gets Message From Home Town in Germany

Durgin's Dispatch Brings Tears to Eyes of Ex-Symphony Violinist

By JOAN McPARTLIN

"I had tears in my eyes when I read that story."

That's what Danny Kuntz, former Boston Symphony Orchestra musician, said yesterday when he saw Cyrus Durgin's dispatch from Germany.

Durgin, Globe music critic, traveling abroad with the symphony, reported that Kuntz's home town of Oberstaufenbach was sending him a greeting—a picture of Kuntz as a young man, a picture of the town, and a message signed by village officials.

"It was the very first I heard of the greeting," said Kuntz happily. "I was delighted. Isn't that nice of those people to send me a greeting?"

Danny Kuntz was one of the first members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in the 1880's, and he was a violinist in it for 30-odd years. He's had an active life as a musician. Now 82, he's still interested in every phase of music except composing.

"I am no composer," he declares.

Kuntz was one of the three musical brothers, one also a violinist and one a pianist. He came to this country as a youth, became an American citizen, and married a girl of German parentage who had been born here.

American vacationists met Kuntz in many places. Besides his work with the Symphony, he led a Boston orchestra which gave concerts at the Algonquin Club, conducted the Summer orchestra at the Poland Spring House, and until he was 77, led the orchestra at the Lake Placid Club.

GETS WORD FROM HOME—Danny Kuntz.

Lives in Back Bay Now

He now lives in a Back Bay hotel, in a room decorated with pictures and bric-a-brac picked up during his career. On the mantel, for instance, sits a metronome. Kuntz doesn't use it any more, but he likes to see it standing there.

"I listen to the B. S. O. concerts on my radio," he says. "I don't go to concerts any more—have to sit still too long. But music is different now anyway, much peppier than in my day, when conductors had a classic style."

Kuntz remembers working with famous conductors, such as Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, and Max Fiedler.

Right now he's waiting to receive the greeting, which will be brought back to the United States by B. S. O. manager George E. Judd.

He's already heard about the concert in Frankfurt, which was attended by a party of 14 of his relatives. They hired a bus for the trip back and forth from Oberstaufenbach, and wrote him immediately after the affair.

How did they like it?

"Naturally," says Kuntz, "they said it was marvelous!"

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAY 25 1952

MUSIC

Special Broadcasts Planned As Koussevitzky Memorial

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

The first anniversary of the death of Serge Koussevitzky on June 4 will be marked by many special broadcasts on both major networks and independent stations throughout the country. The programs, which will also commemorate the tenth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, are to include recordings made by the late conductor as well as works commissioned by the Foundation which he created.

In Paris, where Koussevitzky first became internationally known, the anniversary will be observed in a memorial broadcast by Radiodiffusion Francaise and a concert by the Pascal String Quartet under the auspices of the U. S. Embassy will include quartets commissioned by the Foundation. A number of symphony orchestras abroad are planning to include in their Fall concerts works which came into being through the Foundation's inspiration and aid.

Many more symphonies here have scheduled Fall programs honoring the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, whose life long interest in the contemporary composer is being perpetuated through the work of the Foundation. Leonard Bernstein will conduct a memorial concert at Tanglewood on August 9 during the Berkshire Music Festival. This program is to include Aaron Copland's Symphony No. 3, a work which was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

Since 1942, when the late conductor established the Foundation in memory of his wife Natalie, some 50 works in all categories have been commissioned by the organization. American composers are well represented among the beneficiaries who also number such foreign luminaries as Stravinsky, Schoenberg, and Honegger.

The Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., established through a permanent endowment from the original organization in January, 1950, now is chiefly responsible for the commissioning of new works by composers of all nations. All of the original scores and manuscripts of the commissioned works of both of the Koussevitzky Foundations are to be found in the permanent collection in the Library of Congress.

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has espoused contemporary music interests also by sponsoring new educational trends and by providing funds for concerts of new music. In 1948, the London Committee for the Promotion of New Music received a grant for concert purposes and to provide awards to two composers selected by the Committee. In 1950, the Foundation made a grant to help finance three concerts of contemporary American music in the American Academy in Rome.

Another living monument to the late conductor is the Berkshire Music Center, the school which he established at Tanglewood. Some 3,000 students have been in attendance at the Center which will observe its 10th anniversary this season.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony, as the conductor of which Dr. Koussevitzky made musical history during his tenure of 25 years, opened its current European tour in Paris on May 6 in a scene of wild excitement. Press and public went completely overboard for the Boston musicians in their first concert at the May Festival of the Twentieth Century Arts in Paris. Though the orchestra is 71 years old, this represents the first time in its history that it has appeared in Europe. This tour abroad is being made under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, sponsors of the Paris Festival.

Zion Lutheran Choir To Give Concert Tonight

A program of sacred music will be given by the Zion Lutheran Chorale Choir this evening at 8:15. Alfred Kuhn will direct the singers in the concert which will take place in the Zion Evangelical Lutheran Church on Davenport Avenue. The members of the choir are: The Misses Mildred Kraemer, Inge Weber, Janet Haupt, Ruth Haupt, Mae McLean, Mrs. A. Moritz, Stanley Greimont, Ted Engelder, Max Tietjen, George Moritz, and Hank Tietjen. Mrs. M. Tietjen will be at the organ this evening.

Maunder Cantata To Be Sung At Whitneyville Church

Tonight at 8 in the Whitneyville Congregational Church (Whitney Avenue and Putnam Avenue) the church choir, under the direction of Dwight Blakeslee, will present J. H. Maunder's Cantata, "Penitence, Pardon, and Peace" accompanied on the organ by Mrs. G. Robert Millar.

The guest soloists will be Frances Covone, soprano and William Reynolds, baritone. A free will offering will be taken, proceeds to be used in purchasing additional choir robes.

Miss Covone is a member of the New Haven Chorale and was one of the soloists in their March concert. Mr. Reynolds is known in New Haven as a baritone soloist and has sung many Cantatas in and around New Haven. Mr. Blakeslee, director of the Whitneyville Choir, studies in New York with the American Theater Wing, under their Professional Training Program. At present he is studying voice with Bernard Taylor of Juilliard School of Music, and general musicianship with Vally Weigl, contemporary composer. Mr. Blakeslee is also a member of the New Haven Chorale and serves on their Board of Governors.

[202]

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

MAY 25 1952

Speaking of Music

By Martin W. Bush

Audience Reversed; Stravinsky Now Hero

You may have read about it in a United Press dispatch carried in this newspaper or in other publications. The story was of a recent concert in Paris by our Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Pierre Monteaux. The point is that they played Igor Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" in the same theater in which Mr. Monteaux had conducted its first performance, as a ballet, on May 29, 1913—39 years ago come Thursday.

A more significant point: the contrast of audience reception of the work on the two occasions.

Stories of the audience reaction to the then new music back in 1913 have now become first-rate stranger-than-fiction items in the lore of music. By way of evidence that volatility of Parisan audiences is not a mere myth, here are a few of the capers provoked by that dissonant, revolutionary music that night.

After the first few measures the audience was twittering and old Saint-Saens left the theater in disgust. One writer heard it as "a barnyard come to life." Eventually, restlessness turned into riotous pandemonium. Ordinarily staid Parisian citizens scraped off their veneer and went primitive. As primitive as the music and ballet in its depiction of prehistoric pagan Russia.

A countess wildly brandished her fan, loudly proclaiming, "This is the first time in 60 years that any one has dared to make a fool of me." Other dowagers engaged in hair-pulling and spitting in each others' faces. The men wielded canes and fists without benefit of Queensbery rules, no holds barred. There were torn clothes and blackened eyes, aplenty. All because the music created two schools of thought—"fer and agin."

At this recent concert the audience received the music, not merely without protest, but with unanimous, prolonged acclaim.

This tale is retold only because of its admonition—a simple one. Men who put opinions of music in writing—critics, to you—have through all history been the butt of ridicule for verdicts long since reversed. And here's a case of an audience verdict having been reversed by history. A case of the music world, given time, growing up to advanced ideas. Because Stravinsky's musical ideas, though revolutionary at that time, have been proved sound.

Inference: if not exactly valorous, it's really more discreet to hold fire on new music, especially on first hearing.

This Clipping From
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
ARK. GAZETTE

MAY 25 1952

Tops in Music

Judy Garland, darling of show business who brought vaudeville back and received critical acclaim both here and abroad with her international variety show, returns to guest star on two more of CBS-KLRA's "Bing Crosby" shows. Miss Garland appeared on the show last Wednesday and will be Bing's guest next Wednesday and on June 4.

This will mark Miss Garland's first radio appearances since last year, prior to her sensational vaudeville engagements, when she guest starred on eight of Bing's programs.

The program for KVLC's "Music Shelf" this morning at 9:30 will be highlighted by a recorded performance of Ravel's "Bolero" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. "Bolero" has been evaluated as a masterpiece of orchestration, revealing the enormous powers of the symphony orchestras, and the almost infinite variety of tonal effects of which it is capable. In an entirely different vein will be the presentation by Oscar Levant and Morton Gould and the orchestra of Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra," one of the American composer's more serious works, and one which many critics believe to be one of his most outstanding compositions.

Lucile Cummings, American contralto, will sing the dramatic aria "Ah, Mon Fils" from Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," when she makes another appearance as guest soloist on The Telephone Hour tomorrow on KARK at 8 p. m.

Symphony off Key in Bike Movement

LONDON (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its debut in Britain an hour late tonight because of evening clothes for its 104 members got tied up by a bicycle race in France.

THE 3500 TICKET HOLDERS for tonight's concert in Royal Festival Hall will have to wait from 8 to 9 P. M. to hear it. The British Broadcasting Company rearranged its evening programs.

London has seldom seen so much excitement before a musical event, a spokesman for the British managers said today. All the seats for the concert were sold four days ago and tickets went for as much as £5 ($14) each.

THE ORCHESTRA wound up a successful continental tour Saturday with a concert at Bordeaux, France, under the baton of Charles Munch. But yesterday a truck carrying the players' evening clothes got stuck behind a bicycle race between Paris and Bordeaux.

SYMPHONY
(Continued on Page Seven)

(Continued from First Page)

The musicians got to London on time. But bicycle races take priority in France, so their truck was forced to creep along at bike-pedalling speed—and missed the boat train to London.

The truck, which also carried six bass viols and a number of trucks of sheet music, will be rushed today to the crack Paris-London train, the Golden Arrow. A special corps of workers will stand by at Victoria station in London to whisk the evening clothes to the musicians at Festival Hall.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 26 1952

Tastes in Music Seen Advancing

To the Editor—I read in the Globe of the favorable reception of Stravinsky's masterpiece played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Theatre des Champs Elysees (Le Sacre du Printemps) and of its favorable reception in contrast to its first hearing at which time it was ridiculed.

This is a further confirmation of what I have personally noted with respect to the advance in musical taste during the first 75 years of my life.

When I was about 10 years old I used to go to the annual farewell concerts of Adlina Patti in the old Boston Music Hall, which were advertised to begin at 8 o'clock, at which time the place would be packed to the doors. But Patti would not appear until about 8:45.

At the conclusion of these concerts they would not let her go until, as a double encore, she would sing "The Last Rose of Summer" and "Home Sweet Home." Can you imagine a present-day audience in that frame of mind?

I think the Boston Symphony will make a great impression on their visit abroad. The Met Opera standard of performance would do likewise. I have heard the opera in Paris and, as it seemed to me, they sang and acted as though half asleep. The performances here are much superior to anything I heard anywhere on the other side of the Atlantic.

ERNEST M. SKINNER.
Reading.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY 26 1952

Bike Race Delays Symphony Schedule

LONDON, May 26 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its debut in Britain an hour late tonight because the evening clothes for its 104 members got tied up by a bicycle race in France.

The 3500 ticketholders for tonight's concert in Royal Festival Hall will have to wait from 8 to 9 p. m. to hear it. The British Broadcasting Company rearranged its evening programs.

London seldom has seen so much excitement before a musical event, a spokesman for the British managers said. All the seats for the concert were sold four days ago and tickets went for as much as £5 ($14) each.

The Boston orchestra wound up a successful Continental tour Saturday with a concert at Bordeaux, France, under the baton of Charles Much. But yesterday a truck carrying the players' evening clothes got stuck behind a bicycle race between Paris and Bordeaux.

The players got to London on time. But bicycle races take priority in France, so their truck was forced to creep along at bike-pedalling speed—and missed the boat train to London.

The truck, which also carried six bass viols and a number of music trunks, will be rushed to the crack Paris-London train, the Golden Arrow, today. A special corps of workers will stand by at Victoria Station in London to whisk the evening clothes to the musicians who will be waiting at Festival Hall.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN-TIMES
MAY 27 1952

BICYCLE RACE DELAYS CONCERT

LONDON (AP) — A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert Monday night.

The race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. The truck missed crossing the channel.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded onto a subsequent boat, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 26 1952

had been removed.

S.

Symphony Concerts

To the Editor of The Times:

Upon first coming to Hartford a few years ago, I was most pleasantly surprised to learn of the annual series of concerts by great symphonic orchestras presented in the Bushnell Memorial.

These concerts, I have always felt, help immeasurably to place Hartford culturally in a class far above that of most cities much larger in size.

Not many communities will be able to enjoy next season performances by the Boston, New York, Cleveland and Philadelphia Orchestras, as well as by the eminent Danish State Symphony of Copenhagen.

The coming of the Danish organization is of particular interest, giving as it does, a fine international flavor to the series. This will be the second internationally famous symphonic group included in the series in three years, for I recall with pleasure the grand concert by the Royal Philharmonic in 1950.

Perhaps many people do not realize a fact that has recently come to my attention, that at this time of the year a sizable number of seats for next season's Bushnell Series become available for new subscribers.

Experience has shown that now, instead of next Fall, is the time to apply for such seats. Once obtained they may be held year after year.

MARY B. WHEELER.

This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD-DISPATCH
MAY 27 1952

Music Can Wait

LONDON, May 26. (AP) — A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

[203]

Boston Symphony Has London "Nightmare"

LONDON, May 26 (Reuters) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra, winding up a European tour with a concert here tonight, found itself facing a musicians' nightmare : instruments had gone astray.

Six of the orchestra's nine double basses were on a truck which broke down en route to Paris from Bordeaux, where the orchestra performed Saturday night. By the time it reached Paris it had missed the boat train.

The instruments and all the 100 trunks containing the players' costumes are expected here tomorrow. With crossed fingers, the orchestra set back the starting time of the concert to 8 p.m. (3 p.m. E.D.T.)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

Bicycle Race Delays Symphony Concert

LONDON, May 27 (AP) — A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here Monday.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

SLOW TEMPO DELAYS ORCHESTRA

"Evening News" Reporter

THREE thousand five hundred people who have booked every seat in the Royal Festival Hall for to-night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the orchestra's first and only concert in this country—will have to wait an hour after the scheduled time before the first note is played.

And the reason is a bicycle race in France.

The orchestra of 104 players—only one woman among them—and their conductor, Charles Munch, arrived last night from the Continent. They were due to rehearse in the Royal Festival Hall this morning.

But their instruments, all their dress clothes and all their music failed to arrive.

Made Detour

All the baggage was stored in two lorries which set out from Bordeaux to Paris to catch the boat-train due to arrive in London this morning.

But before the lorry had travelled very far they caught up with a bicycle race between Bordeaux and Paris. The driver had to crawl behind the cyclists for mile after mile until they could make a detour.

Then they put on speed and made a dash for Paris. The first lorry, carrying most of the instruments arrived just in time to make the train connection. But the second lorry, containing six double-basses, the dress suits and the music, was left well behind.

Whn it was learned what had happened there were frantic conferences in London among Mr. George H. Judd, general manager of the orchestra, Mr. T. E. Bean, general manager of the Royal Festival Hall, and representatives of Messrs. Harold Holt, the impresarios, and of the B.B.C.

Broadcast Stands

It was decided to postpone the start of the concert from 8 p.m. until 9 p.m. The B.B.C. agreed to rearrange their Third Programme schedule so that the whole of it could still be broadcast.

Meanwhile, in Paris the contents of the second lorry were being loaded on to the Golden Arrow, due at Victoria at 7.30 p.m. to-night.

Because the Paris authorities loaded the orchestra's equipment last it may be the first out at Victoria. It was arranged that the dress suits should be rushed first from Victoria so the players could be changing while their instruments and music were on the way.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

MAY 26 1952

n "Nightmare"

ith a concert here to-found itself facing a ns' nightmare today—
ents had gone astray.
f the orchestra's nine basses were on a truck roke down en route to om Bordeaux, where the
a performed Saturday
By the time it reached had missed the London
n.

nstruments and ward-nks containing some of yers' evening clothes,
cted here this evening.
ossed fingers, the or-set back the opening
he concert from 8 to 9
. m., E. D. T.).

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

MAY 27 1952

Race Delays
ny Concert

N, May 27 (AP). — A bi e in France forced the ymphony Orchestra to curtain time an hour for here Monday.
cycle race, between Bor Paris, had the right of other traffic, including a ying part of the orches-ment. As a result, the ed an early boat train.

KAFOOFLE and MUSIC —BOSTON FASHION

By LEONARD MOSLEY

[illegible] part of [illegible] concert
[illegible] of [illegible] mphony

[illegible] The con-
[illegible] Munch, of [illegible] ising and [illegible] in Gallic
[illegible] Boston manager
[illegible] Judd jumping
[illegible] like a [illegible] Mr.
[illegible] e Royal [illegible] as if he [illegible] himself into [illegible] Theatre.

Delay

And [illegible] a kafoofle—
[illegible] Orchestra has [illegible] happened
[illegible] London.

[illegible] dinners and [illegible] delayed on the [illegible] cycle race.
[illegible] night ferry
[illegible] forced into a [illegible] compelled to [illegible] and arrived
[illegible] concert was [illegible] hour while [illegible] cheerfully and [illegible] into their bibs

[illegible] loved all the [illegible] confusion. Not for [illegible] been christened
[illegible] Beer Band.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of 104 very [illegible] musicians.

Ego

[illegible] platform their [illegible]. In Paris
[illegible] manager and [illegible] n one hotel. In [illegible] are spread them-
[illegible] the town, too.
[illegible] they really did
[illegible] 104 of them
[illegible] musical instru-
[illegible] gave a fire and a [illegible] m to Honegger's
[illegible] and a heavy [illegible] to parts of [illegible] Ariane.
[illegible] ded to me
[illegible] of European [illegible] of American

[illegible] manship of [illegible] gave this [illegible] ound swell
[illegible] ality of con-
[illegible] the flir and [illegible] Old World.
[illegible] stand that [illegible] remember.

Big Thrill For London

Boston Symphony Orchestra, 104 players strong under the Alsatian conductor Charles Munch and in London for one night, certainly gave a packed Festival Hall a great thrill. Their exciting efficiency is quite unusual to us.

Where have we a battery of four trumpets or a set of six horns who play unerringly whatever the demands of the music? Where have we strings who play so exactly in such an unostentatious and matter-of-fact manner?

But this magnificent orchestra failed through their own special quality—their persistently uniform brilliance of tone. They made music by Samuel Barber, Roussel, Honegger, Piston, Debussy and Ravel sound as if it were all by one composer.

Best performed piece was Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Showpiece was Honegger's Fifth Symphony of 1950, in which Shostakovitch and Kabelevsky and other composers who deliberately write for the masses are completely outdistanced at their own game.

P. B.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 27 1952

LONDON OVATION WON BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, made its first and only appearance in Britain tonight with a concert of French and American works at Royal Festival Hall here. The audience gave a great ovation to the orchestra, especially for Honegger's Fifth Symphony.

Nobody disputed the virtuosity of the players nor their precision. However, some of the London music critics found that very precision rather a mixed blessing.

Commenting that the orchestra reacted "as one man to an extent unknown to us," the Times of London added: "This is not pure gain * * * and it was not till Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe,' the the end of the program, that we found humanity and poetry."

The Daily Mail's Stanley Bayliss made the same point, saying "sheer mechanical virtuosity" was "quite foreign to a good deal of what they played."

Scott Goddard in the News Chronicle said the orchestra "glows with an inner radiance where so many other orchestras merely glitter."

The orchestra's single concert, on its way home after its continental tour, started an hour late because some of its instruments, being trucked across France, missed the night boat to England.

UNDRESS REHEARSAL FOR THE BREATHLESS 'BOSTON'

At nine o'clock last night—an hour later than advertised—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the tempo for his players to begin their concert in the Royal Festival Hall. The concert was put back 60 minutes because the players' evening suits, their music and the double-basses were late in arriving from France—delayed by a six-day bicycle race.

At 7.30 p.m. trucks were waiting at Victoria. The brass-bound black cases were carried into the Festival Hall by 7.55.

At 8 p.m. 103 male players were struggling into dress clothes. Those whose suits came out last were practising the music in their underclothes.

At 8.45 p.m. all the music was ready on the stands.

And 3,500 people waited to hear and cheer.

IT HAS MORE THAN GLITTER

The 61-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their first visit to this country last night, looking in at the Festival Hall for a single concert on their way home after a Continental tour. They were conducted by Charles Munch, who took over from Koussevitzky three years ago.

They differ from other American orchestras we have heard here in that they are not so much a collection of stars as a set of thoroughly excellent players formed into an organisation of great power, well found in all its parts. They glow with an inner radiance where so many other orchestras merely glitter. One day we must hear them in the classics. Last night's music was all of this century.

Honegger's new Fifth Symphony I had heard with a different orchestra last week in Paris. I preferred this performance. There was some magificent playing of works by Roussel and Debussy.

Scott Goddard

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FRENCH AND AMERICAN MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been over in Paris in connexion with the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival, gave its only concert in this country at the Festival Hall last night under Mr. Charles Munch, who is now its permanent conductor.

It played to us what it has been playing in Paris, which in effect limited its programme to four French works and two American. It is difficult to understand why it should only give one concert in London, for we would gladly have heard it in a more representative selection of music.

Nor was its visit without mishap. Its convoy got caught in the toils of a bicycle race on French roads, missed the boat, and so started the concert an hour late at 9 o'clock. An unannounced change in the order of the programme disconcerted the audience in its approach to Honegger's Fifth Symphony "(di trere)" by sub-title, which was having its first performance in Britain. However, nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us. This is not pure gain, as it approximates what should be a corporation to a machine, and it was not till Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe at the end of the programme that we found humanity and poetry.

The tonal quality of the orchestra comes somewhere between the suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the New York Orchestras, which are the two that have paid recent visits to Britain. The wood-wind is very sweet, the flute especially; the strings are capable of both bright and veiled tone and of ample volume. The trumpets sounded like those of New York in their stridency, but they were badly placed for Festival Hall acoustics. Blend was otherwise not abjured, as it is in some American orchestras in favour of sectional independence—the opening of Honegger's symphony established the evenness of the blend in the orchestra's astonishing sonority, which even the Festival Hall's notorious powers of evaporation could not quench.

Honegger's symphony is powerful, dry, and full of invention, but it is not ingratiating. The American pieces were both short and true to their titles: Samuel Barber's concert overture The School for Scandal, was also dry, but not in the grim manner of the twentieth century, rather with the sparkle of the eighteenth, and Walter Piston's Toccata also harked back in texture to the time of Bach.

This description is not to suggest that they were pastiche, for both were modern in technique and feeling: they will serve their generation without opening new vistas. Rousel's Bacchus et Ariane suite and Debussy's La Mer, which are naturally congenial to the conductor, and showed off the virtuosity of the orchestra, gave us rather too much of the same sort of thing in one programme.

Daily Telegraph & Morning Post, Tuesday, May 27, 1952

U.S. ORCHESTRA'S FIRST VISIT

FINE PLAYING

A famous orchestra never before heard in London, the Boston Symphony, gave a concert at the Festival Hall last night under its Alsatian conductor, Charles Munch. A not altogether satisfactory programme of 20th-century French and American music had been chosen; but it was an evening of splendid music-making.

Mr. Munch evidently fancies himself as an exponent of the exciting and the picturesque, and his men responded to him with a sound and a fury that were always of fine musical qualities. In this company of composers, Debussy was the outstanding poet; the performance of "La Mer" had innumerable examples of charm and virtuosity.

Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariadne" ballet remaind theatre music, and Honegger in his fifth symphony, while, as ever, commanding respect for his stylish writing, has once again failed in significant and sustained invention. The Americans were Samuel Barber and Walter Piston, both of them masters of their craft.

R. C.

16 Curtain Calls Given Symphony in London

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a resounding triumph here tonight after its concert was delayed by a French bicycle race.

The sell-out throng at Royal Festival Hall gave conductor Charles Munch 16 curtain calls.

The concert was delayed because the truck carrying its instruments was held up in France to permit a bike race—which had priority — to go through. The equipment missed the channel ferry and the concert had to wait until it got to London.

The performance itself won high acclaim from London's music critics.

Said the Express: "A one-night stand that musical London will remember. The superb result of European direction in charge of American know-how."

The Times commented: "Nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us."

The Telegraph described it as "an evening of splendid music-making."

PARIS CYCLISTS DELAY CONCERT

LONDON VISITORS

Daily Telegraph Reporter

Because part of their equipment was held up on Sunday night on the Bordeaux-Paris road by a midnight cycle race, the Boston Symphony Orchestra were forced to start their concert at the Royal Festival Hall, London, last night an hour after the scheduled time of 8 p.m. A broadcast on the B.B.C. Third Programme was similarly delayed.

Two lorries carrying most of the orchestra's dress clothes, six double basses and the sheet music for the British National Anthem, were caught behind the cyclists on the Bordeaux-Paris road and forced to travel slowly for about half the distance.

As a result they missed the boat train connection. Later, on the way across, there was a further delay because of a mishap at Dunkirk to the train ferry on to which part of the equipment had been loaded.

Arrangements were made in London to despatch the missing equipment to the Festival Hall immediately on its arrival at Victoria. Mr. Leslie Rogers, the orchestra librarian, also borrowed copies of the National Anthem from the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

At a few minutes to eight three lorries drew up outside the Festival Hall with the missing baggage, and assistants began to unload it immediately under the direction of Mr. Harvey Genereux, stage manager of the orchestra. Finally the concert began at 9 p.m. with the British and American National Anthems.

Richard Capell—P6

This Clipping From
MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
MAY 27 1952

Bicycle Race Delays Concert

LONDON—(AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here Monday night.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 26 1952

n "Nightmare"

ith a concert here to- found itself facing a ns' nightmare today— ents had gone astray. f the orchestra's nine basses were on a truck roke down en route to om Bordeaux, where the a performed Saturday By the time it reached had missed the London n.

nstruments and ward- nks containing some of vers' evening clothes, cted here this evening. ossed fingers, the or- set back the opening he concert from 8 to 9 . m., E. D. T.).

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAY 27 1952

Race Delays ny Concert

N, May 27 (AP). — A b e in France forced th ymphony Orchestra t an hour fo here Monday. ycle race, between Bor Paris, had the right o other traffic, including ying part of the orches ment. As a result, th ed an early boat train.

DATE EVENING TUESDAY MAY 27 1952

'KAFOOFLE and MUSIC —BOSTON FASHION

By LEONARD MOSLEY

IT was just the sort of prelude to a concert that the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra like. There was Charles Munch, of France, gaily raising and lowering his hands in Gallic ecstasy. The Boston manager (Mr. George H. Judd) jumping around with excitement like a Mexican bean.

And the Boss himself (Mr. I. E. Beam, manager of the Royal Festival Hall) looking as if he would like to throw himself into the Thames.

Delay

And why? Because a katoofle—as the Boston Orchestra has named it—had happened between Paris and London.

Their evening dresses and music case got delayed on the road in a French cycle race. They missed the night ferry from Paris, were loaded into a special train coupled to the Golden Arrow, and arrived in London as the concert was due to start.

It was postponed an hour while the musicians cheerfully and hurriedly climbed into their bibs and tuckers. They loved all the fuss and confusion. Not for nothing have they been christened the "Boys' Town Band."

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of 104 very individual individualists.

Ego

Off the concert platform their egos come into play. In Paris they defied their manager and refused to live in one hotel. In London they have spread themselves all around the town, too.

But last night they really did play together (all 104 of them) like one inspired musical instrument. They gave a fire and a drum-beat rhythm to Honegger's Fifth Symphony, and a heavy dreamy sweetness to parts of Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane.

The orchestra sounded to me like the superb result of European direction in charge of American know-how.

The skill and musicianship of these deft, clever players gave this programme its solid, round swell of sound. The sensibility of conductor Munch gave it the lift and deep feeling of the Old World.

It was a one-night stand that musical London will remember.

Big Thrill For London

London
The Star
May 27

Boston Symphony Orchestra, 104 players strong under the Alsatian conductor Charles Munch and in London for one night, certainly gave a packed Festival Hall a great thrill. Their exciting efficiency is quite unusual to us.

Where have we a battery of four trumpets or a set of six horns who play unerringly whatever the demands of the music? Where have we strings who play so exactly in such an unostentatious and matter-of-fact manner?

But this magnificent orchestra failed through their own special quality—their persistently uniform brilliance of tone. They made music by Samuel Barber, Roussel, Honegger, Piston, Debussy and Ravel sound as if it were all by one composer.

Best performed piece was Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Showpiece was Honegger's Fifth Symphony of 1950, in which Shostakovitch and Kabelevsky and other composers who deliberately write for the masses are completely outdistanced at their own game.

P. B.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 27 1952

LONDON OVATION WON BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, made its first and only appearance in Britain tonight with a concert of French and American works at Royal Festival Hall here. The audience gave a great ovation to the orchestra, especially for Honegger's Fifth Symphony.

Nobody disputed the virtuosity of the players nor their precision. However, some of the London music critics found that very precision rather a mixed blessing.

Commenting that the orchestra reacted "as one man to an extent unknown to us," the Times of London added: "This is not pure gain * * * and it was not till Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe,' the the end of the program, that we found humanity and poetry."

The Daily Mail's Stanley Bayliss made the same point, saying "sheer mechanical virtuosity" was "quite foreign to a good deal of what they played."

Scott Goddard in the News Chronicle said the orchestra "glows with an inner radiance where so many other orchestras merely glitter."

The orchestra's single concert, on its way home after its continental tour, started an hour late because some of its instruments, being trucked across France, missed the night boat to England.

UNDRESS REHEARSAL FOR THE BREATHLESS 'BOSTON'

London
Express
May 27

AT nine o'clock last night—an hour later than advertised—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the tempo for his players to begin their concert in the Royal Festival Hall. The concert was put back 60 minutes because the players' evening suits, their music and six double-basses were late in arriving from France—delayed by a six-day bicycle race.

At 7.30 p.m. trucks were waiting at Victoria. The brass-bound black cases were carried into the Festival Hall by 7.55.

At 8 p.m. 103 male players were struggling into dress clothes. Those whose suits came out last were practising the music in their underclothes.

At 8.45 p.m. all the music was ready on the stands.

And 3,500 people waited to hear and cheer.

IT HAS MORE THAN GLITTER

The 61-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their first visit to this country last night, looking in at the Festival Hall for a single concert on their way home after a Continental tour. They were conducted by Charles Munch, who took over from Koussevitzky three years ago.

They differ from other American orchestras we have heard here in that they are not so much a collection of stars as a set of thoroughly excellent players formed into an organisation of great power, well found in all its parts. They glow with an inner radiance where so many other orchestras merely glitter. One day we must hear them in the classics. Last night's music was all of this century.

Honegger's new Fifth Symphony I had heard with a different orchestra last week in Paris. I preferred this performance. There was some magificent playing of works by Roussel and Debussy.

Scott Goddard

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FRENCH AND AMERICAN MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been over in Paris in connexion with the "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century" festival, gave its only concert in this country at the Festival Hall last night under Mr. Charles Munch, who is now its permanent conductor.

It played to us what it has been playing in Paris, which in effect limited its programme to four French works and two American. It is difficult to understand why it should only give one concert in London, for we would gladly have heard it in a more representative selection of music.

Nor was its visit without mishap. Its convoy got caught in the toils of a bicycle race on French roads, missed the boat, and so started the concert an hour late at 9 o'clock. An unannounced change in the order of the programme disconcerted the audience in its approach to Honegger's Fifth Symphony "(di trere)" by sub-title, which was having its first performance in Britain. However, nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us. This is not pure gain, as it approximates what should be a corporation to a machine, and it was not till Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe at the end of the programme that we found humanity and poetry.

The tonal quality of the orchestra comes somewhere between the suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the New York Orchestras, which are the two that have paid recent visits to Britain. The wood-wind is very sweet, the flute especially; the strings are capable of both bright and veiled tone and of ample volume. The trumpets sounded like those of New York in their stridency, but they were badly placed for Festival Hall acoustics. Blend was otherwise not abjured, as it is in some American orchestras in favour of sectional independence—the opening of Honegger's symphony established the evenness of the blend in the orchestra's astonishing sonority, which even the Festival Hall's notorious powers of evaporation could not quench.

Honegger's symphony is powerful, dry, and full of invention, but it is not ingratiating. The American pieces were both short and true to their titles: Samuel Barber's concert overture The School for Scandal, was also dry, but not in the grim manner of the twentieth century, rather with the sparkle of the eighteenth, and Walter Piston's Toccata also harked back in texture to the time of Bach.

This description is not to suggest that they were pastiche, for both were modern in technique and feeling; they will serve their generation without opening new vistas. Rousel's Bacchus et Ariane suite and Debussy's La Mer, which are naturally congenial to the conductor, and showed off the virtuosity of the orchestra, gave us rather too much of the same sort of thing in one programme.

Daily Telegraph & Morning Post, Tuesday, May 27, 1952

U.S. ORCHESTRA'S FIRST VISIT

FINE PLAYING

A famous orchestra never before heard in London, the Boston Symphony, gave a concert at the Festival Hall last night under its Alsatian conductor, Charles Munch. A not altogether satisfactory programme of 20th-century French and American music had been chosen; but it was an evening of splendid music-making.

Mr. Munch evidently fancies himself as an exponent of the exciting and the picturesque, and his men responded to him with a sound and a fury that were always of fine musical qualities. In this company of composers, Debussy was the outstanding poet; the performance of "La Mer" had innumerable examples of charm and virtuosity.

Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariadne" ballet remaind theatre music, and Honegger in his fifth symphony, while, as ever, commanding respect for his stylish writing, has once again failed in significant and sustained invention. The Americans were Samuel Barber and Walter Piston, both of them masters of their craft.

R. C.

16 Curtain Calls Given Symphony in London

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a resounding triumph here tonight after its concert was delayed by a French bicycle race.

The sell-out throng at Royal Festival Hall gave conductor Charles Munch 16 curtain calls.

The concert was delayed because the truck carrying its instruments was held up in France to permit a bike race—which had priority — to go through. The equipment missed the channel ferry and the concert had to wait until it got to London.

The performance itself won high acclaim from London's music critics.

Said the Express: "A one-night stand that musical London will remember. The superb result of European direction in charge of American know-how."

The Times commented: "Nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us."

The Telegraph described it as "an evening of splendid music-making."

PARIS CYCLISTS DELAY CONCERT

LONDON VISITORS

May 27

Daily Telegraph Reporter

Because part of their equipment was held up on Sunday night on the Bordeaux-Paris road by a midnight cycle race, the Boston Symphony Orchestra were forced to start their concert at the Royal Festival Hall, London, last night an hour after the scheduled time of 8 p.m. A broadcast on the B.B.C. Third Programme was similarly delayed.

Two lorries carrying most of the orchestra's dress clothes, six double basses and the sheet music for the British National Anthem, were caught behind the cyclists on the Bordeaux-Paris road and forced to travel slowly for about half the distance.

As a result they missed the boat train connection. Later, on the way across, there was a further delay because of a mishap at Dunkirk to the train ferry on to which part of the equipment had been loaded.

Arrangements were made in London to despatch the missing equipment to the Festival Hall immediately on its arrival at Victoria. Mr. Leslie Rogers, the orchestra librarian, also borrowed copies of the National Anthem from the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

At a few minutes to eight three lorries drew up outside the Festival Hall with the missing baggage, and assistants began to unload it immediately under the direction of Mr. Harvey Genereux, stage manager of the orchestra. Finally the concert began at 9 p.m. with the British and American National Anthems.

Richard Capell—P6

This Clipping From
MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
MAY 27 1952

Bicycle Race Delays Concert

LONDON—(AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here Monday night.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 27 1952

French Bike Race Delays Concert

LONDON, May 26—(AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpose curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 27 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Encounter With the Soviet

By CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN, Ger.—The tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently got a little cloak-and-daggerish. But only a little. It was all on account of the oil strike, too. We were supposed to have been flown from Frankfurt to Berlin, as from Brussels to Frankfurt. But we had to settle for a sleeper train.

Now any train to West Berlin has to go through a portion of the Soviet zone, and the Soviets, as you are well aware, ar not easy-going Joes who say "Hi-yuh, fella?" and wave you through.

The United States Army solved the problem by splitting the party in two sections, the first of which went in cars attached to a United States duty train, and the second in a French duty train.

* * *

At the H. I. C. O. G. party a couple of nights ago in Frankfurt, I had asked an official, mostly as a joke but also from curiosity: "I suppose the Russians stop a train every now and again, just to make a nuisance?"

"They haven't yet, and they're not likely to, because they know that we can retaliate in a way which would cut them off," he said.

So we were put in sealed cars attached to the duty train, and once we were in we couldn't get out. Not even to buy a bottle of coke at a station platform. Further, we were told we must pull our shades down between 4:30 and 5 in the morning, which time presumably was the fateful 30 minutes of encounter with the Soviet scout patrol.

Whatever it is that Uncle Joe's boys have, they didn't want any of us to see it, and as a matter of fact, I doubt that anyone would have been interested at 4:30 in the morning.

As luck would have it, I was in the compartment at one end of our car. At what I later discovered was 1 a. m., I heaved up my huge yellow-nylon-clad bulk at the tread of heavy boots outside. Sleep thereafter was punctuated by the prowling of some character who had a bunch of keys, and evidently locked and re-locked each car as he went through the train.

At 4:30, up upon an elbow, with the temptation to leave a warm bunk and peek a teeny-weeny bit around the edge of the window shade. There was a splendid ensemble of snoring up and down the car, in the finest Boston Symphony rhythm and tone, but nought else. No clump of boots, no snatch of either English or Russian. Just complete absolute silence outside.

So while the MPs were dealing with the Russians, and showing those six copies of orders, four in Russian and two in English, covering each man aboard, you wouldn't have known if they had been dealing in sign language.

The next the Globe's wanderer knew it was 6:30 and the train official was inviting us all to rise and perhaps to shine. We were still in the Soviet zone, a little of it, proved by the frequent red banners with hammer and sickle, and one or two of those terrible pictures of Uncle Joe done as he looked when younger and, if the Russians dare to think it, handsomer.

In 10 minutes, however, we were in the American sector, and not long afterward alighting at the suburban station of Lichterfelde-West. How can you make a story out of anything so tame as all this?

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 27 1952

Boston Symphony Orchestra Draws Tremendous Applause at London

London — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra received one of the greatest ovations in London concert history last night when they played their first British concert before a crowd of 3500 persons here.

The sell-out audience stood and shouted its approval as director Charles Muench took seven bows. Leading critics praised the orchestra's "precision and virtuosity."

Music lovers came from all over England for the performance. Members of the orchestra said they were "surprised" by the tremendous applause and added that only in Paris had they enjoyed a greater ovation during their tour of the continent.

The start of the concert was delayed one hour by a complication caused by a bicycle race in France.

The concert, in the Royal Festival Hall here, got underway late because the evening clothes for the orchestra's 104 musicians got left behind in France when a van carrying them Sunday was stuck behind a bicycle race.

The coats-and-tails and the evening dress of the lady harpist were rushed from Victoria Station to the concert hall in time to save the evening.

The program opened with the overture from "The School For Scandal," by American composer Samuel Barber.

The rest of the program included Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5; a work by French composer Albert Rousseo; a toccato by American Walter Piston; "La Mer," by Debussy and the suite by Ravel.

"Nothing Could Obscure Brilliance of the Playing—Splendid Music Making"

London, British Press Rave About Boston's Symphony

LONDON, May 27 (UP)—British newspapers agreed today that the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided "an evening of splendid music making" last night.

A capacity crowd of 3500 persons gave the orchestra one of the biggest ovations in London concert history at the Royal Festival Hall overlooking the River Thames. Conductor Charles Munch took seven bows at the close of the program as the audience stood and shouted approval.

The music critic of the London Times said today, "Nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing, in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us.

"The tonal quality of the orchestra comes somewhere between the suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the Yew York orchestras, which are the two that paid recent visits to Britain."

The Daily Telegraph said it was "an evening of splendid music making," although the newspaper registered a complaint that the program of 20th century French and American music was "not altogether satisfactory."

The Daily Express said the orchestra "played together like one inspired musical instrument."

SYMPHONY Page 16

SYMPHONY

Continued from the First Page

Critic Leonard Mosley said the orchestra sounded like "the superb result of European direction in charge of American know-how. The skill and musicianship of these deft and clever players gave this program its solid, round swell of sound."

Members of the orchestra said they had expected the usual restrained reception from British audiences and were "surprised" at the tremendous applause and cheers. The musicians said that only in Paris did they receive a greater ovation on their European tour.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
MAY 27 1952

Boston Symphony Achieves Musical Triumph in London

By the Associated Press

London

The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a resounding triumph here after its concert was delayed by a French bicycle race.

The sell-out throng at Royal Festival Hall gave Conductor Charles Munch 16 curtain calls.

The concert was delayed because the truck carrying its instruments was held up in France to permit a bike race—which had priority — to go through. The equipment missed the channel ferry and the concert had to wait until it reached London.

The performance itself won high acclaim from London's music critics.

Said the Daily Express: "A one-night stand that musical London will remember. The superb result of European direction in charge of American know-how."

The Times of London commented: "Nothing could obscure the brilliance of the playing in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us."

The Daily Telegraph described it as an "evening of splendid music-making."

The Daily Mail called the performance one of "ruthless efficiency." The News Chronicle said the orchestra was "an organization of great power, well found in all its parts. They flow with an inner radiance where so many other orchestras merely glitter."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 27 1952

Ile de France Sailing Delayed

SOUTHAMPTON, England, May 27 (AP)—Passengers waiting to board the French liner Ile de France tonight for New York were told the ship had been delayed at Le Havre with pump trouble and her sailing delayed twenty-four hours. The 635 passengers waiting to embark here include members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who completed a European tour with a London concert last night.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 27 1952

Liner's Engine Trouble Delays Symphony Return

SOUTHAMPTON, Eng., May 27 (AP)—Passengers waiting to board the French liner Ile de France tonight for New York were told the ship had been delayed at Le Havre with pump trouble and her sailing delayed 24 hours.

The 635 passengers waiting to embark here included members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who completed a European tour with a London concert last night.

NEW YORK TIMES,
TUESDAY, MAY 27, 1952.

CYCLE RACE IN FRANCE DELAYS LONDON MUSIC

LONDON, May 26 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its first concert in Britain before a sell-out crowd of 3,500 persons after a bicycle race in France had delayed the start of the performance for an hour.

The concert, in the Royal Festival Hall, got under way late because the evening clothes of the orchestra's 104 musicians were left behind in France when a van carrying them was stuck behind a bicycle race yesterday. The clothes were rushed from Victoria Station to the concert hall in time to save the evening.

All of London's top music critics were in the hall, which was sold out four days ago, despite a top price of $4.20—double the usual for London concerts. Some persons had offered ticket agencies as much as $14 for a seat.

Britain's royal family was not represented because the mourning period for the late King George VI still is in effect. In the royal box, however, were the British conductor, Sir Malcolm Sargent; the Baroness Ravensdale and Mrs. Walter S. Gifford, wife of the United States Ambassador.

Tonight's program opened with the overture from "The School for Scandal," by the American composer, Samuel Barber. The rest of the program included Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5; a work by the French composer, Albert Rousseo; a toccata by the American, Walter Piston; "La Mer," by Debussy, and a suite by Ravel.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY

Boston Symphony Hailed By Big London Audience

London — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra received one of the greatest ovations in London concert history last night when they played their first British concert before a crowd of 3500 persons here.

The sell-out audience stood and shouted its approval as director Charles Munch took seven bows. Leading critics praised the orchestra's "precision and virtuosity."

Music lovers came from all over England for the performance. Members of the orchestra said they were "surprised" by the tremendous applause and added that only in Paris had they enjoyed a greater ovation during their tour of the continent.

The start of the concert was delayed one hour by a complication caused by a bicycle race in France.

The concert, in the Royal Festival Hall here, got underway late because the evening clothes for the orchestra's 104 musicians got left behind in France when a van carrying them Sunday was stuck behind a bicycle race.

The coats-and-tails and the evening dress of the lady harpist were rushed from Victoria Station to the concert hall in time to save the evening.

The program opened with the overture from "The School For Scandal," by American composer Samuel Barber.

The rest of the program included Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5; a work by French composer Albert Rousseo; a toccato by American Walter Piston; "La Mer," by Debussy, and the suite by Ravel.

This Clipping From
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAY 27 1952

British Wait As French Delay Yanks

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
MAY 27 1952

Bicycle Race Delays Concert

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

[205]

This Clipping From
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
AY 27 1952

ritish Wait
As French
elay Yanks

DON, May 26—(AP)— race in France forc
ston symphony orches
stpone curtain time
r a concert here tonigh bicycle race, betwe ux and Paris, had t
f way over other traffi ng a truck carrying pa orchestra's equipmen
esult, the truck misse
y boat train.
equipment, including s
basses and all the o
s music, was loaded int quent train, necessitatin
r delay.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
MAY 27 1952

ycle Race
ays Concert

DON, May 26 (AP)— race in France force
ston Symphony Orche postpone curtain tim ur for a concert her bicycle race, betwee ux and Paris, had th
f way over other traf cluding a truck carry rt of the orchestra'
ent. As a result, th missed an early boa equipment, including uble basses and all th
tra's music, was loade ubsequent train, neces
the hour delay.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
[illegible] 1952

Boston Symphony Wins Ovation in London Debut

By the Herald Tribune Bureau
Copyright, 1952, New York Herald Tribune Inc.

LONDON, May 27.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra received an ovation from both public and press for its concert last night at the Royal Festival Hall. It was the orchestra's first performance in Britain and 3,500 persons filled the hall. The audience stood and cheered and made conductor Charles Munch and his orchestra of 103 men and one woman take six bows.

The orchestra stopped over in London en route home from Paris, where it had performed at "The Congress of Cultural Freedom."

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
FLA. TIMES-UNION
MAY 27 1952

French Bicycle Race Delays London Concert

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
AY 27 1952

French Bicycle Race Delays Curtain Time

London, May 26, (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
[illegible] 1952

SYMPHONY IN NEW LAURELS

Scores Huge Triumph in London Concert

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a resounding triumph here tonight after its concert was delayed by a French bicycle race.

The sell-out throng at Royal Festival Hall gave Conductor Charles Munch 16 curtain calls.

The concert was delayed because the truck carrying its instruments was held up in France to permit a bike race—which had priority—to go through. The equipment missed the channel ferry and the concert had to wait until it got to London.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAY 27 1952

Cycle Race Delays Boston Symphony

London, May 26. (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 29 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY
East Meets West in Berlin

By CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN—Just as a reminder, let me start this piece by observing that the city of Berlin today is an island, surrounded by the blood red waters of the occupational zone of the U.S.S.R. The city itself is divided into four sectors, United States, British, French and Soviet. The Soviets control the eastern part of the city, including a portion which juts into the older and more interesting part of downtown Berlin. The west is controlled by the other three powers, notably British and American.

Unless you go on Army orders, as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is no way to get to Berlin except to fly. Trains have to go through the Soviet zone, and only military duty trains are permitted freely to do so. At that, there has to be a frontier check with Uncle Joe's boys.

Berlin, in its early years of recovery, wants tourists, and explains that the tourist may enter the Soviet-controlled sector of the city. That is true. It is true, further, that Germans from the East and West sections of Berlin may freely pass back and forth. Some, apparently, work in sectors where they do not live. Nonetheless, the line of demarcation is sharply drawn, and certain parts of East (or Soviet) Berlin are safer to enter than others.

* * *

To all intents and purposes, West and East Berlin are two different states. Each has its own government and police; each has its own economy and its own money. The Deutsch mark of West Berlin is worth four of the Soviet-controlled marks of East Berlin. If you are an East Berliner, and you want to buy something in West Berlin, you have to get your money changed. The rate of exchange is so unfavorable that most East Berliners haven't enough money to do that.

Life for the East Berliners is the same old oppression and propaganda diet of any Soviet satellite. This is on the authority of our guide, Otto, an amiable and young blonde German who speaks English well. He was in the German Army during the war, Denmark Occupation Force, and was severely wounded in his right leg by shrapnel. He has no reason to like the Russians, if only because of a very personal one to hate them: He returned home to find that his mother, aged 65, four times had been raped by Russian soldiers.

Otto explains that apart from the multi-lingual signs which proclaim the end of one sector and the beginning of another, there is another reliable way of telling where you are. In East Berlin you will find no oranges, pineapples or bananas, fruits sold abundantly in West Berlin.

* * *

There is practically nothing in the shops at East Berlin, as a few Boston Symphony men, looking especially for musical scores, reported after a shopping tour in that sector. Nonrationed items may be bought at so-called "H-O stores," Soviet-run, but the prices are high, and in a way such stores are a legal variety of black market.

But if the stores are empty, the propaganda mills are full. The Soviets, with their gall, refer to their part of Berlin as "The Demokratic Sektor." But, luckily, their propaganda is not wholly effective upon the East Berliners, many of whom are in contact with West Berlin. They have some notion of the truth that people outside the Soviet control are not all downtrodden workers living at the pleasure of greedy, cruel warmongering capitalists.

Some Boston Symphony men encountered a boy of about 14, in East Berlin, and questioned him about what was taught in school. The reply contained all the usual lies. But when they asked him if he believed it, his answer was quick and incisive:

"Of course not! Do you think I'm dumb?"

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD
MAY 27 1952

French Bike Race Delays Symphony

London (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here Monday night.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAY 27 1952

Roaring Bicycles Delay Boston Basses in London

LONDON, May 26 (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight. The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train. The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

* * *

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
MAY 27 1952

French Bicycle Race Delays Symphony Start

LONDON—(AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston symphony orchestra to postpone concert curtain time an hour here last night.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 28 1952

Top London Praise For Boston Symphony

London —(UP)— British newspapers agreed yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided "an evening of splendid music making Monday night."

A capacity crowd of 3,500 persons gave the orchestra one of the biggest ovations in London concert history at the Royal Festival Hall overlooking the river Thames. Conductor Charles Munch took seven bows at the close of the program as the audience stood and shouted approval. The London Times said: "Nothing could secure the brilliance of the playing, in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unknown to us.

"The tonal quality of the orchestra comes somewhere between the sauvity of the Philadelphia and the chromium plated glitter of the New York Orchestra, which are the two that have paid recent visits to Britain."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAY 27 1952

Truck Goes Astray, Boston Symphony Starts Concert Late

LONDON, May 27 (Reuters)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight survived the most harrowing experience of a 15-concert tour to appear before a gala audience in London's Festival Hall—one hour late.

Earlier today the orchestra was thrown into near-panic when it was discovered a truckload of instruments and evening clothes had gone astray in France.

The missing articles, which included six of the orchestra's nine double basses, arrived on the evening train from Paris.

This was the last concert of their three-week European tour. The orchestra sails for home tomorrow.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY 27 1952

Boston Symphony Scores in London

LONDON, Tuesday (AP) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra scored a resounding triumph here last night after its concert was delayed by a French bicycle race.

The sell-out throng at Royal Festival Hall gave Conductor Charles Munch 16 curtain calls.

The concert was delayed because the truck carrying its instruments was held up in France to permit a bike race—which had priority—to go through. The equipment missed the channel ferry and the concert had to wait until it got to London.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAY 27 1952

French Bicycle Race Delays London Concert Of Boston Symphony

London, May 26 (AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here tonight.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

The equipment, including six double basses and all the orchestra's music, was loaded into a subsequent train, necessitating the hour delay.

[206]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAY 29 1952

Travel Symphony

Berliners Still Attempt to Keep Up Appearances

By CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN—A first visit to Berlin in this year of 1952 is not the same thing as returning to what you once knew as a superb modern city.

Nonetheless, it is a big shock. You were prepared to see wide devastation, but not so much as still exists after seven years of clearing and rebuilding.

The Berliners are stubbornly, courageously, trying to make a go of day-to-day existence. But truly they are living in the ruins, ruins physical and spiritual. They are poor, and the chances are they are still exhausted to a considerable extent by a dozen years of war and the privations which followed.

They are carrying on business, but they are quiet in the streets. They try to keep up appearances, but their clothes are likely to be nondescript. People look thin, preoccupied, tired.

Harry Dickson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who studied violin in Berlin in pre-Hitler days (he returned to Boston in 1933), and who remembers Berlin as a handsome city where he spent four enjoyable years, was badly depressed. But he also noted something else.

"As I see it, all this destruction has really changed the people of Berlin. They are not anything like the arrogant people I remember. Even the taxi drivers, who used to be known as the toughest anywhere, are polite today, and actually grateful when you give them a tip."

Mr. Dickson found the woman who owned one of the apartment houses where he had lived. Then she operated four big rooming places. The Nazis demanded that she expel her Jewish guests, and she refused.

The houses were confiscated and she lost everything she had. Today she is in technical possession of one of those houses, but someone else runs it, and the only compensation she receives is the privilege of living in a basement apartment.

Mr. Dickson tried to find another place where he had lived. That was just empty space. Nothing except a door frame standing, with the street number identifiable. Emil Kornsand, on the contrary, found the house which he had left in 1938, and his name plate was still by the front door.

The outer suburbs of this far-flung city—an amalgamation of some 20 boroughs, with a total area of more than 300 square miles—fared better than the inward portions. The houses, the trees, shrubs and gardens of such a section as Zehlendorf-West, where I went to the United States Press Center, are not only unharmed but of a really amazing beauty. Nothing quite like it in Brookline or the Newtons.

But toward the center, there were blocks and blocks, either blown to dust by heavy-caliber bombs, or gutted from the fires caused by the napalm bombs. Much cleaning up has been done, and the rubble for the most part consists of neat piles of usable bricks or just a messy heap in the foundation depths of the skeletal buildings. Out in the direction of Tempelhof there are huge mounds of useless rubble, still piling ever higher. These eventually will be smoothed over and grassed and will provide some hilly contrast to the prevailing flatness of Berlin.

* * *

Business rebuilding goes on steadily, and where the structures are brand-new, they also are handsomely modern, with lots of glass and light, and streamlined design. Where the Berliners have been clever at makeshift is in the erection of one-story blocks, or the roofing over of the ground floors in buildings which were gutted.

In these small structures much retail business is transacted and the outside is gay with neon signs. If you don't look higher than the ground floors, the Kurfurstendam, once Berlin's Fifth Avenue, gives you an illusion of having escaped damage. But let your eyes go upward a few feet, and you realize full well that this is truly life among the ruins.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL HERALD
MAY 29 1952

Bicycle Race Delays Symphony Concert

LONDON, May 28.—(AP)—A bicycle race in France forced the Boston symphony orchestra to postpone curtain time an hour for a concert here.

The bicycle race, between Bordeaux and Paris, had the right of way over other traffic, including a truck carrying part of the orchestra's equipment. As a result, the truck missed an early boat train.

Symphony Pierces Iron Curtain

Musicians Born in Russia Worried on Trip to Berlin

By RUDOLPH ELIE

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

The trip from Frankfurt to Berlin in a sealed U. S. Army train is a singular experience. It is singular because it is the first time you come up against the Iron Curtain and that first experience shakes you personally and hard.

★ ★ ★

From the outset there was a good deal of nervousness on the part of the Russian-born members of the Boston symphony. How could they be sure, they inquired, that the train would go through the Russian zone without being stopped and searched?

★ ★ ★

Only a day or two before a French plane had been fired upon by the Russians over the corridor into Berlin. And the day of the scheduled train ride into Berlin (the airlift of the orchestra had been cancelled because of the oil strike), a Belgian newspaper had carried a news story stating the Russians had stopped all train service and were tearing up the rails in Berlin's principal stations.

(Continued on Page Sixteen)

(Continued from First Page)

Despite assurances on the part of the State Department assistants detailed to accompany the orchestra that the train was an official U. S. Army duty train that was locked and sealed from the time it left Frankfurt until it reached Berlin, the nervousness prevailed. One musician, who said he was especially sought by the Russians, refused to go. The others, perhaps ten in all, shrugged it off and went aboard.

Going aboard was not easy. The red tape department, from the outset a fantastic snarl of passports, papers, financial statements itineraries, travel instructions and hotel reservations, suddenly blossomed into the authentic army bouquet of vast dimension. Every member's passport had to be double-checked and listed and every member issued official army orders in octuplet written in English and Russian.

Half Hour's Wait

The time of departure from Frankfurt was 7:40 in the evening for the first section, 9:20 for the second. The first section members were instructed to arrive at the station at 7:00 exactly. They did . . . and stood around for 30 minutes. At 7:30 they were alowed to enter the cars, being checked off at the only open door of the 15-car train by the train commander, a young lieutenant, assisted by a half dozen six-foot, 180 pound MP's. (These are MP specifications to impress the Russians who, they said, are mostly five-footers). Once aboard the train members were instructed not to leave their cars but to stay in their own compartments.

The lieutenant was peppered with eager questions. Could we see the Russians? No, absolutely not; no one must under any circumstances peek out through the blinds.

Would they come aboard? No, they would not.

Could they delay the train? Yes, that's why the papers had to be in perfect order so as to give them no excuse to delay.

Who talked to them? He did; he was the only one who got off the train.

What did they say? Nothing, it was all business.

Did they ever say anything? Only at Christmastime when they broke down and said 'Merry Christmas.'

Are you absolutely sure they won't come aboard? Absolutely.

Not Very Funny

The train, consisting of handsome red cars with U. S. Army in large reassuring letters on the side, pulled out on the second of 7:40. There was no room to sit in the bunk compartments but one regular car was nearly empty and into it the men congregated to speculate jocosely on the possibilities of the Russians coming aboard, finding the Russian-born members and hauling them off the train. The jokes weren't very funny but everybody laughed.

The train sped through the gathering darkness over the flat, green countryside of Hesse. Here and there a red steeple in the hazy distance proclaimed the site of a German town. Now and again the train roared through a hamlet, and several times it stopped in the larger towns like Marburg and Kasel.

At length the MP's came around and sealed up the windows with the blanket-like blinders. It was impossible to peek even if one dared, which nobody did. Somehow the approach to the Russian zone, even although it would not be reached until four in the morning, cast a pall of restraint; to think that such a situation obtained in the world today was enough to sober the most sparkling personality, if any personalities may be said to sparkle after a couple of weeks of one-night stands around western Europe.

Alarm Fails to Work

Little by little the men turned in and the lights went out in the compartments; it was still only 11 o'clock or so. I went to bed myself, requesting myself to wake up at four o'clock merely to be awake for the great event. However, my inner alarm clock, always faulty, failed to function; we were a half hour from Berlin when I woke. And come to find out, not one of the group was awake at the Russian check point.

On the trip out of Berlin two nights later however, they were all awake, for the train arrived at the check point at ten in the evening. Embarking had been as before: all papers checked and triple checked, all members counted off, all instructions repeated, all exhortations reiterated. At 9:30 the MP's came around and sealed the windows as before. At 9:50 the train slowed down, stopped, started, jolted, slowed down again and barely crawled along for ten or 15 minutes. At length it stopped again, paused a while and backed up perhaps a mile. Then it stopped and remained so.

The minutes went by, the men barely whispering in speculation on what might be going on outside between the young lieutenant and the Russians. A half hour passed, then 40 minutes, then 45, and still there was no sound, no movement. Suddenly one shrill toot rang out in the night and the train started; it had been stopped, by the Russians for 49 minutes.

We all went to bed feeling just a little relieved. We had pierced the Iron Curtain and were now safely home in West Germany. It looked pretty good the next morning, at that. But not to the young State Department representative. "Do you know what happend last night?" he cried. "Some body fouled up the orders so half of them authorized travel into Berlin, the other half into Bonn, which is the American zone, and the Russians didn't notice it. If they had, my God, we'd still be detained by the Russians. No telling what they'd have done!" He wiped his brow. "Whew," he said.

[207]

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Touring in East Berlin---I

By CYRUS DURGIN

...tow, the people look terribly thin, anxious, even furtive, almost the second you have crossed the line. The brick walls along the sidewalks frequently are plastered with Communist propaganda slogans. Even a quick glimpse of store windows is enough to show that the comparative abundance of West Berlin is totally lacking here. There has been less attempt at cleaning up and efficiency here than in the Allied sectors. Even the railroad yards reveal it, with their empty and rusting tracks. Where 150 trains used to run every 24 hours, now about 10 leave today.

The first big, fantastic sight is the Soviet cemetery which is a memorial to their soldiers killed in the taking of Berlin. It is beautifully landscaped, and the shrubs, trees and lawns are flourishing. Beneath this green blanket, in three mass graves, lie the 3000 victims of the most recent Great ...ttacy.

* * *

...one's instinctive first emotion ...adness is curiously altered by ...rritating sight of the two ...ed Soviet flags, wrought in ...ished stones taken from the ...s of Hitler's vanished Chan...ry; by the huge statute of the ...ian soldier, holding the child ...he Soviet future in one arm ...e his sword in the other hand ...ust carved up Berlin. Nor ...the heavy sentimentality of ...statue of Mother Russia bow...n grief over the loss of her ...move one very deeply.

* * *

...r all this vast memorial is ...r of unreality. It all seems ...rary, above ground at least. ...before the war the place used to ...playground.

Today it is a cemetery.

And tomorrow?

Back to the busses, shivering from the physical discomfort of cold and rain, and inwardly chilled to the marrow by the seemingly endless horizons of destruction. First you saw it in Italy, then in London, Belgium, Holland, and now in Berlin's once grand capital city.

Will there ever be an end? What can be the future of youngsters who in the first years when memory begins to work, know the sound of air-raid sirens and the crash of bombs; the smell of explosive and of burning wood and flesh; the sight of fire, death all around, and a gnawing ache in the belly because no food can be found? What future, indeed?

* * *

...e proper section of Tiep... got a ... Police ... she was ... ed "Gen... ...e's Police ... was a ... Motors. ... But in ... the Soviet sector it ... to go, especially if ... a camera, about which ... are very touchy. ... are likely to get picked ... and tossed into the clink for ... first, and subsequent ... questioning.

* * *

...ere is a ... of Tiep... ...ing ... ...ed ... ...ed ... ...ed

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Touring in East Berlin—I

By CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN—A Bus Tour of East Berlin: Off we go in four military buses, with Otto our guide, to see something of the so-called Demokratic Sektor of East Berlin. It is all strangely and disturbingly unreal, to see the big white signs marking off the American and British sectors from the Russian. You find it hard to believe that one side of this street is comparative freedom, the other behind the Iron Curtain.

On one side, the gray-uniformed West Berlin Police. On the other the so-called "People's Police," which consist in good part of intransigeant old Nazis who found the Russian totalitarianism more to their taste than Allied democracy. The People's Police is divided into two corps. The police themselves wear blue uniforms, with blue shirts and red ties. The other section is more military. Together they number about 150,000 men and are the nucleus of a possible German Communist Army.

* * *

The West Berlin Police and the People's Police glower at each other across the street, but none will cross the line. If one does, with a weapon on his person, he goes quickly to jail and stays there. These People's Police look sinister and, if I do say so, stupid. Their duties entail examination of every automobile crossing the line, for anti-Communist propaganda and goods which might be contraband. Also refugees going west.

One story is making the rounds foofficial circles in West Berlin, of an American girl who, driving in the East Berlin sector, got a parking tag. The People's Police asked what make of car she was driving, and she answered "General Motors." The People's Police thereupon assumed she was a daughter of some Gen Motors, and hurriedly released her. But in some parts of the Soviet sector it is dangerous to go, especially if you carry a camera, about which the Russians are very touchy. There you are likely to get picked up, and tossed into the clink for at least one night, and subsequent questioning.

* * *

In the poorer section of Treptow, the people look terribly thin, anxious, even furtive, almost the second you have crossed the line. The brick walls along the sidewalks frequently are plastered with Communist propaganda slogans. Even a quick glimpse of store windows is enough to show that the comparative abundance of West Berlin is totally lacking here. There has been less attempt at cleaning up and efficiency here than in the Allied sectors. Even the railroad yards reveal it, with their empty and rusting tracks. Where 150 trains used to run every 24 hours, now about 10 leave today.

The first big, fantastic sight is the Soviet cemetery which is a memorial to their soldiers killed in the taking of Berlin. It is beautifully landscaped, and the shrubs, trees and lawns are flourishing. Beneath this green blanket, in three mass graves, lie the 3000 victims of the most recent Great Idiocy.

* * *

One's instinctive first emotion of sadness is curiously altered by the irritating sight of the two dipped Soviet flags, wrought in polished stones taken from the floors of Hitler's vanished Chancellery; by the huge statute of the Russian soldier, holding the child of the Soviet future in one arm while his sword in the other hand has just carved up Berlin. Nor does the heavy sentimentality of the statue of Mother Russia bowing in grief over the loss of her sons move one very deeply.

* * *

Over all this vast memorial is an air of unreality. It all seems temporary, above ground at least. Before the war the place used to be a playground.

Today it is a cemetery.

And tomorrow?

Back to the busses, shivering from the physical discomfort of cold and rain, and inwardly chilled to the marrow by the seemingly endless horizons of destruction. First you saw it in Italy, then in London, Belgium, Holland, and now in Berlin's once grand capital city.

Will there ever be an end? What can be the future of youngsters who in the first years when memory begins to work, know the sound of air-raid sirens and the crash of bombs; the smell of explosive and of burning wood and flesh; the sight of fire, death all around, and a gnawing ache in the belly because no food can be found? What future, indeed?

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAY 30 1952

East Berlin Boy, 13, No 'Dumbbell'

He Amazes Two Strangers With Knowledge of U. S.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

(Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

The boy was standing in the lobby of the hotel in the western sector of Berlin. He was about 13 and he was scrawny even for his age. His clothes were worn and shabby, but his expression was keen and alert.

★ ★ ★

Harry Dickson, a first violinist of the orchestra who studied in Berlin before the war and who speaks perfect German, went up to the boy. "Do you live in west Berlin?" he asked.

"No," said the boy, "I live in the Russian sector. I'm visiting my uncle today."

★ ★ ★

Our jaws dropped. We knew that one could walk into or out of the eastern sector more or less safely at will and, in fact, many of us had crossed the line for a brief and nervous stroll in the area of the Brandenburg gate.

We knew also that those in the east sector could visit the west at will; 30 per cent. of the audience at the Berlin concert were from the east zone while the morning rehearsal had been open to more than a thousand young people from the east zone.

Nonetheless, here was an opportunity to actually talk with an easterner. "What do they teach you in the east sector schools about Hitler?" asked Harry, on learning he was a school boy.

"They teach us that Hitler destroyed Germany, that he was a monster, a dictator and a tyrant," the boy replied.

"And how about the United States?" Harry continued, "what do they teach you about that?"

"They teach us that it is capitalistic with a few people being very rich, all the rest being very poor," the boy said, "and the working man is downtrodden and there are strikes and crime and it is terrible for the people."

"Hmm," said Harry, "and do you believe it?"

"Do I believe it?" the boy cried. "Do you think I'm a dumbbell? Of course I don't!"

Exciting, Menacing

The boy may have been an exception To judge by what we saw an hour or two later he may well have been. But it is hard to imagine how any of the approximately one million Germans now living in the eight Russian boroughs of the 20-borough city of three and a half million can see what they see, do what they do and live the way they live and not cry "do you think we're dumbbells?" too.

Berlin today is easily the most exciting and at the same time menacing city in the world. It is immense in terms of land area: 340 square miles, which is considerably larger than New York. Like Frankfurt, Cologne and other cities of Germany it was at least 40 per cent. demolished by bombs, which rained down in day and night raids by American and British for more than a year of terror and death. (They will not estimate how many died in these raids, nor how many still lie buried in the mountains of rubble everywhere to be seen. But Berlin had a population of 4.3 millions in 1940, 2.9 millions in 1945).

Save for the rubble, the hollow shells of great buldings, the broken windows, the tottering ruins in every block, the alpine piles of red brick, the warped houses and gashed facades, the visitor would never believe that this was, only seven years ago, a dead city. Those returning after many years, like Josef Zimbler, Harry Dickson and Alfred Krips (who was a member of the Berlin Philharmonic), find it a painful experience.

Mr. Zimbler, seeking for the site of a restaurant he spent many happy hours in as a young student, couldn't even find the location. He inquired of a passerby. "You're standing on it," the passerby said. There was nothing there at all but ten acres of rubble; not even the street remained. It was like returning to Boston and being unable to find the corner of Boylston and Tremont street, he said.

Yet building with Marshall Plan aid is going on everywhere in West Berlin. Great department stores, apartment buildings, hotels and shops are going up on the ruins of the old. And to sit in an outdoor restaurant on the Kurfurstendam, the new Fifth avenue of Berlin, and to watch the people and study their expressions, their mannerisms and their attitudes is to search in vain for any outward sign of disturbance, of grimness, of surliness, even of memories. American soldiers are only occasionally seen, and then only in informal pairs window shopping. Nobody pays any attention to them; like American tourists they're only visitors with money to spend.

Amazed by Shops

It is the shops that amaze the casual visitor, however. Every conceivable thing is offered in them and at prices no higher and in many cases much lower than in the United States. Jewelry, leather, glassware, laces, women's dresses in very high fashion (or so they looked to me), musical instruments, objects of art, painting, books and all very handsomely displayed, too. The restaurants are marvelous, the hotels good, the nightlife extensive and, if you know where to go, very naughty.

Off the Kurfurstendam there are many equally interesting and well-stocked sections, and there are plenty of flea markets, too, in the poorer section. I paused at one of these to watch an old German peddler work a trick on a group of old folks standing around. He was peddling some kind of a life-giving herb and he had a glass tube with a glass bulb on the bottom filled with a blue fluid. Inside the tube, spiral-wise, was another. He'd get the old women to hold the bulb, whereupon the blue fluid rose in the spiral as if by magic. If they couldn't get it up to the top, he'd cry they needed his medicine . . . and they bought it by the package. The trick, I could see, was that the old crones' hands, all calloused and cold, weren't warm enough to cause the fluid to rise; a young boy grabbed it and it almost shot out of the top.

But in the eastern zone, as you shall hear, they don't even have herbs to do tricks with. They haven't got anything . . . and the Russians have all the tricks.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
MAY 31 1952

New Musical Works Sought At Tanglewood

Composers of new musical works will have the opportunity of submitting them for appraisal and possible performance this summer by the Tanglewood Study Group at the Berkshire Music Center. Aaron Copland, assistant director of the center, has sent out a call for such works.

The Study Group, composed of professionals and non-professionals, is under direction of Ingolf Dahl, Guggenheim fellow, pianist and conductor and an arranger for broadcast and film studios, who formerly was associate director of the Zurich Municipal Opera and now is associate professor of music, University of Southern California. The group will play works by the classical masters, easy to perform but not trivial, and will add new contemporary works in the same vein, easy to read at sight, or nearly so.

These new works should be only broadly defined for "high," "middle" and "low" instruments and preference is for the chamber cantata form for 30 to 50 mixed voices, including solo singers, if used, and for small orchestras of unspecified instrumentation.

The composers are asked to describe their works as to nature and length in a letter to Mr. Dahl at Symphony Hall, Boston, before submitting them.

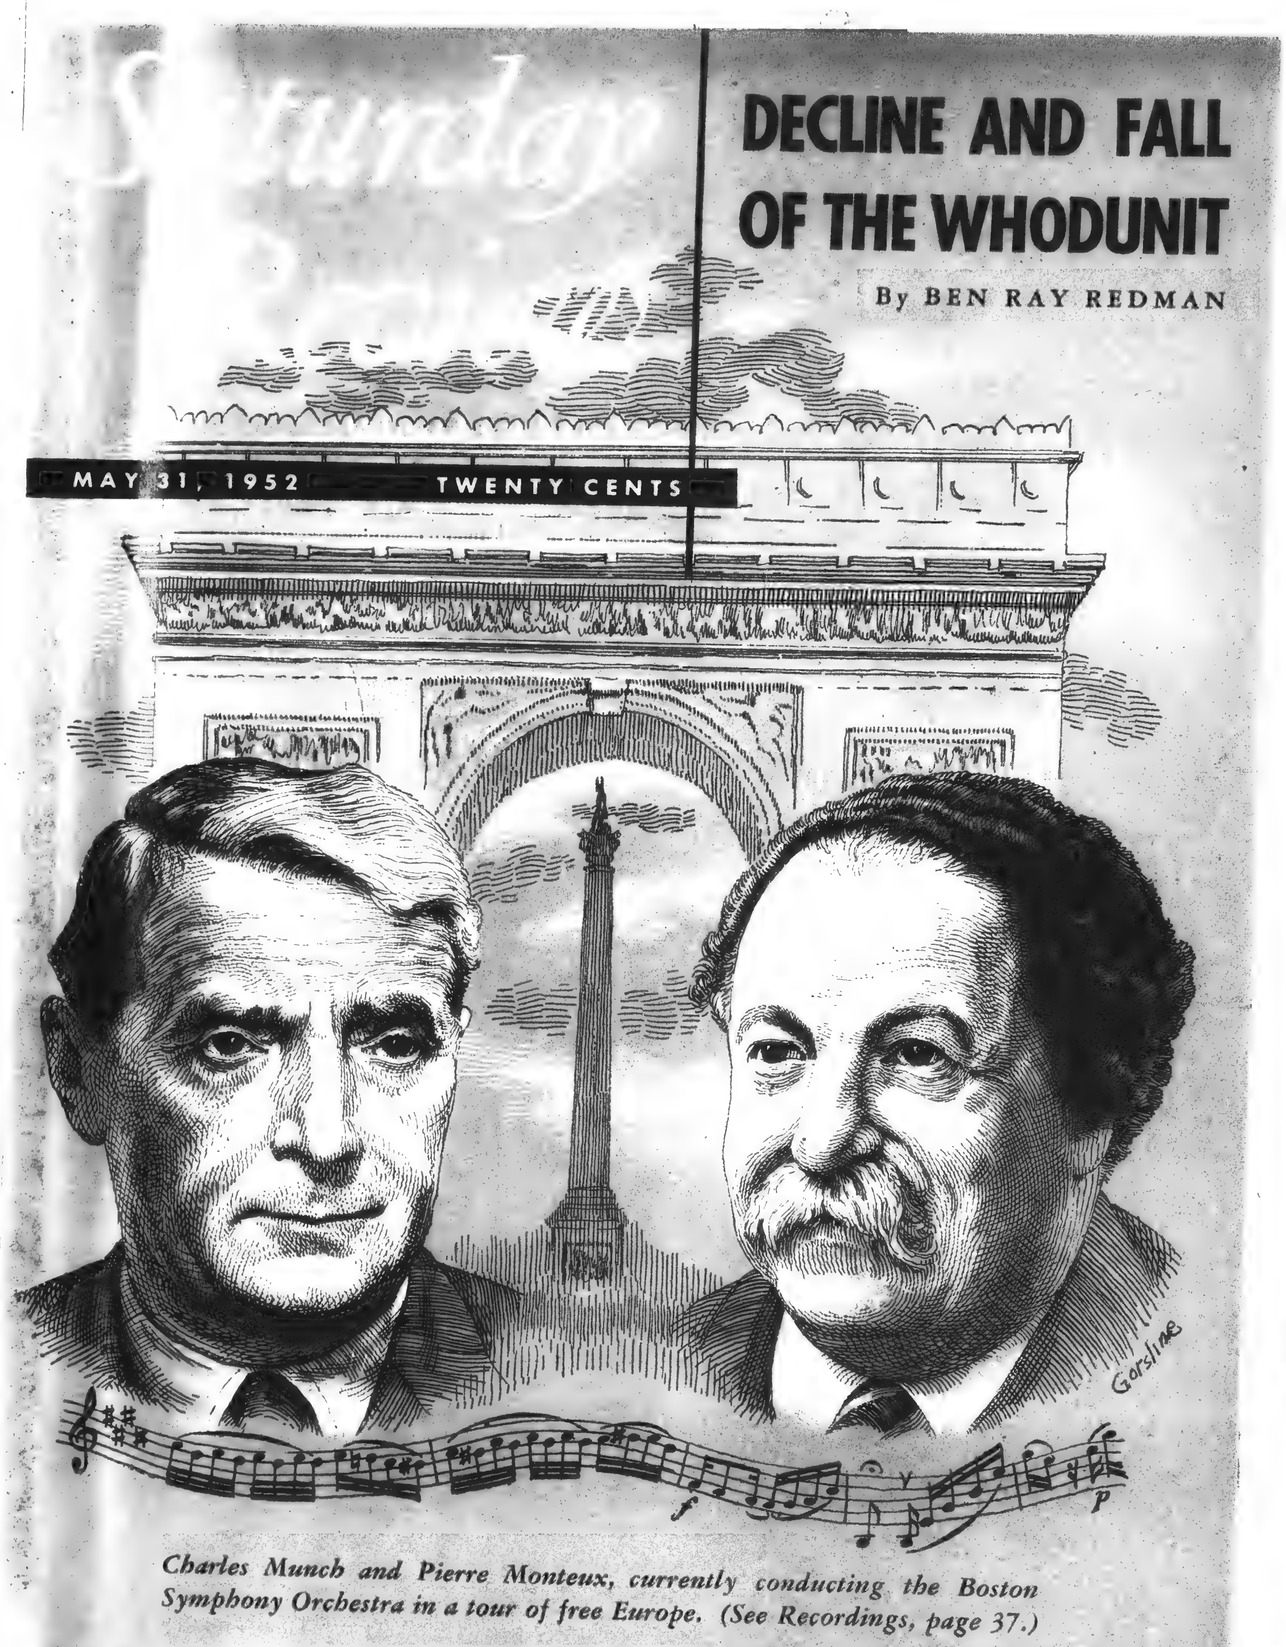
This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAY 31 1952

THE Boston Symphony so impressed the French with its majesties of tone and unity and its rich supply of historic instruments (such as are found in no municipal orchestra in Europe) that they immediately solaced themselves by pointing out that twenty-three of the hundred-odd members are, in any case, French. The orchestra was also involved in the most dramatic and ironic moments of the exposition so far—those long moments when the Parisian public, in a noisy mea culpa, hailed with bravos Pierre Monteux, Stravinsky, and Charles Münch, three musicians it had howled at in contempt at various times in the past. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" thirty-nine years almost to the day after he boldly gave it its first audition before a stylish Parisian riot, in which ladies screamed with displeasure, and gentlemen pulled their beards, and this time he was doubly applauded, because of a double guilt; he had been not only the unappreciated great Paris impresario of everything musically new in the century but also a fine conductor so shabbily let down that he finally had to find haven as chef d'orchestre in San Francisco. Stravinsky himself, who had not been here for thirteen years, was phrenetically applauded, as if in apology for the earlier treatment of his "Sacre," and in recognition of what he has become since. Münch was taken back to the Paris bosom with applause because in 1946 he was harshly treated as a supposed collaborationist; he had kept his orchestra playing under the Germans, perhaps because he thought keeping it going was the Frenchest thing he could do.

—GENÊT

[208]

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.



Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, currently conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a tour of free Europe. (See Recordings, page 37.)

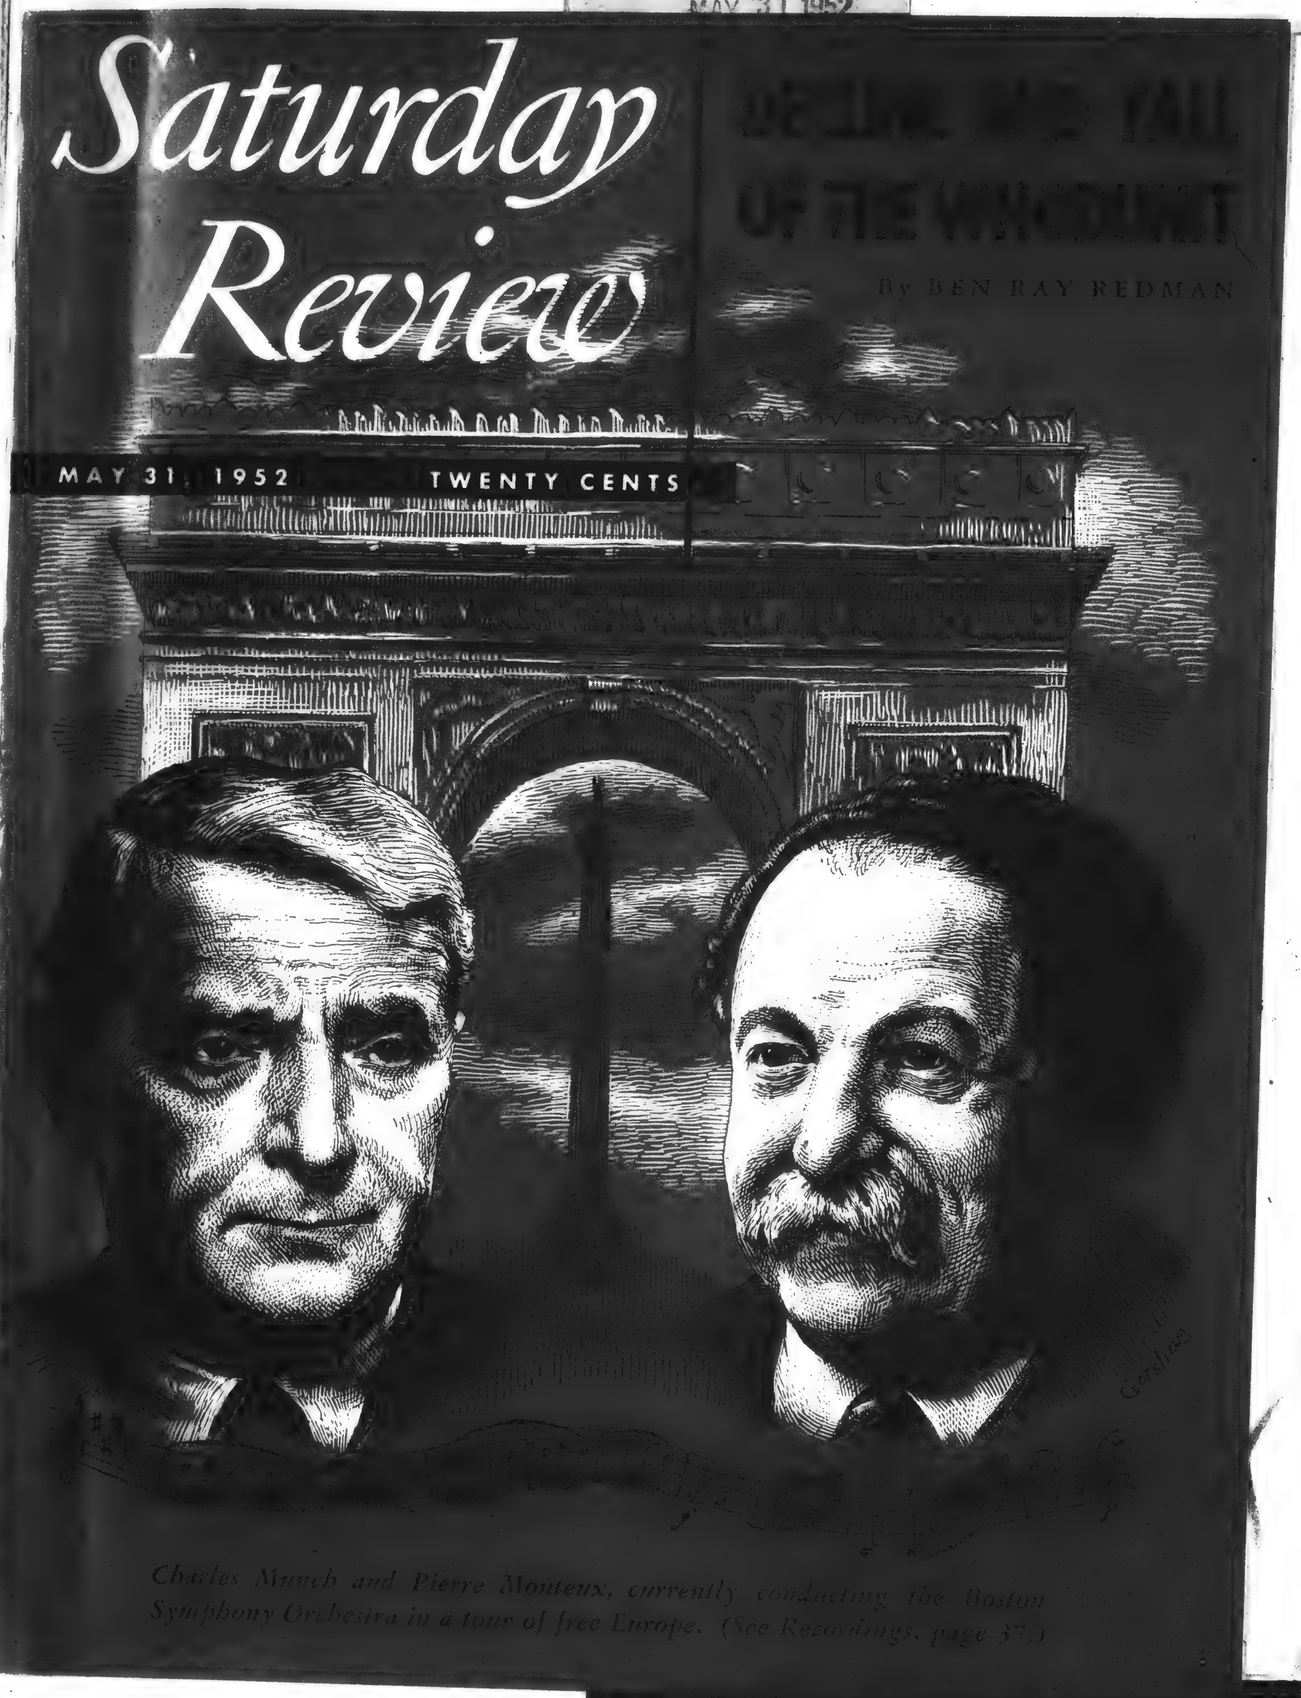
STRA IN PARIS

Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra [illegible] only the visiting firemen [illegible]

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 31 1952

Saturday Review

MAY 31, 1952 TWENTY CENTS



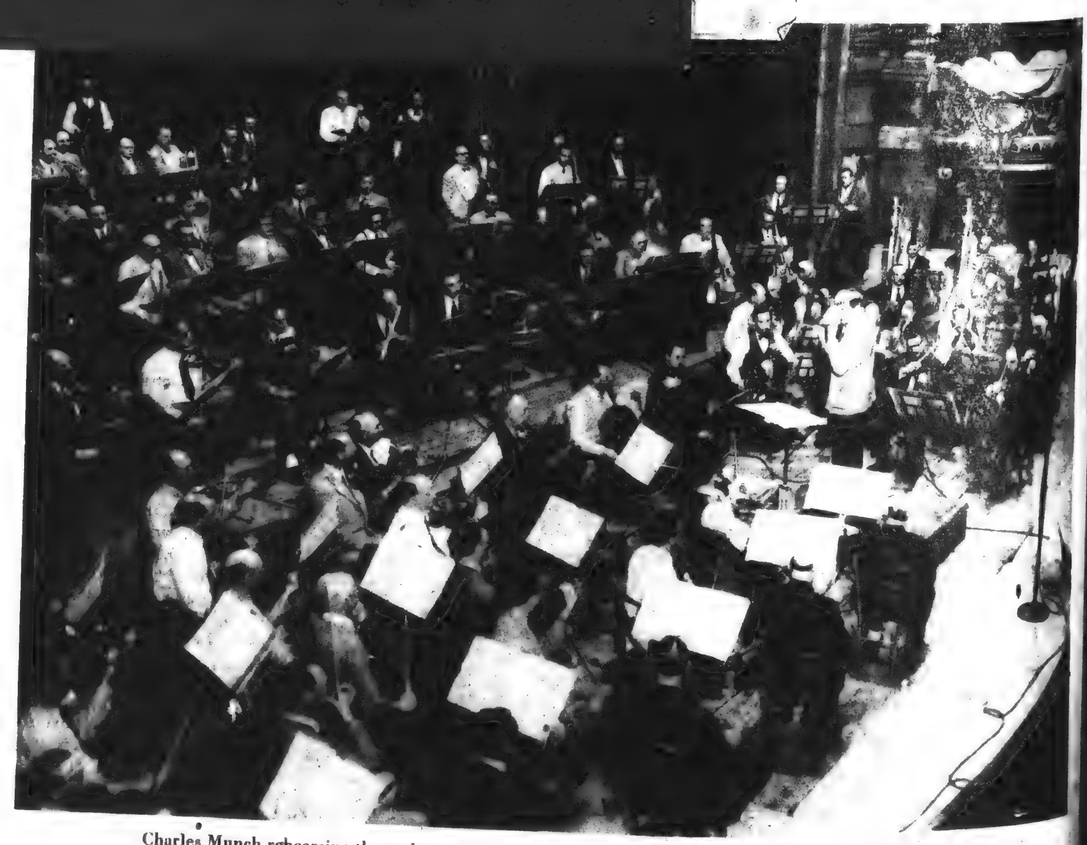
Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, currently conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a tour of free Europe. (See Recordings, page 37.)

...OF THE WHOLE CONCERT

By BEN RAY REDMAN

...STRA IN PARIS

...dience—"enthusiastic hands stageward."



Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visiting firemen seemed to mind."

Lieutenant
Stanley T. Adams
Medal of Honor

ONE BITING-COLD FEBRUARY NIGHT, Lieutenant Adams was on a bitterly contested hill near Sesim-ni, Korea. Out of the dark earth the silhouettes of some 150 Communist troops rose up against the skyline. Ordering fixed bayonets, the lieutenant, with only 13 men, leaped up and charged furiously against the overwhelming odds. He was knocked down by a bullet. At least three hand grenades actually bounced off his body before exploding nearby. But when Adams and his squad were through, there were only 50 Communists left on the hill—and they were dead.

"Nobody likes to kill," says Stanley Adams. "Nobody likes war. But today the surest way to invite a war is to be weak. You and I know that twice in the last ten years Americans have let their guard down. And the Philippine and Korean graveyards are filled with men who paid the price for it.

"Please don't make that tragic mistake again. Remember that in the world today, peace is only for the strong. Help make your country and your armed services stronger still—by buying more . . . and more . . . and more U. S. Defense Bonds. Put your bond-power behind our fire-power, now—and together we'll keep America at peace!"

* * *

Remember that when you're buying bonds for national defense, you're also building a personal reserve of cash savings. Remember, too, that if you don't save regularly, you generally don't save at all. So sign up today in the Payroll Savings Plan where you work, or the Bond-A-Month Plan where you bank. For your country's security, and your own, buy U. S. Defense Bonds now!

Peace is for the strong... Buy U. S. Defense Bonds now!

The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the Magazine Publishers of America.

SR / RECORDINGS SECTION

HIGHLIGHTS

Page

WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN EUROPE
By Cyrus Durgin 37

FRITZ REINER—PERPETUAL PRODIGY
By Cesar Saerchinger 42

ON WITH THE JAZZ
By Wilder Hobson 44

OPERA—ROMANTIC, BOUFFE, SERIA
By Herbert Weinstock 46

RECORDINGS IN REVIEW
By Irving Kolodin 48

With the Boston Symphony in Europe

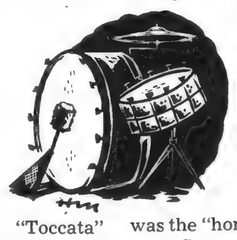
CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN.

CHEERS and tears, the repercussions of the oil strike at home, a blacked-out trip across the Berlin corridor, swank receptions and seats for the press in the gallery—these are among the mingled memories of the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eventful tour around free Europe. It's been tough and it's been tempestuous, but one thing is sure beyond doubt—Europe has heard a great orchestra, and Europe has responded in a way to gratify everyone involved.

Six concerts in four countries in little more than a week—travel time included—have left a jumble of impressions which may eventually be sorted out, collated, and cast up in a neat balance of evaluation. At the moment, with Paris, The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfurt past and Berlin impending, one can mark only a few highlights, attempt some generalizations, underscore the kinds and quantities of reaction this venture has aroused.

Nobody associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tour has seen Paris quite this way before, nor will it be seen the same way again. Local valuations ranged from those who regarded the Boston Symphony as typically American to those who welcomed the Strasbourg-born Charles Munch and some twenty-odd French-born players in the orchestra as a happy evidence of home-grown quality. René Dumesnil, in Le Monde, gave his benediction to the "French wing" of the orchestra, and the critic of Le Figaro took note that all this superb playing at the first concert in the Paris Opéra had been "led by a French general."



Reactions to the American works on the programs were as varied as the pieces, the critics, and the locale. Politeness was the prevailing tone in Paris toward the "School for Scandal" Overture of Samuel Barber and the "Toccata" which Walter Piston, of Boston and Harvard, wrote for the American tour of the French Orchestre National under Charles Munch in 1948. Specifically, the words were "clever," "pleasant," "without originality," for the Barber, much the same for the Piston.

On the other hand, William Schuman's ten-year-old Symphony No. 3 has seemed to interest European audiences more, despite its divisions into Prelude, Fugue, Chorale, and Toccata—which might seem a rather cerebral challenge, and lengthy, too. Yet, as I have personally observed, it has been generally well-received. A leading Frankfurt critic, Hans Enke, has just given it very thoughtful consideration, with due valuation of its formal structure and a sympathetic regard, all told.

As an emotional climax, nothing is likely to surpass the evening of May 8, when Pierre Monteux was in charge of the orchestra before a cheering audience of compatriots in the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. There was other music on the program, but all that was anticipated—and all that was talked about later—was the "home-coming" of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," in the same hall and with the same conductor who had continued phlegmatically to beat time for the original performance with ballet, thirty-nine years ago when an aroused Paris whistled, shouted, rapped canes, and even exchanged blows with neighbors as a modern masterpiece was born.

Part of the legend of that occasion is that the composer found a window

---

Cyrus Durgin is music critic of the Boston Globe.

Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visit

[209]

Lieutenant
Stanley T. Adams
Medal of Honor

ONE BITING-COLD FEBRUARY NIGHT, Lieutenant Adams was on a bitterly contested hill near Sesim-ni, Korea. Out of the dark earth the silhouettes of some 150 Communist troops rose up against the skyline. Ordering fixed bayonets, the lieutenant, with only 13 men, leaped up and charged furiously against the overwhelming odds. He was knocked down by a bullet. At least three hand grenades actually bounced off his body before exploding nearby. But when Adams and his squad were through, there were only 50 Communists left on the hill—and they were dead.

"Nobody likes to kill," says Stanley Adams. "Nobody likes war. But today the surest way to invite a war is to be weak. You and I know that twice in the last ten years Americans have let their guard down. And the Philippine and Korean graveyards are filled with men who paid the price for it.

"Please don't make that tragic mistake again. Remember that in the world today, peace is only for the strong. Help make your country and your armed services stronger still—by buying more . . . and more . . . and more U. S. Defense Bonds. Put your bond-power behind our fire-power, now—and together we'll keep America at peace!"

★ ★ ★

Remember that when you're buying bonds for national defense, you're also building a personal reserve of cash savings. Remember, too, that if you don't save regularly, you generally don't save at all. So sign up today in the Payroll Savings Plan where you work, or the Bond-A-Month Plan where you bank. For your country's security, and your own, buy U. S. Defense Bonds now!

Peace is for the strong... Buy U. S. Defense Bonds now!

The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the Magazine Publishers of America.

SR / RECORDINGS SECTION

HIGHLIGHTS

Page

WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN EUROPE
By Cyrus Durgin 37

FRITZ REINER—PERPETUAL PRODIGY
By Cesar Saerchinger 42

ON WITH THE JAZZ
By Wilder Hobson 44

OPERA—ROMANTIC, BOUFFE, SERIA
By Herbert Weinstock 46

RECORDINGS IN REVIEW
By Irving Kolodin 48

With the Boston Symphony in Europe

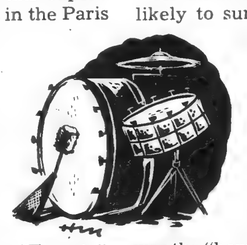
CYRUS DURGIN

BERLIN.

CHEERS and tears, the repercussions of the oil strike at home, a blacked-out trip across the Berlin corridor, swank receptions and seats for the press in the gallery—these are among the mingled memories of the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eventful tour around free Europe. It's been tough and it's been tempestuous, but one thing is sure beyond doubt—Europe has heard a great orchestra, and Europe has responded in a way to gratify everyone involved.

Six concerts in four countries in little more than a week—travel time included—have left a jumble of impressions which may eventually be sorted out, collated, and cast up in a neat balance of evaluation. At the moment, with Paris, The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfurt past and Berlin impending, one can mark only a few highlights, attempt some generalizations, underscore the kinds and quantities of reaction this venture has aroused.

Nobody associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tour has seen Paris quite this way before, nor will it be seen the same way again. Local valuations ranged from those who regarded the Boston Symphony as typically American to those who welcomed the Strasbourg-born Charles Munch and some twenty-odd French-born players in the orchestra as a happy evidence of home-grown quality. René Dumesnil, in Le Monde, gave his benediction to the "French wing" of the orchestra, and the critic of Le Figaro took note that all this superb playing at the first concert in the Paris Opéra had been "led by a French general."



Reactions to the American works on the programs were as varied as the pieces, the critics, and the locale. Politeness was the prevailing tone in Paris toward the "School for Scandal" Overture of Samuel Barber and the "Toccata" which Walter Piston, of Boston and Harvard, wrote for the American tour of the French Orchestre National under Charles Munch in 1948. Specifically, the words were "clever," "pleasant," "without originality," for the Barber, much the same for the Piston.

On the other hand, William Schuman's ten-year-old Symphony No. 3 has seemed to interest European audiences more, despite its divisions into Prelude, Fugue, Chorale, and Toccata—which might seem a rather cerebral challenge, and lengthy, too. Yet, as I have personally observed, it has been generally well-received. A leading Frankfurt critic, Hans Enke, has just given it very thoughtful consideration, with due valuation of its formal structure and a sympathetic regard, all told.

As an emotional climax, nothing is likely to surpass the evening of May 8, when Pierre Monteux was in charge of the orchestra before a cheering audience of compatriots in the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. There was other music on the program, but all that was anticipated—and all that was talked about later—was the "home-coming" of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," in the same hall and with the same conductor who had continued phlegmatically to beat time for the original performance with ballet, thirty-nine years ago when an aroused Paris whistled, shouted, rapped canes, and even exchanged blows with neighbors as a modern masterpiece was born.

Part of the legend of that occasion is that the composer found a window

---

Cyrus Durgin is music critic of the Boston Globe.

Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visit

[209]

Lipatti

Virtuoso performances of Grieg and Schumann Piano concertos in A minor—by Dinu Lipatti on a single Columbia (lp) Record ML 4525

Also—just released—Dinu Lipatti plays the Waltzes of Chopin ML 4522

A BRILLIANT DEBUT
ANDRE
KOSTELANETZ CONDUCTS
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA "POPS"
In their First Great Columbia Record Performance. Jerome Kern: Show Boat (Scenario for Orchestra). Richard Rodgers: South Pacific and Slaughter on Tenth Avenue. All on ONE (lp) Record. ML-4514.

NEW MENDELSSOHN
PROGRAM
A Midsummer Night's Dream. George Szell conducting The Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of N. Y. Symphony No. 4 in A Major. The Cleveland Orchestra, George Szell, Conductor. ML-4498.

A COLUMBIA "FIRST"
THE COMPLETE PIANO MUSIC
RAVEL
VOLUMES I. II. III
ROBERT CASADESUS
with Gaby Casadesus in selections for for 4 hands. ML-4518 • ML-4519 • ML-

Columbia (lp) Records
SYMBOL OF THE FINEST QUALITY IN LONG PLAYING RECORDS
Trade-Marks "Columbia," "Masterworks," ● (lp) Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. Marcas Registradas

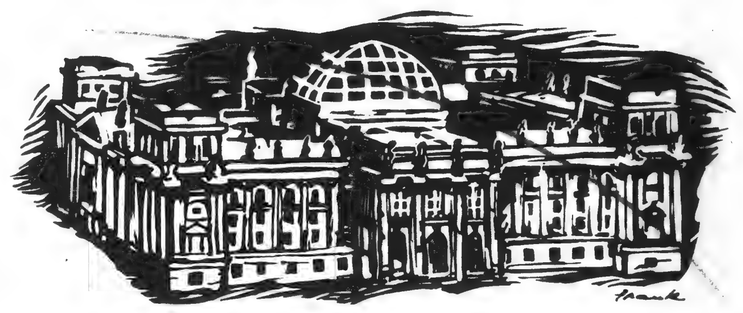
opening on the street the most convenient escape from the chaos. This time the only question was how to acknowledge the applause. From his seat in the auditorium a beaming Stravinsky half-rose to flap enthusiastic hands stageward. Upon the gestured request of the conductor he rose to full height—something less than statuesque at that—and the audience broke into a congratulatory roar. The bald, bespectacled little man of seventy left his seat and disappeared in the general direction of the stage.

I was not there when he arrived, but I am told he suddenly decided not to take a bow. As he hung back, Munch arrived from his place in the audience, and Monteux joined them from the stage. Each conductor grabbed an arm, and fairly dragged Stravinsky to public view. He bowed once, kissed Monteux affectionately, and walked off. Those nearby said he had tears in his eyes.

It's not irrelevant to add, as postscript, that Monteux afterwards proclaimed this was the finest performance of "Le Sacre" that he had ever heard. He speaks with authority, of course, and I don't think excessive personal bias. He has, after all, directed and heard many a performance of "Le Sacre" in nearly forty years.

In part that judgment was occasioned neither by the orchestra nor its conductor, but by the superb acoustics of the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Clear and resonant, the orchestra sounded at is marvelous best. It would be difficult to say the same of the impression in the plush-lined "Grande Boîte" (as Verdi called it) of the Paris Opéra. For reasons known only to the French, a part of the "international" press was shuffled off to the top gallery. Here the orchestra had its familiar richness and resonance, but the sound was off-balance. To accomodate the numerous personnel, an apron was built out over the usual orchestra pit, flaring out, even, under some of the patrician boxes. The strings, pushed beyond a resonating frame, lost some of their power, while the brass, perched on tiers behind, had too much prominence. Only the visiting firemen seemed to mind, but they were generally happier with the results in the more intimate, architecturally uncluttered Champs-Elysées Theatre.

On the road—if you can distinguish between Paris, The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, and Frankfurt—conditions were variable, but generally good. The resonant qualities of the Schouwburg in Den Haag were excellent, the famed Concertgebouw in Amsterdam a baffling disappointment. This Dutch auditorium has doubtless housed some great music-making, but from where I sat it seemed an impossible place, with a high stage toward which one had to crane a neck to see, a steeply rising slope on which the brass and woodwind were arrayed, an encompassing audience, both on the main floor and in the balcony running U-shaped around the hall, who tended to soak up resonance with their clothing. The ceiling, slightly domed, and the auditorium, level as a Kansas wheat field, were also negative factors.



In Brussels, the Palais des Beaux-Arts, built about thirty years ago, proved admirable. Though it has no "sounding box" or shell to reflect the tone hall-ward, the egg-shaped contours of the interior make for bright acoustics. The good effect of the evening's music making was almost spoiled, however, when the ceremonials appropriate to the presence of King Baudouin—looking for all the world like a tired, bored young boy in heavily rimmed spectacles and military uniform in the royal box—almost went awry. It is Belgian custom, under such circumstances, to play the national anthem, "La Brabançonne," both at the beginning and end of the program. It was properly forthcoming at the beginning, but when Mr. Munch strode out after the end of the printed program and took the podium again, half the orchestra was unaware what impended. Many of the woodwinds, in fact, had disassembled instruments and were packing up. Under his whispered direction, the strings swung into the anthem, and little by little others joined.

The Brussels-Frankfurt hop had been anticipated as a swift interlude of air travel, allowing for a much needed breather of a few hours on arrival in Germany. However, the oil strike at home has already had its impact on non-essential military flying over here and, like it or not, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductors and attached campfollowers, were gently advised that they were, for flight purposes, "non-essential." So everybody was loaded onto a train at 7 A.M., for an eight-hour overland jaunt to the Rhineland. Five hours sleep the night before and a long haul by rail did not augur well for the Frankfurt concert, but as such things sometimes happen, it went extremely well, the orchestra sounding as fresh as a hundred-odd daisies.

This concert, practically a triumph of art over fatigue, took place in the newly reconstructed Grosses Haus, formerly the Schauspielhaus. Although much of Frankfurt is still in ruins, the repair of the Schauspielhaus was undertaken several years ago at a cost of $2,000,000. Outwardly, it is a curious blend of old and new, but the interior is a splendid example of modernistic architecture, at once practical and in good taste. It seats 1,400, has two revolving stages, one within the other, and is well equipped for all reasonable purposes.

AFTER an afternoon concert for personnel of the armed forces on the day following, the men embarked for Berlin, again by rail. Here, too, air transport had been scheduled, but revoked under the stringent conditions affecting fuel supply. One contingent was assigned to travel via cars attached to a U.S. Army duty train, and another in like manner with a French duty train. The coaches were sealed, with military personnel in charge.

Just before departure time a French newspaper was procured in Frankfurt which announced in what seemed scare headlines for the usually restrained French that the Soviet check points were refusing rail passage through their corridor, and the rails might be torn up at any time. Fortunately, no evidence of any such gloomy prospects were encountered. We were instructed by the Army personnel on board to keep the shades of our sleeping compartments drawn between 4:30 and 5 A.M.—presumably when the USSR troops would exchange formalities with our military detachment at the frontier—but after a few noises during the night at previous stopping points the official one passed without incident. Indeed, most of us were too exhausted to pay attention, awakening only when the grinding halt at 6:30 announced our arrival in Berlin.

Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visiting firem

Amid the traveling, the changes of halls, food, and sleeping conditions, the orchestra has performed with unflagging spirit and enthusiasm. Hospitality has been unbounded, and often of a touching personal nature. The orchestra of the Radiodiffusion Française tendered the visitors a cocktail party at the Théâtre des Champ-Elysées with appropriate speeches, at which hosts and guests were so numerous that getting a martini or a glass of champagne was a major achievement. In Amsterdam the town council toured the musicians through the canals, then received them in the modernistic council chamber of the Town Hall, whose desks and lecterns gave one the uneasy feeling of having been hauled into court. Here Pierre Monteux, once regular director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, was received as an old friend, with several hundred well-chosen words of greeting from Dr. Anton de Roos, head of Amsterdam's Department of Education and Culture. The next day the orchestra was feted with Geneva gin and other local delicacies at a reception by the Concertgebouw Orchestra.

Among the European born musicians who have been singled out for special attention is cellist Jacobus Langendon, a native Hollander who was greeted in the Hague by Queen Juliana of the Netherlands. He was one of a party including conductor Munch, concert-master Richard Burgin, and manager George Judd summoned to the royal box during the intermission. At Frankfurt a party of official greeters included not only High Commissioner John J. McCloy but also the Burgomeister of Oberstaufenbach, who bore a volume of tributes destined for one of its native sons, Daniel Kuntz. This violinist was a member of the Boston Symphony at its formation in 1881, and is still living in Boston at ninety-two.

Oberstaufenbach hasn't forgotten the Boston Symphony, and it isn't likely that any members of the Boston Symphony will forget this tour even if they should, like the fortunate Mr. Kuntz, live to be ninety-two. With Strasbourg, Metz, Lyon, Bordeaux, and London still to come, anything can happen. What's most likely to happen is that the Boston Symphony will go on playing its triumphant way across Europe. That it's that kind of an orchestra, with the morale to meet any and all circumstances, this tour has—I think I can say without undue egotism—already proven.

Projects in Progress

A CONTINUING evidence of the deep penetration and enduring effect of LP is contained in the number of sizable projects it has propagated—even more, the indication that a reasonable number of them will attain fulfilment. Scherchen's "Salomon" symphonies of Haydn, the clarinet literature by Reginald Kell, Chopin by Rubinstein, are all represented in the present production, but the largest and most promising new venture is introduced by Decca LP's DL 9580 1 ($5.95 each) on which Wilhelm Kempff plays one-eighth of Beethoven's thirty-two piano sonatas —on the first the "Appassionata" and Opus 90, on the second the "Waldstein", and Opus 101.

Assuming that the Schnabel performances will, sooner or later, be available on LP—a considerable assumption, but one not without solid foundation in current planning—the Kempff performances have these distinguishing attributes: more consistently contemporary reproduced sound (Decca is purveying postwar performances, on the whole beautifully processed), a lighter hand on some works in which that virtue is welcome, an over-all individuality worthy of comparison with Schnabel, though it must, in the end, be faced down by his power over some of the biggest works.

This is, of course, the second Kempff "complete" series; the fact that the first came along in the early Thirties inclines some to believe that he is now an ancient, fairly passé. The reverse seems to be true; he is now fifty-seven, with sound technical discipline to match his unquestionable understanding of what he is about. If the pairings continue on the high level of the first two, the series will have its own justification, Schnabel or no.

The Rubinstein Chopin is another, much more individual matter. His concern on RCA Victor LM 1205 ($5.72) and LM 152 ($4.67) are the seven "Polonaises," a literature both intense and individual. I can imagine the works played in a more rigid, mathematical manner; but it would not be Rubinstein's way nor, do I think, Chopin's either. My particular favorite is the "Andante Spianato" and "Grande Polonaise" (E flat), which is realized in a style both meaningful and magical. Clear, resonant piano sound.

Scherchen's investigation of the "Salomon" symphonies of Haydn (Nos. 92 to 104) has now covered ten of the twelve, with the issue of Nos. 96 in D and 98 in B flat (Westminster WL 5111, $5.95). In neither does he approach the exceptional level of the "Military," which protrudes—after months—as one of the peaks of contemporary recording effort, but in neither does he fall off drastically. Whatever the fallible consequence of human sympathy and its limitations—and these two works are not the most stimulating to Scherchen—the mental processes are always dependable, the objective unvarying. I find both performances admirable but a little dull, the recording decent but not remarkable.

In the case of Kell, mention of his associates are about all that is needed to characterize the qualities of the work of the moment—Mozart, Brahms, or Beethoven. In the Mozart Quintet (Decca DL 9600, $5.85) it is the Fine Arts Quartet, in the Brahms A minor Trio (Decca DL 7524, $3.85), Frank Miller, cello, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski, piano. Both are splendidly played, but I find the Mozart a little overwrought and pushed-ahead by comparison with the recent more relaxed version in which Wlach is the soloist (Westminster). The Brahms gets all there is to get out of this not-too-promising score.

Also in the realm of chamber music are the mounting issues from Westminster of Beethoven quartets in performances by the Vienna Konzerthaus Quartet, just extended by LP's WL 5134 and 5127, which completes the treatment of Opus 59 (these are Nos. 1 and 3), and 5120, which contains Opus 127. (Each is $5.95.) Quite the most distinguished thing about this series is the recording, of a breadth and fulness rarely excelled in chamber music, if verging at times on the oversized. The playing is unfailingly sober and musically sophisticated, with few strokes of personal illumination or emotional insight not inherent in the literal markings. Of this group, Opus 59, No. 1, is outstanding in stylistic appreciation and consistently good reproduction.

—I. K.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées—"homecoming."

Stravinsky in the audience

Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visiting firemen seem

Projects in Progress

A CONTINUING evidence of the deep penetration and enduring effect of LP is contained in the number of sizable projects it has propagated—even more, the indication that a reasonable number of them will attain fulfilment. Scherchen's "Salomon" symphonies of Haydn, the clarinet literature by Reginald Kell, Chopin by Rubinstein, are all represented in the present production, but the largest and most promising new venture is introduced by Decca LP's DL 9580 1 ($5.95 each) on which Wilhelm Kempff plays one-eighth of Beethoven's thirty-two piano sonatas on the first the "Appassionata" and Opus 90, on the second the "Waldstein" and Opus 101.

Assuming that the Schnabel performances will, sooner or later, be available on LP—a considerable assumption, but one not without solid foundation in current planning—the Kempff performances have these distinguishing attributes: more consistently contemporary reproduced sound (Decca is purveying postwar performances, on the whole beautifully processed), a lighter hand on some works in which that virtue is welcome, an over-all individuality worthy of comparison with Schnabel, though it might, in the end, be faced down by his power over some of the biggest works.

This is, of course, the second Kempff "complete" series; the fact that the first came along in the early Thirties inclines some to believe that he is now an ancient, fairly passé. The reverse seems to be true; he is now fifty-seven, with sound technical discipline to match his unquestionable understanding of what he is about. If the pairings continue on the high level of the first two, the series will have its own justification, Schnabel or no.

The Rubinstein Chopin is another, much more individual matter. His concern on RCA Victor LM 1205 ($5.72) and LM 152 ($4.67) are the seven "Polonaises," a literature both intense and individual. I can imagine the works played in a more rigid, mathematical manner; but it would not be Rubinstein's way nor, do I think, Chopin's either. My particular favorite is the "Andante Spianato" and "Grande Polonaise" (E flat), which is realized in a style both meaningful and magical. Clear, resonant piano sound.

Scherchen's investigation of the "Salomon" symphonies of Haydn (Nos. 92 to 104) has now covered ten of the twelve, with the issue of Nos. 96 in D and 98 in B flat (Westminster WL 5111, $5.95). In neither does he approach the exceptional level of the "Military," which protrudes—after months—as one of the peaks of contemporary recording effort, but in neither does he fall off drastically. Whatever the fallible consequence of human sympathy and its limitations—and these two works are not the most stimulating to Scherchen—the mental processes are always dependable, the objective unvarying. I find both performances admirable but a little dull, the recording decent but not remarkable.

In the case of Kell, mention of his associates are about all that is needed to characterize the qualities of the work of the moment—Mozart, Brahms, or Beethoven. In the Mozart Quintet (Decca DL 9600, $5.85) it is the Fine Arts Quartet, in the Brahms A minor Trio (Decca DL 7524, $3.85), Frank Miller, cello, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski, piano. Both are splendidly played, but I find the Mozart a little overwrought and pushed-ahead by comparison with the recent more relaxed version in which Wlach is the soloist (Westminster). The Brahms gets all there is to get out of this not-too-promising score.

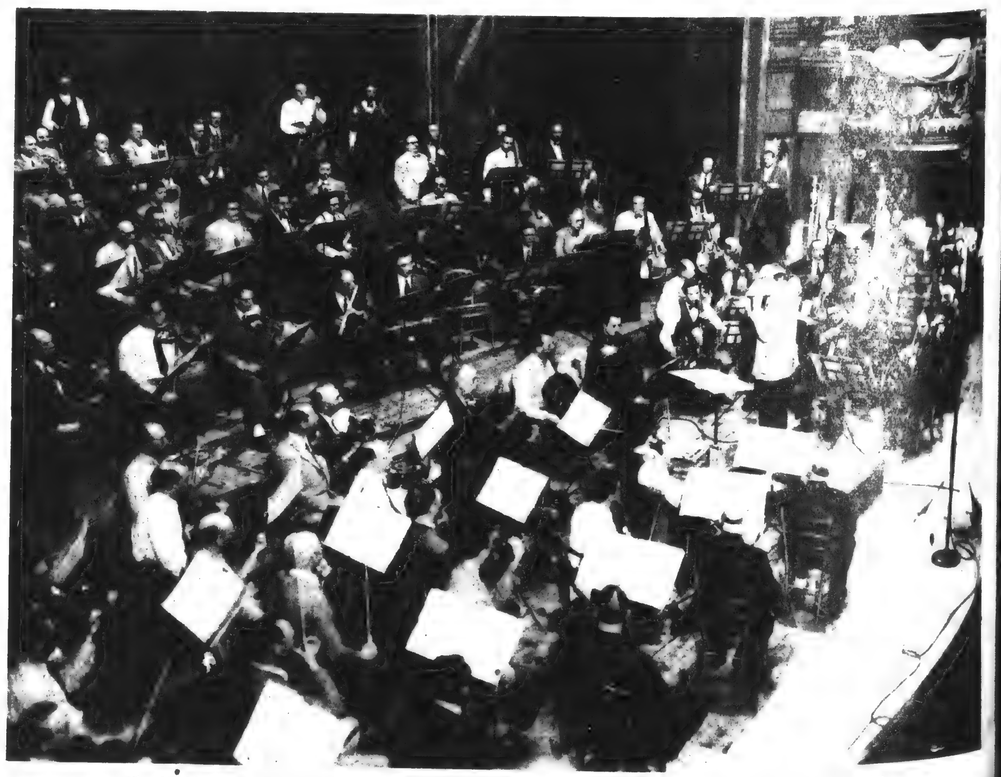
Also in the realm of chamber music are the mounting issues from Westminster of Beethoven quartets in performances by the Vienna Konzerthaus Quartet, just extended by LP's WL 5134 and 5127, which completes the treatment of Opus 59 (these are Nos. 1 and 3), and 5120, which contains Opus 127. (Each is $5.95.) Quite the most distinguished thing about this series is the recording, of a breadth and fulness rarely excelled in chamber music, if verging at times on the oversized. The playing is unfailingly sober and musically sophisticated, with few strokes of personal illumination or emotional insight not inherent in the literal markings. Of this group, Opus 59, No. 1, is outstanding in stylistic appreciation and consistently good reproduction.

—I. K.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN PARIS

Pierre Monteux at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées—"homecoming."

Stravinsky in the audience "reaches [illegible] stageward."



Charles Munch rehearsing the orchestra in the Paris Opéra—"only the visiting firemen seemed to mind."

CHARLES MÜNCH ET 104 BOSTONIENS ONT CONQUIS PARIS

Reportage de G. Graziani et W. Carone

Parue dans Vu 1.1.52

CHARLES MÜNCH a obtenu [illegible] à l'Opéra, le [illegible] plus rare qui [illegible] un musicien: [illegible] de silence. A la der[illegible] de Daphnis et Chloé, [illegible] n'éclatèrent [illegible] de salle. Le chef d'orches[illegible] et salua la salle [illegible]. Pendant cinq secondes fré[illegible] aucune main ne se leva. A la sixième, ce fut le déchaînement: le Président de la République, les ministres, 2.000 spectateurs acclamaient Charles Münch sou[illegible] vif au podium, dominant la masse noire et blanche, étincelante de cuivres et hérissée d'archets des 104 musiciens de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston. Paris, ce soir-là, a fait à Münch l'accueil passionné qu'il réserve à ses généraux victorieux. Il y a trois ans, en effet, Münch partait à la conquête de Paris de la musique aux Etats-Unis, le repère de chef d'orchestre au Symphony Hall de Boston.

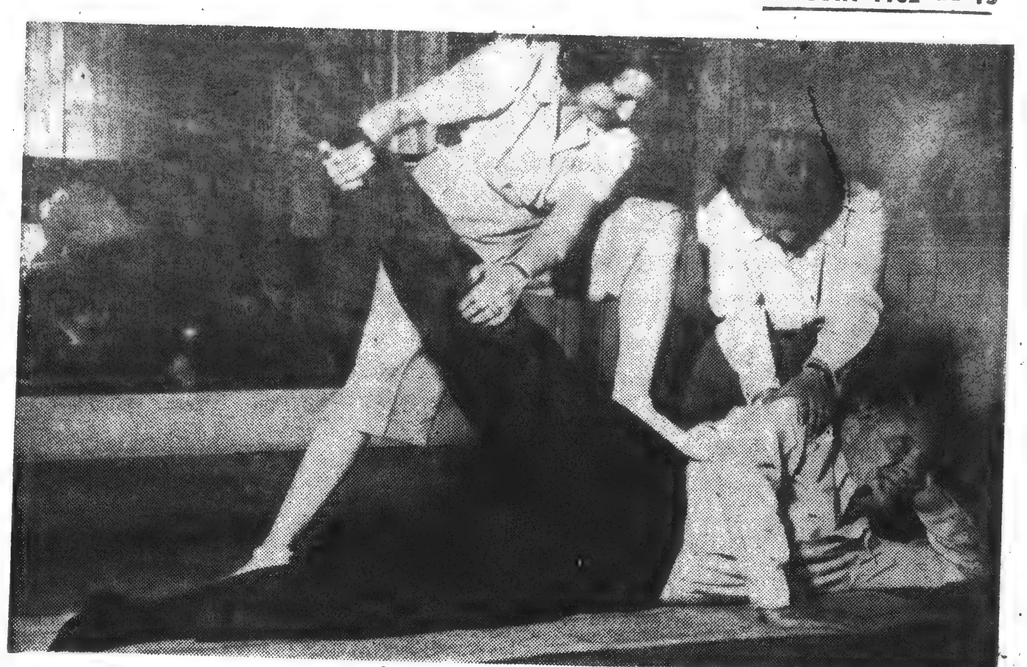
Il est assuré pour 1 million de dollars

Aujourd'hui le héros, plus heureux que tous les chefs qui l'ont précédé à ce poste est revenu avec sa conquête. Pour la première fois depuis 1881, les musiciens de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston ont traversé l'Atlantique et ont fait à Münch la plus glorieuse des gardes d'honneur, celle que composent 104 musiciens parmi les meilleurs du monde. Cet instrument dont le moteur porte un nom alsacien, celui de Charles Münch, dont les rouages viennent de chaque coin du globe, d'Italie, de Russie, d'Egypte et de France, et qui est capable d'assurer deux cents concerts chaque année aux auditeurs des Etats-Unis, fut fondé en 1881 pour son plaisir et celui de ses compatriotes par un amateur de musique, M. Henry Lee Higginson. Assumant tout seul les dépenses de l'orchestre à son origine, il se fia à son goût pour le choix des musiciens et de leur chef. Une véritable institution nationale était créée par ses soins. Un chef d'orchestre allemand, George Henschell, la conduisait. Mais jusqu'en 1949 neuf autres directeurs musicaux allaient se succéder. Parmi ceux-ci on devait voir les plus grands noms étrangers, comme ceux d'Arthur Nikish, de Mück, de Serge Koussevitzky. Mais dès 1918, la France, après la défaite allemande, devait prendre une avance en déléguant à Boston Henri Rabaud et Pierre Monteux. A la fin de la guerre, Higginson étant plus qu'octogénaire, l'orchestre fut administré par un comité qui s'efforça d'élargir son audience. En trente ans celle-ci allait devenir si considérable que le Boston Symphony Orchestra dut acheter deux salles: le Symphony Hall, de 2.600 places, pour les concerts d'hiver, et l'immense auditorium de Tanglewood qui peut contenir 6.000 spectateurs dans son enceinte, et 6.000 autour, répartis sur 85 hectares de prairies où les auditeurs populaires apportent leurs couvertures et leur panier-repas.

Cette ferveur du peuple américain n'est pas toujours partagée par les producteurs de radio. Las de se voir parcimonieusement accorder des quarts d'heure de musique comprimés entre deux vagues de publicité tapageuse, le comité du B.S.O. se paya d'audace en tentant une opération unique dans l'histoire de la musique. Il s'associa avec cinq autres institutions artistiques et scientifiques pour souscrire l'achat d'une chaîne de radiodiffusion.

L'organisation a pris depuis lors son rythme harmonieux, commandé par les saisons: la saison principale d'octobre à mai est de 100 concerts — entièrement loués à l'avance. En mai et juin ont lieu 60 concerts populaires: "les pops". En juillet l'orchestre se divise en deux groupes: l'un d'eux reste à Boston pour présenter des concerts gratuits, l'autre se déplace de 250 kilomètres à l'ouest pour commencer les six semaines de concerts du Festival Berkshire à Tanglewood.

Grâce au B.S.O. l'Amérique entière s'est prise d'une fringale de musique qui ne manque pas d'étonner les Français pour qui cet art demeure encore une denrée de luxe. Nous imaginons mal que toutes les émissions du B.S.O. — même les programmes les plus "modernes" — soient enregistrées et livrées au commerce sous forme de disques qui constituent le quart des "best sellers" musicaux des Etats-Unis.



Charles Münch pratique depuis vingt ans un entraînement physique sévère qui a préparé son corps pour un métier où il faut allier la technique à la séduction.

Le résultat est étonnant si l'on considère que les trois autres quarts représentent les enregistrements de jazz, de be-bop, de chansons, d'orchestres exotiques, et toutes les autres formes de musique.

Quand le B.S.O. se déplace, il est assuré pour 1 million de dollars. Le minimum de salaire pour les musiciens est de 120 dollars par semaine. L'orchestre n'a jamais connu de crise financière et n'a jamais fait appel au public. M. Nabokov, secrétaire de l'Oeuvre du XXe siècle, a dit que le Boston Symphony Orchestra était une institution américaine au même titre que les frigidaires et les gratte-ciel. Les mêmes places sont louées depuis plus de vingt ans aux mêmes familles, chaque saison. Depuis le début du siècle, l'orchestre a créé plus de 169 oeuvres. Pour fêter son cinquantième anniversaire, le B.S.O. a créé dans sa saison, en 1943, la 1re Symphonie d'Honegger, la 4e Symphonie de Prokofiev, la Symphonie en sol mineur de Roussel et la Symphonie des Psaumes de Stravinsky.

Il est plus populaire que Jean Marais

Quand il prit possession de son pupitre, Münch sut gagner l'affection des musiciens et leur respect. Dans un anglais pénible — il le parlait à peine — il s'engagea à faire de son mieux pour maintenir l'orchestre de Boston à son niveau élevé. "Charly" Münch, comme on l'appelle maintenant à Boston, sut conquérir, comme il a conquis son "équipe", les vieilles familles de la ville par sa courtoisie. Pendant les répétitions, il s'adresse à ses musiciens dans un mélange cocasse de français, d'anglais et d'allemand. Souvent il se fait comprendre par gestes. C'est ainsi qu'il lui est arrivé, au cours d'une exécution, de s'agenouiller devant les violoncelles pour en obtenir plus d'expression sans craindre le ridicule, car son principe est de tout sacrifier pour son orchestre et son art. Il est un des derniers musiciens romantiques.

Charles Münch, qui a aujourd'hui soixante et un ans, débarqua de Strasbourg en 1912, son violon sous le bras. Il loue un petit appartement dans l'île de la Cité et s'inscrit au cours de Lucien Capet. La vie de Paris épanouit le jeune Alsacien. Quand il rentre chez lui, son père. Ernst Münch, professe au Conservatoire de Strasbourg, protestant austère, le complimente: "Maintenant, tu es le plus français de nous tous!" Nous tous c'est la famille Münch — quatre fils et deux filles. Charles était le cinquième enfant. Dans la maison la vie était consacrée à la musique: le dimanche toute la famille chantait des cantates de Bach. Souvent un jeune ami, organiste, venait leur rendre visite et participait aux concerts: Albert Schweitzer. La maison résonnait du matin au soir, on y jouait tellement de musique que les voisins la baptisèrent "la boîte à musique". Dans cette ambiance harmonieuse, Charles aurait pu commencer une carrière sans histoire. La guerre va bouleverser cette existence paisible. La mobilisation allemande surprend en Alsace les quatre fils Münch. Charles est gazé à Péronne et blessé à Verdun.

Démobilisé à Cologne, il entre comme violon à l'orchestre de Strasbourg.

En 1921 il est à Berlin où il perfectionne sa technique sous la direction des grands maîtres: Bruno Walter, Furtwaengler, Toscanini.

Mais l'heure du choix est arrivée. Münch, qui est français, ne peut continuer à jouer à Berlin s'il n'opte pas pour la nationalité allemande. Brusquement il quitte sa place de violoniste et rentre à Paris. Il lui faudra attendre l'âge de quarante et un ans pour réaliser son ambition: diriger un orchestre.

Cet homme modeste et passionné qui déclare non sans humour: "Je suis chef d'orchestre parce que je suis trop bête pour faire autre chose" a conquis l'Amérique comme il avait conquis la France: par sa fougue, la beauté de sa plastique, et, naturellement, sa science musicale. Quand, en 1946, on organise un référendum, il se voit classé parmi les cinq grands chefs d'orchestre du monde. Sa popularité est telle que dans un concours organisé par un hebdomadaire féminin il est désigné par 10.000 Parisiennes comme l'homme avec qui elles aimeraient dîner un soir, si elles en avaient le choix. Münch arrivait à la deuxième place après Winston Churchill et avant Jean Marais.

Un génie musical et un athlète

En Amérique il n'était pas un inconnu. Il y fut invité pour la première fois au cours de la saison 1946-1947. Sa distinction un peu hautaine de germain, corrigée par sa douceur latine, enchanta. Ce fut la gloire dès le premier contact. Pourtant sa nomination au pupitre du B.S.O. éclata comme une bombe. Elle étonna tous les Américains mélomanes, sauf le compositeur et critique Virgil Thompson qui avait déclaré quinze ans plus tôt en le voyant jouer à Paris: "Münch est naturellement désigné pour diriger l'orchestre de Boston. Il n'a pas de ventre, ses tempes sont argentées et il déchaîne un enthousiasme hystérique, surtout chez les femmes qui ont dépassé la cinquantaine."

Mais le président du comité du B.S.O., Henri Cabot, entouré des 14 administrateurs, savait bien qu'il avait trouvé l'homme qu'il cherchait après le départ de Serge Koussevitzki: un génie musical, doublé d'un athlète qui serait capable de diriger au moins 90 concerts dans l'année, et qui séduirait d'abord, avant le public, les auditeurs les plus difficiles: ses musiciens.

Quand Charles Münch saisit sa baguette pour diriger sa première répétition devant le B.S.O., il ne dit qu'une phrase: "Et maintenant... relax!..." L'orchestre attaqua Le Corsaire, de Berlioz, avec son premier nouveau chef d'orchestre depuis vingt-cinq ans. Il était conquis.

Le triomphe de Balanchine

A 5.000 kilomètres de Broadway, celui que les Américains ont surnommé "L'Einstein de la Danse" vient de disposer ses plus précises équations sur l'immense plateau de l'Opéra de Paris: c'est George Balanchine, animateur du New-York City Ballet, et maître d'une nouvelle école, celle de la pureté.

Balanchine, qui est aujourd'hui considéré outre-Atlantique comme le chorégraphe du siècle, n'a jamais été un brillant danseur. Au temps où il s'appelait encore Georgi Mélitonovitch Balanchivadzé, il usait ses premiers chaussons de petit rat sur la scène du Théâtre Impérial de Saint-Pétersbourg. La discipline, qu'il devait exiger par la suite de sa compagnie, lui sembla si dure qu'il s'enfuit. Mais ses parents le rattrapèrent dans les quarante-huit heures et le remirent au régime sec des jetés et des battus à l'Ecole des Ballets. Il a dix-huit ans quand il décide de quitter la Russie. Une troupe de "danseurs de l'Etat soviétique" prépare une tournée pour l'Europe. Il s'y engage et sitôt franchie la frontière, l'abandonne. Il ne remettra jamais les pieds dans son pays. Serge de Diaghilev, qui vient de former son génial "Ballet russe de Monte-Carlo" le prend pour maître de ballet. Balanchine est son confident, son conseiller et son héritier spirituel. C'est à lui que Diaghilev confie son élève préféré, Serge Lifar. Sa chorégraphie du "Chant du rossignol" remporte à Paris un triomphe. Quand Diaghilev meurt brusquement en 1933, il va s'installer aux Etats-Unis. Un mécène new-yorkais, Lincoln Kirstein, l'a invité à fonder à New-York l'école du ballet américain. Il ne dansera plus que pour indiquer les pas et les attitudes à ses élèves. A propos de la mazurka tradionnelle russe, qu'il a su rajeunir, il recommande à ses sujets: "Vous courez tout le temps comme un fou". Et un soir, le souffle haletant, il se laisse emporter par le dieu qui l'habite et enlace sa partenaire, Vida Brown. Le coeur lui saute à la gorge. Avec un brio endiablé, il danse une mazurka échevelée. Quand la variation se termine, les spectateurs hurlent debout, pendant sept minutes d'affilée. Après le baisser du rideau, il déclara, encore essoufflé: "Il faut de temps en temps donner de petites nouveautés au public".

C'est à partir de ce soir-là, qu'il se met à supprimer les décors et faire danser devant des rideaux noirs. Il excelle dans les ballets abstraits: "La musique, c'est du geste", dit-il. C'est ce geste qu'il apprend au New-York City Ballet fondé en 1948. Car Balanchine, musicien de classe, emprunte souvent la baguette de son ami Igor Stravinsky pour conduire son orchestre. "Le ballet est comme un papillon: il ne doit vivre qu'une saison. Que diriez-vous d'un papillon de l'année dernière?" Et il crée dix ballets par an.

[illegible]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JUN 1 1952

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

Conductor's Wife Gi... CBS
The interest ... late ...
ductor of the Boston Symp... Serge Koussevitzk... composers will be t... in an interview on ... sevitzky Music ... James Fassett, be... Jones Institute on ... 2:30 p.m.

Played in Hub's First Symphony

Daniel Kuntz with silver miniature violin given him by Mrs. James Jordan, daughter of the late Eben Jordan, founder of Jordan Marsh Co.

Daniel Kuntz, Now 92, Was First Violinist--- Recalls Opening Concert on Winter Street in 1881

By MARK HATCH

AS THE world-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from its triumphal tour of the continent after a brilliant performance at the glittering Paris Opera House, an old man of 92 sat alone in a Back Bay hotel and summoned up remembrances of things past.

For Daniel Kuntz, first violinist in the orchestra for many years, is the only musician living who took part in the Boston Symphony's first performance!

That was in the Music Hall on Winter st. in 1881, 71 years ago, or 19 years before "The Major" (Henry Lee Higginson) and his friends put up the present acoustically superb structure on Huntington ave.

A visiting reporter allowed the retired artist, who's a vigorous dead ringer for Santa Claus in mufti, to break his sessions of sweet silent thought. The short, chunky man with the twinkling blue eyes, who enjoys a bottle of wine at dinner, an occasional "schnapps," and puffs his pipe fiercely all day and half the night, unloosened a spate of memories.

They ranged from the bitter winter's afternoon he went without an overcoat at an outdoor concert in the Fenway because regulation ones were much too long for him, to the summer he courted his late wife and played at the great Wagnerian festival in his native Bavaria, to the grim World war I night federal authorities clapped the Symphony's German conductor in "the common Cambridge jail."

BASEBALL FAN

He'd been listening to the ball game on the radio when his caller walked in, and he promptly chirped: "Those Sox rookies are going great guns again today! I used to go to the games over on Walpole st. And I can see Dick Rudolph of the Braves now. He and Lefty Tyler were wonderful . . ."

"Er, ah, who was the first conductor you played under?"

"Oh, excuse me," he said with a smile, "I forgot you wanted to talk music. Well, I've always liked America. Even its wine. I drink California wine. Rhine wines cost too much. Baseball is our national sport, you know."

There was a picture postcard view of Heidelberg on a desk at his elbow. "My only living sister, Carolina, lives near there, in Oberstaufenbach," he said. "She had three sons and three daughters. The oldest was a veterinary surgeon in the first war, he lived through it, and then came home and worked so hard on a sick horse that he caught a cold that developed into pneumonia, and it killed him. The second son was killed. The third son lost his left arm. He's in a bank in Frankfort today, and he took a busload of his relatives to the orchestra's concert in Frankfort. His boy was killed in this past war.

"That first war was awful for us who were born in Germany. Of course, Dr. Muck, his first name was Karl, was a close friend of the Kaiser's, and he was a little sarcastic, but he was the best conductor of his time. Major Higginson was a proud old Yankee, and he wanted and got the best.

MUSIC TRANSCENDS

"Oh, I'll never forget the night the federal men came right into Symphony Hall, after we'd rehearsed all morning and afternoon—it was just before our performance—and took him off to Cambridge, a common jail. Then he went to Fort Oglethorpe in Georgia. I met him in Europe after the war. He was conducting. But he was a broken old man. His wife had died. And he told me he had to keep going to support 32 relatives.

"I had a little string ensemble on the side. We played at the Algonquin Club. They said they had to let me go. Then I was accused of wearing a Bachelor's Button — that was the Kaiser's flower—in my buttonhole when the Lusitania was sunk. That ship went down in May. How could I get a Bachelor's Button in that month?

"Then I went up to Lake Placid to play and conduct, and they wouldn't let me play Beethoven. It was much better in this last war. Eisenhower himself is of German ancestry. So was Wendell Willkie. Deems Taylor fixed things up so they even put on Wagnerian operas at the Metropolitan. The symphonic classics are mostly German. That's all there is to it. But I like Ravel and Debussy. And the Russian composers were coming along fine. So are the British, nowadays. Music . . . it, it transcends awful things.

"Me a good American? Why I was married in a house right across the street from the Bunker Hill Monument in Charlestown. My father-in-law, Joseph Gahm, lived there. He introduced Schlitz beer into New England."

ITS PEAK

Talking swiftly, obviously delighted that he had a guest, Mr. Kuntz went on to say that he believed he was first violinist with the orchestra when it "hit its peak." "It's stayed up there," he added.

William Gerricker of Vienna was the conductor, the orchestra's second, in the 1890s, Mr. Kuntz said, and he "made the Boston Symphony. We introduced Richard Strauss' tone poems in New York and knocked those critics in the aisles," he recalled, proudly.

"George Henschel was our first conductor," he said, and spelled out the last name for an alien scribe without a moment's loss. "He was a singer and a composer of first rank, but, I must say, a poor conductor. Gerricker was next. The major, who studied in Vienna himself once, got him. After Gerricker we had Arthur Nikisch. He left us after four years to go back to Europe. He was one of the greatest conductors who ever lived.

"Emil Paur came over from Mannheim then. Then we had a Mr. Fiedler. His first name will come to me. (That name subsequently was lost in the hurried conversational flow.) No, he was no relation to Arthur. Arthur's father, Emmanuel, and I sat together the first few years he was here. Gerricker brought him over. He retired on pension, went to Berlin and educated his children there. That's where Arthur got his education.

"After Fiedler came Dr. Muck. Yes, Dr. Muck. He could speak no English. He used to holler at us in German. I can see now a lot of little things added up against him—poor man.

"Pierre Monteux was next, then Dr. Koussevitsky, and now Dr. Munch. I sat next to Mrs. Munch at the first performance her husband conducted here. I don't have a pass. I just walk in." He chuckled.

Mr. Kuntz said he relies on his radio for music today, but that he has a hard time finding programs he likes. "I listen to all of the symphonies, though, I can get on that dial," he said. He added that he moves around quite a lot in the daytime, but nights he prefers the overstuffed chair in his room. "This is comfortable, especially after a good dinner and a pint of wine," he said, and winked knowingly.

He and his wife, who died 23 years ago, "come this Decoration Day," had no children. "She was a wonderful person," he said. "I get lonesome for her."

"Well," he said brightening up, "I came here in 1874 from Oberstaufenbach, a little village on the Rhine. A friend of my father's brought me over. I was 14. And the night after I got to Boston, I played the violin at a Thanksgiving Eve ball, from 8 at night to 5 the next morning. Then I joined Brown's Brigade band. I played the trombone. I can play any instrument. I guess I get it from my father. He was a farmer, and a pretty good country musician, when I think about it. I used to walk 16 miles to take a violin lesson. The price was 25 pfennings—about 7 cents.

AMONG THE BEST

"In October, 1881, I joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That's when it was organized. We weren't very good under Henschel. It took Gerricker two years to get us into shape. Then I can say, in all modesty, we became the finest in this country and among the best in the world. Munich, Dresden, Frankfort, Berlin and Vienna had had symphony orchestras for hundreds of years. It was something for us to top them after a while, I can tell you.

"Gerricker, as I say, made the orchestra. He put in the pension system, too. Imagine! In those days! I've had a comfortable pension for years. I used to be able to go to South Yarmouth every summer, but prices are so high now I can't afford to. I summer in the Fenway. I can remember when I used to swim in the Fenway when the tide came in. You can't remember that!"

Mr. Kuntz, who stopped playing altogether when he was 83, sold his two violins only three years ago, getting $1200 for one of them, $400 for the other. "Both were sound Italian pieces," he said. "Say," he said, "I also played the bass drum and the cymbals my first three years in the Symphony."

[21]

...Y, N. J.
...1952

...Wife On CBS

...of the late con... Boston ... Symphony, ...key, in modern... ...be traced by his wife ... on the Serge Kous... Foundation with ...host of CBS Radio's ...n to Music," today

...D'S ...DAY

...ow 92, ...inist— ...Concert ...in 1881

...t performance her hus... ...ducted here. I don't have ... I just walk in." He ...-said he relies on his ... music today, but that ...hard time finding pro... ...likes. "I listen to all ...phonies, though, I can ...at dial," he said. He ... he moves around quite ...he daytime, but nights ... the overstuffed chair ...om. "This is comfort... ...cially after a good din... ...pint of wine," he said, ...d knowingly.

...his wife, who died 23 ..."come this Decoration ...no children. "She was ...ul person," he said. "I ...me for her."

...he said brightening up, ...ere in 1874 from Ober... ...h, a little village on the ... friend of my father's ...e over. I was 14. And ...after I got to Boston, I ... violin at a Thanks... ... ball, from 8 at night ...next morning. Then I ...own's Brigade band. I ... trombone. I can play ...ment. I guess I get it ...ather. He was a farm... ...retty good country mu... ...en I think about it. I ...alk 16 miles to take a ...on. The price was 25 ...—about 7 cents.

...THE BEST

...ber, 1881, I joined the ...Symphony Orchestra. ...n it was organized. We ...ry good under Hen... ...ok Gerricker two years ...nto shape. Then I can ...modesty, we became the ...is country and among ... the world. Munich, ...Frankfort, Berlin and ...d had symphony or... ...r hundreds of years. ...nothing for us to top ...a while, I can tell you. ...r, as I say, made the ... He put in the pension ... Imagine! In those ...o had a comfortable ... years. I used to be ... to South Yarmouth ...ner, but prices are so ...I can't afford to. I ... the Fenway. I can ...when I used to swim in ... when the tide came ...'t remember that!"

...r, who stopped play... ...ber when he was 83, ...o violins only three ...getting $1200 for one ...$400 for the other. ...sound Italian pieces," ...Say," he said, "I also ... bass drum and the ... first three years in ...ny."

...-11-

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

AMERICAN MUSICIANS MAKE HIT

...auded as Artistic Festival Closes in Europe

BY JOHN RODERICK

...TICAL OVERTONE

...Spurred by Criticism

...Artistic Jealousy

...Praises Americans

...Boston Symphony Orchestra and our own City Center ballet company have already made their appearances, both to vast acclaim. Paris is a city well accustomed to artistic achievement, and it is a source for some pride that our own organizations can win considerable enthusiasm from so discriminating an audience. Other nations besides our own are represented at the Paris festival, of course; all have sent their best and most representative artists, and all have been meeting with success. It is an impressive event, this international display of art and artistry, and Americans can take considerable satisfaction in their part in it. One likes to think that gatherings like these help solidify the nations of the Western World, and leave a sense of mutual understanding and admiration that far outlast the actual event.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUN 2 - 1952

U. S. Arts Score As Free World's Festival Ends

The Boston Conductors and Ballet Win Popular and Critical Acclaim in Paris

PARIS, June 1 (AP).—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century"—in which Americans proved to critical Europe that the United States has achieved cultural maturity.

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

The program, greeted with great enthusiasm, was not without criticism and artistic feuding. Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "Nato Festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's Western defense alliance.

But one Parisian who patronized nearly every event, keynoted the general approval: "This festival has certainly shown one thing if nothing else. That is that American orchestras, ballet and conductors can stand up to or even eclipse most of those in Europe."

The first American triumph was scored by American conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the seventy-one-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding.

Mr. Monteux followed with a triumphant performance two nights later of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." He had conducted this ballet music in its world premiere thirty-nine years earlier in the same Theatre des Champs-Elysees.

The New York City Ballet Company danced the classical "Swan Lake" ballet of Tchaikovsky in its first appearance and set the audience on its ear. The critics gave lavish praise for the brilliance of the dancing company.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
JUN 2 - 1952

Glittering Concert In Paris Closes Artistic Festival Of Free World

By John Roderick

Paris, June 1. (AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—Masterpieces of the 20th Century—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of western intellectuals.

Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, U. S. gin and yeast heir Julius Fleischmann.

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov, complaining that the ends of culture could not be met by political aims.

But one Parisian who patronized nearly every event keynoted the general approval:

"This festival has certainly shown one thing if nothing else. That is that American orchestras, ballet and conductors can stand up to or even eclipse most of those in Europe."

The first American triumph was scored by American Conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's Daphnis And Chloe, the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before.

A rage of artistic jealousy fanned the interest in the first appearance of the New York City Ballet. The director of the Paris Opera Ballet Company, Serge Lifar, was angry because his own group had not been asked to perform. He wrote scathing letters to the papers attacking the American company and its director, George Balanchine.

Balanchine's troupe met Lifar on his own ground, in the ornate Paris Opera House. It was the first time an American ballet ever had danced there.

The New York company danced the classical Swan Lake ballet of Tchaikovsky and set the audience on its ear. The critics minced no words. Balanchine, they said, had clearly won his bout with Lifar and praised the brilliance of the New York ballet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUN 2 - 1952

Americans in Paris

Americans are making a decided impression upon Paris this spring. They do every spring, of course, but this year, things are a little different. For in addition to the customary number of tourists, Americans in Paris are represented right now by an unusually large number of cultural and artistic organizations. Most of them are there to participate in the Exposition of Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Among these are the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York City Ballet Company and the American Negro cast of "Four Saints in Three Acts," the opera by Gertrude Stein and Virgil Thomson.

The Boston orchestra and our own City Center ballet company have already made their appearances, both to vast acclaim. Paris is a city well accustomed to artistic achievement, and it is a source for some pride that our own organizations can win considerable enthusiasm from so discriminating an audience. Other nations besides our own are represented at the Paris festival, of course; all have sent their best and most representative artists, and all have been meeting with success. It is an impressive event, this international display of art and artistry, and Americans can take considerable satisfaction in their part in it. One likes to think that gatherings like these help solidify the nations of the Western World, and leave a sense of mutual understanding and admiration that far outlast the actual event.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JUN 2 - 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY
Of Cabbages and Kings

By CYRUS DURGIN

BRUSSELS—It wouldn't have happened if it hadn't been for the historic old Hotel de Ville. "It" means I wouldn't have been late for the Boston Symphony concert at the Palais des Beaux Arts. Anyone who writes for a newspaper shouldn't be late, as a matter of principle, and furthermore this concert was a "gala," with the place dripping with decorations and King Baudoin himself on hand.

But I was late, because in getting a first look at this capital of the Belgians, I saw a stretch of what looked like old Gothic facade. No Bostonian can possibly resist anything Gothic (New Yorkers think we are a sort of Gothic survival, anyway), and so in a trice the Globe's Flying Dutchman found himself in the Great Place.

I was standing approximately on the spot where the Flemish patriot, Count Egmont, lost his head in the 17th century, when I saw the street sign. It said Rue de Harengs, and anything named Herrings Street had to be investigated. Then all was lost, for midway in the block stands the ancient structure which houses that famed restaurant, L'Epaule de Mouton.

This building, probably constructed about 1660 of "Spanish bricks," slabs of blue stone and age-resistant oak, with "skew-backed" gables toward the top, has been a restaurant for many many years. About a century ago it became known as a first rate place for food, and took the name L'Epaule de Mouton, or "Shoulder of Mutton." In 1907 the Chantraine family took over, and have run it ever since.

It is a small place, seating not more than 30 persons. The napery, silver and glass are distinctive, and flowers are on every table. About in the middle stand two little gas plates. Here M. Chantraine, who would look like Santa Claus had he some whiskerage, presides over the sauces.

The pre-cooking of meats and poultry, game and fish, is done backstage, so to speak. But M. Chantraine makes the sauces, and it is a joy to watch his quick fork, whisk and spoon, all over a flame which burns briskly and never is raised or lowered.

It was sheer agony to tear away from the sight of M. Chantraine at his little gastronomic altar, but eventually I arrived at the Palais des Beaux Arts. There Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony were enjoying another of the cheering, applauding ovations which has been their good fortune in every European city they have visited thus far.

The King? I couldn't see him until he stood up, in the royal box at the rear, when "La Brabanconne" was played at the end. He stood erect and slender, wearing his dark-rimmed spectacles and military uniform, looking, I thought, like a tired and bored young boy. Then, the Belgian National Anthem finished, he bowed slowly and gravely, with that certain awkwardness you would expect from a youth of his age, turned and silently left the hall.

Jumping at superficial conclusions, it seemed a little pathetic. A boy forced young into a prescribed and sadly restricted life; into a Kingship for which he may or may not have any born talent, his days directed by formality and protocol; his spirit burdened by the weight of a crown, and his personality, whatever it may be, hidden behind the glittering exterior of regal show. And all, in time, to become what Sean O'Casey termed "purple dust."

As I found my way on foot back to the Hotel Metropole, it seemed wonderful to breath fresh air and realize that being just another guy is a pretty good deal.

[21a]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
JUN 2 - 1952

American Musicians Triumph At World Festival in Paris

Paris—(AP)—A glittering concert last night closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the 20th Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a monthlong program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of Western intellectuals, including British Philosopher Bertrand Russell and Italian Philosopher Benedetto Croce.

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Lambasted by Reds

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "NATO festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's Western defense alliance.

The first American triumph was scored by American conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before.

Monteux, who was associate conductor of the Boston Symphony followed by recreating a moment in musical history two nights later with the playing of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Earlier Riot Recalled

Monteux had conducted the ballet in its world premier 39 years earlier in the same Theater des Champs-Elysees. That first performance caused a riot of disapproval, however, and Stravinsky had to flee. The 1952 performance brought down the house, and Stravinsky, now an American, was there with Monteux to receive the cheers.

A rage of artistic jealousy fanned the interest in the first appearance of the New York City Ballet. The director of the Paris Opera Ballet Company, Serge Lifar, was angry because his own group had not been asked to perform. He wrote scathing letters to the papers, attacking the American company and especially its director, George Balanchine, who once worked with him in the old Diaghilev Ballet.

The New York company danced the classical "Swan Lake" ballet of Tchaikovsky. Written and staged with a fresh approach, it set the audience on its ear. The critics minced no words. Balanchine, they said, had clearly won his bout with Lifar and praised the brilliance of the New York Ballet.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JUN 2 - 1952

Boston Symphony Aboard Ile de France to Hear Pops Tonight

Boston Symphony Orchestra players will get an idea of what's been going on in their absence tonight when the radio presentation of the Boston Pops Orchestra will be transmitted them aboard the Ile de France, somewhere off the New England coast.

New England radio listeners will be able to hear the concert at 10 p. m. on the standard broadcast band. The program is being presented through the cooperation of WBZ, the Boston Musicians Local, A. F. of L., and the French Lines.

...Explosion
...Europe
...of Americ...

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 1 - 1952

State and Local Topics

Symphony Players

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra making its first European tour—and a most successful one artistically, according to reports—the annual Boston "Pops" concerts in Symphony Hall have been carried on, four nights a week, by an ensemble that includes many young musicians who would not otherwise have had a chance to perform there. Because it takes longer than a few weeks and more than a few rehearsals to mold any such group into a polished orchestra, the early concerts may not have been quite up to past standards, but at least they were not abandoned.

Now, with the return of the Symphony players, the ambitious youngsters will have to make way for them; many of the regular Symphony artists have appeared in the "Pops" in recent years, until time for them to move on to Tanglewood, though the first-desk men have not done so. The Tanglewood programs begin the first week in July, and during that month the younger, less experienced element will presumably have its innings again in the Esplanade concerts.

But while these musicians have not yet attained the mastery of the Symphony veterans, they are by no means amateurs. More than 20 of the present "Pops" orchestra are members, or former members, of the Springfield Symphony, or the Young People's Symphony, and it is a tribute to their training under Dr. Alexander Leslie that so many of them were able to pass the careful screenings made by Arthur Fiedler in their selection.

It is less gratifying locally, however, that these players are now largely unavailable here, particularly since the Springfield Symphony is to appear tonight in an international broadcast in the Auditorium as part of the opening ceremonies of the city centennial celebration. According to present indications, many of them will also be unavailable next season, when the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, already widely known for its recordings, is to go on tour for the first time.

Constant changes in personnel are hardly conducive to optimum efficiency in orchestral performance and, while it is nice to know that local musicians are advancing in their profession, it is to be regretted that lack of permanent employment here has made it necessary for them to find it elsewhere, as many others besides those now playing in Boston have done. Thus, while new talent is constantly being developed under the broad program sponsored by the Springfield Orchestra Association, it appears that in not providing adequate opportunity for local musical talent to earn a living at home Springfield may already have missed the boat.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

U. S. 'Proves' Cultural Maturity In Free World's Paris Festival

Paris, June 1—(AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the 20th Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Month-Long Program

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchsetra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of western intellectuals, including British philosopher Bertrand Russell and Italian philosopher Benedetto Croce. Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, U. S. gin and yeast heir Julius Fleischmann.

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "NATO Festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty organization's western defense alliance. Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov, complaining that the ends of culture could not be met by political aims. And American conductor Arthur Rodzinski suggested tartly that Fleischmann might well spend his money on helping starving artists rather than on lavish festivals.

Walter Scores First

The first American triumph was scored by American Conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before.

Monteux, who was associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, followed by recreating a moment in musical history two nights later with the playing of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite Of Spring."

Monteux had conducted the ballet in its world premier 39 years earlier in the same Theater Des Champs-Elysees. That first performance caused a riot of disapproval, however, and Stravinsky had to flee. The 1952 performance brought down the house, and Stravinsky, now an American, was there with Monteux to receive the cheers.

A rage of artistic jealousy fanned the interest in the first appearance of the New York City Ballet. The director of the Paris Opera Ballet Company, Serge Lifar, was angry because his own group had not been asked to perform. He wrote scathing letters to the papers, attacking the American company and especially its director, George Balanchine, who once worked with him in the old Diaghilev Ballet.

Balanchine's troupe met Lifar on his own ground, in the ornate Paris Opera House. It was the first time an American ballet ever had trodden there.

The New York company danced the classical "Swan Lake" ballet of Tchaikovsky. Written and staged with a fresh approach, it set the audience on its ear. The critics minced no words. Balanchine, they said, had clearly won his bout with Lifar and praised the brilliance of the New York ballet.

ART FESTIVAL AMERICAN TRIUMPH

Los Angeles Times
MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1952

Free World Shows Europe She Has Come of Age, Culturally Speaking

PARIS, June 1 (AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the 20th Century" — in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of western intellectuals, including British Philosopher Bertrand Russell and Italian Philosopher Benedetto Croce.

Fleischmann Sponsor

Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, U.S. gin and yeast heir, Julius Fleischmann.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the NATO Festival and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's western defense alliance.. Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov, complaining that the ends of culture could not be met by political aims.

American Conductor Artur Rodzinski suggested tartly that Fleischmann might well spend his money on helping starving artists rather than on lavish festivals.

Walter Scores First

The first American triumph was scored by American Conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding.

Monteux, who was associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, followed by re-creating a moment in musical history two nights later with the playing of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Monteux had conducted the ballet in its world premier 39 years earlier in the same Theater des Champs-Elysees. That first performance caused a riot of disapproval, however, and Stravinsky had to flee. The 1952 performance brought down the house, and Stravinsky, now an American, was there with Monteux to receive the cheers.

Jealousy Shown

A rage of artistic jealousy fanned the interest in the first appearance of the New York City Ballet. The director of the Paris Opera Ballet Company, Serge Lifar, was angry because his own group had not been asked to perform. He wrote scathing letters to the papers, attacking the American company and especially its director, George Balanchine, who once worked with him in the old Diaghilev Ballet.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1952

Symphony Resumes Wednesday

Regular Musicians to Hear Substitutes by Radio on Ship

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is almost home again. Having completed their first European tour with distinguished success, the musicians of this noted ensemble will arrive in Boston tomorrow and will resume their regular duties as members of the Boston Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening. The Pops concerts will continue each night including Sunday throughout June.

Tonight, while the Boston Symphony musicians are still aboard the Ile de France, they will hear a special broadcast concert by the remarkable substitute orchestra that Arthur Fiedler organized and trained to take over during their absence.

This broadcast is being presented through the cooperation of WBZ, the Boston Musicians Local of the AFL, and the French Lines. New Englanders may hear the program by tuning in at 10 o'clock.

The Pops concert tonight in Symphony Hall is entirely sold out for Boston University Night. No seats are available to the general public.

The Pops soloists for this week will be Gerson Yessin, who will play the Liszt E-flat Piano Concerto on Wednesday night; Berica Shulman, whose vehicle will be the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto in D minor on Friday evening; Charles Hedlund, who will perform the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto in G minor on Saturday evening; and Henry Gregorian, soloist in the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto while the orchestra performs under the direction of his brother, Rouben Gregorian, on Sunday night.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JUN 2 - 1952

Pops to Entertain Boston Symphony in Radio Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra players, aboard the Il de France, will be entertained tonight by, of all things, a special concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Through the cooperation of station WBZ, the Boston Musicians Local, A.F.L., and the French Lines, a special broadcast by the "May Pops"—the remarkable substitute group taking over for the touring players, will be radioed to the Il de France and into the Little Theater, where the symphony men will be relaxing.

Arthur Fiedler says the idea of the concert is to welcome home the regular players, give them an idea of what's been going on in their absence," and to let them hear this remarkable group of musicians who have striven so excellently toward maintaining the Pops' standard."

New Englanders will be able to eavesdrop on the concert by tuning in at 10:30 p. m., when the Il de France will be somewhere off the New England coast, within range of the broadcast.

[213]

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
JUN 2 - 1952

...ral Maturity ...aris Festival

...g concert tonight closed ...Masterpieces of the 20th ...oved to critical old Eu... ...chieved an astonishing

Month-Long Program

...achioed Pierre Monteux, con... ...the Paris Conservatory ...ra, climaxed a month-long ...n designed to prove that art ... on freedom and is crushed ...litarian regimes.

...e political overtones were in... ...by the festival's sponsors, ...ngress for Cultural Freedom, ...p of western intellectuals, in... ...British philosopher Bertrand ... and Italian philosopher Ben... Croce. Great orchestras, con..., composers, dancers, writers ...ainters were brought to ... thanks to the program's ... U. S. gin and yeast heir ...Fleischmann.

...program, greeted with the ...ousing enthusiasm seen in ...arts for many a day, was not ... its tart spicing of criticism ...istic feuding.

...unists lambasted the whole ...naturally. Left-wingers called ...NATO Festival" and said it ...d the North Atlantic Treaty ...ation's western defense alli... ...ome artists wrote irate let... ...the festival director, Nicholas ..., complaining that the ends ...re could not be met by poli... ...ns. And American conductor ... Rodzinski suggested tartly ...iechmann might well spend ...ey on helping starving art... ...er than on lavish festivals.

...ne Parisian who patronized ...every event keynoted the ... approval:

...festival has certainly shown ...ng if nothing else. That is ...erican orchestras, ballet and ...ors can stand up to or even ...most of those in Europe."

...first American triumph was ...by American conductor Bru... ...er, leading the Paris Opera ...ra.

...greater, however, was the ...nce for the first time in ...of the 71-year-old Boston ...ony Orchestra under the ...of Charles Munch. By the ...e 110-piece orchestra had ... playing Ravel's "Daphnis ...hloe," the diamond-studded ...e was on its feet, shouting, ... and applauding as never

...eux, who was associate ...or of the Boston Symphony, ... by recreating a moment ...cal history two nights later ...e playing of Russian-born ...ravinsky's "Rite Of Spring." ...eux had conducted the ballet ...orld premier 39 years earlier ...ame Theatre Des Champs-

That first performance ...a riot of disapproval, how... ...d Stravinsky had to flee. ...952 performance brought ...he house, and Stravinsky, ... American, was there with ... to receive the cheers.

...e of artistic jealousy fanned ...erest in the first appear... ...the New York City Ballet, ...rector of the Paris Opera ...Company, Serge Lifar, was ...because his own group had ...n asked to perform. He ...athing letters to the papers, ...g the American company ...ecially its director, George ...ine, who once worked with ... the old Diaghilev Ballet. ...chine's troupe met Lifar on ...ground, in the ornate Paris ...ouse. It was the first time ...rican ballet ever had danced

...New York company danced ...ssical "Swan Lake" ballet ...haikovsky. Written and ...with a fresh approach, it set ...iences on its ear. The critics ...no words. Balanchine, they ...d clearly won his bout with ...nd praised the brilliance of ...York ballet.

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

Charles Munch's Triumph

By CYRUS DURGIN

SIERA-BOURG, ... The Boston Symphony O... ...s appearance ... Alsace may ... ...ner concert, ... man ... ...ne becau... ... a life... ... Tour man, ... is ... Munch ... ... upon this ... was a ... ...n honored ... ... Charles Munch was born ... and his ... name is ... that has been respected here in musical circles for a very long time. His fame before it has made it famous, and on account of it Colmar, there are two buildings which have rec... ...ed ... the reaction. One of ... ... Symphony is devoted ... of the ... ... Fair, the ... ... and conductor ... Pa... ...

So when the capacity audience in Strasbourg's Salle de la Musique des Fetes let loose with a tempestuous ovation at the end of the program, that moment was perhaps the culmination of a lifetime of music-making for Charles Munch. I was able to see him, from a vantage point backstage, as he conducted the final number, Brahms' great and noble Fourth Symphony. There was something almost transfigured in the expression upon his face.

* * *

At any rate, this concert, which included Honegger's Second Symphony and the "Bacchus et Ariane" ballet suite by Roussel, was another highlight in what has been for the Boston Symphony a genuine triumphal progress. Furthermore, it was given under the gratifying auspices of the University in Exile, and there were appropriate party ceremonies afterward.

* * *

My own view of this charming city was not confined to musical aspects. A short visit convinces me that this home of the goose-liver delight, pate de foie gras, and that colorless brandy known as framboise, flavored with the inimitable flavor of raspberries, is a really gay place. It looks bright, and the people so far as I could make it, enjoy life.

Although next day was Sunday, that had its pleasant surprise, too, for as I was breakfasting under an awning, looking out over the square, my ears caught a sound of horns. Not auto or just ordinary horns, either, but eight valveless, natural hunting horns, played by eight gentlemen in scarlet coats, black caps and britches and long riding boots.

They weren't about to chase a fox, either. These eight are a society of hunting horn players who practice just for fun, and on Sundays when the weather is fine give impromptu concerts of old hunting calls.

They call themselves "Le Sainte Hubert Fanfare de Tromps de Chasse du Bas-Rhin." If that is quite a mouthful, their instruments are even more so. Each horn is the same size, but different mouthpieces are used so that the horns really sound in four-part harmony. Their tone, especially when heard from a little distance, is light and haunting.

James Stagliano, the Boston Symphony's excellent first horn, also was attracted by the sound. When the Ste. Hubert boys discovered who he is, they made him an honorary member on the spot, and one of the eight took from his own jacket the little pin of the society and fastened it in the Stagliano lapel. The pin is of silver a tiny replica of a waldhorn containing in its circle of tubing a stag with a cross between its antlers.

Unfortunately, Mr. Stagliano did not have his mouthpiece handy, so he could not respond with a solo. But ever since he has been so proud of that pin I suspect he will wear it everywhere. He had it on his tailcoat at next night's concert!

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

The Boston of France

By CYRUS DURGIN

...ons call a piece of ... steak is really thick and lusciously ... race, and like the place which calls ... itself by the amusing name of Le ... Filet de Sole.

* * *

... a devotee of Boston's Faneuil ... Hall market district, I had a lot of ... fun prowling through the long, ... covered market stalls of Lyon. It ... was a treat just to look at the ... varieties of fish, so many of them; ... the big baskets of frogs' legs, the ... abundance of vegetables and fruits.

Cheese, like taste in women and ... tuxedo, is a very personal matter, ... and there are those who reel and ... turn white at the smell of a French ... cheese stall. But to the stronger ... people, that aroma of mingled basic ... odors is just as delightful as any ... perfume of the great houses of ... Paris.

I don't know, really, whether the Lyonnais are stuffy or not. In the ... primitive, casual dealings of getting ... a room, food, taxis and what not, ... everyone seemed reasonably ... cordial. Just like Bostonians.

The audience at the Salle de ... Opera, listening to Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, did not seem to exert themselves very much in applauding. Up to intermission, that was. The end of the concert was another matter, and the last chords of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" brought a warm but puzzling reception.

The audience clapped in a definite rhythm. Neither Mr. Monteux, who had never conducted there before, nor any of the players knew what it meant. Some thought perhaps the whole program had been a failure, until a backstage figure explained that the rhythmic applause, not heard too often, meant the Lyonnais wanted an encore.

Mr. Monteux amiably explained the orchestra had no music for an encore.

"We'll lend you some!" shouted a man out front.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
JUN 2 - 1952

FESTIVAL OF FREE ENDS ON HIGH NOTE

And U. S. Proves Cultural Maturity to Europe

By JOHN RODERICK

PARIS, June 1—(AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the 20th Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of western intellectuals including British philosopher Bertrand Russell and Italian philosopher Bendetto Croce.

Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, United States gin and yeast heir Julius Fleischmann.

Called "N. A. T. O. Festival"

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers caled it the "N. A. T. O. festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's western defense alliance.

Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov, complaining that the ends of culture coul dnot be met by political aims. And American Conductor Artur Rodzinski suggested tartly that Fleischmann might well spend his money on helping starving artists rather than on lavish festivals.

But one Parisian who patronized nearly every event keynoted the general approval:

"This festival has certainly shown one thing if nothing else. That is that American orchestras, ballet and conductors can stand up to or even eclipse most of those in Europe."

Bruno Walter Triumphs

The first American triumph was scored by American Conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris opera orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch.

By the time the 10-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JUN 1 - 1952

4 Orchestras Engaged for Next Season

By Seymour Raven

Four concert series, embracing 33 individual programs [eight of them orchestral], have been booked by the Allied Arts corporation for the 1952-53 season. Of these the musical programs will be given in Orchestra hall, but one series, that which is devoted to dance, will be moved to the Civic Opera house. Managing director of Allied Arts is Harry Zelzer.

The emphasis being placed by the concert agency on symphonic music is reflected in the engagement of four orchestras, each to play two concerts. Three will be American organizations, the Boston, Cincinnati, and Denver orchestras, and one will be a visitor from Scandinavia, the Danish State orchestra.

* * *

Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, as we have already noted, will conduct the Boston Symphony on its American tour next spring, as they will have worked together over a year's span starting with the European tour this spring and continuing thru summer at Tanglewood and the winter season in Symphony hall, Boston. Chicago audiences, who heard the Boston many times under the late Serge Koussevitsky's direction, have also a very long acquaintance with Mr. Monteux. Mr. Munch is not a stranger either, tho his Chicago appearances have been far fewer.

The novelty in this booking, if that is the right word, lies in the fact that the Boston orchestra's history is being drawn together in a sense. Monteux was, for five years, the predecessor of Koussevitzky, the musical director of the Boston for 25 years. Munch, of course, was appointed to the post when Koussevitzky retired in 1949.

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

French Manners at Metz

By CYRUS DURGIN

METZ, France—Until yesterday, all I knew of Metz was that something unpleasant happened there during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. And Oh yes, there were American troops there during World War II. Willis Page, double bass of the Boston Symphony, was one of them.

Today, I know that Metz is a city of 65,000, a city of industry, with a certain architectural uniformity and a look of age, with a big and good restaurant named the Globe, near the station; a dive called the Casino Bar in the shadow of the imposing cathedral, and with a definite prejudice on the part of its people against their neighbors, the Alsatians.

"We are Lorraineoise," said one lady who spoke English like an American, though she never had been in the United States, "and we are colder than the Alsatians."

I hadn't noticed any of them was cold.

* * *

Today, I know further that of all the smaller places where the Boston Symphony has appeared, Metz did the most for us.

There isn't any real concert hall, just the Salle des Mines, a fairly big auditorium with a floor good for dancing, a balcony and a small stage. The head of the local conservatory of music really got busy. He had the stage built out to accommodate 100-odd men, covered it with carpet and ringed it with potted palms; rigged up some lights, and, as a final touch of welcome, put a big Stars and Stripes on the wall above the stage.

By the time everybody was in, the place was suffocating, but that didn't matter.

It was an occasion for everybody, and the talk was that this visit of the Boston Symphony was not only important to Franco-American friendship, but it had got together under one roof some people who ordinarily did not speak to each other, at least not amiably.

The concert went great guns, with Charles Munch in his liveliest form. Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" wowed 'em, Brahms' Fourth Symphony socked 'em, and the Berlioz "Fantastic" Symphony all but blew them out of their seats. Cheers and applause, applause and cheers, for as long as Mr. Munch wanted to come back.

* * *

M. Dubois, a tall, keen-looking man, with hair graying at the temples, gave a small and elegant party at the Prefecture, afterwards. One of those soirees limited to the Best People (which doesn't explain how Durgin got in), where the liquid refreshment is nothing but champagne, and the food an enormous repertory of tasties from salami to roast beef, and mushrooms in mayonnaise on toast.

Once you get the hang of balancing a tall champagne goblet (cocktail and high ball glasses are easier to manage) with a plate of food, all was fine. The best way is to carry the plate in the left hand, place the goblet on the plate, and place your left thumb on the foot of the goblet. That leaves your left elbow extended to ward off lurchers, and a free right hand to meet the next person.

Purely as a social observation, no reflection intended, I noticed at this party one fascinating aspect of French manners. This relates to simultaneous conversation and munching of food, and applies especially to men. Women talk first and eat afterward. But men try to do both at once, and it is a tour de force of timing to get the food in and the words out without jamming oral traffic.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUN 4 - 1952

Boston Symphony Back From 1st Europe Tour

Members of the Boston Symphony arrived aboard the Ile de France yesterday from the orchestra's triumphal first tour of Europe and entrained for Boston. The tour began May 6 at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris, and after appearances in The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Strasbourg, Metz, Lyons, Bordeaux, concluded in London on May 26.

Aboard the Ile de France, members of the orchestra formed a double quartet to play Mozart and Handel Sunday night. A collection taken among the audience added 146,000 francs ($420) to the seamen's fund.

MUSIC

Symphonists Return to Thundrous Welcome

By JOHN WM. RILEY

"Hail the conquering heroes," the applause said, and Symphony Hall thundered with it last night. For the members of the Boston Symphony who ordinarily play the Pops Concerts were back in force for their first performance in Boston after the triumphant European tour.

Arthur Fiedler was justifiably proud of the orchestra he whipped together to play the Pops four nights a week through May. They were a brilliant and responsive group and the conductor will brook no slights handed them, even by inference.

But there's nothing like the depth, the sheen and the brilliance of the Boston Symphony. Electricity was in the air last night. The audience was alive with interest. And the orchestra played with the confident assurance of heroes.

Despite the rigors of the tour, they looked tanned and healthy. "Maybe a little tired," said cellist Joseph Zimbler. But their energy was still high.

You could even say that the B. S. O. members were showing off last night. They're known for years that they were good. But a prophet is without honor in his own house. It took the acclaim of Europe to prove their worth to themselves. They made no bones about showing it last night.

Last night's program was geared to the glittering talents of the Boston Symphony men and was changed to suit them. Rimsky-Korsakov, Weber's "Der Freischutz" Overture, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony in which they can really show off, were among the first pieces. Gerson Yessin played the solo part of the Liszt E-Flat Piano Concerto in the big style, like a man who enjoys his work. And Mr. Fiedler wound up the middle section of the program with the finale to Brahms' First Symphony. The program closed with selections from "Kis Me, Kate," pieces by Eduard and Johann Strauss and the Farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne."

TIGHT BINDING

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Boston Symphony Conquers Europe

Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is impossible to convey the extent of the success the Boston Symphony orchestra has had in Europe so far.

The orchestra has now given eight of the 15 concerts scheduled during the tour and every one of them has been received by public and press alike in a way to leave all of us really staggered indeed, anything less than a 10 minute ovation complete with cheers, bravos and stamping on the floor with, the next morning, a couple of columns of almost frighteningly effulgent reviews in the papers, is now considered a slight.

Five of the six "important" concerts are now behind the orchestra. These were the two Paris concerts and concerts in Amsterdam, Berlin and Strasbourg. The others in The Hague, Brussels, Frankfurt and so on were important, too, of course, but Paris is always a special test. Amsterdam is the most critical city in the world musically speaking, Berlin is almost equally so and is, after all, an occupied city, and Strasbourg is Charles Munch's home town.

London, the scene of the orchestra's final concert, is the last and the widest water jump; no American orchestra has ever yet been quite accepted in London, and the private odds among the members of the orchestra are 5 to 4 that it won't like the Boston orchestra either.

Most Sensational

Of the concerts so far, certainly the most sensational was the second Paris concert when Pierre Monteux conducted Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" with the composer himself in the audience. The demonstration on this occasion was not less than historic. So far as I'm concerned this was one of the greatest experiences of my life; I'll never forget standing back stage and seeing Stravinsky run off the stage and out into the alley, tears streaming down his face.

The scene was very nearly repeated in The Hague two nights later with Queen Juliana in the royal box over the stage. As it had been in Paris on the opening event, this was Charles Munch's triumph; the audience shook the hall with its applause and cheers until the conductor could respond no longer. The next afternoon in Amsterdam's Concertgebouw hall, a peculiar sort of place with the orchestra scattered all over the sharply rising stage, with the audience all around it, the audience was graver, more sombre, more sedate. Its rising ovation was said by the local concert people to be an unusual display of enthusiasm though it seemed mild to me in contrast to the previous ovations.

"Boston Symphonie Orkest," read the headlines over the review the next morning, "een kolossaal ensemble," the critic and his colleagues went on to say that they never heard such a brilliant orchestra, such beauty of tone, such fantastic virtuosity of playing.

In Brussels the next night at a concert attended by the King it was the same scene repeated over again. The King, a small, slim bespectacled young man in a khaki uniform behind a vast corset of medals, sat absolutely immobile through the whole thing in the royal box at the rear of the auditorium which was, as a matter of fact, a little too small for the orchestra. The audience, as all of them have been so far, was in evening dress. At the end it sprang up for the usual ovation. After about six calls to the stage, Mr. Munch signalled for the Belgian national anthem. As only a handful of musicians expected this, their parts were buried and the anthem got off to a start played by only a couple of dozen men. The others quickly caught up, however, and played it while the audience faced the standing King.

The anthem over, the audience gave the king a very mild round of clapping (he isn't very well liked, they say, not for anything he's done but because they hate his father), then turned around to continue the ovation for the orchestra.

Frankfurt Concerts

The orchestra gave two concerts in Frankfurt, one for the German public, the other for the American army. Again, both were tremendous successes as were the reviews in the paper the next day. What they couldn't get over was the brilliance of the playing combined with the orchestra's capacity to go from the softest and subtlest tones to astonishing climaxes of sound. It was amusing to note, too, that each nation mentioned the fact there were a number of their own nationals in the orchestra and attributed some of the orchestra's capacity to this fact. In France, for example, they conveyed the idea that the orchestra consisted of 40 French-born musicians augmented by others.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAY 29 1952

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, long acknowledged as one of America's finest musical organizations, has added European acclaim to its already impressive laurels, according to a Paris dispatch to the New York Times from its music critic, Olin Downes. The orchestra, under its noted French conductor, Charles Munch, is appearing for the first time in Europe, taking part in the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations."

Mr. Downs, whose article was headlined "Boston Symphony Captivates Paris," wrote that although the gala event was marked by much pomp and ceremony and attended by the French President and other notables, "the performances given by the superb orchestra were by far the highest honor that the evening could invoke."

Performing music by Honegger, Barber, and Piston, the orchestra, according to the Times' critic, "was not only playing matchlessly for the first time in Europe, it was also the first American orchestra to be invited to perform at the Paris Opera."

The most recent RCA Victor recordings by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, are the Symphony No. 103, in E flat ("Drum Roll") of Haydn, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, in C, Opus 21—coupled together on 33 1/3-rmp discs.

A new album by the orchestra, featuring works of Ravel, Lalo, Berlioz, and Saint-Saens, will be included on the July release and Schumann, as well as the album, The Heart of the String Quartet.

yet chauvinism, the thing the orchestra most feared as it began its tour, has been remarkably absent. No one has yet suggested that the Boston orchestra is good, but of course not as good as their own; to a man they have so far stated point blank that they've never heard anything like it.

But certainly no ambassador to the European people, who estimate a people by their culture and not by their politics, could possibly have made the tremendous impression that the Boston Symphony orchestra has. Boston may have been living on its Emersonian reputation up to now, but from henceforth it will live in Europe on the basis of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

VOLUME 44 NO. 162

Symphony Returns To Elated Hub

By Laura Haddock
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Home from triumphs in Europe, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are still blinking over the wild enthusiasm shown by European audiences for their performances.

"People in all the cities we visited said they had never heard an orchestra like ours," said Willis Page of the double-bass section, a young American musician. He says he believes the orchestra has a new realization that theirs is possibly one of the finest musical organizations the world has ever heard.

"I believe the really sensational success of this tour will not only increase immeasurably the reputation of American musicians generally but will intensify the already fine morale of the orchestra itself." Mr. Page told The Christian Science Monitor today.

Metz Concert Recalled

The most exciting concert of the tour for the young bass player was the one played in Metz, in the Saar Basin. "I had been in that city once before, in December, 1944, as a matter of fact," he explained. "I was with the 95th Infantry, and we and the Fifth Infantry captured the town from the Germans in one of the bloodiest battles of the war. We lost a third of our division in that action, and at the time I certainly never dreamed I'd be comng back eight years later to play a symphony concert there."

Mr. Page said the first concert of the tour, given at Paris, seemed to all of them the crucial one. "What we did there would likely set the tone for the tour," he said. "And I can report that the orchestra never played better.

Paris Applauds

"The audience was, of course, very distinguished at that first concert, and they were so enthusiastic it was hard to believe. They stood up to applaud, and they kept on applauding and applauding. They wouldn't stop. Finally, we just left the stage, and they were still applauding.

"It was the same everywhere: the audiences were wonderful. And of course that made us very proud. We realized the importance of the whole thing. We had a feeling we were representing not only Boston but the United States, and we really gave it everything we had."

The orchestra was "a little United Nations" with almost all the major countries of Europe represented among its players. "Yet on this tour we were all Americans, believe me," Mr. Page said. "It was a good example of what America is, really, a mixture of everything, but something special in its own right, too."

Command Invitation

He said he felt the sensational success of the tour was one more blow to the old myth that a top-notch musician must obtain his training in Europe. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra now has a large minority of American-born, American-trained artists," he said.

Jacobus Langendoen, cellist born in Holland, was invited by Queen Juliana of the Netherlands to visit her in her box when the orchestra played at The Hague.

"One of the other players came backstage to me, and said, 'Quick, quick, the Queen wants to see you,'" Mr. Langendoen said. "Someone had told her that there were Dutch players in the orchestra. She was very gracious, but she was also very charming and easy to talk to, very informal and pleasant.

Success Emphasized

"I told her," Mr. Langendoen said, "that we were very proud of our orchestra and also that it was a great honor to us to have her present in the audience."

Mr. Langendoen described the whole tour as "tremendously successful." "We had never had so much glory heaped upon us as we did on this trip," he said.

In Holland, he explained, it is a custom of audiences to express extreme satisfaction by standing applause, and this they did for the Boston orchestra.

TRAVEL-SYMPHONY

London Critics' Reaction

By CYRUS DURGIN

LONDON: This Heart City of the United Kingdom, by Father Thames, in a way has been a hard luck city for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everybody felt pretty good today after the overwhelming success of last night's concluding concert. They were all set to have fun until the Southampton boat train left at 7 tonight.

So out they went to Westminster Abbey, the Tower of London and other places including Mme. Tussaud's wax works museum. They were back to pack their bags and check out of their hotel rooms in courteous time for other guests to move in. Then at 4 o'clock the management got word that a pump had busted on the Ile de France and that the ship would not depart for about 24 hours.

Dr. Guillermo Sanchez, the official physician on this trip, unzipped his bag and got the aspirin, while the management got busy finding new rooms for 116 people. They made it by 7:30, at which hour all concerned, with something between a laugh and a shudder, rejoiced that the first transportation hitch had not come until the tour was over.

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1952. NEW YORK TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY UNIT OPENS SHOP IN PARIS

First Observance of Setting Up of Music Foundation Held at American Embassy

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, June 3—The first observance in Paris of the establishment o fthe Koussevitzky Music Foundation took place this afternoon at the American Embassy. The theatre was packed for the musical program and motion picture, "Tanglewood on Parade," held for a distinguished audience.

The ceremonies were simple and impressive. They began with the cultural attaché's introduction of Henri Barraud, director of the French Radio Diffusion Nationale and chairman of the European committeel of the Koussevitzky Foundation, which has its headquarters at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C. In the National Library at Washington are preserved the manuscripts of the compositions the Koussevitzky Foundation has commissioned of composers of the United States, France and other countries.

An eloquent message from Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famous conductor, was read to the audience. In it Mme. Koussevitzky recalled Mr. Koussevitzky's passionate advocacy of the cause of the creative musician, his long and enthusiastic support of the music of France, and his profound appreciation of the honors the French Government had conferred upon him for these services.

M. Barraud referred at the [illegible] gunning of his speech to the Brahms recently offered [illegible] "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century"—programs [illegible] not been wholly proper [illegible] their representations of [illegible] music. Then he reminded [illegible] was recalling that the [illegible] so many contemporaneous [illegible] pieces and the stimul[illegible] chant creative careers [illegible] traced to th[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky.

The musical program, [illegible] tionally broadcast by the [illegible] Broadcasting Company and [illegible] bia Broadcasting System, [illegible] markably interpreted by the [illegible] Quartet, bore witness to [illegible] covereign aspect of Mr. [illegible] vitzky's career. The two [illegible] performed, commissioned by [illegible] Koussevitzky Foundation, were [illegible] the young American W[illegible] Bergsman, and M. Barraud.

The freshness and [illegible] Bergsma's writing and the [illegible] wisdom and emotional sensi[illegible] of the highly modern [illegible] M. Barraud were placed in [illegible] spicuous and suggestive con[illegible] to each other. There was [illegible] applause for M. Barraud [illegible] bowed from a seat in the rear [illegible] the theatre after the performance [illegible] of his work.

Many Lands Represented

The presence of Koussevitzky [illegible] felt in the display in the hall [illegible] side the theatre of a series [illegible] photographs of the Koussevitzky [illegible] different stages of his career [illegible] in the home and in the [illegible] famous conductor, was read to the [illegible] audience. In it Mme. Koussevitzky [illegible] recalled Mr. Koussevitzky's pas[illegible] sionate advocacy of the cause of [illegible] the creative musician, his long and [illegible] enthusiastic support of the music [illegible] of France, and his profound appre[illegible] ciation of the honors the French [illegible] Government had conferred upon [illegible] him for these services.

M. Barraud referred at the [illegible] orchestra were recognized [illegible]

"It was plain to [illegible] that they were not [illegible] orchestra of this caliber. [illegible] body seemed to be lost [illegible] gasted at our precision [illegible] cipline. It was most surp[illegible] them apparently.

"As for the 'cold English' [illegible] — well, they really jumped [illegible] of their skins. The applause [illegible] instantaneous and burst upon us [illegible] like a bomb. You could feel the [illegible] tenseness.

Hard Work, Also

"In London we played in the Royal Festival Hall, which is rarely filled, Englishmen told us, because it is on the inconvenient side of the river and very large anyway. When we played, every seat was filled, and people told us, 'If we could have a few more people like you, that hall would pay for itself.'"

The trip was hard work at times, Mr. Langendoen said, involving occasional long journeys in uncomfortable trains. "But it was more than worth it, and I'm sure no member of the orchestra regrets a moment of it," he said.

8 A

Londo[illegible]

Orchestra A[illegible] Hear[illegible]

By W[illegible] Lon[illegible]

"Everything comes if [illegible] will only wait," said Disrae[illegible] after waiting from Marc[illegible] 1881, to May 26, 1952, [illegible] music lovers actually liste[illegible] an orchestra that they had [illegible] of practically all their live[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchest[illegible] first conductor, Georg He[illegible] the friend of Brahms, wa[illegible] known here, as were [illegible] Nikisch, Serge Koussevitzk[illegible] Pierre Monteux. Charles M[illegible] the present occupant of th[illegible] who succeeded Koussevitz[illegible] of course, also a familiar

These famous names ha[illegible] helped to increase our cu[illegible] This had to be curbed e[illegible] the last moment. Perhaps [illegible] first time in musical histor[illegible] cle race on the Paris-Bo[illegible] road kept a London audie[illegible] 3,500 waiting for a whol[illegible] (this in addition to the 71[illegible] because 102 boiled shirts, s[illegible] ble basses and music, had[illegible] to arrive from France.

The program at the new [illegible] Festival Hall, which began [illegible] o'clock, instead of the adv[illegible] eight, consisted of Barber's [illegible] ture, "The School for Sc[illegible] Honegger's Symphony No[illegible] first performance in En[illegible] Roussel's Suite No. 2, "B[illegible] et Ariane"; Piston's T[illegible] Debussy's "La Mer"; and [illegible] "Daphnis et Chloé" ([illegible] series).

Merit of Program

For receptive ears, thi[illegible] gram had the great me[illegible] avoiding those time-worn c[illegible] which demand from orc[illegible] players just that amount of [illegible] cal attention sufficient to [illegible] them awake. If the more h[illegible] paid conductors only do [illegible] signaling - apparatus, sema[illegible] stuff vigorously enough, [illegible] spectators are satisfied th[illegible] getting their money's [illegible] Those impassive poker-fac[illegible] chestral players seem to [illegible] obviously in need of heroi[illegible] suasive efforts to forget the[illegible] buses and trains.

Incidentally, do not [illegible] critics enjoy an unfair adv[illegible] in not being similarly expo[illegible] the public gaze? Fortunate[illegible] thoughts of orchestral [illegible] about their conductors, an[illegible] audiences, are invisible an[illegible] occasionally is the cat let [illegible] the bag, as exposed by [illegible] Diestel's "Ein Orchesterr[illegible] uber das Dirigieren," or o[illegible] Bernard Shore's "The Or[illegible] Speaks."

Interesting as the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra's p[illegible] was with the welcome abs[illegible] over-familiar Beethoven, [illegible] or Tchaikovsky, not to [illegible] the customary instrumen[illegible] tuoso, the chief focus of a

TIGHT BINDING

Boston Herald, June 5, 52

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Boston Symphony Conquers Europe

Mr. Elie is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is impossible to convey the extent of the success the Boston Symphony orchestra has had in Europe so far.

The orchestra has now given eight of the 15 concerts scheduled during the tour and every one of them has been received by public and press alike in a way to leave all of us really staggered indeed, anything less than a 10 minute ovation complete with cheers, bravos and stamping on the floor with the next morning, a couple of columns of almost frighteningly effulgent reviews in the papers, is now considered a slight.

Five of the six "important" concerts are now behind the orchestra. These were the two Paris concerts and concerts in Amsterdam, Berlin and Strasbourg. The others in The Hague, Brussels, Frankfurt and so on were important, too, of course, but Paris is always a special test, Amsterdam is the most critical city in the world musically speaking, Berlin is almost equally so and is, after all, an occupied city, and Strasbourg is Charles Munch's home town.

London, the scene of the orchestra's final concert, is the last and the widest water jump; no American orchestra has ever yet been quite accepted in London, and the private odds among the members of the orchestra are 5 to 4 that it won't like the Boston orchestra either.

Most Sensational

Of the concerts so far, certainly the most sensational was the second Paris concert when Pierre Monteux conducted Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" with the composer himself in the audience. The demonstration on this occasion was not less than historic. So far as I'm concerned this was one of the greatest experiences of my life; I'll never forget standing back stage and seeing Stravinsky run off the stage and out into the alley, tears streaming down his face.

The scene was very nearly repeated in The Hague two nights later with Queen Juliana in the royal box over the stage. As it had been in Paris on the opening event, this was Charles Munch's triumph; the audience shook the hall with its applause and cheers until the conductor could respond no longer. The next afternoon in Amsterdam's Concertgebouw hall, a pecullar sort of place with the orchestra scattered all over the sharply rising stage, with the audience all around it, the audience was graver, more sombre, more sedate. Its rising ovation was said by the local concert people to be an unusual display of enthusiasm though it seemed mild to me in contrast to the previous ovations.

"Boston Symphonie Orkest," read the headlines over the review the next morning, "een kolossaal ensemble," the critic and his colleagues went on to say that they never heard such a brilliant orchestra, such beauty of tone, such fantastic virtuosity of playing.

In Brussels the next night at a concert attended by the King it was the same scene repeated over again. The King, a small, slim bespectacled young man in a khaki uniform behind a vast corset of medals, sat absolutely immobile through the whole thing in the royal box at the rear of the auditorium which was, as a matter of fact, a little too small for the orchestra. The audience, as all of them have been so far, was in evening dress. At the end it sprang up for the usual ovation. After about six calls to the stage, Mr. Munch signalled for the Belgian national anthem. As only a handful of musicians expected this, their parts were buried and the anthem got off to a start played by only a couple of dozen men. The others quickly caught up, however, and played it while the audience faced the standing King.

The anthem over, the audience gave the king a very mild round of clapping (he isn't very well liked, they say, not for anything he's done but because they hate his father), then turned around to continue the ovation for the orchestra.

Frankfurt Concerts

The orchestra gave two concerts in Frankfurt, one for the German public, the other for the American army. Again, both were tremendous successes as were the reviews in the paper the next day. What they couldn't get over was the brilliance of the playing combined with the orchestra's capacity to go from the softest and subtlest tones to astonishing climaxes of sound. It was amusing to note, too, that each nation mentioned the fact there were a number of their own nationals in the orchestra and attributed some of the orchestra's capacity to this fact. In France, for example, they conveyed the idea that the orchestra consisted of 40 French-born musicians augmented by others.

...et chauvinism, the thing the orchestra most feared as it began its tour, has been remarkably absent. No one has yet suggested that the Boston orchestra is good, but of course not as good as their own; to a man they have so far stated point blank that they've never heard anything like it.

But certainly no ambassador to the European people, who estimate a people by their culture and not by their politics, could possibly have made the tremendous impression that the Boston Symphony orchestra has. Boston may have been living on its Emersonian reputation up to now, but from henceforth it will live in Europe on the basis of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAY 30 1952

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, long acknowledged as one of America's finest musical organizations, has added European acclaim to its already impressive laurels, according to a Paris dispatch to the New York Times from its music critic, Olin Downes. The orchestra, under its noted French conductor, Charles Munch, is appearing for the first time in Europe, taking part in the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations."

Mr. Downs, whose article was headlined "Boston Symphony Captivates Paris," wrote that although the gala event was marked by much pomp and ceremony and attended by the French President and other notables, "the performances given by the superb orchestra were by far the highest honor that the evening could invoke."

Performing music by Honegger, Barber, and Piston, the orchestra, according to the Times' critic, "was not only playing matchlessly for the first time in Europe, it was also the first American orchestra to be invited to perform at the Paris Opera."

The most recent RCA Victor recordings by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, are the Symphony No. 103, in E flat ("Drum Roll") of Haydn, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, in C, Opus 21—coupled together on 33 1/3-rmp discs.

A new album by the orchestra, featuring works of Ravel, Lalo, Berlioz, and Saint-Saens, will be included on the July release and Schumann, as well as the album, The Heart of the String Quartet.

* * *

Christian Science Monitor
June 6, 52

VOLUME 44 NO. 162

Symphony Returns To Elated Hub

By Laura Haddock
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Home from triumphs in Europe, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are still blinking over the wild enthusiasm shown by European audiences for their performances.

"People in all the cities we visited said they had never heard an orchestra like ours," said Willis Page of the double-bass section, a young American musician. He says he believes the orchestra has a new realization that theirs is possibly one of the finest musical organizations the world has ever heard.

"I believe the really sensational success of this tour will not only increase immeasurably the reputation of American musicians generally but will intensify the already fine morale of the orchestra itself," Mr. Page told The Christian Science Monitor today.

Metz Concert Recalled

The most exciting concert of the tour for the young bass player was the one played in Metz, in the Saar Basin. "I had been in that city once before, in December, 1944, as a matter of fact," he explained. "I was with the 95th Infantry, and we and the Fifth Infantry captured the town from the Germans in one of the bloodiest battles of the war. We lost a third of our division in that action, and at the time I certainly never dreamed I'd be comng back eight years later to play a symphony concert there."

Mr. Page said the first concert of the tour, given at Paris, seemed to all of them the crucial one. "What we did there would likely set the tone for the tour," he said. "And I can report that the orchestra never played better.

Paris Applauds

"The audience was, of course, very distinguished at that first concert, and they were so enthusiastic it was hard to believe. They stood up to applaud, and they kept on applauding and applauding. They wouldn't stop. Finally, we just left the stage, and they were still applauding.

"It was the same everywhere; the audiences were wonderful. And of course that made us very proud. We realized the importance of the whole thing. We had a feeling we were representing not only Boston but the United States, and we really gave it everything we had."

The orchestra was "a little United Nations" with almost all the major countries of Europe represented among its players. "Yet on this tour we were all Americans, believe me," Mr. Page said. "It was a good example of what America is, really, a mixture of everything, but something special in its own right, too."

Command Invitation

He said he felt the sensational success of the tour was one more blow to the old myth that a top-notch musician must obtain his training in Europe. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra now has a large minority of American-born, American-trained artists," he said.

Jacobus Langendoen, cellist born in Holland, was invited by Queen Juliana of the Netherlands to visit her in her box when the orchestra played at The Hague.

"One of the other players came backstage to me, and said, 'Quick, quick, the Queen wants to see you,'" Mr. Langendoen said. "Someone had told her that there were Dutch players in the orchestra. She was very gracious, but she was also very charming and easy to talk to, very informal and pleasant.

Success Emphasized

"I told her," Mr. Langendoen said, "that we were very proud of our orchestra and also that it was a great honor to us to have her present in the audience."

Mr. Langendoen described the whole tour as "tremendously successful." "We had never had so much glory heaped upon us as we did on this trip," he said.

In Holland, he explained, it is a custom of audiences to express extreme satisfaction by standing applause, and this they did for the Boston orchestra.

"It was plain to us everywhere that they were not used to an orchestra of this caliber. Everybody seemed to be just flabbergasted at our precision and discipline. It was most surprising to them apparently.

"As for the 'cold Englishmen' — well, they really jumped out of their skins. The applause was instantaneous and burst upon us like a bomb. You could feel the tenseness.

Hard Work, Also

"In London we played in the Royal Festival Hall, which is rarely filled, Englishmen told us, because it is on the inconvenient side of the river and very large anyway. When we played, every seat was filled, and people told us, 'If we could have a few more people like you, that hall would pay for itself.'"

The trip was hard work at times, Mr. Langendoen said, involving occasional long journeys in uncomfortable trains. "But it was more than worth it, and I'm sure no member of the orchestra regrets a moment of it," he said.

TRAVEL SYMPHONY Boston

London Critics' Reaction

By CYRUS DURGIN

LONDON—This Heart City of the United Kingdom, by Father Thames, in a way has been a hard-luck city for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Everybody felt pretty good today after the overwhelming success of last night's concluding concert. They were all set to have fun until the Southampton boat train left at 7 tonight.

So out they went to Westminster Abbey, the Tower of London and other places, including Mme. Tussaud's wax works museum. They were back to pack their bags and check out of their hotel rooms in courteous time for other guests to move in. Then at 4 o'clock the management got word that a pump had busted on the Ile de France and that the ship would not depart for about 24 hours.

Dr. Guillermo Sanchez, the official physician on this trip, unzipped his bag and got the aspirin, while the management got busy finding new rooms for 116 people. They made it by 7:30, at which hour all concerned, with something between a laugh and a shudder, rejoiced that the first transportation hitch had not come until the tour was over.

The London press, too, was more than cautiously complimentary. Times agreed it was a fine orchestra, deplored the program as what, but thought the BSO's ulous ensemble "a marvelous not until the last number did critic find humanity and poetry Richard Capell, in the Daily graph and Morning Post found fault with the program praised the orchestra's virtuo Charles Reid of the Evening dard, however, said that after Boston Symphony, the best ish orchestras will sound drab. But he called it, progr wise, "a trick evening."

Wrote Scott Goddard in News Chronicle: "... an orga tion of great power, well fou in all its parts. They glow wi inner radiance where so other orchestras merely gli The Daily Express carries trivial and in general idiotic which was remarkable for puerile criticism and inacc reporting.

It has been a new and satisf experience, traveling so far a long with this orchestra. really get to know people you are at close-quarters them for any length of tim suspect that at first some of though that having a music along was like walking und Providence. But after 24 these 100-odd men and one (harpist Olivia Hall Luetkem a thoroughly friendly bunch

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1952. NEW YORK T

KOUSSEVITZKY UNIT OPENS SHOP IN PARIS

First Observance of Setting Up of Music Foundation Held at American Embassy

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, June 3—The first observance in Paris of the establishment o fthe Koussevitzky Music Foundation took place this afternoon at the American Embassy. The theatre was packed for the musical program and motion picture, "Tanglewood on Parade," held for a distinguished audience.

The ceremonies were simple and impressive. They began with the cultural attaché's introduction of Henri Barraud, director of the French Radio Diffusion Nationale and chairman of the European committee of the Koussevitzky Foundation, which has its headquarters at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C. In the National Library at Washington are preserved the manuscripts of the compositions the Koussevitzky Foundation has commissioned of composers of the United States, France and other countries.

An eloquent message from Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famous conductor, was read to the audience. In it Mme. Koussevitzky recalled Mr. Koussevitzky's passionate advocacy of the cause of the creative musician, his long and enthusiastic support of the music of France, and his profound appreciation of the honors the French Government had conferred upon him for these services.

M. Barraud referred at the beginning of his speech to the grams recently offered "Masterpieces of the Twe Century"—programs he said not been wholly proportion their representations of music. Then he remarked was recalling that the orig so many contemporaneous pieces and the stimulus of liant creative careers had traced to th eguardianship Serge Koussevitzky.

The musical program, tionally broadcast by the Na Broadcasting Company and C bia Broadcasting System markably interpreted by the Quartet, bore witness to covereign aspect of Mr. Kou vitzy's career. The two performed, commissioned by Koussevitzky Foundation, w the young American, Wi Bergsman, and M. Barraud.

The freshness and spir Bergsma's writing and the wisdom and emotional sensi of the highly modern sco M. Barraud were placed in spicuous and suggestive co to each other. There was applause for M. Barraud, bowed from a seat in the re the theatre after the perform of his work.

Many Lands Represented

The presence of Koussevitzky felt in the display in the hall side the theatre of a serie photographs of the conducto different stages of his career, in the lively and uncommonly teresting film or Koussev rehearsing and directing the c and orchestra of his Berk Music School at Tanglewood, various activities of the stu at that school.

Applause broke from the ence as the conductor's fam figure eand his characteristic firm and sensitive direction orchestra were recognized.

In the audience were posers from lands near and —Villa Lobos from South Am Georges Enesco of Rumania, H Sauget and Darius Milhaud France and a group of younger confreres, present to homage to the conductor w support and sympathetic und standing has meant so much their creative careers.

Londo

Orchestra

He

"Everything comes will only wait," said after waiting from 1881, to May 26, music lovers actually an orchestra that the of practically all their Boston Symphony Orc first conductor, Georg the friend of Brahms known here, as Nikisch, Serge Kous Pierre Monteux. Ch the present occupant who succeeded Kou of course, also a fa

These famous na helped to increase This had to be e the last moment. P first time in musical cle race on the Pa road kept a London 3,500 waiting for a (this in addition to the because 102 boiled sh ble basses and mus to arrive from France

The program at the Festival Hall, which o'clock, instead of eight, consisted of Ba ture, "The School for Honegger's Symphony first performance in Roussel's Suite No. 2, et Ariane"; Piston's Debussy's "La Mer"; and "Daphnis et Chloé series).

Merit of Program

For receptive ears, t gram had the great avoiding those time-wor which demand from or players just that amount cal attention sufficient them awake. If the more paid conductors only signaling-apparatus, stuff vigorously enough spectators are satisfied getting their money's Those impassive poker-f chestral players seem obviously in need of he suasive efforts to forget buses and trains.

Incidentally, do not critics enjoy an unfair ad in not being similarly ex the public gaze? Fortunat thoughts of orchestral about their conductors audiences, are invisible occasionally is the case in the bag, as exposed Diestel's "Ein Orchester über das Dirigieren Bernard Shore's Speaks."

Interesting as Symphony Orchestra was with the wo over-familiar Be or Tchaikovsky, the customary inspi tuoso, the chief focus

London View of the Boston Symphony

Orchestra After 71 Years Heard in British Debut

By W. H. Haddon Squire

London

"Everything comes if a man will only wait," said Disraeli: and after waiting from March 30, 1881, to May 26, 1952, London music lovers actually listened to an orchestra that they had heard of practically all their lives—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its first conductor, George Henschel, one friend of Brahms, was well known here, as were Arthur Nikisch, Serge Koussevitzky, and Pierre Monteux. Charles Munch, the present occupant of the dais, who succeeded Koussevitzky, is, of course, also a familiar figure.

These famous names have all helped to increase our curiosity. This had to be curbed even at the last moment. Perhaps for the first time in musical history a cycle race on the Paris-Bordeaux road kept a London audience of 3,500 waiting for a whole hour (this in addition to the 71 years) because 102 boiled shirts, six double basses and music, had failed to arrive from France.

The program at the new Royal Festival Hall, which began at nine o'clock, instead of the advertised eight, consisted of Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Honegger's Symphony No. 5 (a first performance in England); Roussel's Suite No. 2, "Bacchus et Ariane"; Piston's Toccata; Debussy's "La Mer"; and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloë" (second series).

Merit of Program

For receptive ears, this program had the great merit of avoiding those time-worn classics which demand from orchestral players just that amount of musical attention sufficient to keep them awake. If the more highly-paid conductors only do their signaling-apparatus, semaphoric stuff vigorously enough, simple spectators are satisfied they are getting their money's worth. Those impassive poker-faced orchestral players seem to them obviously in need of heroic persuasive efforts to forget their last buses and trains.

Incidentally, do not music critics enjoy an unfair advantage in not being similarly exposed to the public gaze? Fortunately the thoughts of orchestral players about their conductors, and their audiences, are invisible and only occasionally is the cat let out of the bag, as exposed by Hans Diestel's "Ein Orchestermusiker uber das Dirigieren," or our own Bernard Shore's "The Orchestra Speaks."

Interesting as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program was with the welcome absence of over-familiar Beethoven, Brahms, or Tchaikovsky, not to mention the customary instrumental virtuoso, the chief focus of attention was naturally, in the circumstances, on the world-famous orchestra itself. One could almost hear Koussevitzky's voice at rehearsal saying "Zing, always zing! There is no music without zingen." And no better advice could be given to that complex organism which has now so largely displaced the singer and, to a considerable extent, even the instrumental virtuoso.

In spite of the prima donna conductor, who now has the average music critic hot on his tail, we are nearer the healthy musical attitude of the player who, when asked what So-and-So was going to conduct, replied: "I really can't say. But we are going to play Beethoven's Eighth."

Orchestral Color

The modern orchestra, dating from Berlioz, brought into greater prominence the element of color, or timbre, which composers, like painters, learned to use for its own sake, thus abandoning what used to be called the black-and-white test. To the significant relations of form were added the significant relations of color.

Orchestral color being a quality, the actual quality of tone became of great importance. Today we judge an orchestra, apart from its executive capacities, by the tonal quality of its strings, its wood-wind, and its brass.

The kitchen department, or percussion, plays its chief part in the rhythmical life of its neighbors. Here again one recalls Koussevitzky who, after telling an English orchestra "You haf no rhyt'm in vat you do," left the hall and "was persuaded back out of the Paris express only just in time" (Bernard Shore). His 25 years at Boston must have left a rich store of reminiscences.

Tone and Balance

At the Royal Festival Hall it was not easy critically to judge the tone and balance of the Boston orchestra. Whether the idiosyncrasies of the hall itself, the placing of the players, or the position of one's seat was responsible, the quality of the strings seemed a little disappointing. One admired the wood-wind; but the finely disciplined brass (although it may not have been the fault of the players) was too loud for the general balance.

For sheer virtuosity and ensemble, the orchestra is outstanding—a perfect instrument, although for some listeners, machine might seem the more suitable word. From the purely aesthetic and musical point of view its efficiency is almost excessive. A composer playing his own work, for example, may be deficient technically, but he will play more musically than the hardened virtuoso who never fails to dot every "i" and cross every "t."

The Honegger Symphony is a striking work; and one will look forward to hearing it again. Mediocre is perhaps the right adjective for the two American works. Some of the best playing of the evening was heard in Roussel's Suite. Restraint, it has been said, is the secret of the great conductor's technique—the extreme gesture is made effective by the economy of its use. One can only regret that Munch's art, which has always been much admired here, was limited to this solitary concert and not in the happiest circumstances. It will be interesting to see the eventual effect of Munch's influence on the splendid instrument now in his hands.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.,
JOURNAL
MAY 2 3 1952

America's Reputation Is Growing in Paris

U. S. Contributions to Month of Music Are Hailed; French Like Symphony, Ballet

By RICHARD S. DAVIS
Of The Journal Staff

Paris, France — The present spring in Paris has brought great music to the city—drama and the dance as well—and the reputation of the United States, because of its generous contributions, has been remarkably enhanced.

All this has more value than appears on the surface, because in Paris there is a big segment of the population that needs convincing. Repeatedly the reporter has come upon natives who turned up their noses at America's music and other arts, and who scoffed at all Yankees as "barbarians." Such skeptics have been learning a thing or two this brilliant May.

The superior fringe just mentioned has been peculiarly susceptible to the wiles of the Communists. The talk of the latter has run to the effect that the average American, aside from his dollars, can appreciate nothing but football players bashing in each other's ribs, baseball players galloping aimlessly over the greensward and boxers scrambling their opponents' brains.

Ballet Is Hailed

Every little bit helps these days and it is good to know that anti-American propaganda on this score has been greatly weakened. All the French press except the Communist has gone overboard in praise of America's share of the magnificent May festival. It seems generally agreed that the month of music has set a new high.

First it was the Boston symphony orchestra under Charles Muench that set the town to cheering. Then came the New York city ballet, which did even better in the way of huzzahs. The latter, indeed, has been widely hailed as the finest in the world and much has been made of the fact that it is so distinctively American.

It was not the reporter's good fortune to be here when either the ballet or the orchestra appeared, but perhaps there will be chances later on to catch up with them. Every country in western Europe is having impressive festivals this summer and Americans will play a considerable part in most of them.

"Sugar Ray" Helps

Heaven knows that your agent is no expert in public relations, but surely it is true that ambassadors of good will in the ar serve a purpose that no othe can reach. Nor should the val of envoys like "Sugar Ray" R inson, the boxer, be overlool A dozen times in Paris, the porter has overheard ex Frenchmen discussing the dleweight champion in the affectionate terms. The p of the unmuscular visit not have been helped by but that of his country edly has.

On the night just man went to see American ballet hea quin Perez Fernar Argentine. The c scored an enormo sonvedly so. It bo a talent and in s all around origi program offere As for the gift is truly a star

The danci Americans, vaguely sim Spanish, is at least on been exh costumin troupe is, the mus ingly someth

If friend Mauric structi of che They's the lea singing The porter

Expert on Roses

Albert Bernard, viola, is a performer on the viol and is a member of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments which for many years gave notable chamber music recitals in Boston. An expert on cacti and roses, Mr. Bernard specializes in color photography.

The list of the members' interests and hobbies is virtually endless: Paul Cherkassky is conductor of the Civic Symphony orchestra; Willis Page, double bass, conducts the St. Cecilia Society; Josef Zimbler directs the renowned Zimbler Sinfonietta in its many notable chamber concerts; Reuben Green, viola, who works in ceramics, also plays a jazz viola and joined with Willis Page, Harold Farberman and William Babcock to give an informal jazz recital on the Ile de France that brought down the ship.

[216]

Boston Herald June 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Stagliano of Symphony Authority on Mushrooms

The Boston Symphony orchestra is back in Symphony Hall now mingling the sounds of "Fiddle Faddle" with the recollection of the sounds of ovations in Paris, Amsterdam, Berlin, Strasburg, Bordeaux, London and way stations, and so it is now possible to say, as one who traveled with them all the way, that never in my experience have I encountered such an interesting family of men.

There is James Stagliano, for example, the first French horn player, who comes from a family of horn players and who, still in his middle 30's, played this difficult and untractable instrument with most of the great orchestras of America before coming to Boston.

But Mr. Stagliano, married to the talented soprano, Marguerite Willauer, is also a virtuoso upon the guitar, an amateur chef with a flair for Italian cooking, and an authority on mushrooms. Besides adding to his already large collection of books on mycology in Europe, he acquired two or three German hunting horns, upon one of which he performed hunting fanfares for the great amusement of the German bystanders in Frankfort.

He also acquired the priceless silver emblem of the members of a hunt club in Strasbourg. Calling themselves "La Ste. Hubert," these elegantly garbed gentlemen, about eight of them, performed a "fanfare de trompes de chasse" in the main square of the town on Sunday morning. On learning Mr. Stagliano was first horn with the Boston Symphony, one of the members gave him his silver emblem from, as he put it, "the heart."

Many Conductors

A great many members of the orchestra play other than their chosen instruments. Joseph Pasquale, first viola player, was a trumpet player for four years in the band of the U. S. Marines. Married to Koussevitzky's niece-in-law, Mr. Pasquale is a member, with Samuel Mayes and Ruth Posselt, of the newly-formed Bel Arte trio, which made its debut last season in Boston with great success.

Harry Dickson, violin, also plays percussion and, like many other members of the orchestra, is a conductor. For three years now he has conducted the Providence Civic orchestra. Harry Dubbs, violin, plays the saxophone, too, but is more interested in the Brookline Community orchestra, which he conducts, as well as the Newton Children's orchestra. Famous in the orchestra for his imitations, Mr. Dubbs is a teacher at Boston University and, like practically everybody else in the orchestra, is an amateur protographer. (The top imitator and story teller is generally recognized to be Dickson, one of whose imitations of Koussevitzky many years ago got him into a most embarrassing situation with the late conductor.)

Emil Kornsand, violin, was first engaged by the orchestra as a viola player. An amateur water colorist, Mr. Kornsand is one of the two composers in the orchestra, having written a good deal of music, including a concerto for viola and orchestra performed not too long ago in Boston. The other composer is Jacobus Langendoen, 'cello, whose compositions and arrangements have often been performed. Mr. Langendoen, incidentally, was personally honored by Queen Juliana of Holland on the occasion of the orchestra's concert in the Hague. She expressly called him to her royal box to congratulate him on the work he and Mrs. Langendoen had done in sending food and clothing to Holland after the German occupation.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, is a pianist as well as violinist, but he's also the champion card player of the orchestra. At one time he was its chess champion, but as conductor of the New England Philharmonic as well as the Portland Symphony, he doesn't keep up with it now. The leading chess players of the orchestra are Paul Federowsky, violin, and Einar Hansen, also a first violin player.

John Holmes, oboe, plays both piano and trumpet and is an amateur astronomer and telescope maker. Ernst Panenka, however, who began his career in optics, but became a bassoonist instead, has recently completed a telescope of extraordinary size and quality, making most of the parts himself. A former mountain climber, Mr. Panenka is also a professional movie photographer, and is hardly ever seen without camera and tripod.

Harold Meek, French horn, plays violin and double bass, and is an amateur interior decorator and an expert in sound equipment. He has also recently published a method for his instrument and has commissioned such composers as Gardner Read and Edmond Hayes to compose music for the horn. Osborne McConathy, French horn, collects methods and etudes for the horn and has acquired a large library of rare volumes on the history of the instrument.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JUN 1 - 1952

Mostly About Music

From The Paris Press: 'Boston Symphony Bowls Over Parisians'

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Staff Writer

THE VARIANT French, whose enthusiasms are quite as violent as their antipathies, are busy these days recalling the glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which made its European debut at the Paris Opera.

The American press has had little say on the subject, always excepting the comprehensive New York Times, inclined to publish everything down to the last grain of sand.

A private dispatch to this corner of cultural comfort indicates the response to have been overwhelming. Walter Alford writes me from Paris:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has conquered another city—Paris. The 104-man orchestra, led by Charles Munch and with a former musical director, French-born, Pierre Monteux, as his associate on this first tour of Europe, arrived by plane and ship to participate in the month-long international Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by the Congress For Cultural Freedom.

"Led by Mr. Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its Paris debut May 6 on the stage of the Paris Opera, the first American orchestra ever to perform in the shrine of French opera and ballet. It was an occasion for triumph, attended by "tout Paris," led by President Vincent Auriol and Mme. Auriol and their daughter; Foreign Minister Robert Schumann; U.S. Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

★ ★ ★

"WHEN THE TALL silver-gray conductor came on the stage he received a tumultuous welcome from Americans in the jammed 3,000-seat Opera, and from his French confreres, welcoming back the former conductor of the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise (French National Radio Orchestra).

"He had led that organization on its successful 1948-49 tour of the U.S. and subsequently was invited by the retiring Serge Koussevitzky to succeed him as musical director of his orchestra.

"The program opened with Samuel Barber's overture, 'The School for Scandal.' The American composition, dated 1932, which the orchestra first performed in Boston Nov. 15, 1940, was followed by Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for string orchestra, a composition which Mr. Munch introduced to the U.S. with the Boston ensemble Dec. 27, 1946.

"Albert Rousel's second suite from Act II of the ballet "Bacchus et Ariane" completed the first half of the program. Mr. Munch played the world premiere of this suite in Paris in 1936, 10 years later, Dec. 26, 1947, introduced it to the U.S. with the Boston Symphony.

"The second half opened with American composer Walter Piston's 'Toccata' which Mr. Munch introduced to the U.S. Oct. 14, 1948, after a premiere on the French National Radio earlier in 1948. Debussy's 'La Mer,' introduced to the U.S. by the Boston Symphony in 1907, and Ravel's second 'Daphnis et Chloe' suite, also first played in the U.S. by the Boston Symphony in 1917, completed the program.

"Applause laste more than 10 minutes at the end of the performance, and the conductor was recalled six times. Whereupon, he repeated the last section of the Ravel score.

"Following the performance the French Government's Ministry of Culture and the Directors of the Paris Opera honored the visiting ensemble with a buffet served on the stage of the Opera.

★ ★ ★

" 'THANK YOU, thank you again,' President Auriol said to Mr. Munch, in his box during intermission.

"Last year, during his visit of state to the U.S., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Munch at its head, had traveled especially to Washington to give a concert for President Auriol and at that time received a hearty invitation to play in France. "Last night," the newspaper France Soir remarked, "the real U.S. Ambassador was not M. James Dunn but the Boston Orchestra which M. Auriol came to applaud."

"The French press unanimously welcomed the distinguished visiting orchestra. 'The debut of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Europe naturally drew to the Opera an audience as enthusiastic as it was large,' reported Le Monde. Rarely has a triumph so striking rewarded an achievement so complete."

Jean Mistler in L'Aurore: "Does there exist in the world an orchestra which is capable of a program of modern music in such a brilliant manner? I don't know, but from the sumptuous sonority of the bass violins to the mordant quality of the trumpets every man gives proof of a quality of excellence such as I never remember ever hearing quite so overwhelmingly. M. Munch not only magnificently rendered the masterpieces, but he even succeeded, through his tonal celeration, in giving life to them. In hearing Mr. Munch, it is difficult not to evoke the shade of Koussevitzky, that famous musician who welded together the incomparable ensemble which an enthusiastic house acclaimed long and loud last night."

"The orchestra is truly an extraordinary ensemble," wrote the critic of Le Figaro. Our national orchestras needn't take umbrage at this enthusiasm, because out of 104 musicians the Boston Orchestra boasts 23 Frenchmen!"

Le Monde's Rene Dumesnil found the Barber overture "a very polite, agreeable composition, but without much originality," but welcomed the Honegger string work: "It was necessary for the composer to appear with Charles Munch on the stage to accept the plaudits of the crowd." The Piston "Toccata" was termed "a work of classic construction and competent workmanship." But the critic reserved his main enthusiasm for the Ravel and Debussy: "Here Charles Munch drew out of the magnificent orchestra all the finesse, the grace, the transparency, and all the vigor necessary to delineate these two masterpieces of French music."

★ ★ ★

CLARENDON in Le Figaro: "Each musician plays his instrument so well, with such great quality, the confidence in the conductor is so complete, each work has been so minutely rehearsed, that a final execution is absolutely perfect. Moreover, there was an elan, a youthfulness, a dynamic drive, something vigorous, clear, which is uncommon."

Paris Pres'l'Intransigeant greeted the orchestra's debut in Europe with the headline: "The Boston Symphony Bowled Over Parisians." Wrote Emil Vuillermoz: "The one aspect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its giant string quartets, its massed woodwinds and its rich mines of brass, is that it is satisfying both to the eye and the mind. One feels oneself in the presence of a factory of sound, equipped with exceptionally fine machines. But when all this mechanism is put in motion, one is ravished by its power, its suppleness and its precision. We have here an admirable selection of virtuosi belonging to all nations of the earth. Our compatriots are numerous among them and their high quality does us honor. The discipline of the 65 string players is impeccable. One feels that each desk is occupied by a master of his instrument."

Composer Honegger, 60 years old this March, was forced by the cheers at the end of his Symphony No. 2 to show himself in his box, as Mr. Munch led the determined applause. Another witness of the concert was the quietly proud figure of Mme. Koussevitzky, widow of the man who had directed the Boston Symphony for 27 years and l..rgely made it what it is today; what Time magazine called one of the world's first four (along with the Philadelphia, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Amsterdam Concertgebouw).

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

JUN 2 - 1952

U.S. Culture Acclaimed As Paris 'Masterpieces' Festival Closes

Paris, June 1 (AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of Western intellectuals including Bertrand Russell, British philosopher, and Benedetto Croce, Italian philosopher. Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, Julius Ficisch-mann, United States gin and yeast heir.

Some Criticism

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "NATO Fe... said it promoted the ... Treaty Organiza... on's Western ... fense alliance.

Some artists were ... to the festival ... Nabokov, c... of culture could ... litical aims. And Arthur ... American conductor ... tartly that Fleischmann ... spend his money on b... ing artists rather ... festivals.

"Has Shown One Thing"

But one ... nearly every ... general approval:

"This festival ... shown one thing if nothing ... That is that American ... ballet and conductors ... to or even eclipse mo... Europe."

The first American triumph was scored by Bruno Walter, American conductor, leading the Paris Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. For the time the 110-piece orchestra ...

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Boston Orch Back From Sock Europe Tour; Bike Race Slows Up Concert

Boston, June 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra returns today (Tues.) from its first European tour, having completed one of the most boff tours in orchestra annals. Alternating under its regular conductor, Charles Munch, and guest Pierre Monteux, the BSO played 15 European dates, including five European capitals, Paris, the Hague, Brussels, Berlin and London. Tour sponsored by the American Committee of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, brought rave notices everywhere.

President Auriol of France attended the opening concert at the Paris Opera House, which was climaxed with a 20-minute standing ovation for Munch and the orchestra. Queen Juliana attended in Holland and King Baudauin in Belgium. The orchestra made three appearances in Germany under the auspices of HICOG, and was trained in and out of Berlin in sealed Army train "shipments" when a gas strike grounded Army planes which were to have flown the orchestra to Berlin.

Expected trouble from the Russians did not materialize, even though the German side trip was specially designed by the U. S. State Dept. to impress Russians and Germans with American culture, and 1,000 East Zone Berliners were given tickets to attend an open rehearsal. Two concerts were given in Frankfort, one solely for the U. S. Armed Forces.

Personnel and baggage moved without incident until the move from Bordeaux to London. Vans carrying music and double basses were caught behind a French bicycle race and therefore missed the boat train. Concert in London had to be delayed one hour as a result.

Total capacity at concerts and five open rehearsals figured near 50,000 for the trip. All concerts were broadcast by European radio networks and Radio Free Europe. Of the 15 concerts, Munch conducted eight and Monteux seven.

BSO now returns to Symphony Hall here to take over the Pops season from a sub orchestra, and will continue under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. On July 5, orchestra moves to the Tanglewood Festival in Lenox, Mass. If attendance there holds up to previous levels, as is expected from advance season biz, total attendance for all BSO concerts (224) during the 1951-52 season will reach over 1,000,000.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JUN 1 - 1952

Mostly About Music

From The Paris Press: 'Boston Symphony Bowls Over Parisians'

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Staff Writer

THE VARIANT French, whose enthusiasms are quite as violent as their antipathies, are busy these days recalling the glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which made its European debut at the Paris Opera.

The American press has had little say on the subject, always excepting the comprehensive New York Times, inclined to publish everything down to the last grain of sand.

A private dispatch to this corner of cultural comfort indicates the response to have been overwhelming. Walter Alford writes me from Paris:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has conquered another city—Paris. The 104-man orchestra, led by Charles Munch and with a former musical director, French-born, Pierre Monteux, as his associate on this first tour of Europe, arrived by plane and ship to participate in the month-long international Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by the Congress For Cultural Freedom.

"Led by Mr. Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its Paris debut May 6 on the stage of the Paris Opera, the first American orchestra ever to perform in the shrine of French opera and ballet. It was an occasion for triumph, attended by 'tout Paris,' led by President Vincent Auriol and Mme. Auriol and their daughter; Foreign Minister Robert Schumann; U.S. Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn.

★ ★ ★

"WHEN THE TALL silver-gray conductor came on the stage he received a tumultuous welcome from Americans in the jammed 3,000-seat Opera, and from his French confreres, welcoming back the former conductor of the Orchestre National de la Radio-diffusion Francaise (French National Radio Orchestra).

"He had led that organization on its successful 1948-49 tour of the U.S. and subsequently was invited by the retiring Serge Koussevitzky to succeed him as musical director of his orchestra.

"The program opened with Samuel Barber's overture, 'The School for Scandal.' The American composition, dated 1932, which the orchestra first performed in Boston Nov. 15, 1940, was followed by Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for string orchestra, a composition which Mr. Munch introduced to the U.S. with the Boston ensemble Dec. 27, 1946.

"Albert Rousel's second suite from Act II of the ballet "Bacchus et Ariane" completed the first half of the program. Mr. Munch played the world premiere of this suite in Paris in 1936, 10 years later, Dec. 26, 1947, introduced it to the U.S. with the Boston Symphony.

"The second half opened with American composer Walter Piston's 'Toccata' which Mr. Munch introduced to the U.S. Oct. 14, 1948, after a premiere on the French National Radio earlier in 1948. Debussy's 'La Mer,' introduced to the U.S. by the Boston Symphony in 1907, and Ravel's second 'Daphnis et Chloe' suite, also first played in the U.S. by the Boston Symphony in 1917, completed the program.

"Applause laste more than 10 minutes at the end of the performance, and the conductor was recalled six times. Whereupon, he repeated the last section of the Ravel score.

"Following the performance the French Government's Ministry of Culture and the Directors of the Paris Opera honored the visiting ensemble with a buffet served on the stage of the Opera.

★ ★ ★

"'THANK YOU, thank you again,' President Auriol said to Mr. Munch, in his box during intermission.

"Last year, during his visit of state to the U.S., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Munch at its head, had traveled especially to Washington to give a concert for President Auriol and at that time received a hearty invitation to play in France. "Last night," the newspaper France Soir remarked, "the real U.S. Ambassador was not M. James Dunn but the Boston Orchestra which M. Auriol came to applaud."

"The French press unanimously welcomed the distinguished visiting orchestra. 'The debut of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Europe naturally drew to the Opera an audience as enthusiastic as it was large,' reported Le Monde. Rarely has a triumph so striking rewarded an achievement so complete."

Jean Mistler in L'Aurore: "Does there exist in the world an orchestra which is capable of a program of modern music in such a brilliant manner? I don't know, but from the stumptuous sonority of the bass violins to the mordant quality of the trumpets every man gives proof of a quality of excellence such as I never remember ever hearing quite so overwhelmingly. M. Munch not only magnificently rendered the masterpieces, but he even succeeded, through his tonal celeration, in giving life to them. In hearing Mr. Munch, it is difficult not to evoke the shade of Koussevitzky, that famous musician who welded together the incomparable ensemble which an enthusiastic house acclaimed long and loud last night."

"The orchestra is truly an extraordinary ensemble," wrote the critic of Le Figaro. Our national orchestras needn't take umbrage at this enthusiasm, because out of 104 musicians the Boston Orchestra boasts 23 Frenchmen!"

Le Monde's Rene Dumesnil found the Barber overture "a very polite, agreeable composition, but without much originality," but welcomed the Honegger string work: "It was necessary for the composer to appear with Charles Munch on the stage to accept the plaudits of the crowd." The Piston "Toccata" was termed "a work of classic construction and competent workmanship." But the critic reserved his main enthusiasm for the Ravel and Debussy: "Here Charles Munch drew out of the magnificent orchestra all the finesse, the grace, the transparency, and all the vigor necessary to delineate these two masterpieces of French music."

★ ★ ★

CLARENDON in Le Figaro: "Each musician plays his instrument so well, with such great quality, the confidence in the conductor is so complete, each work has been so minutely rehearsed, that a final execution is absolutely perfect. Moreover, there was an elan, a youthfulness, a dynamic drive, something vigorous, clear, which is uncommon."

Paris Pres'l'Intransigeant greeted the orchestra's debut in Europe with the headline: "The Boston Symphony Bowled Over Parisians." Wrote Emil Vuillermoz: "The one aspect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its giant string quartets, its massed woodwinds and its rich mines of brass, is that it is satisfying both to the eye and the ear. One feels oneself in the presence of a factory of sound, equipped with exceptionally fine machines. But when all this mechanism is put in motion, one is ravished by its power, its suppleness and its precision. We have here an admirable selection of virtuosi belonging to all nations of the earth. Our compatriots are numerous among them and their high quality does us honor. The discipline of the 65 string players is impeccable. One feels that each desk is occupied by a master of his instrument."

Composer Honegger, 60 years old this March, was forced by the cheers at the end of his Symphony No. 2 to show himself in his box, as Mr. Munch led the determined applause. Another witness of the concert was the quietly proud figure of Mme. Koussevitzky, widow of the man who had directed the Boston Symphony for 27 years and largely made it what it is today; what Time magazine called one of the world's first four (along with the Philadelphia, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Amsterdam Concertgebouw).

[27]

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

JUN 2 - 1952

U.S. Culture Acclaimed As Paris 'Masterpieces' Festival Closes

Paris, June 1 (AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

These political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of Western intellectuals, including Bertrand Russell, British philosopher, and Benedetto Croce, Italian philosopher. Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, Julius Fleischmann, United States gin and yeast heir.

Some Criticism

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its tart spicing of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "NATO Festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's Western Defense alliance.

Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov, complaining that works of culture could not be met by political aims. And Artur Rodzinski, American conductor, suggested tartly that Fleischmann might better spend his money on helping struggling artists rather than on lavish festivals.

"Has Shown One Thing"

But one participant who came nearly every event keynoted the general approval:

"This festival has certainly shown one thing if nothing else. That is that American orchestras, ballet and conductors can stand up to or even eclipse most of those in Europe."

The first American triumph was scored by Bruno Walter, American conductor, leading the Paris Opera orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet shouting and applauding as never before.

Plays "Rite Of Spring"

Monteux, who was associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, allowed his recreating a moment in musical history two nights ago with the playing of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Monteux had conducted the ballet in its world premier 39 years earlier in the same Theater des Champs-Elysees. That first performance caused a riot of disapproval, however, and Stravinsky had to flee. The 1952 performance brought down the house and Stravinsky now an American was there with Monteux to receive the cheers.

A rage of artistic jealousy fanned the interest in the first appearance of the New York City Ballet. The director of the Paris Opera Ballet Company, Serge Lifar, was angry because his own group had not been asked to perform.

Scathing Letters

He wrote scathing letters to the papers, attacking the American company and especially letters to the papers attacking the American company and especially its director, George Balanchine, who once worked with him in the old Diaghilev Ballet.

Balanchine's troupe met Lifar on his own ground, in the ornate Paris Opera House. It was the first time an American ballet ever had danced there.

The New York company danced the classical "Swan Lake" ballet of Tchaikovsky. Written and staged with a fresh approach, it set the audience on its ear. The critics minced no words. Balanchine was hailed, had a real success here. He came and captured the [illegible]

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JUN 4 - 1952

Boston Orch Back From Sock Europe Tour; Bike Race Slows Up Concert

Boston, June 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra returns today (Tues.) from its first European tour, having completed one of the most boff tours in orchestra annals. Alternating under its regular conductor, Charles Munch, and guest Pierre Monteux, the BSO played 15 European dates, including five European capitals, Paris, the Hague, Brussels, Berlin and London. Tour sponsored by the American Committee of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, brought rave notices everywhere.

President Auriol of France attended the opening concert at the Paris Opera House, which was climaxed with a 20-minute standing ovation for Munch and the orchestra. Queen Juliana attended in Holland and King Baudauin in Belgium. The orchestra made three appearances in Germany under the auspices of HICOG, and was trained in and out of Berlin in sealed Army train "shipments" when a gas strike grounded Army planes which were to have flown the orchestra to Berlin.

Expected trouble from the Russians did not materialize, even though the German side trip was specially designed by the U. S. State Dept. to impress Russians and Germans with American culture, and 1,000 East Zone Berliners were given tickets to attend an open rehearsal. Two concerts were given in Frankfort, one solely for the U. S. Armed Forces.

Personnel and baggage moved without incident until the move from Bordeaux to London. Vans carrying music and double basses were caught behind a French bicycle race and therefore missed the boat train. Concert in London had to be delayed one hour as a result.

Total capacity at concerts and five open rehearsals figured near 50,000 for the trip. All concerts were broadcast by European radio networks and Radio Free Europe. Of the 15 concerts, Munch conducted eight and Monteux seven.

BSO now returns to Symphony Hall here to take over the Pops season from a sub orchestra, and will continue under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. On July 5, orchestra moves to the Tanglewood Festival in Lenox, Mass. If attendance there holds up to previous levels, as is expected from advance season biz, total attendance for all BSO concerts (224) during the 1951-52 season will reach over 1,000,000.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
JUN 6 1952

Grace Note

Paris, which likes to think of itself as the cultural capital of the western world, has been having a high old time, culturally speaking. A festival of concerts, ballets, art shows, forums, and other aesthetic and intellectual enterprises has brought together some of the 20th-century riches of what we call the "free" world, but what the Russians call the "decadent bourgeois" world.

The United States, which is so often painted to Europeans as a mechanical paradise and a cultural desert, has been well represented at this great exposition. An especially brilliant success was scored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but to its enthusiastically acclaimed performance in Paris we should like to add a grace note from Boston.

Last February, in editorializing on the festival as then planned, we noted that the American contribution would depend on private philanthropy rather than government subsidy. Thereupon we received a letter from a college undergraduate enclosing a money order for two dollars and explaining that he felt such projects as this one and Point Four deserved "direct support by many small contributions" rather than relying always on government or "a few beneficent millionaires." The letter concluded:

> I should like very much to contribute more, but so long as I am in college my resources are somewhat limited financially.

To which we might add that so long as America possesses the human resources symbolized by this small act it is not likely to go bankrupt—financially, morally, or culturally.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUN 6 - 1952

Mid-Atlantic Program Offered

Special to The Hartford Times

BOSTON — Members of the Boston Symphony congregated in the theater room of the Ile de France (in mid-Atlantic) Sunday night and were serenaded a warm greeting by Arthur Fielder and the "Pops" Orchestra. It was made possible by a specially transcribed broadcast radioed to the ship and Mr. Fiedler, in his verbal greeting to the Symphony members now returning from their successful tour abroad, echoed the feeling of many Bostonians who have great pride in their Orchestra.

* * *

THE OCCASION gave Symphony members a chance to hear what their alter egos have been doing in Boston the past few weeks. The present "Pops" orchestra is made up of substitute players, and as the recording was piped aboard the Ile de France, most of these musicians were playing at the "Pops" for the last time this season. Now the regular Symphony players will be resuming their posts under Mr. Fiedler's baton.

* * *

A FEW days ago in the Church of the Advent, Jean Langlais gave a distinguished recital under the aegis of the Massachusetts Chapter, American Guild of Organists.

M. Langlais is more than an organ virtuoso of the first rank; he is a creative artist, in the most practical and realistic sense; his technical skill is second only to his superb musicianship.

Although there were pieces by Bach, Couperin, De Grigny, and Demessieux, the four works of Jean Langlais himself are the ones most worthy of attention in this program.

* * *

THE PRELUDE to his "Suite Francaise" is a pithy piece—one capable of sustaining the composer's lighter thoughts. "In Quiet Joy," a charming piece, and Theme and Variations called "Hommage a Frescobaldi" produced an endless variety of tonal colors from the instrument. "Postlude No. 2" was a soaring piece, an almost literal waterfall of contrast in sound.

However, the most remarkable part of M. Langlais' recital was near the end when he took four themes which had been handed to him in Braille a few minutes before the concert, and improvised them into a 20-minute, four-movement Symphony — a conventional symphony, admittedly, but an almost incredible performance in this modern day —a fascinating coordination of mind and fingers of a consummate musician.—F. S.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
JL 6 1952

Boston Symphony Orchestra Wins French Record Award

Special to The Times Herald

Camden, N. J., July 5. — The first prize of the French Academy of Recordings (Academie du Disque Francais) has been awarded to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its permanent conductor, Charles Munch, for their RCA Victor album of Brahms' Symphony No. 4, in E Minor, Op. 98, it was disclosed in an announcement from Paris.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JUN 7 - 1952

TRAVEL SYMPHONY

"Blaze of Tonal Glory"

By CYRUS DURGIN

LONDON—The first European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wound up in a blaze of tonal glory and rousing cheers at the Royal Festival Hall here. The concert proved another huge success for conductor Charles Munch and the players, which makes it unanimous all the way, so far as the public is concerned. After the closing piece, the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," most of the audience of 3500 which packed the place, remained standing and called Mr. Munch back again and again. Each time he reappeared, a fresh cheer and renewed applause greeted him.

So, in all essentials, it can be said that this tour has been wholly a triumphal progress. French, Dutch, Belgian, German and English audiences have received orchestra and conductor with unqualified enthusiasm.

Luckily, there were no serious difficulties until this final stop on the tour, but the crisis which developed yesterday gave a bad headache for several hours. What happened was that all the wardrobe trunks, six double-basses and some of the chests containing the printed music, failed to arrive with the rest of the orchestral baggage.

A quick check with France revealed that the baggage had been loaded on two trucks, to be driven to Paris from Bordeaux, and at Paris to be transferred to the Callais boat train and thence to the channel packet. The first truckload got to the Calais train in time.

But the second truck was held up by the crowd gathered to watch the midnight start of an overnight bicycle race from Bordeaux to Paris. By the time the second truck arrived at Paris' Gare du Nord, the boat train had pulled out.

* * *

So the last rehearsal, at 6 in the Royal Festival Hall, was minus double-basses, which made the sound peculiar indeed. The missing dress-clothes, instruments and music arrived a little before 8, and the concert, which had to be delayed an hour, began at 9.

But these musicians are troupers, and unless you had been told of the mishap, you never would have known.

They played at their marvelous best in this acoustically brilliant hall, which is a fantastic layout built on the south bank of the Thames for the Festival of Britain a year ago. It is all concrete, stone and glass, with huge lobbies, restaurants and everything to make the public happy. Extremely modern in design, the structure outside and the lobbies look well enough, but the style of the auditorium itself is distinctly messy to the eye.

But the sounds! That is something else, and truly wonderful! I climbed as high as I could get up in back, for the last piece, and there you could hear everything clear and in proportion, and every solo passage was in just the right focus.

It must be that the Londoners who complained that these acoustics were dry and brittle just never heard a really good orchestra there before.

Important to Bostonians was the reported presence (although I did not glimpse them) of Francis Hatch and Fire Commissioner (also new B. S. O. trustee) Michael T. Kelleher.

So, although it does not seem quite possible, this tour is over. I suspect that the orchestra could return any time and meet with just as warm a welcome.

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
JUN 2 - 1952

Concert Closes Paris Festival Of Western Art

By JOHN RODERICK

PARIS, June 1 (AP)—A glittering concert tonight closed the free world's artistic festival—"Masterpieces of the 20th Century"—in which Americans proved to critical old Europe that the United States has achieved an astonishing cultural maturity.

Mustachioed Pierre Monteux, conducting the Paris Conservatory orchestra, climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes.

The political overtones were injected by the festival's sponsors, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, made up of Western intellectuals, including British philosopher Bertrand Russell and Italian philosopher Benedetto Croce. Great orchestras, conductors, composers, dancers, writers and painters were brought to Europe, thanks to the program's angel, U. S. gin and yeast heir Julius Fleischmann.

The program, greeted with the most rousing enthusiasm seen in these parts for many a day, was not without its barbs sprung of criticism and artistic feuding.

Communists lambasted the whole affair, naturally. Left-wingers called it the "NATO festival" and said it promoted the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's Western defense alliance. Some artists wrote irate letters to the festival director, Nicholas Nabokov complaining that the ends of culture could not be met by political aims. And American conductor Artur Rodzinski suggested tartly that Fleischmann might well spend his money on helping starving artists rather than on lavish festivals.

The first American triumph was scored by American conductor Bruno Walter, leading the Paris Opera Orchestra.

Even greater, however, was the appearance for the first time in Europe of the 71-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. By the time the 110-piece orchestra had finished playing Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the diamond-studded audience was on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before.

Monteux, who was associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, followed by recreating a moment in musical history two nights later with the playing of Russian-born Igor Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Monteux had conducted the ballet in its world premier 39 years earlier in the same Theatre des Champs-Elysees. That first performance caused a riot of disapproval, however, and Stravinsky had to flee. The 1952 performance brought down the house, and Stravinsky, now an American, was there with Monteux to receive the cheers.

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, OHIO
NEWS-JOURNAL
JUN 4 - 1952

Beauty as Heritage

Dollars of Americans too long have been accused of treating art treasures of Europe as pillage and decoying to this country outstanding artists in many fields, of whom Caruso in his long sojourn in the U. S. was a prime example.

There never was a better time for individuals and representative institutions of this country to demonstrate their feeling that beauty, in its appeal to any of the senses, belongs to all who can appreciate it than the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" being held this year in Paris.

It is, therefore, both astonishing and heartening to note that on the evening of the very day paintings by European artists from American collections were exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing for the first time in Europe, achieved an unforgettable triumph at the Paris Opera.

It was a gala event, with President Auriol, Robert Schuman, diplomats, notable composers, society and just plain music lovers in the throng, which responded fervently to a long program divided between American and French music. Conductor Charles Muench and the orchestra had to give their hearers for a second time the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et and Chloe" suite.

To such an exposition of the arts as Paris planned and is staging it is well that Americans are unselfishly contributing. In an increasingly technological age humans dare not become automata. Sanity prescribes an increasing love of beauty as one of the great preventatives.

[218]

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report For the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

While the Boston Symphony has been winning new laurels in Europe a group of 80, mostly young and therefore eager musicians, has been filling in at the Pops. This May Pops Orchestra, as it is now being called, has one more week, or four-sevenths of a week, to go; this Thursday through next Sunday. After that, the Symphony men, or the portion of them that play in the Pops, will carry on nightly through June.

* * *

When Wilhelm Gericke took over the Boston Symphony in 1884, which is to say at the beginning of its fourth season, he said to Major Higginson after two concerts: "You have not an orchestra here. There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra." That is what might have been said, though no one said it publicly, of the first concert of the new Pops orchestra, that of May 1. The players themselves had been carefully screened by Arthur Fiedler and they have since demonstrated conclusively that he was a good picker. But on the opening night, while they played with abundant spirit and commendable precision, the finer orchestral values were missing. The players in their nine collective hours of rehearsal had not yet learned to hear each other. The brass was overenthusiastic and on the blatant side. The string tone was thin, and not only because there are fewer strings in the group than we have been having at the Pops of late years. Time was, by the way, when only a little more than half the Symphony men played in the Pops. The first chair men have never done so and in the old days a large number of the others betook themselves to various summer jobs. Now about nine-tenths of the men play at the Pops and they add up to a body of performers larger and, it is hardly necessary to say, more skilfull than the average symphony orchestra.

* * *

Anyway, it did not take Mr. Fiedler long to get the substitute orchestra to a point where listening to it could be genuinely pleasurable, as I discovered at the opening concert of the third week. As reported here at the time, there was a finish and a refinement in performance, a tonal balance lacking at the outset. It will be interesting to see how the real Pops orchestra sounds by comparison. The men have had a tough schedule in Europe, 15 concerts in 21 days, in 10 cities of five countries, but they will have had a brief rest on the ship. Moreover, they are in the habit of attacking the Pops almost immediately after the Symphony season and of playing nightly through May. There has still been the strain of travel and the necessity of trying to appear everywhere at the top of their form, something they do not do, I am afraid, in the nightly routine of the Pops, where most of the music, from their point of view, is relatively untaxing.

* * *

It is this business of playing for all they are worth that makes the new Pops Orchestra a bit different from the regular one. These young musicians—and, as I say, they are mostly that—plainly appreciate the honor and the experience that has come their way. And the speed with which they have acquired the missing polish in performance, and the smooth and flexible ensemble, bears witness both to their native ability and to the skill of Mr. Fiedler. Several years ago the latter organized a youth orchestra and in a short time had it playing like a bunch of veterans. That was largely an amateur group. This is not. Its members have all had orchestral experience, while a few of them are veterans in the true sense of the word, being either ex-Boston Symphony men or players of long experience in a variety of musical fields.

* * *

What it really amounts to is this: Ours is an orchestral age. These players did not go into the respective American orchestras from which they came and to which, by and large, they will return next season, without having had both orchestral experience and an instinct for orchestral playing. A large number got the former in the orchestra of the New England Conservatory. And they can easily have acquired the latter by listening to orchestral records and broadcasts. In Gericke's day, if you wished to hear a symphony orchestra, you had to go to one of the cities that boasted such a luxury and buy yourself a ticket.

* * *

Be that as it may, Mr. Fiedler's experiment has borne rich fruit, the Pops went on, if only for four nights a week and with a weekly rather than a nightly program. And when the European invitation came it was immediately assumed that there would be no Pops during May. The man who saved the day was Arthur Fiedler.

The final program to be offered by the May Pops Orchestra contains one item of rare interest, the Concert Symphonique for piano orchestra, No. 4 in D minor, Op. 104, by Henry Charles Litolff (1818-91), a composer who would be completely unknown to present-day Bostonians but for the attention that Mr. Fiedler occasionally pays to his Overture, "Robespierre."

* * *

Litolff was a pioneer in the matter of the symphonic concerto, something of which Lszt took due note by dedicating his First Con-

Progress of the Pops

Gerson Yessin Scheduled As Piano Soloist

The Symphony Hall Pops Orchestra, organized by Arthur Fiedler for the May concerts while the Boston Symphony musicians are abroad, will make its final appearances next week beginning Thursday evening and continuing through Friday, Saturday, and Sunday evenings.

On the following week the regular Pops Orchestra, having returned from Europe, will take over for the month of June, appearing nightly.

Gerson Yessin, who has appeared several times at the Pops as piano soloist, will be the featured artist for next week's concerts. He will play Litolff's Concerto Symphonique for Piano and Orchestra No. 4 in D minor, Op. 102.

The first section of Mr. Fiedler's program for these four concerts will include Schubert's "Marche Militaire," Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Ave Maria," and Waldteufel's "Très Jolie."

The second section will consist of Leoncavallo's Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," the Litolff Concerto Symphonique, and Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The final group will include selections from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," Anderson's "Sleigh Ride," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

New Pops Orchestra in Final Performances Under Fiedler

The May Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall will make their last appearance under the direction of Arthur Fiedler in the concerts of this week, beginning Thursday evening and continuing through Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

On the following week the regular Pops Orchestra, having returned from Europe, will take over for the month of June. Arthur Fiedler announces the following program for the concerts of May 29 through June 1, with Gerson Yessin as piano soloist: Marche Militaire, Schubert; Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Tres Jolie, Waldteufel; Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Concerto Symphonique for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 102, Litolff; Suite from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla; selections from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin; Because, Rodgers; Sleigh Ride, Anderson; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Tonight's concert will be the first one this week. Leo Litwin is the piano soloist. The program: Hungarian March "Rakoczy," Berlioz; First Movement from the "Unfinished" Symphony, Schubert; Little Fugue in G minor, Bach-Caulliet; Ballet Suite from "Faust," Gounod; Three Hungarian Dances (Nos. 19, 20 and 21), Brahms; "Interplay," American Concertette for Piano and Orchestra, Gould; Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Addinsell; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; Selections from "South Pacific," Rodgers; The Classical Juke Box, Anderson; March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

This Clipping From
HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST
MAY 14 1952

Boston Pops, Ballet Troupes Added to Saunders Season

Houston Impresario Edna W. Saunders made public Tuesday night the engagement of five distinguished musical and dancing organizations to supplement the already impressive list of attractions she will present in the coming season.

The Boston Pops Orchestra, popular companion unit to the Boston Symphony, will be heard at the Music Hall under the baton of, Arthur Fiedler. This ensemble is appearing by a special arrangement with the Boston orchestra.

Mrs Saunders will also import the Jose Greco Spanish Ballet, which set some records for dance companies this season on Broadway.

Two other eminent dancing troupes are on the bill. The Mia Slavenska Company, which has just acquired Frederic Franklin, late of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, will bring a company of 30. Romantic, character and comedy ballets will be offered, including a new item based on Tennessee Williams' "A Streetcar Named Desire."

Ballet Theatre, which is well known to Houston dance-lovers, will also be seen. This company numbers 80 performers and carries its own symphony orchestra.

The new season will also include the Robert Shaw Chorale, one of the nation's outstanding choral groups, with Mr Shaw as conductor.

Earlier, Mrs Saunders had announced the booking of the American Savoyards, which will present two Gilbert and Sullivan operas, "Patience" and "The Mikado;" the Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Vladimir Golschmann; the San Antonio Symphony, with Victor Alessandro conducting; and Metropolitan Opera Soprano Victoria de los Angeles, who will be heard in recital.

All attractions will be in the Music Hall, and Mrs Saunders' regular subscription course of six items will be picked from the above list.

Regular Pops Men Returning Tonight

The regular players of the Pops Orchestra resume their desks tonight after a successful European tour with the Boston Symphony. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the following program at 8:30 P. M. in Symphony Hall.

Wedding March from the "Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky Korsakoff
Toccata ..... Frescobaldi-Kindler
Three Movements from the "Classical Symphony" ..... Prokofieff
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Three dances from the ballet "Fancy Free" ..... Bernstein
Concerto in E-Flat (Gerson Yessin, soloist) ..... Liszt
Finale from the First Symphony ..... Brahms
Selection from the "King And I" ..... Rodgers
Blue Tango ..... Anderson
"Pineapple Poll" (Finale) ..... Sullivan-Mackerras

Z

Television may have hurt the movies but it doesn't seem to have bothered the Pops at all. Not last Saturday night at least because there was a packed house and the Sold Out sign went up at seven thirty.

All in all it was a grand evening. To begin with, Mr. Fiedler made his usual elegant entrance. Funny thing about Arthur, he is the only Man of Distinction I know who looks like one. It appears that nowadays one doesn't have to look messy to be musical. Never saw a better looking audience--very young and all shined up which leads me to believe that all the Patrons of Symphony must have followed Munch to Europe. There were dozens of soldiers and sailors, all very quiet and most reserved. I wonder what's happening to our Army and Navy. One young lady (all of seventeen) at the next table was really in heaven. Whether it was the Brahms Hungarian Dance or the Boy beside her I'll never know. I gave her my card but I'm not counting on success. The last girl I gave my card to phoned the next day and said her Father didn't need a thing. Now they were playing the Warsaw Concerto. Leo Litwin was in a powerful mood. He tore the piano apart, the walls apart, and me apart. When it was over he jumped up and pumped Mr. Fiedler's hand so hard he almost tore him apart, too. Ecstacy can be such a violent thing. Now the orchestra was playing strains from South Pacific. I never believed I could ever sit through Bali Ha'i again but I did and loved it. The audience was stomping for an encore and got the Blue Tango. From the screams that went up I thought Sinatra was back. Then Mr. Fiedler and the boys played "Cry"! It was unbelievable. Those wonderful fiddles gave it the full treatment and when they let up the cellos swept in and took it from there. I had to leave. My bouts with Culture are so sporadic I get much too excited.

Next Saturday I shall go bowling again—it's much less strenuous, really.

Zareh INC.
Boston, Brookline, Belmont

BU Night at the Pops

The [illegible] sity Night at the Pops, [illegible] concludes [illegible] ment Wednesday [illegible] held this [illegible] on Monday [illegible] 8:15.

Arthur Fiedler [illegible] Pops Orchestra [illegible] program. The [illegible] be Francis [illegible] music and [illegible] ton University.

Following [illegible] James R. Ha[illegible] the University Glee Club, and lead graduates, past presidents and families, and [illegible]sets of the University [illegible]ox and administrative officers in singing songs of the Alma Mater.

...may have hurt
...but it doesn't
...ve bothered the
... Not last Satur-
...at least because
... packed house
...d Out sign went
... thirty.
...it was a grand
...bugin with, Mr.
...le, his usual ele-
...ce. Funny thing
...n, he is the only
...stinction I know
...f one. It appears
...ays, one doesn't
...messy to be mu-
... saw a better
...nce—very young
...d up which leads
...ve that all the
...Symphony must
...d Munch to Eu-
... were dozens of
...sailors, all very
...ost reserved. I
...'s happening to
...nd Navy. One
...all of seventeen)
...table was really
...Whether it was
...Hungarian Dance
...beside her I'll
... I gave her my
...not counting on
...last girl I gave
...phoned the next
...aid her Father
... a thing. Now
...aying the War-
... Leo Litwin was
...mood. He tore
...part, the walls
...e apart. When
... jumped up and
... Fiedler's hand
...almost tore him
...Ecstacy can be
... thing. Now the
... playing strains
...acific. I never
...could ever sit
...Ha'i again but I
... it. The audience
... for an encore
...lue Tango. From
...that went up I
...tra was back.
...iedler and the
..."Cry"! It was
... Those wonder-
...ave it the full
...d when they let
... swept in and
...there. I had to
...tz with Culture
...dic. I get much
...rday I shall go
...—it's much less
...lly.

...rek
...Inc.
...kline, Belmont

...1952

...t at the Pops

...onal Boston Univer-
...the Pops, which will
... annual Commence-
...nd events, will be
...r in Symphony Hall
...evening, June 2, at

...dler will conduct the
...tra for part of the
... guest conductor will
...Findlay, professor of
...onductor of the Bos-
...y orchestra.
... an old custom, Dr.
...oughton, director of
...y's Glee Club, will
...s; their friends and
...d members of the
...aculty and admini-
...rs in singing songs
... Mater.

Monitor
June 2

...ances Abresch
Gerson Yessin is the soloist for the Symphony Hall Pops concerts this week in Litolff's Concerto Symphonique for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4.

POP CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Pops Concert had last evening what might be called their second opening. In other words, the Boston Symphony men, finally returned from their European triumphs, took over; and the members of the substitute orchestra have gone their several ways. This May Orchestra, as it was finally called, did a most competent job and our collective thanks go to them as well as to Arthur Fiedler, who accomplished so much with them.

The Symphony men, or most of them, since some came by plane, landed in New York Tuesday morning but their instruments did not get here until yesterday noon. Last evening's concert was unrehearsed and some minor changes were made in the scheduled program. There was nothing on the list that the boys could not take in their stride, and take it they did.

In the first section came the Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakow's "Coq d'Or," the "Freischuetz" Overture of Weber, three movements from Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and a Suite from "Carmen."

That able resident pianist, Gerson Yessin, who had just played the Fourth Concerto of Litolff four nights in a row, Thursday through Sunday, was on the job again last evening playing that Pops staple, the E-flat Concerto of Liszt. If it is true that even this part of the program was unrehearsed, it must be said that the Concerto went surprisingly well. Of course, Mr. Fiedler and his players could do it in their sleep. Flanking the Concerto were the Frescobaldi-Kindler Toccata and the finale of Brahms' First Symphony. Then came the lighter third of the program, drawn this time from Cole Porter, Eduard and Johann Strauss and again Bizet. Did this orchestra sound any different from its predecessor? Yes. The tone was richer and fuller. There is only one Boston Symphony, a fact recently made clear to several European communities.

Each of the returning players was presented with a white carnation to sport in his buttonhole and a montage of the reviews of the two Paris concerts. The men were too busy on the tour to do much sightseeing, but Leslie Rogers, the librarian, told me that when in London he managed to sneak off and visit Westminster Abbey. Looking beneath his chair he discovered that he was sitting above the grave of Handel. "All my life," he said, "I have been sitting in front of Handel's music, and there I was on top of his remains."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

JUN 3 - 1952

'Concert' From Symphony Gets Pops—at Sea

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailing home from France on the Ile de France, last night enjoyed a Boston Pops concert, rebroadcast by short wave to them as they passed Nantucket.

The concert, transcribed last week, started with a greeting from Pops conductor, Arthur Fiedler, and included the Pops hit of the season, a gay version of "Cry"; the farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite; Sousa's "Washington Post March," and variations on the English folk song, "Greensleeves," arranged by Vaughn Williams.

This morning, B. S. O. officials received a radiogram from the orchestra members aboard ship.

"Broadcast received clearly and enjoyed by whole ship," it read. "Next Pops Orchestra thanks you for this serenade and your greetings."

The phrase "next Pops orchestra" refers to the fact that a substitute orchestra has been sitting in at Pops concerts while the B. S. O. men were on their first musical tour of Europe.

Originally, the B. S. O. men were scheduled to take over Pops tonight. That would have been their first post-trip concert.

However, the Ile de France was delayed in France for one day by mechanical difficulties, so the substitute orchestra will play tonight. The regular Pops ensemble will be back at Symphony Hall tomorrow.

Meanwhile, Alfred Krips, regular concertmaster, had flown home from Paris and arrived in Boston last night. He will step in as concertmaster at tonight's Pops.

Regular Pops Players Back

Tonight the Boston Symphony musicians, home from their first tour of Europe, will take their places on the Symphony Hall stage and will continue to provide the Boston Pops concerts every evening through June.

Gerson Yessin, who was soloist at the Pops concerts last week, will be featured tonight in a performance of Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra. The complete programs for tonight and the remainder of the week follow:

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

JUN 2 - 1952

Pops Regulars Due On Wednesday Night

With the return of June and the Boston Symphony, triumphant if tired from its widely acclaimed European debut tour, the Boston Pops moves into a schedule of performances seven nights a week in historic Boston Symphony Hall.

Arthur Fiedler's May Pops Orchestra, composed of Boston musicians from symphony orchestras of other cities, is now expected to play tomorrow night as well as tonight, Boston University Night at Pops. Their delayed Isle de France sailing, the symphony management reports, is expected to set back the first home-again concert by the Boston Pops orchestra to Wednesday night.

Boston University, for its concluding commencement week event, has taken the entire house for tonight, when conductors will be Francis Findlay and Dr. James R. Houghton. Soloists will include pianists Margaret Moreland and Richard Perry. They will perform Saint-Saens' "The Animals' Carnival." Dr. Houghton, director of the university chorus and glee clubs, will lead the university gathering in singing traditional college songs.

Tonight's program, beginning at the customary 8:30 p. m., follows:

Marche Militaire	Schubert
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Tres Jolie	Waldteufel
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Concerto Symphonique for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4 in D minor, Op. 102 (soloist, George Yessin)	Litolff
Suite from ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"	de Falla
"Of Thee I Sing," selections	Gershwin
"Because"	Richard Rodgers
"Sleigh Ride"	Anderson
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

Boston Symphony Returns, to Play Pops Nightly This Month

With the arrival of June and the return of the Boston Symphony to its home at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avs., the Boston Pops move into a schedule of performances seven nights a week. And Arthur Fiedler's May Pops Orchestra, composed of Boston musicians, and players from symphony orchestras of other cities, will disband.

This group, which Mr. Fiedler whipped into a vital and responsive orchestra, will play its last concerts tonight and Monday night. However, the orchestra may be held over to play on Tuesday as well, since at the moment it is not known whether the Boston Symphony players will be able to return in time for Tuesday's concert. The Isle de France, on which they sailed from England, had minor mechanical difficulties, and was delayed a full day.

Boston University has taken the entire house for Monday night, when guest conductors will be Francis Findlay and Dr. James R. Houghton. Soloists will include pianists Margaret Moreland and Richard Perry.

Wednesday night Gerson Yessin will be the soloist in Liszt's E-Flat Piano Concerto. Thursday is Tufts Night. Friday Bertica Shulman will play Mendelssohn's D Minor Piano Concerto. And on Saturday Charles Hedlund will play the same composer's G Minor Concerto. Sunday night Henry Gregorian will be the soloist in the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto and his brother, Rouben, lately arrived in this country and now a resident of Watertown, will be guest conductor of the middle third of the program.

All concerts begin at 8:30. The programs for the week:

Tonight—Marche Militaire, Schubert; Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Tres Jolie, Waldteufel; Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Concerto Symphonique for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 102, Litolff (soloist, Gerson Yessin); Suite from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla; selections from "Of Thee, I Sing," Gershwin; Because, Rodgers; Sleigh Ride, Anderson; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Tuesday—Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Academic Festival Overture, Brahms; Meditation from "Thais," Massenet, solo violin, Alfred Krips; Ballet Music from "Faust," Gounod; "Voices of Spring," Waltzes, Strauss; Claire de Lune, Debussy; Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakoff; Selection from "Kiss Me, Kate," Porter; Fiddle Faddle, Anderson; Songs of Dartmouth.

Wednesday—Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Toccata, Frescobaldi-Kindler; Three Movements from the "Classical" Symphony, Prokofieff; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Three Dances from the Ballet, "Fancy Free," Bernstein; Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra, Liszt, (Soloist; Gerson Yessin); Finale from the First Symphony, Brahm; Selection from "The King and I," Rodgers; Blue Tango, Anderson; "Pineapple Poll" (Finale), Sullivan—Mackerras.

Thursday (Tufts Night)—Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Academic Festival Overture, Brahms; Polka from "The Golden Age," Shostakovitch; Three Dances from the Ballet, "Fancy Free," Bernstein; Fantasia on Tufts Airs, Morton. Tufts-Jackson Chorus — Dr. Thompson Stone, conductor. Selection from "The King and I," Rodgers; Blue Tango, Anderson; Finale, "Pineapple Poll," Sullivan—Mackerras.

Friday — Triumphal March from "Aida", Verdi; Hoe Down from "Rodeo", Copland; Invitation to the Dance, Weber—Berlioz; Overture to "Die Fledermaus", Strauss; Concerto in D minor, for Piano and Orchestra, Mendelssohn, (Soloist; Bertica Shulman); The Sorcerer's Apprentice, Dukas; Selection from "The King and I," Rodgers; Blue Tango, Anderson; "The Stars and Stripes Forever", Sousa.

Saturday—Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Valse Triste, Sibelius; "Finlandia," Tone Poem, Sibelius; Concerto in G minor for Piano and Orchestra, Mendelssohn (Soloist; Charles Hedlund); Polovetzian Dances, Borodin; Northeastern University Chorus, Tucker Keiser, Conductor; Richard Rodgers Waltzes; Plink, Plank, Plunk! Anderson; Dance of the Tumblers from "The Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Sunday—"The Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; In the Village from Caucasian Sketches", Ippolitov-Ivanov; From the "Masquerade" Suite, Khatchaturian, Rouben Gregorian, conducting: Tatragoun's Bride, Gregorian; Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Khatchaturian, soloist, Henry Gregorian; Iranian Suite, Gregorian. Selection from "South Pacific" Rodgers; Sleigh Ride, Anderson; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Six

Pops to Entertain Boston Symphony in Radio Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra players, aboard the Ile de France will be entertained tonight by, of all things, a special concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Through the cooperation of station WBZ, the Boston Musicians Local, A.F.L., and the French Lines, a special broadcast by the "May Pops"—the remarkable substitute group taking over for the touring players, will be radioed to the Ile de France and into the Little Theater where the symphony men will be relaxing.

Arthur Fiedler says the idea of the concert is to welcome home the regular players, give them an idea of what's been going on in their absence," and to let them hear this remarkable group of musicians who have striven so excellently toward maintaining the Pops' standard."

New Englanders will be able to eavesdrop on the concert by tuning in at 10:30 p. m., when the Ile de France will be somewhere off the New England coast, within range of the broadcast.

Regular Pops Orchestra Returns

Gerson Yessin Soloist In Liszt Piano Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Symphony Hall's customary spring aspect was restored last night when the Boston Symphony musicians, back from their first triumphal tour of Europe, played their first Pops concert program of the season. It was a good, comfortable feeling to see the familiar faces back in the familiar places, Alfred Krips was again in the concert master's chair. Arthur Fiedler, of course, officiated on the podium.

The first two-thirds of the program veered strongly to the sedate—the standard classics—many of which Mr. Fiedler brought off with a measure of distinction. Especially noteworthy were the three movements from Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony and Bizet's Suite from "Carmen," though the finale from the Brahms First was churned a bit, unable to speak in its great and simple majesty.

Gerson Yessin, who was the soloist last week in Litolff's Concerto Symphonique No. 4, appeared last night as executant in the Liszt Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra, the so-called "Triangle" Concerto.

Mr. Yessin somehow became involved in several anticlimaxes as he approached the peaks of the mounting crescendos found in the first movement and again in the last. In these fortissimo portions his driving intensity pushed him into the area of bombast.

That he has a poetic heart was proved when he brought out the charm and songful lyricism of the middle movement, as well as the scherzo frivolities of the last movement when the piano and triangle indulge in a pas de deux.

It is interesting and also disturbing to note that nearly every Pops soloist tends to overplay, to be too flashy, too dynamic, too astounding. They tend to make the music say things that it was never intended to say. Their performances exchange a silver sheen for chromium plate. Instead of a glow there is a glare. It does not seem to me that the Pops audiences insist that everything be so "popular," especially when the work at hand is not so by nature. A little poetry is always appreciated.

In the third portion of the program Mr. Fiedler stepped into the frankly popular vein where one expects and enjoys the dash, the verve, the scintillations of emphatic rhythm and sentimental melody. Here we heard Cole Porter's haunting tunes from "Kiss Me Kate." Here we were amused by the inanities of the "Classical Juke Box." Here we raced with Eduard Strauss's "Fast Track" (after which Armando Ghitalla took a bow for his spicy trumpeting) and we caught the carnival spirit of "In a Vienna Park" with Johann Strauss.

After the first and second fiddles rose en masse to acknowledge the applause for their rippling traversal of Leroy Anderson's "Fiddle Faddle," Mr. Fiedler closed the concert with a galloping Farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" Suite.

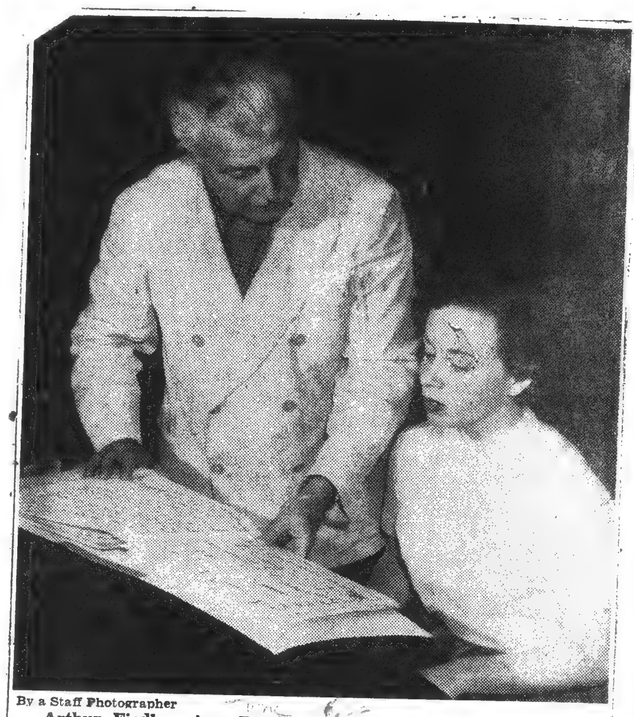
Yes, gentlemen, it's good to have you back.

Jagel Pops Soloist

Frederick Jagel, tenor, head of the voice department of the New England Conservatory of Music, will be a soloist at New England Conservatory Night at the Pops Saturday evening, June 14, in Symphony Hall at 8:30. Arthur Fiedler has invited Malcolm Holmes, dean of the Conservatory, to conduct that night.

John Moriarty, pianist, graduating this year, will also be a soloist, and Lorna Cooke deVaron of the faculty of the Conservatory will conduct the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Mr. Jagel will sing "Salut demeure" from Gounod's "Faust" and "Recondita armonia" from Puccini's "Tosca." Mr. Moriarty will play the first movement from the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor. The New England Conservatory chorus will sing Two American Folksongs, adapted by Aaron Copland, Four Slovak Folksongs by Béla Bartók, and two selections from Five Flower Songs by Benjamin Britten.



By a Staff Photographer

Arthur Fiedler gives Bertica Shulman some pointers for her performance of the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto in D minor tonight at the Boston Pops.

THE BOSTON HERALD,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Pops

At Symphony Hall last evening Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra in the following program:

[illegible]

By ELINOR HUGHES

[illegible] news this morning is contained in the fact that the Boston Symphony is back at Symphony Hall [illegible] from the triumphal tour of Europe—and I do mean triumphal—and that it's wonderful to have them around again. You'd think that after all that traveling and strenuous schedule of concerts they'd seem tired or at least slowed down, but from the cheerful volume of noise they produced last evening and the sheer exuberance of their playing it appears that work agrees with them. Perhaps they should go abroad every spring.

The program seemed particularly enjoyable, too, not just for the performance but also for Arthur Fiedler's selections. The popular resistance was the dashing Liszt Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra, played with great verve and color by that excellent pianist, Gerson Yessin, rapidly and understandably becoming a great favorite with Pops audiences. This was topped only by a rousing, if sometimes breathlessly fast rendering of the beautiful [illegible] from Brahms C minor Symphony which evoked rapturous applause.

Earlier in the evening Mr. Fiedler gave us a thoroughly agreeable reading of three movements from Prokofieff's delightful little "Classical" Symphony—a musical joke which is not only clever but musically and charming to hear. That it has fooled plenty of people into [illegible] it was written by Mozart is no secret by now. The Fugue and Toccata offered good [illegible] and the rest of the program, divided between Pops [illegible] Cole Porter, Eduard and Johann Strauss, [illegible] no cause for complaint [illegible] more [illegible] of course.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—

About Music

Armenian Composer Gregorian Guest Conductor of Pops Sunday

By JOHN WM. RILEY

The Boston Pops will play host to Alexander Gregorian, Armenian composer-conductor, who will be guest leader next Sunday.

This will be Gregorian's first professional appearance in America since he arrived on these shores from Iran last November as an immigrant, with the espoused intention of becoming an American citizen. He lived briefly in New York before coming to Boston and is now making his home in Watertown.

Rouben Gregorian (also spelt Roubik Grigorian) is a plump and jolly man with coal black hair, slightly touched with gray, who laughs infectiously.

But he didn't laugh when someone inadvertently called George Gershwin an "American Strauss." Gregorian's hands flew in the air and he spouted voluble French, for he speaks little English. And he punctuated his declarations with the firm opinion that "Gershwin was better than Strauss."

Sunday night Gregorian will be represented both as conductor and composer in the middle third of the Pops program. He will conduct several of his own works, and will include Khatchaturian's Violin Concerto, the work of a fellow Armenian. This will be a signal occasion, since the soloist will be Henry Gregorian, Rouben's brother who has lived in this country for four years, studying at the Longy School in Cambridge.

Assisting as interpreter, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb on Lime st., Emile Francois LeVin explained the purpose of the Sunday night Pops Concerto. It is not only intended to launch Gregorian professionally in this country, but also to get together a sum of money to help him furnish his apartment in Watertown where he lives with his wife, Manoosh and talented 10-year-old son, William.

For a number of years Gregorian has been conductor of the Teheran Symphony and director of the Conservatory there, where his father is still a professor.

Symphony's Return May Add Continental Flavor to Pops

The Pops continue at Symphony Hall each night through this week, the music to be provided by the regular Pops Orchestra now returned from Europe. Arthur Fiedler presents programs of variety, with several soloists. These include Paul Saltman and George Wright, duo pianists, tomorrow; Lee Litwin on Tuesday; Ruth Slenczynski, the pianist who is making her Pops debut, on Wednesday; Miss Tung Kwong Kwong, a favorite at the Pops concerts, on Friday.

On New England Conservatory night Malcolm Holmes will conduct and soloists will include John Moriarity, piano, and Frederick Jagel, tenor of the faculty, and the New England Conservatory Chorus. Alfred Krips, concert master of the Pops, will be heard as soloist on Monday and Thursday, Roger Voisin, first trumpet, on Thursday. The programs follow:

Monday—Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerell," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Overture to "La Belle Helene," Offenbach; Meditation from "Thais," Massenet; Three Dances from the Ballet, "Fancy Free," Bernstein; "Masquerade" Suite, Khatchaturian; Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; "Call Me Madam" Medley, Berlin; Briggs: "Twinkle, Twinkle Little Star," Arr. by Briggs, Schuyler, Post, Sauter and George Wright Duo; Selection from "The King and I," Rodgers; Serenade, Anderson; Plink, Plank, Plunk, Anderson; Old Timers' Night at the Pops, Arr. by Lake (Conducted by Warren Freeman).

Tuesday—"Princess Elizabeth" March, Coates; Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Pavane for a Dead Infanta, Ravel; "Gayane" Ballet Suite, Khatchaturian; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, Litzt; Two Movements from "Interplay," American Concertette for Piano and Orchestra, Gould; Warsaw Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, (Soloist: Lee Litwin), Addinsell; "Espana" Rhapsody, Chabrier; Slaughter on Tenth Avenue, Rodgers; Delicado, Azevedo; The Rakes of Mallow, Arr. by Anderson.

Wednesday — "Princess Elizabeth" March, Coats; Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Pavane for a Dead Infanta, Ravel; "Gayane" Ballet Suite, Khatchaturian; Three Dances from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla; "Todtentanz," Paraphrase on "Dies Irae" for Piano and Orchestra, Liszt; (Soloist: Ruth Slenczynski.); "Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; Slaughter on Tenth Avenue, Rozders; Delicado, Azevedo; "Gypsy Baron" March; Strauss.

Thursday—"The Stars and Stripes Forever" March, Sousa; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; The Lost Cord, Solo Trumpet; Roger Voisin, Sullivan; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes, Strauss; Three Movements from the "Nutcracker" Suite, Tchaikovsky; Ave Maria, Solo Violin; Alfred Krips, Bach-Gounod; Tone Poem, "Finlandia," Sibelius; "Many Happy Returns," arr. by Mason; Song Fest Medley, arr. by Hodge; "Pomp and Circumstance" March, Elgar.

Friday—Hungarian March, "Rakoczy."

[22]

BOSTON HERALD,

MUSIC

HONY HALL

ymphony Hall last evening. Fiedler conducted the Bos- Orchestra in the follow- ram:

March from "The Golden ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff to Der Freischutz ..... Weber vements from the "Classical" ..... Prokofieff
"Carmen" ..... Bizet
n E-flat for Piano and ..... Liszt
Soloist: Gerson Yessin
the First Symphony ..... Brahms from "Kiss Me Kate" ..... Porter
t ("Fast Track") ..... Edward Strauss ald'l ("In a Vienna Park") ..... Johann Strauss from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet

ELINOR HUGHES

al news this morning is the fact that the Boston y is back at Symphony sh from the triumphal Europe—and I do mean d that it's wonderful to m around again. You'd t after all that traveling uous schedule of concerts eem tired or at least wn, but from the cheer- e of noise they produced ing, and the sheer ex- of their playing it ap- work agrees with them. they should go abroad ng.

gram seemed particular too, not just for the ce but also for Arthur elections. The piece de was the dashing Liszt n E-flat for Piano and played with great color by that excellent erson Yessin, rapidly, standably, becoming a te with Pops audiences. opped off with a rous- times breathlessly fast. of the beautiful finale ms C minor Symphony, ed rapturous applause. n the evening Mr. Fied- a thoroughly agree- of three movements ofieff's delightful little Symphony—a musical is not only clever but nd charming to hear. fooled plenty of peo- inking it was written is no secret by now. baldi-Kindler Toccata d solid enjoyment, and the program, divided msky-Korsakov, Bizet, r and Edward and auss, afforded no cause ht. There were nu- ores, of course.

May Add Pops

re to "La Gazza Ladra." day Night Waltz and Hoe xico." Copland; Suite from Music, Gounod. Hungarian 9, "Carnival at Pesth." in G minor for Piano and ndelssohn. (Soloist: Tuns); "Finlandia." Sibelius. Returns," arr. by Mason; nderson; "Knightsbridge."

w England Conservatory Holmes conducting; Tele- Coates; First Movement Minor for Piano and Or- ven (Soloist: John Mori- t demeure" from "Faust." condita armonia" from ini (Soloist: Frederick Prelude to "The Master- rembers." Wagner. New ervatory Chorus, Lorna on, conductor. Elizabeth mpanist: Selection from dam," Berlin; Delicado. e Up the Band," Gersh-

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Pops Great, But Audience Frigid

By PEGGY DOYLE

e only disappointing thing about last night's Pops program was the audience. e Boston Symphony Orchestra players, presenting their first Boston Pops ason and fresh from their conquest of discriminating European symnd Bizet's Farandole from L'Arlesienne" were also heard.

Tonight is Tufts Night at Symphony Hall.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, S

Pops Program for Week

Nine Soloists Scheduled For SymphonyHall

Nine soloists will be featured at the Boston Pops concerts in Symphony Hall next week. The regular Pops Orchestra, back from Europe, will continue their nightly June performances, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, will present a variety of standard and popular classics on his programs.

On Monday evening Phil Saltman and George Wright Briggs will be the soloists in two duo-piano arrangements, made by Mr. Briggs, of a medley from Irving Berlin's "Call Me Madam" and the nursery tune, "Twinkle Twinkle Little Star."

Leo Litwin, on Tuesday, will perform two movements from Morton Gould's "Interplay" and the "Warsaw" Piano Concerto by Addinsell. Ruth Slencynski, who several years ago was a noted child pianist, will make her Pops debut on Wednesday evening in Liszt's "Todtentanz" for Piano and Orchestra.

On Thursday night Alfred Krips, concertmaster, will play the solo violin part in the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," and Roger Voisin will be the solo trumpeter in Sullivan's "The Lost Chord." Tung Kwong Kwong, a favorite at the Pops, will be the piano soloist Friday evening. Miss Tung will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor.

Saturday night—New England Conservatory Night—will feature Frederick Jagel as tenor soloist. He will sing arias from "Faust" and "Tosca." John Moriarty will be the soloist in the first movement from Beethoven's Piano Concerto in C minor. Malcolm Holmes will conduct.

The programs for the week follow:

By a Staff Photographer

Henry Gregorian, shown rehearsing the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto which he will play with the Boston Pops Sunday evening in Symphony Hall.

Next Week at the Pops

Six soloists and two guest conductors will appear on the programs for the Boston Pops that Arthur Fiedler has announced for next week in Symphony Hall.

Hermann Gantt, bass-baritone and holder of a Marian Anderson award, will be heard Sunday night in "Il lacerato spirito" from Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra." Sharing the honors in this program with Mr. Gantt will be Leo Litwin, who will again be heard in Gershwin's perennial favorite, the "Rhapsody in Blue."

Mr. Litwin will also play the Gershwin Rhapsody on Friday evening, and on Saturday he will be heard in two movements from Gould's "Interplay" and in Addinsell's "Warsaw" Concerto.

On Wednesday evening Mildred Moore will perform the Liszt E-flat Piano Concerto, Jan Peerce, Metropolitan Opera tenor, and Gerson Yessin, pianist, will be the featured soloists for Israel Histadrut Night on Thursday. Mr. Yessin will play the Liszt Concerto in E-flat; Mr. Peerce will sing arias by Halevy, Donizetti, and songs by Milner and Chagis.

Paul Cherkassky will be the guest conductor Tuesday evening; Harry Ellis Dickson on Sunday, June 22.

The programs f...

Rhapsody in Blue for Piano and Orchestra ..... Gershwin
Soloist: Leo Litwin
Selection from "The King and I" ..... Rodgers
Happy Birthday Goes to Town ..... Caillet
"Semper Fidelis" March ..... Sousa
Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
AFRO AMERICAN
JUL 1 - 1952

Gantt Soloist For Boston Pops

BOSTON — Herman Gantt of Cambridge, grand winner of the Boston Post Musical Festival, last month, was guest soloist recently at the Boston Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gantt had been picked grand winner from a group of more than 1,500 singers and musicians from all over New England.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is directed by Arthur Fiedler. Later this summer Mr. Gantt will appear at the Chicago and Music Festival in Chicago.

Another winner of the Post Festival, 11-year-old Kenneth Scott of Dorchester, and nephew of Irving Ashby, formerly guitarist with King Cole, appeared recently on the Ted Mack TV program.

This Clipping From
Richmond Va
Afro-American
JUL 5 - 1952

Gantt Soloist For Boston Pops

BOSTON — Herman Gantt of Cambridge, grand winner of the Boston Post Musical Festival, last month, was guest soloist recently at the Boston Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gantt had been picked grand winner from a group of more than 1,500 singers and musicians from all over New England.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is directed by Arthur Fiedler. Later this summer Mr. Gantt will appear at the Chicago and Music Festival in Chicago.

Another winner of the Post Festival, 11-year-old Kenneth Scott of Dorchester, and nephew of Irving Ashby, formerly guitarist with King Cole, appeared recently on the Ted Mack TV program.

200

Words About Music Morning Telegraph

Boston 'Pops' Outfit To Take to the Road

June 19, 52

by Dan Richman

Arthur Fiedler and the great Boston Pops Orchestra will take to the road next January for their first national tour, which ought to be a matter for considerable rejoicing among music lovers who have never been given an opportunity to hear one of their favorite musical groups other than on the air or on records.

Although a number of symphonic aggregations hit the hinterland on annual or sporadic treks, the Boston Pops has seemingly been content until now to confine its "live" concert activities to the Hub exclusively.

For half a century this group—the original "Pops" orchestra in the U. S.—has played nightly every May and June in Boston's Symphony Hall. Years of broadcasting and recording a varied repertoire of light clasiscs, pops and some symphonic works under Fiedler's veteran baton have built it into one of the most outstanding and popular orchestras in the concert field today. Yet curiously enough, no attempt had ever been made to capitalize on its wide popularity and publicity via an in-person tour.

▼

Columbia Artists management, through its Judson, O'Neill and Judd division, has now come along, however, as the remedial agent for that situation. With the blessing of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which controls the destinies of the Pops contingent, the concert bureau has lined up an impressive and widespread string of dates that will pour better than a quarter-of-a-million dollars in guarantees into the coffers of the BSO.

The junket as scheduled now calls for some 65 appearances for the 70-piece group over a 10-week period from January 19 through March 28 of next year. The itinerary will cover New England, the Middle Atlantic and Southern states and as far west as Iowa and Wisconsin. In addition to playing regular concert halls, Fiedler and his musicians will set up their music racks in the auditoriums of a number of colleges and universities.

▼

What isn't generally known about the Boston Pops is the fact that for a long time it has been the biggest-selling orchestra on records, maintaining a sales average and achieving individual platter sales that top such major long-hair outfits as the Philadelphia and NBC orks, as well as its own parent, the Boston Symphony. A couple of basic statistics spectacularly illustrate the point.

Of RCA Victor's 101 best-sellers of all time—which include both classical and jazz discs—Fiedler's group heads the list with 16 titles, as against only three each for the NBC Symphony conducted by Arturo Toscanini and the Boston Orchestra under the wand of the late Serge Koussevitzky. To that distinction the Boston Pops last year added another when its pressing of "Jalousie" sold over a million copies—the first time in Victor history that an ork on the Red Seal label hit that mark.

▼

Along with the Boston Pops' decision to break out of its Beantown cocoon and let its devotees around the land have a long-awaited look at it, there's another interesting piece of news for long-hair discophiles in the upcoming release of what is alleged to be the most ambitious compendium of recordings ever compiled. Practically every new platter compendium is ballyhooed as the "most ambitious ever compiled," but this one really seems to have what it takes to live up to the description.

Titled "The World's Encyclopedia of Recorded Music," the new tome will shortly be made available to American disc buyers through the researching, publishing and financial beneficence of a quintet of gentlemen in not-so-jolly old England. Two British music scholars named Clough and Cuming spent upwards of 10 years doing research for the book, the London firm of Sedgwick and Jackson put it between covers, and publication costs were borne by E. R. "Ted" Lewis, president of Decca Records, Ltd. (U. S. Decca's English affiliate).

▼

The "Encyclopedia" is in catalog form covering some 900 pages and limited to classical recordings only. The Messrs. Clough and Cuming have purportedly researched their subject to the point of listing every longhair platter issued throughout the world since the beginning of the electrical method of disc manufacture up to May of last year. The volume contains in addition a large number of listings of outstanding early waxings that were recorded acoustically before the switch to "orthophonic" cutting.

The tome, which will be merchandised in this country through record stores and book shops, simply catalogs platter titles and artists without any editorial comment. Since the value of this type of reference work obviously lies in its all-inclusiveness, the compilers and publishers intend to issue a supplement to it each year. The initial retail price has been pegged at $17.50, a rather hefty bite for a straight catalog job, but the completeness claimed for it would seem to make it worth the money to serious students of discology.

THE BOSTON HERALD,

MUSIC

YMPHONY HALL

ops

At Symphony Hall last evening Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra in the following program:

dding March from "The Golden ockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff icture to Her Freischutz ..... Weber ee Movements from the "Classical ymphony" ..... Prokofieff
s from "Carmen" ..... Bizet ncata ..... Pecckoieff ncerto in E-flat for Piano and rchestra ..... Frescobaldi-Kindler
Soloist: Gerson Yessin
ale from the First Symphony ..... Liszt ection from "Kiss Me Kate" ..... Porter Polkas
ann Frei ("Fast Track" ..... Edward Strauss apfenwald'l ("In a Vienna Park" ..... Johann Strauss ndole from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet

By ELINOR HUGHES

he real news this morning is tainly the fact that the Boston mphony is back at Symphony l, fresh from the triumphal r of Europe—and I do mean. h—and that it's wonderful to e them around again. You'd k that after all that traveling strenuous schedule of concerts 'd seem tired or at least ed down, but from the cheer volume of noise they produced evening and the sheer exrance of their playing it aps that work agrees with them. haps they should go abroad y spring.

he program seemed particular yable, too, not just for the ormance but also for Arthur ler's selections. The piece de tance was the dashing Liszt certo in E-flat for Piano and estra, played with great e and color by that excellent ist, Gerson Yessin, rapidly understandably, becoming a favorite with Pops audiences. was topped off with a rous sometimes breathlessly fast ering of the beautiful finale Brahms C minor Symphony. evoked rapturous applause. riller in the evening Mr. Fiedave us a thoroughly agreereading of three movements Prokofieff's delightful little sical" Symphony—a musical which is not only clever but cally and charming to hear. it has fooled plenty of peonto thinking it was written ozart is no secret by now Frescobaldi-Kindler Toccata d good solid enjoyment, and est of the program, divided en Rimsky-Korsakov, Bizet Porter and Edward and n Strauss, afforded no cause omplaint. There were nus encores, of course.

May Add to Pops

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Saturday Night Waltz and Hoe om "Rodeo," Copland; Suite from Ballet Music, Gounod. Hungarian y No. 9, "Carnival at Pesth; oncerto in G minor for Piano and ra, Mendelssohn. (Soloist: Tung Kwong); "Finlandia," Sibelius. Happy Returns," arr. by Mason; ango, Anderson; "Knightsbridge" Coates.

day—New England Conservatory olcolm Holmes conducting: Telearch, Coates; First Movement, o in C Minor for Piano and Or Beethoven (Soloist: John Mon); "Salut demeure" from "Faust;" "Recondita armonia" from Puccini (Soloist: Frederick culty); Prelude to "The Masters of Nuremberg," Wagner New Conservatory Chorus, Lorna de Varon, conductor. Elizabeth accompanist; Selection from Madam," Berlin; Delicado, "Strike Up the Band," Gersh-

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Pops Great, But Audience Frigid

By PEGGY DOYLE

hing about last night's Pops program was the audience. y Orchestra players, presenting their first Boston Pops from their conquest of discriminating European sym-

Bizet's Farandole from "L'Arlesienne" were also heard.

Tonight is Tufts Night at Symphony Hall.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, S

Pops Program for Week

Nine Soloists Scheduled For SymphonyHall

Nine soloists will be featured at the Boston Pops concerts in Symphony Hall next week. The regular Pops Orchestra, back from Europe, will continue their nightly June performances, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, will present a variety of standard and popular classics on his programs.

On Monday evening Phil Saltman and George Wright Briggs will be the soloists in two duo-piano arrangements, made by Mr. Briggs, of a medley from Irving Berlin's "Call Me Madam" and the nursery tune, "Twinkle Twinkle Little Star."

Leo Litwin, on Tuesday, will perform two movements from Morton Gould's "Interplay" and the "Warsaw" Piano Concerto by Addinsell. Ruth Slencynski, who several years ago was a noted child pianist, will make her Pops debut on Wednesday evening in Liszt's "Todtentanz" for Piano and Orchestra.

On Thursday night Alfred Krips, concertmaster, will play the solo violin part in the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," and Roger Voisin will be the solo trumpeter in Sullivan's "The Lost Chord." Tung Kwong Kwong, a favorite at the Pops, will be the piano soloist Friday evening. Miss Tung will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor.

Saturday night—New England Conservatory Night—will feature Frederick Jagel as tenor soloist. He will sing arias from "Faust" and "Tosca." John Moriarty will be the soloist in the

By a Staff Photographer

Henry Gregorian, shown rehearsing the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto which he will play with the Boston Pops Sunday evening in Symphony Hall.

ng From
ON, D. C.
ERICAN
52

The Richmond Council of Mothers' Clubs, Inc., will observe Mother's Day Wednesday, May 14, with a luncheon at the Hotel Richmond. Mrs. Wives recently motored to Montague, Va., for the Founder's Day celebration of the E. C ist Pops

an Gantt of inner of the Festival, last ist recently Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gantt had been picked grand winner from a group of more than 1,500 singers and musicians from all over New England.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is directed by Arthur Fiedler. Later this summer Mr. Gantt will appear at the Chicago and Music Festival in Chicago.

Another winner of the Post Festival, 11-year-old Kenneth Scott of Dorchester, and nephew of Irving Ashby, formerly guitarist with King Cole, appeared recently on the Ted Mack TV program.

Next Week

Six soloists and two guest conductors will appear on the programs for the Boston Pops that Arthur Fiedler has announced for next week in Symphony Hall.

Hermann Gantt, bass-baritone and holder of a Marian Anderson award, will be heard Sunday night in "Il lacerato spirito" from Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra." Sharing the honors in this program with Mr. Gantt will be Leo Litwin, who will again be heard in Gershwin's perennial favorite, the "Rhapsody in Blue."

Mr. Litwin will also play the Gershwin Rhapsody on Friday evening, and on Saturday he will be heard in two movements from Gould's "Interplay" and in Addinsell's "Warsaw" Concerto.

On Wednesday evening Mildred Dilling will perform the Liszt E-flat Piano Concerto, Jan Peerce, Metropolitan Opera tenor, and Gerson Yessin, pianist, will be the featured soloists for Israel Histadrut Night on Thursday. Mr. Yessin will play the Liszt Concerto in E-flat; Mr. Peerce will sing arias by Halevy, Donizetti, and songs by Milner and Chagis.

Paul Cherkassky will be the guest conductor Tuesday evening; Harry Ellis Dickson on Sunday, June 22.

The programs

This Clipping From
Philadelphia, Pa.
Evening American

JUL 5 - 1952

Gantt Soloist For Boston Pops

BOSTON — Herman Gantt of Cambridge, grand winner of the Boston Post Musical Festival, last month, was guest soloist recently at the Boston Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gantt had been picked grand winner from a group of more than 1,500 singers and musicians from all over New England.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is directed by Arthur Fiedler. Later this summer Mr. Gantt will appear at the Chicago and Music Festival in Chicago.

Another winner of the Post Festival, 11-year-old Kenneth Scott of Dorchester, and nephew of Irving Ashby, formerly guitarist with King Cole, appeared recently on the Ted Mack TV program.

200

Words About Music Morning Telegraph June 1952

Boston 'Pops' Outfit To Take to the Road

by Dan Richman

Arthur Fiedler and the great, jolly old England. Two British Boston Pops Orchestra will take to the road next January for their first national tour, which ought to be a matter for considerable rejoicing among music lovers who have never been given an opportunity to hear one of their favorite musical groups other than on the air or on records.

Although a number of symphonic aggregations hit the hinterland on annual or sporadic treks, the Boston Pops has seemingly been content until now to confine its "live" concert activities to the Hub exclusively.

For half a century this group—the original "Pops" orchestra in the U. S.—has played nightly every May and June in Boston's Symphony Hall. Years of broadcasting and recording a varied repertoire of light clasiscs, pops and some symphonic works under Fiedler's veteran baton have built it into one of the most outstanding and popular orchestras in the concert field today. Yet curiously enough, no attempt had ever been made to capitalize on its wide popularity and publicity via an in-person tour.

▼

Columbia Artists management, through its Judson, O'Neill and Judd division, has now come along, however, as the remedial agent for that situation. With the blessing of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which controls the destinies of the Pops contingent, the concert bureau has lined up an impressive and widespread string of dates that will pour better than a quarter-of-a-million dollars in guarantees into the coffers of the BSO.

The junket as scheduled now calls for some 65 appearances for the 70-piece group over a 10-week period from January 19 through March 28 of next year. The itinerary will cover New England, the Middle Atlantic and Southern states and as far west as Iowa and Wisconsin. In addition to playing regular concert halls, Fiedler and his musicians will set up their music racks in the auditoriums of a number of colleges and universities.

▼

What isn't generally known about the Boston Pops is the fact that for a long time it has been the biggest-selling orchestra on records, maintaining a sales average and achieving individual platter sales that top such major long-hair outfits as the Philadelphia and NBC orks, as well as its own parent, the Boston Symphony. A couple of basic statistics spectacularly illustrate the point.

Of RCA Victor's 101 best-sellers of all time—which include both classical and jazz discs—Fiedler's group heads the list with 16 titles, as against only three each for the NBC Symphony conducted by Arturo Toscanini and the Boston Orchestra under the wand of the late Serge Koussevitzky. To that distinction the Boston Pops last year added another when its pressing of "Jalousie" sold over a million copies—the first time in Victor history that an ork on the Red Seal label hit that mark.

▼

Along with the Boston Pops' decision to break out of its Beantown cocoon and let its devotees around the land have a long-awaited look at it, there's another interesting piece of news for long-hair discophiles in the upcoming release of what is alleged to be the most ambitious compendium of recordings ever compiled. Practically every new platter compendium is ballyhooed as the "most ambitious ever compiled," but this one really seems to have what it takes to live up to the description.

Titled "The World's Encyclopedia of Recorded Music," the new tome will shortly be made available to American disc buyers through the researching, publishing and financial beneficence of a quintet of gentlemen in not-so-

The 'encyclopedia' is in catalog form covering some 900 pages and limited to classical recordings only. The Messrs. Clough and Cuming have purportedly researched their subject to the point of listing every longhair platter issued throughout the world since the beginning of the electrical method of disc manufacture up to May of last year. The volume contains in addition a large number of listings of outstanding early waxings that were recorded acoustically before the switch to "orthophonic" cutting.

The tome, which will be merchandised in this country through record stores and book shops, simply catalogs platter titles and artists without any editorial comment. Since the value of this type of reference work obviously lies in its all-inclusiveness, the compilers and publishers intend to issue a supplement to it each year. The initial retail price has been pegged at $17.50, a rather hefty bite for a straight catalog job, but the completeness claimed for it would seem to make it worth the money to serious students of discology.

VISITORS AND LOCALS IN LONDON

By STEPHEN WILLIAMS

LONDON.

TO live seventy-one years without coming to Europe, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done, could be taken either as a compliment to Europe or as an affront. We in Europe prefer to take it as a compliment. We like to imagine the Boston players whispering together in awe-stricken tones "What, Europe? London, Paris and all that? Oh, no, boys; we must practice for a few more years before we rush in where so many angels have feared to tread!"

Well, last month they rushed in, and finished their tour with a triumphant concert in the Royal Festival Hall, London, under the dynamic, sometimes despotic beat of their conductor, Charles Munch. On the whole we felt that their playing was worth waiting seventy-one years for, and we hope it will not be another seventy-one years before we hear them again. Said the critic of The London Times: "The tonal quality of the orchestra comes somewhere between the suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the New York orchestra, which are the two that have paid recent visits to Britain."

Our one regret was that this eloquent orchestra was giving only one concert in London and that we could not hear it in more broadly representative works. These would have enabled us, in the friendliest possible spirit, to compare it with our own. Comparisons may be "odorous," as honest Dogberry remarked, but they are a convenient way of assessing values.

Impressive

One of the most impressive certs of the past mon conducted in the Ro
Malcolm Sargent
chief works w ten's "Spri gar's F
agg
B
d cl
M at
d

fill their houses and so charge of wasting t money. To this safe" (or at le
ly) by harn
the old
"Trov
a tou

ho al wo te a su of pi
th wo
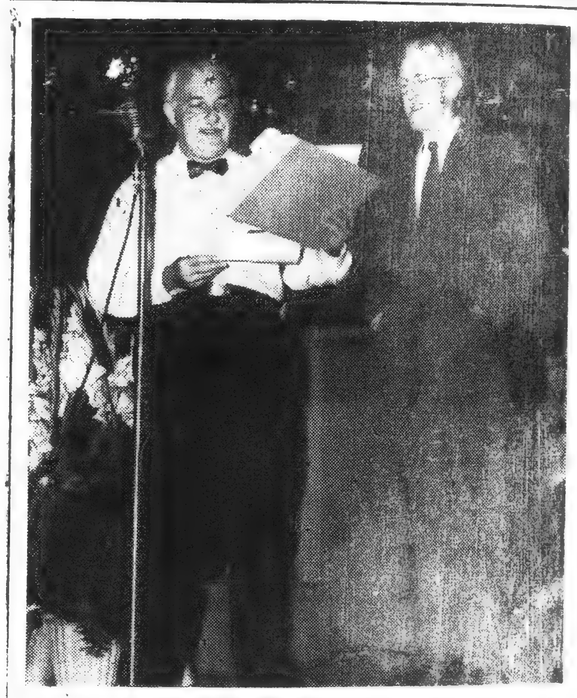
pa
E
se

AN EVENING AT THE BOSTON "POPS"

Arthur Fiedler conducts the informal spring season at Symphony Hall, Boston, which ends next Sunday. The New York Times

POPS



GLOBE EDITOR-COMPOSER HONORED—Lucien H. Thayer (right), assistant managing editor, stands on platform with Conductor Arthur Fiedler after the Pops Orchestra played his composition, "Saratoga" at last night's concert.

Thayer's Horse Across the Board

Globe Editor's Racy 'Saratoga' Given Big Hand at Pops Debut

By CYRUS DURGIN

There was a successful first performance at the Pops in Symphony Hall last night. It came toward the end of the program, and although the whole concert was enjoyable, what this chronicler was really waiting for was the premiere of "Saratoga," by his good friend and the Globe's assistant managing editor, Lucien H. Thayer.

Mr. Thayer is a man who has enjoyed music all his life, and you could tell that from the lively, rhythmic and tuneful character of "Saratoga." The piece depicts some of the sights and sounds of a race track; it was easy to imagine the enthusiasm of the crowd, the gayety that always hangs over a track (at least before the race) and the tense expectancy of the people gathered to watch the horses run.

This is a pleasing and nicely-made piece of light music, full of tunes and spirited rhythms, set in march tempo and skillfully written for orchestra. For Mr. Thayer not only composed "Saratoga" but arranged it for large orchestra, as well. Hearing it you could not fail to get the race track atmosphere. But since music does not convey exact ideas, there were three things which "Saratoga" did not tell me: what horse Mr. Thayer bet on, and how much, and if it won, placed or showed. (I'll ask him after working hours one of these days.)

"Saratoga" got a big hand from the audience and from conductor Arthur Fiedler [illegible] Pops Orchestra [illegible] tured toward the c [illegible] ing him to come o [illegible] Mr. Thayer appeared, [illegible] gave him a pleasant su[illegible] presenting a citation of m[illegible] a composition "composed and [illegible] chestrated by a [illegible] than a music critic," and [illegible] Mr. Fiedler.

In expressing his [illegible] Mr. Thayer humorously re[illegible] favorite saying of the late Geo[illegible] Charles H. Taylor, [illegible] Globe, 'not an ounce [illegible] you are alive is worth a [illegible] epitaphy after you are [illegible] sod."

The evening [illegible] Saens' "French [illegible] included a cap[illegible] bel di" from [illegible] by soprano [illegible] rane, and o[illegible] win's usual [illegible] the Gersh[illegible] But this t[illegible] there was a divi[illegible] cadenza or two in [illegible] lar piece.

Another highlight [illegible] —which drew a near [illegible] ence in spite of [illegible] Johnnie Ray's "Cry" song. He ought to hear this arrangement, by Beckwith if I read the encore card correctly, for it is a swell parody, with a phrase from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, a touch of a funeral march and even a dash of Spike Jones. After that, I'll never cry again.

There's No Secret to Recipe Of Celebrated Pops Punch

Off the Beaten Path

By Don Messenger

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

In all the quarter century that Bert Martin has been mixing the traditional Pops fruit punch at Symphony Hall, it has never been more popular than it is now. It's not unusual for 200 or more pitchers of this fresh, cool, non-alcoholic beverage to be served during a single Pops concert. And he is always ready to mix up another five or 10-gallon batch at a moment's notice.

There's no secret about the formula, says Mr. Martin. Among the ingredients are such things as five-fruit sirup, fresh mint, plenty of lemon and sugar. Probably, he thinks, it's the atmosphere in which it is served that seems to make the taste so distinctive.

Mr. Martin's arrival at Symphony Hall marked a turning point in the history of its decoration for the Pops seasons. Up to that time the old square tables had been of somber hues. Mr. Martin applied the touch of spring—with a spray gun.

Employed at that time in the De Havilland Moth airplane plant in Lowell, he had been spray-painting, among other things. He took this extra job of coating the Pops tables with bright green.

He had served overseas in World War I and, one way and another, he had acquired a number of different skills. "We could use a man like you all the time," said the Symphony Hall management. And he has been there ever since, doing all sorts of useful things, from this Pops season punch mixing, to wrestling with baggage problems when the orchestra is on tour.

[227]

and Esplanade

Lenscraft

Arthur Fiedler will bring the Symphony Hall Pops to a close this evening and will launch the twenty-fourth season of the Esplanade Concerts Sunday night.

THE POPS

THIS EVENING

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Air.....Bach-Wilhelmj
Suite from "Swan Lake".....Tchaikovsky
Peer Gynt Suite.....Grieg
"Tales from Vienna Woods".....Strauss
"Finlandia," Tone Poem.....Sibelius
Selection from "South Pacific".....Rodgers
Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicato..Anderson
"Washington Post" March.....Sousa

* * *

TOMORROW EVENING

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Polka.....Shostakovitch
Sixth Rhapsody.....Liszt
Three Dances.....de Falla
Concerto No. 2.....Rachmaninoff
Slaughter on Tenth Avenue.....Rodgers
Delicado.....Azevedo
Procession of the Sardar..Ippolitov-Ivanov

* * *

TUESDAY

Polonaise.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Barcarole.....Menotti
Suite from "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky
"Emek".....Lavry
Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini.....Rachmaninoff
"Many Happy Returns".....Mason
Francesca.....Feller
American Salute.....Gould

* * *

WEDNESDAY

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"
Overture to "Oberon".....Wagner
Toccata.....Weber
Dance of the Hours.....Frescobaldi-Kindler
Ballet Egyptien.....Ponchielli
Je Suis Titania.....Luigini
"Les Preludes".....Thomas
"Aida" Fantasy.....Liszt
Francesca.....Verdi
"El Capitan" March.....Feller

* * *

THURSDAY

French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "La Belle Helene".....Offenbach
Jewel Song from "Faust".....Gounod
Soloist: Virginia Sellars Cochrane
"Masquerade".....Khatchaturian
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
"Many Happy Returns".....Mason
Delicado.....Azevedo
"Washington Post".....Sousa

* * *

FRIDAY

"Second Connecticut".....Reeves
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
a. To a Wild Rose.....MacDowell
b. To a Water Lily.....MacDowell
"Many Happy Returns".....Mason
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
O, Promise Me.....de Koven
Song Fest Medley.....Bodge
Victor Herbert Favorites.....Sanford
Waltzes from "The Merry Widow".....Lehar
Old Timers' Night at the Pops.....Lake

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING

"Gypsy Baron" March.....Strauss
Suite from "The Water Music".....Handel-Harty
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Pineapple Poll".....Sullivan-Mackerras
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
First Movement, Concerto No. 1.....Tchaikovsky
"Many Happy Returns".....Mason
Cry.....Arranged by Bodge
Prayer of Thanksgiving.....Valerio

Fiedler Opens Season Sunday At Hatch Shell

The last Pops concert of the season will take place tonight under Arthur Fiedler's direction in Symphony Hall. Tomorrow night Mr. Fiedler will take his orchestra to the Hatch Memorial Shell for the first program in a three-week series of free concerts on the Esplanade. These concerts will be held nightly (excepting Mondays) at 8:30. Three children's concerts will take place on Wednesday mornings at 10:15 on July 2, 9, and 16.

The Esplanade Concerts are supported by public contributions. Such contributions may be left at any of the program-distribution booths on the Esplanade or mailed to the Esplanade Concerts Fund, Merchants National Bank, 513 Boylston Street.

The programs for the week follow:

Awe-Inspiring Event at Pops Concert

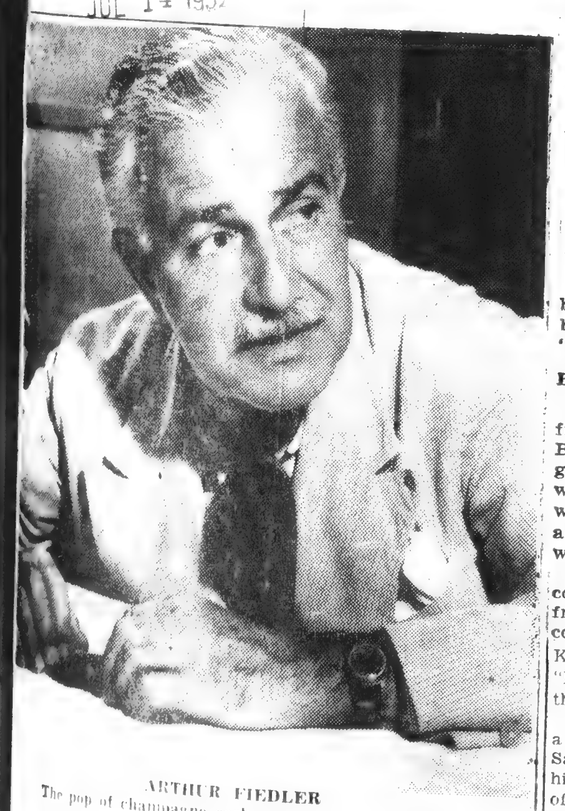
To the Editor—I attended the closing night of the Boston Pops, and I feel that I must write just a short note of tribute to the "proper Bostonian."

During the playing of the Schubert-Wilhelm "Ave Maria," one could hear a pin drop because of the hush that came over the audience. To me this presented a very awe-inspiring feeling which was not only noticed by myself, but also by the group with whom I was.

A thing like this ought not to go unnoticed.

JAMES H. SULLIVAN.
Rockland, Mass.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
JUL 14 1952



ARTHUR FIEDLER
The pop of champagne corks punctuates his music
Sentinel Photo.

Fans Eat Up Cultured Corn That Fiedler Dishes Out

BY ED SACHS

Arthur Fiedler, a symphony conductor who has made a specialty of playing music you can whistle, is a natty little fellow from Boston who is not at all defensive about his preoccupation with cultured corn.

The role of the Boston Pops orchestra was to bridge the gap between boogie-woogie and high-brow music," he said of the organization he has conducted for over 20 years, "and I think we have."

APPEARS TUESDAY

Fiedler was in Milwaukee Sunday rehearsing for his conducting appearance here Tuesday night in the second of the Music Under The Stars concerts at the Blatz Temple of Music.

"Many people who never thought seriously of music are now attending concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he pointed out, "because they became interested in music after a Pops concert."

Fiedler uses atmosphere in bringing about the evolution of a brow from "no" to "low" to "high."

BECOMES BEER GARDEN

The night of a Pops concert finds somber Symphony Hall in Boston transformed into a beer garden. Menus and wine lists go with the programs and trim little waitresses thread their way among the tables serving beer, wine, soft drinks and snacks.

In fact, the name Pops does not come from popular music but from the sound of champagne corks punctuating "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen," "Hora Staccato," or "Pop Goes the Weasel," typical Fiedler fare.

When he was asked to arrange a similar type of program for San Francisco, Fiedler showed himself a judge of another kind of taste.

DIFFERENT THERE

"They asked me if I thought it would be all right to serve hard liquor," he recalls. "We don't in Boston, but I told them it was all right for San Francisco. They do like their hard liquor out there."

Fiedler is proud of his formula of a mass music for the masses and frequently mentions that while night clubs in Boston have been going out of business, the Pops concerts continued to be sellouts.

"I think one proof of our success is the fact that our record (victor of "Jalousie" has sold a million copies, a record for anything but a popular dance band," he said.

Jagel Heard at the Pops

By Jules Wolffers

Both students and faculty were well represented in Symphony Hall Saturday night at the New England Conservatory of Music's annual Pops evening.

With Malcolm Holmes on the podium, the orchestra's opening "Television March" by Coates settled the capacity audience comfortably for the appearance of the first soloist. John Moriarty, of this year's graduating class, turned in a capable performance of the first movement from the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3. Aided by a sympathetic accompaniment, the young pianist showed considerable dash and poise together with a commendable command of the instrument.

The high spot of the evening undoubtedly was the appearance of Frederick Jagel. The tenor was in excellent voice and showed rare artistic form in "Salut demeure" from Gounod's "Faust," and "Recondita armonia" from Puccini's "Tosca."

More inportant than Mr. Jagel's knowledgeable way with the two arias was the near-perfect sense of communication he established. His rapport with the music and with his hearers was complete, and the resulting tumultuous ovation was only to be expected from an audience made up so largely of musicians. One has not heard Mr. Jagel to better advantage in recent years.

For a change of timbre, Lorna Cooke deVaron gave skillful direction to the Conservatory Chorus in a well-chosen group devoted mainly to folk song. The Aaron Copland adaption of "Boatman's Dance" and "Long Time Ago," as arranged for chorus by Irving Fine, held its own with four Slovak examples by Béla Bártok. Two selections from Britten's "Five Flower Songs" seemed over-fussy in contrast, but the entire group was sung with precision and clarity.

To end the evening with jollity and mirth came selections from Berlin's "Call Me Madam," "Delicado" by Azevedo, and the ever-popular "Strike Up the Band" by Gershwin.

SYMPHONY HALL CO 6-1492
CLOSING WEEK
TONIGHT AT 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR
Tickets .50, $1, $1.50, $2.50

Esplanade Concerts Begin Tonight.

ARTHUR FIEDLER will conduct the opening concert of the 24th season of free, open-air Esplanade Concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade, tonight at 8:30. Mr. Fiedler founded the concerts in 1929.

Fiedler Opens, but Rain Halts First Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Up to 8:45 last night, it seemed that Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of Boston Symphony men might just squeeze by with the first Esplanade concert of the season before it began to rain again.

A crowd estimated at more than 2000 persons had gathered well before 8:30 on the lawn before the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade at the foot of Mt. Vernon st.

The weather was threatening, even though the beacon on the Hancock tower was confidently blinking the blue that predicts no worse than cloudiness.

The city was lighting up, and the reflection of thousands of red neon signs on the low-hanging clouds, gave a comforting illusion of sunset.

Fiedler, in light slacks and shirtsleeves, and his musicians clad in white flannels and blue jackets, were cordially welcome. The program got under way with Wagner's Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg, from "Tannhaeuser," and progressed into Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

But at 8:50 the wind swept in from the northeast, bringing a mist with it. By the time the last chord of the slow movement of the Symphony had echoed off the buildings toward Beacon st., the violinists in the front row were getting wet. Some few minutes before, the drizzle had caused some in the audience to depart, while hardier souls had broken out raincoats and umbrellas.

"We'll make the intermission now," said Fiedler over the public address system, "and perhaps the weather will improve in a few minutes."

Unfortunately it didn't, and the conductor was forced to cancel the remainder of the concert.

"I hate to call it off," said Fiedler backstage, "but there's no point going on in the rain. We did our best."

His decision was wise because, in addition to the discomfort of an audience listening even to the Boston Symphony in rain, the wet could have damaged some of the instruments. Fiedler moreover promised to complete the Beethoven Fifth Symphony at Tuesday night's concert.

So while the 24th season of Esplanade concerts may be said to have opened officially, this was one of the shortest concerts on record. This year the series, which Fiedler founded in 1929, will run three weeks, omitting Monday nights, and with three Wednesday morning programs for children.

The policy this season is that which has prevailed for 23 years: The concerts are free to all-comers. But they depend upon public support, and all contributions will be welcomed. "Be an Esplanaider" is the slogan. You can send your donation to the Esplanade Concerts Fund, Merchants' National Bank, Copley sq.

MONDAY, JUNE 30, 19[illegible]

Rain Halts First Concert On Esplanade

(Picture on Page Twenty)

A persistent drizzle last night washed out the opening of the 24th season of Esplanade concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell, after a selection from Wagner's "Tannhauser" and half of Beethoven's famous Fifth Symphony had been completed.

Maestro Arthur Fiedler called off the performance when the wind-blown rain drifted into the shell and endangered the musicians' instruments.

Fiedler announced that at the performance tomorrow night, the program would be altered to include the entire rendition of Beethoven's Fifth.

Nearly 7000 gathered between the Charles River and the new Storrow Drive, many sitting on raincoats and blankets, others standing or sitting in rented chairs.

As in years past, the concerts will be held six nights a week (omitting Mondays), and on three Wednesday mornings at 10:15 for children. Evening performances start at 8:30. The concerts will continue through Saturday, July 19.

Fiedler Begins 24th Season of Esplanade Concerts Tonight

Tonight at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler opens the 24th consecutive season of Esplanade Concerts, at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Embankment road, near the foot of Mt. Vernon st.

A large orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians will play six nights a week (omitting Mondays), and on three Wednesday mornings at 10:15 for young people. The concerts will continue through Saturday, July 19. As has been the rule from the first season, there is no admission charge. But to maintain this plan, the public is asked to "chip in" to the Esplanade Concerts Fund through the Merchants National Bank at Copley sq., which annually serves as voluntary depositary. "Be an Esplanaider" is the slogan of the fund.

Programs of the week:

Tonight, Entrance of the Guests into the Warburg (from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner); Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven; The Star Spangled Banner; "Espana" Rhapsody, Chabrier; Selections from "The King and I," Rodgers; Pizzicato, Azevedo; March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Tuesday, Hungarian March, Berlioz; Symphony No. 4, in A major, No. "Italian," Op. 90, Mendelssohn; First Movement, Concerto No. [illegible] B minor, for piano, [illegible] Tchaikovsky, soloist; Selections from "Apple Poll," Sullivan; Fantasie from "Ivan Mackeri; Fantasie from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet.

Wednesday at 10:15 a.m., Children's Concert: [illegible] "Aida," Verdi; [illegible] major, "The [illegible] Movement, from [illegible] piano, Beethoven; [illegible] minor, Bach; [illegible] from the Concerto [illegible] and Orchestra, [illegible] Luetkee; Dance of the [illegible] Saluting Home, Grieg; [illegible] Meacham.

Wednesday at 8:30 p.m., [illegible] Military Symphony [illegible] finished, No. 8, Schubert; [illegible] "Finlandia," Sibelius; [illegible] minor for Piano and Orchestra, No. [illegible] Mendelssohn, soloist; [illegible] Blue Tango, Anderson; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Thursday, Paul Cha[illegible] conducting: Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," Smetana; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; "Espana," Waldteufel; Dance of the Buffoons, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Friday, Paul Ch[illegible] conducting: National Fanfare, [illegible] Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Overture, Fantasia, [illegible] Tchaikovsky; Selections [illegible] "Voices of Spring," [illegible] March, "The [illegible] Sousa.

Saturday, [illegible] conducting: Prelude, [illegible] Symphony No. [illegible] Mozart; Vocal [illegible] Brahms; No. [illegible] from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; [illegible] Waltzes, Strauss; "Up the Street," Morse.

RAIN RUINS CONCERT AT ESPLANADE

Boston Post 6/30/32

Music Lovers Hear Part of Fifth Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The 5000 or so people who braved the threat of rain to attend last evening's opening Esplanade Concert, were rewarded by the March from "Tannhaeuser" and the first two movements of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The raindrops began to arrive not long after

Continued on Page 8—Third Col.

[225]

Four Soloists Scheduled For The Esplanade

Four soloists and two guest conductors have been announced by Arthur Fiedler for the Esplanade Concerts next week. The concerts will continue nightly, excepting Mondays, for two more weeks at the Hatch Memorial Shell. Special concerts for children will be held Wednesday mornings, July 9 and 16, at 10:15.

On Tuesday evening Paul Knudson will be the piano soloist in Mozart's Concerto No. 15 in B-flat. Ten-year-old Sandra McEntaffer will be heard at the Children's Concert Wednesday morning in the first movement of Mozart's Concerto in A major (K 488) for Piano and Orchestra. On this same program Norman Shirk will be the narrator for Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale.

On Wednesday evening the violin soloist will be George Zazofsky in the Brahms Concerto in D major. Bernard Kritzman, who played the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 last week at the Pops, will play its second and third movements Thursday evening.

ESPLANADE CONCERTS

This is the 24th. season of the Esplanade concerts and the enthusiasm for this gay music continues as great as ever. Anyone who has taken in the concerts—and the number now extends well into the millions—comes away with a deeper appreciation of fine music. There is always lavish praise for the excellence of the Boston Symphony musicians and conductor Arthur Fiedler. Our summer nights are made more interesting and brighter during the all-too-brief time the concerts are given. The splendid setting adds greatly to the charm of it all and the fact that great throngs are attracted to enjoy the outdoor music proves a matter of satisfaction. Radio, television, and other forms of entertainment all have their place in modern living, but nothing offers interference with the Esplanade concerts. Boston, without these summer concerts, would seem drab to those who find a genuine thrill and unparalleled pleasure in the city's musical nights.

On the Esplanade

The incomparable Esplanade Concerts are drawing thousands of persons to the banks of the Charles River these warm summer nights. Nowhere else in the world is there anything quite like this.

They began on the night of July 4, back in 1929, entirely through the initiative and imagination of Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler, then a young violinist with the Boston Symphony, was convinced that the public would respond to open-air concerts by a symphonic ensemble. He scarcely dreamed of the astounding reception that has developed through the years.

These nights, the young and the old, the rich and the poor, sit side by side on the soft grass and thrill to the music of the masters — from Gershwin to Grieg, from Kern to deKoven.

This is Boston's own, and the best of its kind in the world. It deserves the warm support of the public in every way possible.

(Herald Staff Photo by Carleton Patriquin)

BEFORE THE RAINS CAME and washed out the opening of the Esplanade Concerts at Hatch Memorial Shell last night, avid first nighters lisented raptly to music by Wagner and Beethoven.

[226]

BOSTON POST, MO

Music Lovers Hear First of Symphony

DAMP BUT UNDAUNTED

It took more than rain to discourage these Carney Hospital nurses, who sat it out during the showers that caused an intermission in the Esplanade concert. Left to right: Kay Burke, Dorchester; Agnes Keady, South Boston; Mary Beatty, Dorchester, and Rita Wailknas, South Boston.

Continued From First Page

the symphony began, and they came in increasing quantities.

WAIT 10 MINUTES

The violinists, first and second, got the benefit of them and they were the ones who could stand them least. They tried to move their chairs in far enough to escape the damage and, when the Symphony had reached the half-way mark, they and Mr. Fiedler held a consultation of war. After discussing matters with his men, the conductor announced that there would be a 10-minute intermission to give the rain a chance to quit.

Many Remained

The withdrawals began almost as soon as the symphony did, yet, though the rain was coming down hard, there were many who remained in their seats after the orchestra had retired. Around 9 o'clock, or a half an hour after the concert started, it became apparent that clear weather was out of the question, and Laning Humphrey, as spokesman for the orchestra, announced that the concert was off. He went on to say that since there are no concerts on Monday evening, there was a good chance that by Tuesday the weather would definitely improve. Moreover, in order to accommodate those who felt that they had been cheated out of part of Beethoven's masterpiece, the remainder of the symphony would be played on Tuesday evening and the program altered to make room for them. What part of the announced program for Tuesday would be deleted was not clear, but Mr. Fiedler may be trusted to arrive at a satisfactory solution.

The season that began so inauspiciously is the 24th of these famous concerts. That the weatherman would be so inconsiderate as to misbehave in similar fashion on the 25th is surely out of the question, so, better luck next year.

Through July 19

This series of concerts, by the way, continues through July 19. After that all of the Symphony men must move on to Tanglewood to join those members of the orchestra that are already installed there for the preliminary Berkshire Festival concerts, under Charles Munch's direction, in the small hall. The first of these three Saturday-Sunday pairs will fall on July 5 and 6 and the festival-proper opens on July 24.

Esplanade Programs

The Esplanade Concerts start their second week tonight at 8:30 in the Hatch Shell at the foot of Mt. Vernon street. G. Wallace Woodworth conducts this evening, Harry Ellis Dickson on Thursday and Arthur Fieldler the remaining concerts. A special children's concert takes place Wednesday morning at 10:15.

On the Esplanade

Arthur Fiedler will conduct tonight's Esplanade Concert at the Hatch Memorial Shell, starting at 8:30. The program is as follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" — Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67 — Beethoven
First Movement from the Concerto No. 15 in B-flat for Piano and Orchestra — Mozart Soloist: PAUL KNUDSON
"Espana" Rhapsody — Chabrier
Delicado — Azevedo
"The Stars and Stripes Forever" March — Sousa

Pre-Europ-
Pops
Pops
Europe

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
JUL 6 - 1952

THE ESPLANADE CONCERTS

Boston's Musical Democracy

NOWHERE else in the wide world can a person do what the 20,000 people in the picture above are doing. For one thing, the orchestra they're listening to is the only one of its class in existence. Second, it's all on the house—absolutely free. Third, it happens every night for a month, and everybody is welcome.

Boston's Esplanade Concerts, which have just begun their twenty-fourth season under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, are the envy and despair of other cities. Each summer a quarter of a million people, young and old, sit under the stars to hear the works of the masters, judiciously interspersed with lighter compositions and sometimes even (s-h-h) what practically amounts to be-bop.

To duplicate the Esplanade Concerts elsewhere the sponsors must have (1) a natural setting by a beautiful river basin which can easily accommodate 25 to 30 thousand persons; (2) $250,000 with which to build a shell like the Hatch Memorial. These they might arrange. But there is a third consideration: there must also be at hand a second Boston Symphony Orchestra from which to recruit the players.

This is going to be tough; there IS no second Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the finest in the world, bar none and no takers, as foreign critics admitted, with reluctance on the occasion of its just-concluded tour of foreign shores.

However, Boston does have it; and so we have the Esplanade orchestra, recruited from the parent symphony.

Esplanade concerts differ in many ways from the ordinary out-of-door performance. There are no enclosures, gates or ticket windows. When you step from the sidewalk onto a vast lawn facing the stage you are in what might pass for an auditorium.

You can settle yourself on the grass, stand on the outskirts, or bring your own blanket or cushion. For a dime you can hire a chair, but you won't find it pre-arranged. Grab one from the pile and put it in any unoccupied spot you fancy.

One thing—all the tea in China can't buy you a reserved seat. But if you feel like it—and the sponsors hope you will—you can drop a contribution of any size you fancy into a handy depository.

These contributions, together with sizable donations from public spirited citizens, keep the Esplanade concerts going, and have kept them thus since 1929 when Fiedler, as a young violinist in the Symphony Orchestra, initiated by experimental" series, paid for by a small group of citizens.

With the depression, these backers felt forced to withdraw their support, and Fiedler decided to appeal to the general public support. For 24 years in succession, small contributions from thousands of music lovers have kept the Esplanade concerts going.

Progress has been steady. For five years the musicians played in a wooden shell erected by the MDC. In 1934 a second was constructed, this time of steel plates. In 1940 the present granite Hatch Memorial Shell was dedicated. It is a sumptuous affair, with the most modern lighting equipment and dressing rooms.

Character of the concerts has changed steadily as the musical taste of the public has been educated. Fiedler introduced the orchestral repertoire by easy stages. When symphonies appeared, one or two movements only were played in a single evening. In his seventh season he tested the orchestral taste of his audiences with all nine of the Beethoven symphonies. They were received with enthusiasm.

Similar progress has been made through the years, and today most of the symphonic repertory is familiar and received with appreciation.

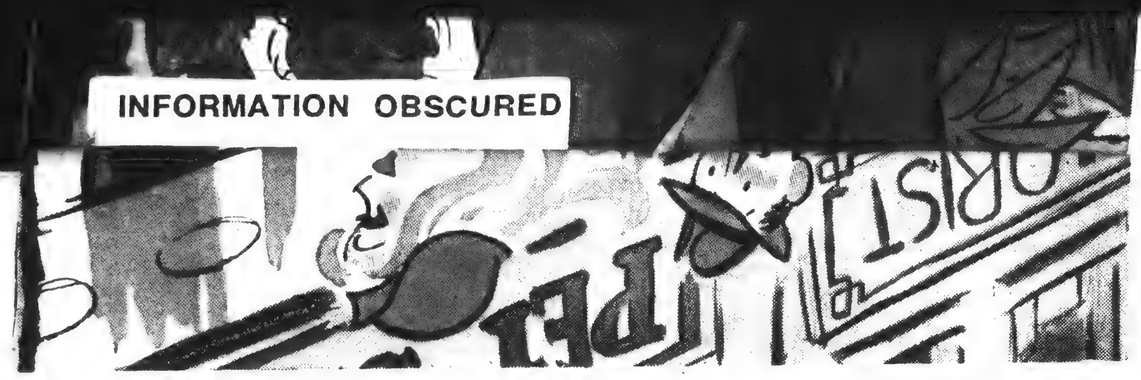
Since 1938 there have been special concerts for children on Wednesday mornings, attended by many thousands weekly.

WHEN concerts first began, in 1929, the 45 musicians played from this shell, erected of wood at small expense by the Metropolitan District Commission. It served purpose then.

IN 1934 a larger orchestra demanded a larger shell. This one was made of welded steel plates, was a great improvement acoustically.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the Esplanade concerts and of the Boston Pops), who has seen his idea of 1929 bloom into one of the finest civic activities in all of America.

[227]



FUSSY customer in a local restaurant asked the waitress if the beverage he had been served was tea or coffee and added: "It tastes like kerosene."

"Well," she replied, "it it tastes like kerosene, it is positively tea. Our coffee tastes like turpentine."

Sletson U. Reporter

Mrs. Counterfeiter: "Darling, I'm so proud of Junior, he's following in your footsteps. He printed a boxtop today that would have fooled a T-man."

Coed

"Now," said the architect, "if you will just give me some idea of the kind of house you want."

"That's easy," replied the prospective home owner, "we want something to go with this antique door knocker my wife bought in Mexico City last Winter."

Air University Dispatch

He: "Let's get married, darling. Two can live as cheaply as one."

She: "Nothing doing—it's worth the difference to me to stay single."

A goof was zipping around town at high speed when a policeman yelled at him to stop. Instead of stopping, the goof pushed the gas pedal to the floor and took off. When the officer finally caught up with him, he roared, "Why didn't you stop when I yelled at you?"

Replied the goof, "Oh, was that you? I thought it was somebody I ran over."

Voo Doo

"Do you know Art?"

"Art who?"

"Artesian."

"Oh, yes, I know artesian well."

Lone Star Scanner

"Oops! I didn't know it was loaded!"

THE CONCERTS

The Esplanade concerts will be launched on their 24th season by Arthur Fiedler next Sunday evening, June 29, at 8:30, at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Enbankment rd., at the foot of Mt. Vernon st.

The concerts will continue nightly, omitting Monday's, through July 19. Concerts for children will be given Wednesday mornings at 10:15, July 2, 9, and 16.

As before, the maintenance of these immensely popular concerts, free of admission charge, depends on the public's contribution to the Esplanade Concert's Fund, for which the Merchants National Bank at Copley sq. serves annually as voluntary depositary. Contributions may be mailed or brought in personally to that office.

ON THE ESPLANADE

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Esplanade Orchestra in the following program at 8:30 P. M. in the Hatch Shell at the foot of Mt. Vernon street:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Symphony in A Major No. 4, Op. 90, "Italian".....Mendelssohn
First Movement Concerto, No. 1 for Piano and Orchestra.....Tchaikovsky
"Pineapple Poll," Suite from the ballet.....Sullivan-Mackerras
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet

[illegible] season of Esplanade Concerts will play six nights a week (omitting Mondays), and on three Wednesday morning at 10:15 for young people. The concerts will continue through Saturday, July 19.

at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Embankment Road at the foot of Mount Vernon Street.

There is no admission charge, but to maintain this plan, the public is asked to "chip in" to the Esplanade Concerts Fund through the Merchants National Bank at Copley Sq., which annually serves as volutary depositary. "Be an Esplanaider' 'is the slogan of the Fund.

The opening program is as follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser"...Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.....Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

The Star Spanged Banner
"Espana" Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Selection from "Th King and I"...Rodgers
Dalicado.....Azevedo
March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

Esplanade Programs

The 24th season of free, open-air concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens tonight at 8:30 at the Hatch Shell at the foot of Mt. Vernon street. As in the past, Arthur Fiedler will be the conductor.

The first children's concert of the series will take place next Wednesday morning at 10:15. Paul Cherkassky conducts Thursday and Friday evenings, and G. Wallace Woodworth is the conductor next Saturday at 8:30 P. M. There is no concert on Monday night:

TONIGHT

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.....Beethoven
The Star Spangled Banner
"Espana" Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Selection from "The King and I".....Rodgers
Delicado.....Azevedo
March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

TUESDAY NIGHT

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian," Op. 90.....Mendelssohn
First Movement, Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, for Piano and Orchestra.....Tchaikovsky Soloist: Salvatore Sullo.
"Pineapple Poll," Suite from the Ballet.....Sullivan-Mackerras
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet

WEDNESDAY MORNING

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Die Fledermaus". ("The Bat").....Strauss
Third Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
Little Fugue in G minor.....Bach-Cailliet
Two Movements from the Concerto in B-flat for Harp and Orchestra.....Handel Soloist: Olivia Luetcoke
Delicado.....Azevedo
"American Salute" (When Johnny Comes Marching Home).....Gould
American Patrol.....Meacham

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished," No. 8.....Schubert
Tone Poem, "Finlandia".....Sibelius
Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2.....Mendelssohn
Soloist: Bertica Shulman
Blue Tango.....Anderson
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

THURSDAY NIGHT

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Espana" Waltzes.....Waldteufel
Dance of the Buffoons.....Rimsky-Korsakov

FRIDAY NIGHT

National Emblem March.....Bagley
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tchaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet.....Luigini
"Voices of Spring" waltzes.....Strauss
March, "The Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

SATURDAY NIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Symphony No. 34 in C major (K. 338).....Mozart
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms
Nocturne and Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn Deep Forest.....Mabel Daniels
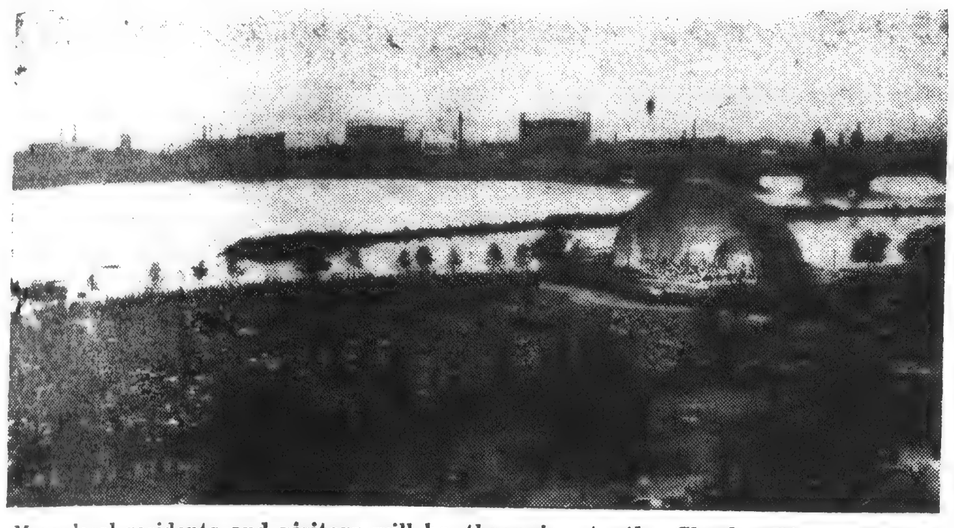
"Emperor" waltzes.....Strauss
March, "Up the Street".....Morse

[227]

Back Bay Ledger - June 26 1952

Esplanade Concerts To Begin Sunday Arthur Fiedler Will Conduct Series Children's Concerts on Wed. Mornings

OPENING NIGHT ON THE ESPLANADE



Many local residents and visitors will be thronging to the Charles River this coming Sunday evening at 8:30 where Arthur Fiedler will inaugurate the 1952 Esplanade Concert series.

This coming Sunday at 8:30 marks the opening of the July Esplanade Concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell alongside the Charles River. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler will play every night during the next three weeks, with the exception of Monday evenings.

Special "Children's Concerts" are scheduled for Wednesday morning at 10:15 on July 2, 9, and 16. No other organization in Boston offers such an opportunity for hearing good music suited to the musical tastes of children of all ages.

The opening program typifies the well-rounded program offered each night at the Esplanade. Beethoven's popular Fifth Symphony will be played, as well as Selections from "The King and I," current New York musical stage-play.

Wagner's "Entrance of the Guests," from his opera Tannhauser, will also be included in the first program. "Delicado" by Azevedo, Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" complete the evening of music.

Originated through the personal initiative of Arthur Fiedler when he was a young violinist in the Boston Symphony, the concerts were started in 1929 as an "experimental contribution to Boston's musical life." Even Fiedler's closest friends were doubtful of the venture.

Continued on Page Five

Esplanade

Continued from Page One

It did not take long for the series to attain a yearly audience of a quarter of a million persons of all ages and from all walks of life.

During the depression, it seemed impossible for the small group of public-spirited citizens to continue financing the Esplanade concerts. Mr. Fiedler decided to try a plan of asking for smaller contributions from a large number of people. For 22 years, this plan has worked because so many Boston residents have come to feel that the Esplanade Concerts are a vital cultural opportunity for thousands of old folks, young parents with their children, young working people and students.

A wooden shell was built for the first concerts by the Metropolitan District Commission. In 1934, a larger shell with welded steel plates was constructed to house the enlarged orchestra. The present granite Shell was the gift of Maria Hatch as a memorial to her brother, Edward.

Mr. Fiedler has also pioneered in the musical repertory offered at the Esplanade Concerts. In 1935, he tried out all nine of Beethoven's symphonies on his delighted audience. Today, he includes modernists such as Shostakovitch and Prokofieff, as well as the classics; the popular renditions of Broadway musical hits, rousing Sousa marches, and light classical numbers are not slighted either.

There are no reserved seats on the Esplanade. You may sit in the first row if you arrive early enough. You may sit on the grass, or folding chairs may be rented for a small fee.

Back Bay residents always attend the river-side concerts in large numbers to escape the heat of the city, as well as to enjoy the unmatched playing of our own world-renowned orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS. THURSDAY,

HERE AND THERE

A real display of good old American initiative is being shown by the group of Albemarle Street parents. They're taking up where the city left off by organizing their own Fourth of July party . . . We hope other group of citizens in the Back Bay will follow their suggestion and form local committees to give a party on their own street for the kids on the glorious Fourth.

The Boston Pops Concert had distinguished visitors from New York recently—Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, creators of the Broadway musical, "The King and I." The celebrities were amazed and delighted by the 90-piece Symphonic rendition of the songs from their hit show.

We heard of a new way to raise money, patterned somewhat after the old "Tortoise and the Hare" story. The Junior Chamber of Commerce and the Lions Club in a mid-western town sponsored a "turtle derby" to raise money for an ambulance for their local Fire Department.

Mayor Hynes came out with a new suggestion that may set a pattern throughout the country. It's the idea that all city officials and employees who run for office should take a month's leave of absence without pay while they are campaigning. Hynes smilingly remarked, "I don't think they will do justice to themselves if they don't devote all their time and energy to vote-getting." The general public would probably add that they could hardly do full justice to their jobs

Continued on Page Ten

Harry Dubbs, who will be guest conductor of the Children's Concert at the Esplanade, Wednesday morning.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JUL 15 1952

HARRY DUBBS, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will guest conduct the final Esplanade Children's Concert at the Hatch Memorial Shell Wednesday morning.

CONDUCTOR

Willis Page, guest conductor at the Esplanade concert tonight and tomorrow night.

[225]

Boston Evening Globe
Jul 15, 52

(Traveler Staff Photo by Anthony Cabral)

INTENT LISTENERS—Shaded by a dainty parasol, Linda Rondina, 5 (left), and Chery Lindstrom, 5, both of Cambridge, enjoy the Arthur Fiedler music at a children's concert given today at the Esplanade.

Boston Traveler 7/9/52 Page 1

Fiedler Speeds Pianist To Sub for Sick Soloist At Children's Concert

A last minute switch in soloists for the children's Esplanade concert was made today when the 10-year-old scheduled pianist was taken ill and the son of a Symphony player made a hurried trip by taxi from Wellesley to replace her on the program.

Conductor Arthur Fiedler called 21-year-old Paul Knudson at his home in Wellesley Hills and asked him to be soloist for the concert. This took place 15 minutes before the concert was to begin, when Fiedler was notified by phone that Sandra Lou McEntaffer of Florida was sick with a fever and would be unable to give her scheduled performance.

Fiedler then reshuffled the program so that the soloist, who was to have appeared in the third number, would appear later.

Knudson, son of Clarence Knudson, principal of the second violin section of the Symphony orchestra, arrived near the end of the orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf." After five minutes to catch his breath he went on the stage to play the first movement of Mozart's piano concerto, No. 15, the same number he had played when he was soloist at last night's concert.

CONCERT

(Continued on Page Twenty-two)

Concert

(Continued from First Page)

Sandra Lou, who had come to Boston from her home in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. to play in today's concert, was to have played Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major. She recently had played for Fiedler on a Boston visit and then had been invited to be soloist for a children's concert.

More than 5000 persons, most of them children, attended the concert.

Tonight's concert will be at 8:30.

(Traveler Staff Photo by Anthony Cabral)

CONCERT AUDITORS—Among those attending the children's concert today at the Hatch Memorial Shell were (left to right) Mrs. Felix Heald and Louise Heald, 2; Mrs. George Buffington, with George Buffinton, 3, and Andy Buffinton, 2, all of Cambridge.

2 CONCERTS AT THE SHELL

Morning Program 10:15, Evening at 8:30

This is double-header day at the free Esplanade Concerts. From 10:15 to 11:15 o'clock this morning, Arthur Fiedler conducts his Boston Symphony musicians in a children's concert at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Embankment rd., at the foot of Mt. Vernon st. Tonights regular concert will be at 8 o'clock.

Ten-year-old Sandra Lou McEntaffer of Florida will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major at the children's concert. The "orchestral fairy tale," Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" also will be presented. Assisting the orchestra to make the story clear will be narrator, Norman Shirk, concert artist who now is assistant manager of the orchestra.

The program:

AT 10:15 A. M.

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to "Fra Diavolo" ..... Auber
First Movement, Concerto in A major (K. 488) for Piano and Orchestra ..... Mozart Soloist: Sandra MacEntaffer
"Peter and the Wolf," An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children .... Prokofieff
Narrator: Norman Shirk
"Saratoga" ..... Lucien Thayer
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Tonight at 8:30, Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93, Beethoven; First Movement from the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D major, Brahms, Soloist, George Zazofsky; Suite "Petrouchka," Stravinsky.

Seldomridge

Sandra MacEntaffer of Florida will be the piano soloist at the Children's Esplanade Concert Wednesday morning. She will play the first movement of Mozart's Concerto in A major.

Music Draws 5,000 Children

Five thousand children were on hand this morning to enjoy the Esplanade concert held at the Hatch Memorial Shell, Boston, especially for them.

The majority of the children were unaware of the behind-the-scenes drama which was taking place during the earlier part of the program.

At the last minute, Sandra Lou MacEntaffer of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., who was scheduled to play the First Movement of Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major, was unable to appear.

On a minute's notice, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, phoned Paul Knudson of Wellesley, son of Clarence Knudson, first desk man in the second violin section of the Boston Symphony, and asked him to fill in. Young Mr. Knudson rushed in by taxi and was ready to play by the time Prokofieff's narrated tale of Peter and the Wolf, which had been shuffled into third place, was over.

Mr. Knudson played the first movement from Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 15 in B-flat, which was substituted for the scheduled piano number and which he had played at the Esplanade concert last night.

MUSIC

Children's Concerts Worth While

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Among the many admirable features of our Esplanade Concerts are the special concerts for children on Wednesday mornings. They were originated in 1938 and have gone on continuously since. a better record than Symphony Hall has been able to show in the same period of time.

The attendance varies, but as many as 10,000 youngsters have shown up on occasion. The Esplanade Concerts are running for three weeks this year, concluding next Saturday evening. The third children's concert will fall on Wednesday morning, as usual. When possible, Mr. Fiedler prefers to conduct them himself in order that the children may feel that they are getting the best that is to be had. In the matter of programs Mr. Fiedler stresses the musical side in preference to the educational, but the latter is present all the same. In fact, these programs are admirably suited to their purpose.

* * *

Unquestionably many graduates of these Wednesday morning affairs are now regular attendants at the evening concerts. Not a few of them are probably Pops fans or even subscribers to one of the four seasons of regular Symphony concerts. Precise figures on this sort of thing are difficult to obtain, but the inference is obvious. People who acquire an interest in music relatively early in life are likely to keep it. Alexander Pope didn't exactly have music in mind when he wrote, "'Tis education forms the common mind: Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," but it applies here, too. I won't say that no one ever outgrows an early love for music or that no one develops it late in life, yet on the average it surely works the other way.

* * *

In M. A. DeWolfe Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," we read: "Concerts for young people were introduced by Gericke in 1887 and continued for a number of seasons. Again, in 1920, young people's concerts were established. The tickets are distributed through the schools at the all-reaching price of 35 cents. There is mutual enlightenment when a conductor submits Mozart or Beethoven, Strauss or Stravinsky, to the frank appraisement of our grammar and high school citizens." Eventually, however, these Symphony youth concerts fell by the wayside, but before returning to the situation at Symphony Hall, I would like to say a word about the most individual children's concerts ever held in Boston, namely, those given Saturday mornings at Jordan Hall, from 1922-29, under the direction of Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling had at his disposal an orchestra of 50 Symphony players and he made much use of lantern slides, some of them instructive and some humorous. A distinguished pianist and composer, Mr. Schelling had also a rare way with young people, and the few older ones that got in had a good time, too.

* * *

When the Symphony's youth concerts were resumed in 1920, Mr. Monteux conducted them himself. When Koussevitzky took over he directed some but the brunt of that particular burden was carried by Mr. Burgin. For a few years there were no such concerts at the hall, then Wheeler Beckett appeared on the scene, This able conductor and sterling musician engaged an orchestra of 70 Symphony men, assembled a list of guarantors and put on the concerts as a private undertaking. They got off to a good start and there was great interest and enthusiasm. They ceased after the 1947-1948 season, their sixth,

On the Esplanade

Three guest conductors, all of whom are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been invited by Arthur Fiedler to conduct the Esplanade concerts in the Hatch Memorial Shell next week. Owing to conducting engagements in the West, Mr. Fiedled will conduct no more Boston concerts this summer.

Carlos Pinfield will wield the baton for the concerts tonight and Sunday nights. There is no concert scheduled for Monday evening. Willis Page will be on the podium for the Tuesday and Wednesday night concerts. Harry Dubbs will lead the third and last children's concert on Wednesday morning at 10:15.

For the children's concert Margaret Moreland and Richard Perry will be the duo-piano soloists in "The Animals' Carnival," a Grand Zoological Fantasia by Saint-Saëns. The programs through Wednesday are as follows:

Sunday Evening, July 13

"Carnival" Overture ..... Dvořák
Andante and Finale from the Symphony No. 5, in E minor Tchaikovsky
Ballet Music from "Faust" .... Gounod
"Where the Citrons Bloom" Waltzes Strauss
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" Porter
Carlos Pinfield conducting

Tuesday Evening, July 15

Symphony No. 4 in F minor Tchaikovsky
Overture to "The Roman Carnival" Berlioz
Serenata ..... Anderson
Sleigh Ride ..... Anderson
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa
Willis Page conducting

Wednesday Morning, July 16
Third Children's Concert

Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Kosakov
Overture "Fingal's Cave" ("The Hebrides") ..... Mendelssohn
Toy Symphony ..... Haydn
Peer Gynt Suite ..... Grieg
"The Animals' Carnival" Grand Zoological Fantasia for Two Pianos and Orchestra ..... Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Margaret Moreland and Richard Perry
The Ballerina and Dance of the Coachmen from "Petrouchka" .. Stravinsky
A Birthday Fantasy ..... Calliet
Harry Dubbs conducting

Wednesday Evening, July 16

Overture to "The Magic Flute" . Mozart
Symphony in D major, No. 38 ("Haffner") ..... Mozart Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saëns
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes ..... Strauss
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Solo Trumpet: Armando Ghitalla
Overture Solennelle, 1812 ..Tchaikovsky
Willis Page conducting

HARRY DUBBS, who conducts the final Children's Esplanade Concert on Wednesday morning in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

1952

FINAL WEEK AT ESPLANADE

Concert Is Attended by 15,000 Listeners

Opening its final week of the season, the Esplanade orchestra was heard by an audience of 15,000 at the Hatch Memorial shell last night. Carlos Pinfield, the Boston Symphony's senior violinist in point of service, was guest conductor. With the exception of tonight, there will be a concert every night, through Saturday. In addition, the final children's concert will be given Wednesday morning from 10:15 to 11:15.

James Abresch

Willis Page will conduct the Esplanade concerts tonight and Wednesday evening.

CARLOS PINFIELD is conducting the Esplanade Concerts tonight and tomorrow evening.

On the Esplanade

Carlos Pinfield will conduct tonight's Esplanade Concert, starting at 8:30 at the Hatch Memorial Shell. The program is as follows:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Overture to "Mignon" Thomas
From "L'Arlesienne" Suite Bizet
Prelude—Carillon
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli

Selection from "South Pacific" Rodgers
Largo from "Xerxes" Handel
Solo Violin: Rolland Tapley
"The Skaters" Waltzes Waldteufel
American Salute ("When Johnny Comes Marching Home") Gould

Sunday Concert

The Esplanade Concert tomorrow night will be conducted by Carlos Pinfield. The program is as follows:

"Carnival" Overture Dvorak
Andante and Finale from the Symphony No. 5, in E minor Tchaikovsky

Ballet Music from "Faust" Gounod
"Where the Citrons Bloom" Waltzes Strauss
Selection from "Kiss Me Kate" Porter

John Brook

Harry Dubbs will conduct the Children's Concert on the Esplanade Wednesday morning.

[230]

ESPLANADE CONCERT FUND ENRICHED—Patricia Ann Humphrey, 8-year-old pianist who aspires to be a concert artist someday, turns over hard-earned $4 to fund director Fredericka Nielsen from sale of Hatch Shell picture cards. Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lanning Humphrey of 364 Woodward st., Waban, the young musician prides herself as being the Boston Symphony Orchestra's youngest "patron."

52

WILLIS PAGE, double-bass player of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Esplanade Orchestra tonight at 8:30.

Fiedler's Last Esplanade Concert Draws 16,000

A crowd of 16,000 watched Arthur Fiedler last night conduct his own last Esplanade concert of the season. The series will continue with guest conductors selected by him each night, with the omission of Monday, through July 19. There will be a children's concert on Wednesday morning, July 16.

The popularity of Fiedler has brought him conducting engagements in Milwaukee, Chicago and San Francisco and the possibility of an appearance in Alaska with the Seattle Symphony.

Addressing the audience in behalf of Mayor Hines, and also as a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher paid tribute to Fiedler's services in originating the concerts and conducting them during 24 summers.

Pointing out that when the 25th season opens, the Metropolitan District Commission will have constructed a handsome footbridge leading over auto traffic to the concert grounds, he suggested that the concertgoers and the Boston Chamber of Commerce ask Gov. Dever to consider naming it the Fiedler bridge as a permanent memorial to the conductor's quarter century of artistic contribution to Boston life.

Donald J. Hurley, vice-president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, brought that organization's compliments, and added that it felt that the concerts, besides their artist merit, had been of business value to the city because of their attraction for summer visitors.

Esplanade Concert

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct tonight's Esplanade Concert starting at 8:30 at the Hatch Memorial Shell. The program is as follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Little Fugue in G minor ..... Bach-Cailliet
Ballet Suite ..... Rameau-Motl
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Second and Third Movements from the Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor for Piano and Orchestra ..... Tchaikovsky
Soloist: BERNARD KRITZMAN
"Vienna Blood" Waltzes ..... Strauss
Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolitov-Ivanov

BLOONS similar to those he dug up on Isl played by Snow. Originals were impounde ernment under currency export laws.

E—THURSDAY, JULY 17.

VICTOR ALESSANDRO, who will be guest conductor of the last three Esplanade Concerts, tonight through Saturday. He is a native Texan and conductor of the San Antonio Symphony.

GERSHWIN ON THE GRASS—Sally Johnson of Newton, Joan Ward of Boston and Nancy Johnson of Cambridge (left to right) enjoy the Esplanade concert from a vantage point on the green. (Herald Staff Photo by E. O. MacLean.)

On the Esplanade

Closing Night

Procession of Bacchus from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Solo Violoncello: Hippolyte Droeghmans
Air on the G String ..... Bach-Wilhelmj
Third Movement, Allegro molto vivace, from Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" ..... Tchaikovsky
"Peer Gynt" Suite ..... Grieg
Rêve Angélique ..... Rubinstein
Waltzes from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Prayer of Thanksgiving ..... Valerius
Victor Alessandro conducting

[270]

MUSIC LOVERS

Among the most popular features of Boston's early summer season are the Children's Concerts on the Esplanade when the city's junior music-lovers, and some who are not quite so junior, flock in large numbers to hear Arthur Fiedler and his group of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here are some studies of the concert-goers by Anthony Cabral.

Right—A typical morning audience, seated on folding chairs or on the Esplanade greensward listens with rapt interest to one of the Fiedler programs for children—and others.

Above—PAUL KNUDSON, son of Clarence Knudson, principal second violinist of the Symphony, substitutes for a young woman pianist who was taken ill. Below—They Shall Not Pass. This juvenile line, halted by a police barrier, presents a study in expressions as well as types.

Above—THIS LITTLE GIRL has a very special interest in th and her father is the famous Arthur Fiedler who conducts the o

Right—THIS GROUP of Camp Fire Girls deseed their usual to be enjoying it.

MUSIC LOVERS

Among the most popular features of Boston's early summer season are the Children's Concerts on the Esplanade when the city's junior music-lovers, and some who are not quite so junior, flock in large numbers to hear Arthur Fiedler and his group of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here are some studies of the concert-goers by Anthony Cabral.

Right—A typical morning audience, seated on folding chairs or on the Esplanade greensward listens with rapt interest to one of the Fiedler programs for children—and others.

Above—PAUL KNUDSON, son of Clarence Knudson, principal second violinist of the Symphony, substitutes for a young woman pianist who was taken ill; Below—They Shall Not Pass. This juvenile line, halted by a police barrier, presents a study in expressions as well as types.

Above—THIS LITTLE GIRL has a very spe al interest and her father is the famous Arthur Fiedler who onducts t

Right—THIS GROUP of Camp Fire Girls dese ed their u to be enjoying it.

BLISS OR DROWSINESS? Whatever it is, something seems to be affecting these very youthful members of the audience.

TLE GIRL has a very special interest in the program. Her name is Deborah Fiedler e famous Arthur Fiedler who conducts the orchestra.

UP of Camp Fire Girls deserted their usual activities to listen to music and they seem

BLISS OR DROWSINESS? Whatever it is, something seems to be affecting these very youthful members of the audience.

TLE GIRL has a very special interest in the program. Her name is Deborah Fiedler e famous Arthur Fiedler who conducts the orchestra.

UP of Camp Fire Girls deserted their usual activities to listen to music and they seem

Pre-Europ-

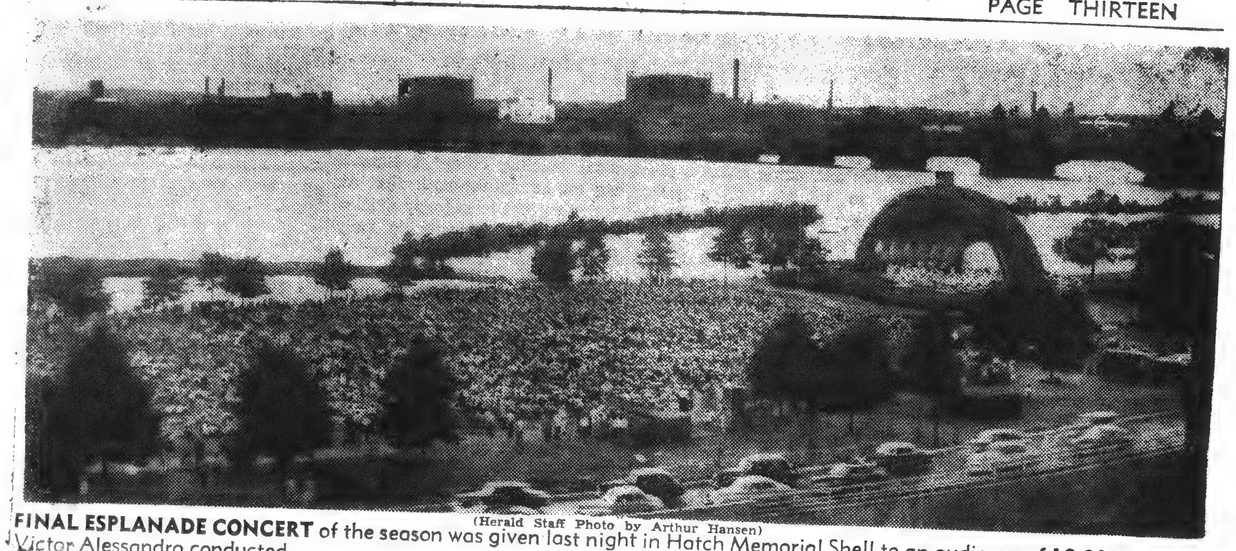
Pops

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.



(Herald Staff Photo by Arthur Hansen)

FINAL ESPLANADE CONCERT of the season was given last night in Hatch Memorial Shell to an audience of 18,000 persons. Victor Alessandro conducted.

18,000 Applaud Final Concert Of 1952 Season on Esplanade

A crowd of 18,000 applauded the last Esplanade concert of the summer last night, and, as the las chord faded, 20 volunteer firemen showed them the light.

Wide and naked spotlight beams picked out the seven wagons which are marked for donations to the concert fund to end once and for all the complaint—"We'd like to give but we can never find a booth."

Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher arranged the spotlight revelation of the contribution wagons which Public Relations Director Laning Humphrey explained "have apparently been in the dark."

NO BASEBALL

The last night crowd had expected to have a little baseball with their Bach because Red Sox Manager Lou Boudreau was scheduled to talk, but he sent his regrets.

Pinch-hitting for him, however, Commissioner Kelleher told the crowd: "Lou is a real music fan. And he has told me that, after all, 90 percent of the Esplanade symphony players are Red Sox fans."

Two sour notes were sounded at the concert. Manager Norman Shirk reported that the concerts are in the red "in excess of last year's $10,000 deficit."

And George D. Tolman, superintendent of the Jackson Chair, Mo., ported that the best night of this June 29-July 19 season was 4000 chairs.

"Why," Tolman said, "in the old day, before the new road, we rented as many as 11,000 chairs. But, if there's no place to park, who's going to come to the concert if he has to walk a mile?"

GUEST CONDUCTOR

Guest Conductor Victor Alessandro, 36-year-old Texas, had notihng but praise for the concerts and their audiences.

"Naturally, this is one of the finest audiences in the country. After all, a great symphony reflects the personality of its people."

The 88 players of the Esplanade symphony wer erained out only three nights of this season.

Coming up is next year's celebration of the 25th season for which cards asking preferences have been distributed to the audiences this summer.

Humphre yreports an encouraging response from the cards, "especially from East Boston, Somerville and Newton."

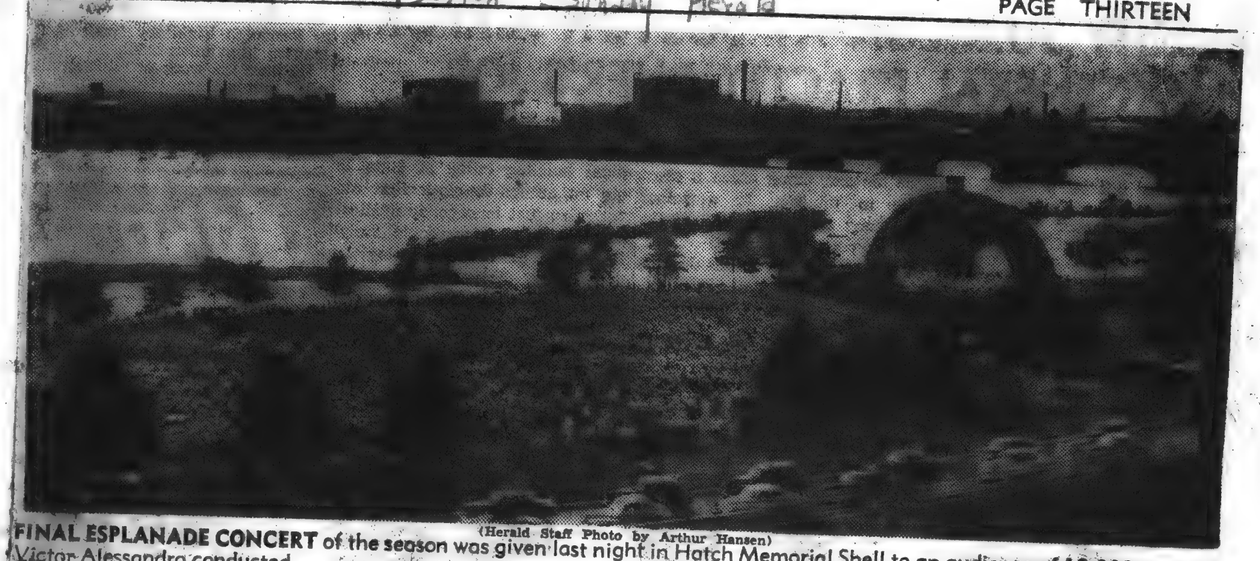
And, he adds, "the thing to remember about the Esplanade audience is that it is always one of the quietest, best-behaved audiences in the country."

[35]

Pre-Europe

Europe

POPS



(Herald Staff Photo by Arthur Hansen)

FINAL ESPLANADE CONCERT of the season was given last night in Hatch Memorial Shell to an audience of 18,000 persons. Victor Alessandro conducted.

18,000 Applaud Final Concert Of 1952 Season on Esplanade

A crowd of 18,000 applauded the last Esplanade concert of the summer last night, and, as the las chord faded, 20 volunteer firemen showed them the light.

Wide and naked spotlight beams picked out the seven wagons which are marked for donations to the concert fund to end once and for all the complaint—"We'd like to give but we can never find a booth."

Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher arranged the spotlight revelation of the contribution wagons which Public Relations Director Laning Humphrey explained "have apparently been in the dark."

NO BASEBALL

The last night crowd had expected to have a little baseball with their Bach because Red Sox Manager Lou Boudreau was scheduled to talk, but he sent his regrets.

Pinch-hitting for him, however, Commissioner Kelleher told the crowd: "Lou is a real music fan. And he has told me that, after all, 90 percent of the Esplanade symphony players are Red Sox fans."

Two sour notes were sounded at the concert. Manager Norman Shirk reported that the concerts are in the red "in excess of last year's $10,000 deficit."

And George D. Tolman, superintendent of the Jackson Chair, Mo., ported that the best night of this June 29-July 19 season was 4000 chairs.

"Why," Tolman said, "in the old day, before the new road, we rented as many as 11,000 chairs. But, if there's no place to park, who's going to come to the concert if he has to walk a mile?"

GUEST CONDUCTOR

Guest Conductor Victor Alessandro, 36-year-old Texas, had notihng but praise for the concerts and their audiences.

"Naturally, this is one of the finest audiences in the country. After all, a great symphony reflects the personality of its people."

The 88 players of the Esplanade symphony wer erained out only three nights of this season.

Coming up is next year's celebration of the 25th season for which cards asking preferences have been distributed to the audiences this summer.

Humphre yreports an encouraging response from the cards, "especially from East Boston, Somerville and Newton."

And, he adds, "the thing to remember about the Esplanade audience is that it is always one of the quietest, best-behaved audiences in the country."

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
AUG 22 1952

Arthur Fiedler Conducts "Pops" Programs

[illegible] Arthur Fiedler of [illegible] Orchestra is currying memories of Vienna's [illegible] with his programs in [illegible] consisting of Tschi- [illegible] alternating with [illegible] Not, mind you, that [illegible] nothing wrong with beer and [illegible] there are some of us [illegible]. The programs are [illegible] certainment, and maybe [illegible] warm summer eve- [illegible] After the excitement [illegible] one needs something [illegible] in Tschaikovsky can [illegible] the boys in Chicago [illegible] ks ago.

[illegible] evening pianist Sylvia [illegible] best artist in a program that includ[illegible] [illegible]ters marches by Sousa and Alber[illegible] and pieces by Sibelius, Debussy and others, the piece de resistance being the first piano concerto of Tschaikovsky. Miss Jenkins, who made her local [illegible] ago, has made recognizable strides in her mastery of both technic and musicianship, and her conception of the concerto was individual enough to make the playing of it a rather novel experience. It is always a task to find something new in the familiar, but Miss Jenkins seems to have the knack of doing this, and with the benefit of added years she should make a creditable addition to the list of contemporary rising young artists.

ABRAMOWITSCH TO PLAY BEETHOVEN

Conductor Fiedler knows his business, of course, and has a way with an orchestra that can even make "Finlandia" and "Clair de Lune" seem new, fresh and inspiring. It is not great conducting, certainly, but it is satisfying music making on a delightful level, and one hopes for more depth and perception tomorrow when Bernhard Abramowitsch will play Beethoven's third piano concerto with the orchestra. For where the Tschaikovsky concerto is at best merely "brilliant," in the best sense of that much-abused term, the Beethoven concerto is a work of art and needs artistic perception in all ways to make its performance the rare experience it should be.

One of the huge crowds which listens to the summer evening outdoor concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Hatch Memorial Shell. (David F. Lawlor)

First in Selling Music to the Masses

By Leo J. Hines

ONE man's vision became the perennial pleasure of a quarter million New Englanders just 23 years ago this month when violinist Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra persuaded unconvinced public authorities, cynical musicians and the people themselves that a symphony orchestra could play popular music, that untutored popular music lovers could come to love symphony music, that both could be played outdoors, with no admission charge and with huge success.

This was artistic dreaming on the grandest scale, but the dreamer faltered in only one aspect: he didn't dream grandly enough.

Even Arthur Fiedler, now a national figure in the world of music, realized that a few weeks ago when he raised his dramatic baton, glittering eyes and neatly trimmed mustache to the waiting Symphony Orchestra musicians who comprise the Boston Pops Orchestra, to open the 23rd Hatch Memorial Shell Esplanade concert season.

A Dream Come True

These things Arthur Fiedler has learned in the past quarter century: That he reckoned rightly in every element of his original plan; that not only symphony music but entire classical symphonies could be played and happily received by mass outdoor audiences; that his classically trained musicians could play adeptly swing, jazz, bebop, nonsense music, patriotic fantasies, and novelties of every kind; that public officials will cooperate with enthusiasm and efficiency in a well-formulated cultural movement; and, perhaps most arresting truth of all, dimes and quarters from the pockets of the poor and average man are never wanting when the rich man's wallet stays.

For the Esplanade could never have continued its ambitious enterprise through the hard years of the Big Depression had not Mr. Fiedler appealed to the thousands seated, standing and sprawling on the bank of the Charles to hear his concerts, for many modest contributions. These were needed to offset the deficit left each year after the Boston Symphony Orchestra Fund and a mailing list of well-to-do music patrons had done their level best to finance the programs.

Expenses now are shared several ways: by the proceeds of an annual fund-raising campaign by small donations, the rental of wooden chairs for a small fee, from which the concerts receive a percentage, and, should there be a deficit, by the funds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Corporation, which, some years ago, assumed the obligations of the Esplanade concerts, declaring them an official adjunct of Symphony business.

Symphony Shares Expense

The musicians and stagehands, the program and the program distributors are paid for by Symphony. Care of the shell itself and the surrounding land is taken by the Metropolitan District Commission, which owns the land. The Hatch Shell is held by a deed of trust by the M.D.C.

While the dimes and quarters collected at small booths on the Esplanade amount to several thousand dollars each year, they are not enough, not even when added to the gift from the Symphony and the patrons' donations. The future financial security of the Esplanade set-up, Mr. Fiedler believes, will result from subsidies by large corporations and successful business

[236]

Bostoncasting

✓ THAT TEMPORARY TAX! The federal personal income tax was adopted in 1913 (as an emergency measure), with rates ranging from 1 to 7 percent. Today rates range from 22.2 to 92 percent.

The total tax burden - direct and hidden - federal, state and local - now is approaching 35 percent for the average American.

Those in the $2,000 to $3,000 income group pay almost 30 percent of their income.

These facts were reported by the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S. in recommending that proposed foreign aid spending be cut from $10.5 billion to $5 billion next fiscal year.

✓ HENRY PENN, for more than 60 years internationally known as "Penn The Florist," and originator of the expression, "Say it with Flowers," recently was unanimously voted the annual 1952 Boston Rotary Club Award.

The citation pointed out that he has been active and helpful in the club's affairs for more than a quarter of a century and "during a long span of years has applied the highest ethical standards to the commercial enterprises and associations so well directed by him."

He is a charter member of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce.

✓ "AMERICA'S WONDERLAND" is the title of a full-page advertisement in July 1 "Look" Magazine extoling New England as one of the nation's topmost vacation areas.

Adv., by H. J. Heinz Co., first of a series featuring country's vacation areas, says in part: "Whether you turn back the pages of history in Boston, camp in the Berkshires or bask on the sandy stretches of Cape Cod, you'll find the scenery inspiring, the natives hospitable and the food truly exceptional."

✓ SAID "BOSTON AMERICAN" recently, via columnist Alan Frazer: "James H. Walsh, managing director of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce and a fine artist, will have a one man show of his paintings of Ireland in the fall. He creates these from sketches which he made on the scene."

✓ NOT ONE BUT TWO members of the Sales Managers Club of the Chamber have been honored by the National Sales Executives.

Boone Gross, Gillette vice president, is now a director-at-large, and Walter C. Gorenflo, past club president, a director for Northern New England.

✓ "IT'S UP TO VOTERS NOW!" Austin S. Igleheart, General Foods president, before Advertising Club of Boston:

"Whether we will keep our form of representative government, or see it change into something along socialist lines, depends on how far the voter sees ahead.

"If we vote for handouts, featherbedding, paternalism along with more inflation, we shall have abandoned the American spirit...

"We would be powerless to keep the Communists from making slaves of us, as they intend to do in the long run. We could not possibly help in getting Europe and Asia to their own feet, because we ourselves would be beyond help."

✓ CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT AWARDS in New England in May totalled $119,605,000 or 14 percent more than in April and 4 percent more than May 1951, reports F. W. Dodge Corp.

Non-residential awards in May were $35,534,000 or 23 percent above April, residential awards $57,315,000 or 3 percent higher, and public and private works and utilities were $26,756,000 or 31 per cent more.

men, many of whom in the Greater Boston area employ hundreds and thousands of the Esplanade's audience.

But musicians are sanguine people. Despite deficits they intend to go right on playing until, as the saying goes, they are "driven right into the ground." That is unlikely to happen.

The Esplanade and the Pops Orchestra mean too much to Boston. It is not enough to house the educational and research center of the nation, to produce the world's finest Symphony, to provide the nation with its wool and many other commodities. Boston is not satisfied unless the unique cultural success of America is its own. The Esplanade concerts are the unique cultural success of America.

None Offers So Much

Other cities have free concerts. Some present symphony music outdoors. A few can attract masses of people. But none offers all these elements: free symphony music, brilliantly played, outdoors. None can draw annually thousands of people from as far as California and Florida in the Esplanade season, to help spark Boston's hotel and tourist trade.

Steadily making their way in public affection and official regard, the Esplanade concerts have been accorded progressive improvements in facilities. For the first five years the orchestra, numbering 46 musicians, played in a wooden shell constructed at the expense of the Metropolitan District Commission, in whose jurisdiction the grounds belonged.

A larger orchestra and larger shell, this one of welded steel plates, took over in 1934. On July 2, 1940, the present granite Hatch Shell was dedicated. The major part of the cost $240,000, was derived from the bequest of Maria Hatch, left for the purpose of erecting a memorial to her brother Edward. The orchestra is now approximately double that of 1929.

To make possible the presentation of certain religious works, and some symphonic music written for organ and orchestra, former Governor Alvan T. Fuller, shortly after the Hatch Shell was completed, donated a handsome and valuable Hammond Organ to be permanently installed therein. This was in honor of his mother.

(Photos by Lenscraft Photos, Inc.)

ABOVE—FAMOUS COMPOSERS AT THE BOSTON POPS. Standing, Oscar Hammerstein (left) and Richard Rodgers. Seated (at same table) left to right, Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mrs. Kelleher, Mrs. Byron Tosi.

AT RIGHT—"GENTLEMEN, PLEASE! You are running away with yourselves," admonishes Arthur Fiedler to his famous Boston Pops Orchestra now having its 23rd outdoor season on the Charles River Esplanade.

Names Carved in Steps

Carved into the steps leading to the director's rostrum in the Hatch Shell are the names of the masters of music—Brahms, Mozart, Bizet, Handel, Beethoven, and a host of others. Thus always reminded of the great as he mounts his podium, Arthur Fiedler has never ceased trying to make the great popular and beloved as well. He has succeeded amazingly.

Not only a proficient musician, Mr. Fiedler is also an expert showman, and an uncanny judge of what will go, and what will not.

He has introduced symphony music to the Esplanade in easy stages, at first only one or two movements at a time. Finally, in his seventh season, 1935, Mr. Fiedler tested his audience by playing every one of the nine Beethoven Symphonies, omitting only the vocal part of the Ninth. Friends warned him he would lose his audience. The audience swelled and has continued to do so.

The original pattern has varied and widened many times to include people of all ages and tastes. Since

—please turn to page 30

July, 1952

Bostoncasting

✓ THAT TEMPORARY TAX! The federal personal income tax was adopted in 1913 (as an emergency measure), with rates ranging from 1 to 7 percent. Today rates range from 22.2 to 92 percent.

The total tax burden - direct and hidden - federal, state and local - now is approaching 35 percent for the average American.

Those in the $2,000 to $3,000 income group pay almost 30 percent of their income.

These facts were reported by the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S. in recommending that proposed foreign aid spending be cut from $10.5 billion to $5 billion next fiscal year.

✓ HENRY PENN, for more than 60 years internationally known as "Penn The Florist," and originator of the expression, "Say it with Flowers," recently was unanimously voted the annual 1952 Boston Rotary Club Award.

The citation pointed out that he has been active and helpful in the club's affairs for more than a quarter of a century and "during a long span of years has applied the highest ethical standards to the commercial enterprises and associations so well directed by him."

He is a charter member of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce.

✓ "AMERICA'S WONDERLAND" is the title of a full-page advertisement in July 1 "Look" Magazine extoling New England as one of the nation's topmost vacation areas.

Adv., by H. J. Heinz Co., first of a series featuring country's vacation areas, says in part: "Whether you turn back the pages of history in Boston, camp in the Berkshires or bask on the sandy stretches of Cape Cod, you'll find the scenery inspiring, the natives hospitable and the food truly exceptional."

✓ SAID "BOSTON AMERICAN" recently, via columnist Alan Frazer: "James H. Walsh, managing director of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce and a fine artist, will have a one man show of his paintings of Ireland in the fall. He creates these from sketches which he made on the scene."

✓ NOT ONE BUT TWO members of the Sales Managers Club of the Chamber have been honored by the National Sales Executives.

Boone Gross, Gillette vice president, is now a director-at-large, and Walter C. Gorenflo, past club president, a director for Northern New England.

✓ "IT'S UP TO VOTERS NOW!" Austin S. Igleheart, General Foods president, before Advertising Club of Boston:

"Whether we will keep our form of representative government, or see it change into something along socialist lines, depends on how far the voter sees ahead.

"If we vote for handouts, featherbedding, paternalism along with more inflation, we shall have abandoned the American spirit...

"We would be powerless to keep the Communists from making slaves of us, as they intend to do in the long run. We could not possibly help in getting Europe and Asia to their own feet, because we ourselves would be beyond help."

✓ CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT AWARDS in New England in May totalled $119,605,000 or 14 percent more than in April and 4 percent more than May 1951, reports F. W. Dodge Corp.

Non-residential awards in May were $35,534,000 or 23 percent above April, residential awards $57,315,000 or 3 percent higher, and public and private works and utilities were $26,756,000 or 31 per cent more.

men, many of whom in the Greater Boston area employ hundreds and thousands of the Esplanade's audience.

But musicians are sanguine people. Despite deficits they intend to go right on playing until, as the saying goes, they are "driven right into the ground." That is unlikely to happen.

The Esplanade and the Pops Orchestra mean too much to Boston. It is not enough to house the educational and research center of the nation, to produce the world's finest Symphony, to provide the nation with its wool and many other commodities. Boston is not satisfied unless the unique cultural success of America is its own. The Esplanade concerts are the unique cultural success of America.

None Offers So Much

Other cities have free concerts. Some present symphony music outdoors. A few can attract masses of people. But none offers all these elements: free symphony music, brilliantly played, outdoors. None can draw annually thousands of people from as far as California and Florida in the Esplanade season, to help spark Boston's hotel and tourist trade.

Steadily making their way in public affection and official regard, the Esplanade concerts have been accorded progressive improvements in facilities. For the first five years the orchestra, numbering 46 musicians, played in a wooden shell constructed at the expense of the Metropolitan District Commission, in whose jurisdiction the grounds belonged.

A larger orchestra and larger shell, this one of welded steel plates, took over in 1934. On July 2, 1940, the present granite Hatch Shell was dedicated. The major part of the cost $240,000, was derived from the bequest of Maria Hatch, left for the purpose of erecting a memorial to her brother Edward. The orchestra is now approximately double that of 1929.

To make possible the presentation of certain religious works, and some symphonic music written for organ and orchestra, former Governor Alvan T. Fuller, shortly after the Hatch Shell was completed, donated a handsome and valuable Hammond Organ to be permanently installed therein. This was in honor of his mother.

Names Carved in Steps

Carved into the steps leading to the director's rostrum in the Hatch Shell are the names of the masters of music—Brahms, Mozart, Bizet, Handel, Beethoven, and a host of others. Thus always reminded of the great as he mounts his podium, Arthur Fiedler has never ceased trying to make the great popular and beloved as well. He has succeeded amazingly.

Not only a proficient musician, Mr. Fiedler is also an expert showman, and an uncanny judge of what will go, and what will not.

He has introduced symphony music to the Esplanade in easy stages, at first only one or two movements at a time. Finally, in his seventh season, 1935, Mr. Fiedler tested his audience by playing every one of the nine Beethoven Symphonies, omitting only the vocal part of the Ninth. Friends warned him he would lose his audience. The audience swelled and has continued to do so.

The original pattern has varied and widened many times to include people of all ages and tastes. Since

—please turn to page 30

(Photos by Lenscraft Photos, Inc.)

ABOVE—FAMOUS COMPOSERS AT THE BOSTON POPS. Standing, Oscar Hammerstein (left) and Richard Rodgers. Seated (at same table) left to right, Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mrs. Kelleher, Mrs. Byron Tosi.

AT RIGHT—"GENTLEMEN, PLEASE! You are running away with yourselves," admonishes Arthur Fiedler to his famous Boston Pops Orchestra now having its 23rd outdoor season on the Charles River Esplanade.

"Looking Ahead with Boston"

NUMEROUS advantages Boston has over other big cities were cited by President Paul T. Rothwell of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce in a talk on "Looking Ahead with Boston" last month before the Boston Kiwanis Club at Hotel Touraine.

Mr. Rothwell, who also outlined some of the recent accomplishments of the Chamber and a number of its immediate aims, declared in part:

"When I speak of Boston, I do not refer merely to that bit of land stretching from the Neponset Bridge or the Dedham Line to Sullivan Square, but the real Boston, the Boston Metropolitan Area which represents the single economic, civic and cultural center which is the source of livelihood and well-being for nearly all of us.

"It would probably be appropriate right here to say something about these advantages of Boston, but I am going to resist that temptation and reverse the usual course in order to examine for a moment one of the strangest phenomena of our time and place—and that is, the tendency of so many of our people to dwell on our civic infirmities and shortcomings rather than upon those things of which Boston should be justly proud.

"That is not the case in other cities. Our friends returning from the South, the West and the Central West report with wonder of the fierce pride which citizens of those areas exhibit about their own advantages —and the indignation they express if even the slightest doubt or criticism of their communities is mentioned. Yet they do not—not one of them—possess the wealth of attractions or leadership qualities which repose in the Boston area; and if they did how noisily and persistently would they proclaim these advantages.

"I think it is actually possible to say that strangers coming to Boston praise our community more than do we ourselves; whereas all too frequently our tendency is to compare the worst of what we have with the best of all other communities combined.

"You are as familiar as I with that typical Boston failing. Criticism of this sort could be helpful to some extent if we also realize that something is being done to correct those faults which are within human control; if it is realized that our leaders are working earnestly to improve them; and especially if the critics realize that they too have a stake and a responsibility to cooperate in bringing this improvement about.

Foresees Better Days

"I am one—and not merely because I happen to be president of the Chamber of Commerce — who believes that a change for the better has begun to assert itself in the minds of our people. I believe we can see a heightening of civic morale and civic solidarity, based on those factors which have already won for Boston in two successive years the distinction of being designated an 'all-American city.'

"I believe this improvement stems from the determination of the people of Boston to establish a new form of government and select for their leaders men in whom they feel genuine confidence. I certainly feel, and many like me do also, that Boston's prestige is being revived, that Boston is regaining its self respect, and that the old standard of decency in civic affairs is being restored.

"They believe too that the progress being made, slow as it is, in implementing the new and simplified administrative process in our municipal government and that the steps being taken to improve the management of Boston's debt represent a refreshing gain in morale and an enormous increase in our commercial assets.

Graduated Tax Foes Help Defeat Project

State of New England

By Edgar M. Mills
New England Political Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Behind the heavy defeat administered to the administration-backed proposed state constitutional amendment to permit levying of a graduated state income tax lies the work of a smoothly operating, long-planned opposition organization and a gubernatorial "faux pas."

But the lion's share of the organization work was performed by the Boston Chamber of Commerce which constantly developed the weapons by which the opposition blasted out the amendment's defeat.

Much of the research work was done by E. J. Brehaut, secretary of the chamber's committee on state affairs. The product of this research was used throughout the state by businessmen and civic organization workers in their contacts with legislators.

In the campaign to defeat the graduated income-tax amendment opponents throughout the state employed with considerable

"LION'S SHARE OF THE WORK"

That's what the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce did in organizing the opposition to the graduated state income tax project on Beacon Hill, as stated in this special article on the subject which appeared recently in The Christian Science Monitor.

H. N. HARTWELL & SON, Inc.
Established Over 50 Years
★
Wholesalers of ANTHRACITE and BITUMINOUS COAL
DOMESTIC FUEL OIL
HEAVY OIL for INDUSTRY
★
PARK SQUARE BUILDING — BOSTON, MASS.

Fairfield & Ellis
INSURANCE
SIXTY CONGRESS STREET BOSTON 9
The Ground Floor Office That's on the Square

STEEL For Every Purpose
- ALUMINUM — BRASS — COPPER — BRONZE
- STAINLESS STEELS — ALLOYS — TOOL STEELS
- WELDING SUPPLIES — BOILER TUBES — CHAIN
- BOLTS — RIVETS — SCREWS — INDUSTRIAL SUPPLIES

ARTHUR C. HARVEY CO.
Allston District Boston, Mass.

FULL LICENSE PRIVILEGES COMPLETELY RENOVATED
COFFEE SHOP
100% Sprinkler System Protection Throughout
IDEAL LOCATION
Half-way between White Mountains and Green Mountains
Write — Wire — Telephone
THE ST. JOHNSBURY HOUSE
St. Johnsbury, Vermont

strains to be found anywhere in the land.

"What we have inherited from the past can also serve as a foundation for our future. Even, as I say, if we may not build the dream city of tomorrow or see here the last fulfillment of human hope, we shall still have a good city and I believe a superior city. Yet, despite all that we may do, our achievements will be small unless we look hopefully to a power beyond our own. What I mean is best expressed by that philosophy with which you are all familiar, although perhaps in different words than I can recall—'Unless the Lord buildeth he labors in vain who builds. Unless the Lord keep watch over the city he labors in vain who watches.'

"Boston has been singularly blessed over the years. The best wish which I can hold for our future is that we may have the wisdom to strive that we may earn a continuance of that blessing."

FIRST . . . .

(continued from page 7)

1938 there have been concerts for children on Wednesday mornings, sometimes with narrations and special skits, with group singing, and always, beautiful music.

To use a crude analogy: P. T. Barnum used his side show to entice crowds into the Big Top. Arthur Fiedler uses any novelty within reason and the dictates of taste (these are never exceeded), to entice the young, and the old too, into the realm of beautiful sounds, which is appreciation of fine music.

Such was his now famous medley of radio singing commercial tunes, arranged by Leroy Anderson, and played a la the most pompous of classical music. This was one of the most productive free advertisements ever given to Rinso, Lifebuoy and similar organizations peddling their wares through the medium of the radio jingle.

It was followed up in later years with various fantasies on juke-box favorites, patriotic songs, Irish airs, and musical comedy favorites. The Pops Orchestra can switch from Wagner to Wearever, from Die Fledermaus to Danny Boy with real aplomb. And the audiences often don't know which they like better.

Leroy Anderson is a major

[236]

has engaged the Chamber's attention for a quarter century.

Fire Prevention

"'(6) The development of a sound fire prevention program and a modern fire code for Boston—a goal which needs no elucidation.

"' (7) An expansion of our foreign trade and the development and maintenance of general port services.

"' (8) The achievement of a sound American opportunity education program, to which I have already referred.

"'(9) A new wholesale and distribution program in order to provide activities and the proper recognition appropriate to the nation's third largest wholesale center.

"'(10) Vigorous efforts to provide the most economical and efficient transportation services for New England.'

"As I have said, the Chamber makes no claim to originality or to sole responsibility for these vital needs, which we must attain if we are properly to claim leadership among American communities. They are certainly goals worth striving for and worthy of the effort of every civic-minded group, including, of course, your own.

"No single group knows all the answers. There is no blueprint for the golden city of the future.

"In any appraisal of Boston's attainments and progress we must never fail to realize how much we owe to the past. We have inherited many material advantages, but we have been also endowed with what may possibly be even more potent gifts on the spiritual and ethical level.

"The New England character is still a valid standard of conduct everywhere, but we right here are its chief beneficiaries.

"We have less crime on the whole —sensational as have been a few of the criminal acts committed here. We have a deeper religious spirit, a better appreciation of brotherhood, more church goers, and the most outstanding amalgamation of racial

1897 1952

DOMESTIC HARDWOODS

MAHOGANY

SUGAR PINE — EASTERN PINE

Air Dried — Kiln Dried

CHARLES HOLYOKE LUMBER CORPORATION

Yard and Office: 231 Medford Street, Charlestown, Mass.

Telephones: CHarlestown 2-1136, 2-1137, 2-1138

KALER, CARNEY, LIFFLER & CO.

General Agents

REPRESENTING LEADING INSURANCE COMPANIES FOR OVER 55 YEARS

141 MILK STREET · LIberty 2-7460 · BOSTON 9, MASS.

achievement of the Pops. Not that the orchestra does not play the music of other young and talented arrangers and composers, and not that he need depend on any one orchestra to defend his place as a leading composer of light classics in the U.S. But through the medium of the Pops concerts on the Esplanade, Anderson has made himself easily the most popular composer Boston has called its own in years, maybe ever.

Scores of child proteges and unknown but richly endowed musicians, many from Boston's own musical schools and colleges, have been introduced to the Esplanade audiences as soloists and accompanists with the orchestra. What such an opportunity to play with a famous symphony orchestra before an audience of thousands can mean to a young musician's career and ambition all can see. Some of these proteges have been high school and even grade school children.

They are all part of a plan: a plan to cinch Boston's position as the music leader of America, a plan to bring music to all who have ears to hear it, whether or not they have money to pay for it, an eminently successful plan conceived 23 years ago this month by a young Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist, Arthur Fiedler.

EXECUTIVE EMPLOYMENT

In this column appear brief statements regarding persons desiring executive employment or the requirements of those wishing to secure executives. Positions below the rank of minor executives cannot be included. While statements inserted in this column are believed to be true, they are not guaranteed by "Boston Business" or the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce. Queries should be addressed to the Commercial and Industrial Department of the Chamber.

E-2613 Young sales engineer with insurance background is anxious to locate with organization offering chance of advancement.

E-2614 Young sales executive with thorough knowledge of export trade would like to join the foreign division of company offering opportunity for advancement.

E-2615 Sales executive with wealth of experience in metal and building material lines seeks a position equal to his capacity and ability.

E-2616 Textile sales and sales promotion executive with heavy experience available as consultant or full time.

E-2617 Energetic executive sixteen years personnel managership and administrative experience, desires challenge and broad responsibility as Personnel Manager.

IT'S EASY TO REACH THE BANGOR HOUSE FROM BOSTON

By RAIL . . . . . Dependable Daily Trains including the Streamlined "Flying Yankee."

By AIR . . . . . Convenient Fast Modern Transport Planes with daily arrivals at the improved Bangor Airport.

By HIGHWAY . . Comfortable day's ride in dependable Buses or your own automobile.

Daily Rates $1.75 Up • Capacity 250 ALLEN HOTEL CO.

Enviable Reputation for Serving the Best Food in Maine Frank Allen, Mgr.

1893 — 1952

An organization whose over half-century of experience in the design of industrial plants is at your service for consultation, suggestion and constructive development.

Investigations • Appraisals • Reports

CHAS. T. MAIN, Inc.

80 FEDERAL STREET, BOSTON

[236]

Musical America

JUNE, 1952

CHARLES MUNCH

Musical America

JUNE, 1952

CHARLES MUNCH

Radio Poll

(Continued from page 3)

ception: the Standard Hour, broadcast by NBC on the Pacific Coast, appears for the first time in the poll in third place among Symphony Orchestras. Two singers, Patrice Munsel and Dorothy Kirsten, enter the lists, Miss Munsel tying for second place among Women Singers with Bidu Sayao and Marian Anderson, who were in a two-way tie for third place last year. Miss Kirsten ties for third place with Miss Steber.

A pianist new to the poll is Clifford Curzon, in second place, with Robert Casadesus, second, last year in third. Isaac Stern is another new poll name, taking second place as Violinist, with Zino Francescatti once again in third. Alexander Schreiner is new as the secondplace Organist, with Richard Ellsasser remaining in third.

Among Men Singers, Leonard Warren, whose name has appeared twice previously in second place, occupies the same spot this year, while Ferruccio Tagliavini exchanged second place for third.

Bruno Walter's is a familiar name to the poll, having been listed both as operatic and symphony conductor. This year, he appears in third place in the latter category. The Opera Conductor category is one of two that remain exactly as they were last year, the other being the Orchestra with Featured Artists. Eugene Ormandy, who conducted Fledermaus at the Metropolitan, is again in second place. Fausto Cleva, who conducted Aïda and other operas, is in third. The Voice of Firestone (NBC) appears again as runner-up in the Orchestra with Featured Artists classification; Concert of Europe (ABC) is third.

BECAUSE of the streamlining of the poll, several categories were omitted to rectify any possible injustice, voters were asked for a write-in vote to name any program not in the poll categories that they believed worthy of mention. Two favorites of the years—the Longines Symphonette, conducted by Mishel Piastro, and the Railroad Hour, an operetta program—were prominently mentioned. Others that received a vote from one or more were a program of old records, played and commented on by Wally Butterworth; the Mario Lanza Show (NBC); the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir (CBS); the Choraliers, a male-voice ensemble (CBS); and Stars in Khaki and Blue (NBC), a showcase for talent in the Armed forces. One critic cited the Boston Symphony Rehearsals as a splendid program. Unfortunately, it has not been broadcast this year. Alison M. Lyle, of the Yakima, Wash., Sunday Herald, and several others mention James Fassett's Your Invitation to Music, a recorded program over CBS, which fills the New York Philharmonic-Symphony time in the summer.

Many critics wanted to favor local programs, and described their candidates with pride. Among these were George Stone's Promenade Concert, broadcast by WMAQ, Chicago, which Theo Jean Ahrends, of the Peoria Star claims is "the only late-evening program in the Midwest (that I know of) that carries classical music"; Treasured Music, a transcribed series of four-and-one-half hours from WOSU, Columbus, Ohio, which Lola Hill, of the Piqua Daily Call, says, in capital letters, "has no commercials"; and Gunnar Johansen's Bach series, over the University of Wisconsin station, WHA, and the State Radio Council's FM network, recommended by William L. Doudna of the Wisconsin State Journal, Madison.

Canadian programs are mentioned by correspondents from that dominion, among them the CBC Little Symphony, by E. B. Young, of the Ottawa Journal, and Les Petites Symphonies (Mutual-CBC), by Eric McLean, of the Montreal Star, and Pierre Gascon, of the Montreal Photo-Journal, who also puts in a word for a program called Stage 52. Phil Barney of the Tampa Tribune, says one of his favorite programs is Serenata mejicana, a daily half-hour program of good Mexican music, from station CMW, Havana.

To encourage radio's still feeble interest in contemporary music, critics ranged far and wide once Amahl and the Night Visitors had been voted into first place. They took considerable notice of the Contemporary Festival Broadcast over CBS, and they voted for two works heard on it—Alexei Haieff's Piano Concerto and Roger Goeb's Symphony. Howard Swanson's Short Symphony, a winner of the New York Critics' Circle Award, broadcast by the NBC Symphony under Milton Katims, was mentioned, as was William Schuman's Sixth Symphony. Other votes went to Britten's Peter Grimes, which was evidently heard in Canada if not in the United States, and Berg's Wozzeck. The concert performance of Berg's opera by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony ranked high in the Outstanding Event of the Year voting. The Columbia Festival and the Critics' Circle broadcast also received attention in this department.

Whether television should show recitals and orchestra concerts or devote itself exclusively to stage productions, including opera, musical comedy, operettas, and ballet, was a controversial issue. There were several dissenters to TV recitals, led by John Rosenfield, of the Dallas Morning News, who says: "I doubt the possibility of concerts on TV; it is an incompatible mixture of sight and sound." Another "No" to concerts was registered by Walter Monfried, of the Milwaukee Journal. Many, however, while voting for operatic productions, included concerts among their preferences. "Recitals à la Poulenc and Bernac, and opera à la Amahl," are the choices of Paul Hume, of the Washington Post. Anne Norman, of the Hartford (Conn.) Times, wants to see "good orchestras with guest artists," as does Ina B. Wickham, of the Davenport (Iowa) Democrat and Leader. A voter whose name cannot be used amplifies this by insisting on TV portrayals of conductors or artists whose technique can be clearly shown. Earl J. Dias, of the New Bedford (Mass.) Standard Times, specifies recital programs such as the series Meet the Masters.

Contemporary music, which includes music composed specially for TV, took the lead in voters' preferences. Conrad B. Harrison, of the Salt Lake City Deseret News, asked for new music, "if only to stimulate contemporary writers. He believes in the concert form for TV, saying that it "can sell serious music." Mildred Norton, of the Los Angeles Daily News, wants contemporary-music forums, in addition to composition workshops, good light opera, and youth programs. Burton Bernstein of The Dartmouth, Hanover, N. H., would like to see "concert programs with a minimum of war-horses, and a maximum of works by contemporary composers of all shapes and sizes." Ralph Lewando, of the Pittsburg Press, believes that new works should be given, as stimulation to the composer. Works by Leroy Anderson, Piston, Menotti, and Schuman were specified by an anonymous correspondent from Lincoln, Neb., who also wants to hear—and see—modern music from Europe and telecasts from the Metropolitan, San Francisco, New York City, and Toronto operas.

Helene Lewis Coffer, of the Ponca City (Okla.) News, thinks there is "no need for new works specially composed. Let's hear the best of the new symphonies and choral works already written," she adds.

The telecasting of opera is important, believes J. F. Goossen, of the St. Cloud (Minn.) Daily Times, because it offers TV a "chance to grow up—if it wants to." Harry Warner, Jr., of the Hagerstown (Md.) Herald-Mail, advocates single acts of opera instead of abridgements, adding that many single acts will be found to be just the right length and complete in dramatic and musical entity. Scenes from opera "with action" are suggested by Ethelyn Sexton, of the Lansing (Mich.) State Journal. "TV to date can't stage large ensembles," she comments. Miss Sexton is one of the few to excoriate TV commercials. "They detract from all programs—they are so vivid," she says. "But they are most irritating for the lone singer."

The pro-opera and con-concert view for TV is expressed by Winstead D. Smith, of the Richmond (Calif.) Independent. "Ossification of opera makes the present form abhorrent to me," he writes, "but TV opera, specially composed and staged, might put life in the corpse. Concerts, on the other hand, should stay on radio, with no visual distraction."

"Something original and with movement," is advocated by Maxine Cushing Gray, of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, in other words, "serious choreography." E. B. Young, of the Ottawa Journal, is in favor of TV dance productions, as is Miss Sexton, if the ensembles are small, like Mia Slavenska's or Spanish dance troupes. Thomas H. Hamilton, of the Mounmouth (Ill.) Daily Review Atlas, expresses himself more tersely. "Ballet!" is what he wants.

Several writers expressed the desire to see educational programs on TV, among them Charles D. Perlee, of the Pasadena Star News, and Miss Norton of Los Angeles. Another California voter, Clifford Gessler, of the Oakland Tribune, would like to witness performances of folk songs by authentic singers, and ballet.

Against the violent repudiation of TV in any form—"Keep it away!" (one West Coast writer) and "Am not even giving a set house-room!" (a New York State voter who perfers to be anonymous)—can be placed the philosophic and optimistic summing-up of Albert Elias, of the New York Compass: "Ideally it should be a type of program no other medium does better."

THE question of recorded vs. live music provided some thoughtful comment, as well as a few fireworks. The question was phrased:

"The use of transcriptions is more and more prevalent on networks, as well as forming the chief musical content of local stations. Should this be discouraged on the ground that it constitutes a menace to the employment of live talent?"

The Nos, reflecting tolerance of recorded music, outnumbered the Yeses by more than two to one—chiefly it would seem, because local stations are the only recourse of many listeners, and most local stations cannot afford to hire much live talent. The voting on this question reflected a faute de mieux attitude expressed succinctly by E. B. Young, of the Ottawa Journal: "Without records we just would not have enough good music here."

Another trend was toward unqualified approval of recorded programs. Among the objectors is Marshall F. Bryant, of the Portland (Me.) Press-Herald, Evening Express, and Sunday Telegram. He writes: "It removes the local opportunity, or responsibility, to provide experience to young singers and instrumental musicians in the art of broadcasting, not to mention the lowering of the level of good music . . . In the earlier days of radio, it was possible to acquire a somewhat liberal education in good music. Except for a few programs, the radio stations do mighty little to raise the level above the infantile . . ." In agreement with him, and emphasizing the need for development and employment through radio of new talent, are G. Appleby, of the British Columbian, New Westminster, B. C.; Helen A. F. Penniman, of the Baltimore News-Post; and Conrad B. Harrison, of the Salt Lake City Deseret News who adds: "Just to play records narrows the field to the most famous or 'popular' artists. Live programs lead to performance in a

WINNERS IN MUSICAL AMERICA'S 1952 RADIO POLL

Outstanding Event of the Year
Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Arturo Toscanini (NBC)

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera Broadcast (ABC)
1. Strauss's Elektra
2. Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte
3. Gluck's Alcestis

Outstanding New Work
Menotti's Amahl and the Night Visitors (NBC-TV)

Network serving most faithfully the cause of serious music
National Broadcasting Company

Music on Television
(Opera)
NBC-TV Opera Theatre

(Concert)
NBC Symphony

Symphony Orchestra
1. New York Philharmonic-Symphony (CBS)
2. NBC Symphony
3. Standard Hour (Pacific Coast, NBC)

Orchestra with Featured Artists
1. Telephone Hour (NBC)
2. Voice of Firestone (NBC)
3. Concert of Europe (ABC)

Symphony Conductor
1. Arturo Toscanini
2. Dimitri Mitropoulos
3. Bruno Walter

Opera Conductor
1. Fritz Reiner
2. Eugene Ormandy
3. Fausto Cleva

Woman Singer
1. Kirsten Flagstad
2. Patrice Munsel, Bidu Sayao, Marian Anderson
3. Eleanor Steber, Dorothy Kirsten

Man Singer
1. Jussi Bjoerling
2. Leonard Warren
3. Ferruccio Tagliavini

Pianist
1. Artur Rubinstein
2. Clifford Curzon
3. Robert Casadesus

Violinist
1. Jascha Heifetz
2. Isaac Stern
3. Zino Francescatti

Organist
1. E. Power Biggs
2. Alexander Schreiner
3. Richard Ellsasser

[257]

San Francisco Music Wanes As Opera Announces Plans

SAN FRANCISCO'S thirtieth annual opera season will open on Sept. 16 with a performance of Puccini's Tosca, according to preliminary announcements issued by the San Francisco Opera Association. A total of 41 performances are scheduled for California cities, and the repertoire indicates an uncommonly novel and adventurous season.

Major interest is divided between a new production of Strauss's Der Rosenkavalier, which will be given in the new English translation by John Gutman, and in a new production of Boito's Mefistofele, which has not been heard in San Francisco since 1923. It is understood that Nicola Rossi-Lemeni will sing the title role in Mefistofele.

A third opera will be given a new production, Mozart's Don Giovanni. Other works to be presented during the season will be Verdi's Aïda, Il Trovatore, and La Traviata; Puccini's La Bohème and the trilogy consisting of Il Tabarro, Suor Angelica, and Gianni Schicchi; Donizetti's La Fille du Régiment; Montemezzi's L'Amore dei Tre Re; Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana; and Leoncavallo's Pagliacci.

Singers who will make their San Francisco debuts with the company are Mary Curtis, soprano; Fedora Barbieri and Margaret Roggero, mezzo-sopranos; Virginio Assandri, tenor; and Jan Gbur and Frank Guarrera, baritones. Singing for the first time with the company will be Jean Fenn, soprano, and Brian Sullivan, tenor.

Artists who have been re-engaged include Dorothy Kirsten, Brenda Lewis, Herva Nelli, Lily Pons, Bidu Sayao, Thelma Votipka, Dorothy Warenskjold, Eileen Baldwin, and Yvonne Chauveau, sopranos; Blanche Thebom and Claramae Turner, contraltos; Eugene Conley, Caesar Curzi, Mario del Monaco, Alessio de Paolis, Walter Fredericks, Ernest Lawrence, Jan Peerce, James Schwabacher, Ferruccio Tagliavini, and Frans Vroons, tenors; George Cehanovsky, Colin Harvey, Ralph Herbert, Giuseppe Valdengo, Frank Valentino, and Robert Weede, baritones; and Lorenzo Alvary, Salvatore Baccaloni, Dezso Ernster, Désiré Ligeti, Nicola Moscana, Mr. Rossi-Lemeni, and Italo Tajo, basses.

Gaetano Merola continues as general director of the association. The position of assistant to the general director has been created this season, with Kurt Herbert Adler appointed to the post. On the musical staff are Paul Breisach, Pietro Cimara, Fausto Cleva, Glauco Curiel, Antonio Dell'Orefice, Richard Karp, Karl Kritz, Mr. Merola, Corrado Mucčini, and Giacomo Spadoni. Armando Agnini is technical and stage director; Herbert Graf, stage director; Mr. Adler, chorus director; Lew Christensen, choreographer; Etienne Barone, stage manager; and Madi Bacon, director of the boys' chorus.

The company will give eleven performances in Los Angeles. San Diego has joined Sacramento and Fresno as cities where a single performance will be staged. Three matinees for young people will again be sponsored by the local opera guild.

Eight guest conductors for the San Francisco Symphony's 1952-53 season have already been announced—George Szell, Victor de Sabata, Enrique Jorda, Erich Leinsdorf, Alfred Wallenstein, Bruno Walter, Leopold Stokowski, and Massimo Freccia. Other names will be added to the list later.

The Hungarian String Quartet will give the regular summer series of chamber-music programs sponsored jointly by the San Francisco Museum of Art and Mills College. Six programs, beginning June 24, are scheduled at the museum. Each will open with a Mozart quartet.

In its April concert the San Francisco String Quartet was joined by Maria Kurenko in works for soprano and quartet by Virgil Thomson, Chausson, Gretchaninoff, and Pizzetti. In the final program of its eighteenth season the quartet, aided by Jane Hofeld as guest pianist, gave the American premiere of Tibor Harsanyi's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra.

The California String Quartet concluded its series in the Museum of Art with a program that included Berg's Lyric Suite and Bruckner's String Quintet. Ferenc Molnar was the assisting violist.

The Composers' Forum presented chamber music by Paul Pisk, Ernst Krenek, Harold Schiffman, Ingvar Litholm, Charles Duncan, Darius Milhaud, Anton Webern, and Walter Piston, in its April program at the museum. Sonatas for violin and piano by Charles Ives, Beethoven, Lopatnikoff, and Schubert were capably presented by Frances Wiener and Lev Shorr as they ended their season.

One of the finest of recent recitals was that given by Jan Peerce, who sang with beauty of tone and phrasing in a program ranging from oratorio and opera to art song and ballad. A recital by Vronsky and Babin ended the Spencer Barefoot Celebrity Series, and one by Artur Rubinstein ended the Paul Posz concert series.

Alexandra Danilova was guest artist in the spring program presented by the San Francisco Ballet in the opera house. In the program were Swan Lake, with Sally Bailey as Odette and Roland Vazquez as the Prince; Le Gourmand, a novelty more distinguished for Leonard Weisgard's costumes than for Lew Christensen's choreography; Serenade, with Miss Danilova; and Parranda, a colorful South American fantasy devised and designed by Sotomayer. The company, without Miss Danilova, gave a special children's matinee, offering a new version of Carnival of Animals.

The new San Francisco Schola Cantorum, directed by Giovanni Camajani and sponsored by the University of San Francisco, made an impressive debut in the opera house with a program of generally unfamiliar sacred music, both ancient and modern, including Gustav Holst's How Mighty Are The Sabbaths and Thomas Canning's Rogation Hymn.

The University of California Extension Division Chorus, directed by Madi Bacon, beautifully assisted by the Little Symphony of San Francisco, presented the local premieres of Schubert's E flat major Mass and Holst's The Hymn of Jesus, with impressive musical results.

Debut recitals have been given by Tamara Masloff, Freda Trepel, Dorothy Cumming, Douglas Thompson, and Richard Corbett, pianists. Mr. Thompson introduced here Samuel Barber's interesting C minor Sonata. Stephen Bishop, outstanding eleven-year-old pianist of this city, and Roy Bogas, gifted teen-age resident pianist, were also heard. Tadeisz Kadzielawa, excellent cellist of the San Francisco Symphony; Ernestine Riedel, violinist; Joseph Eger, French horn player, and Dorothy Anthony, flutist; and Iris Mabry, dancer, and Ralph Gilbert, composer-pianist, also appeared in debut programs. Donald Gramm, excellent young bass-baritone, was the assisting artist in a program by the San Francisco Boys Choir, directed by Madi Bacon.

—MARJORY M. FISHER

Halasz Awarded Verdict by Jury In Dismissal Suit

Laszlo Halasz, who was dismissed last Dec. 21 as musical director of the New York City Opera Company, won a verdict for $15,324 from a New York Supreme Court jury on May 28 in his $37,000 suit against the New York City Center of Music and Drama, which operates the company. The trial began on May 15.

The jury unanimously agreed that Mr. Halasz's conduct before dismissal did not constitute a threat to the "prosperity and advancement" of the City Center and that the organization did not have sufficient reason to break his contract, which ran until Dec. 31, 1952, and discharge him. The $15,324 awarded him included $12,000 due under the contract, $2,200 due for services while on tour with the company, and $1,124 for expenses incurred during a talent-scouting trip in Europe. The sum Mr. Halasz originally sued for was cut down when certain claims were eliminated by Judge Carroll G. Walter, after studying the contract, and others were turned down by the jury.

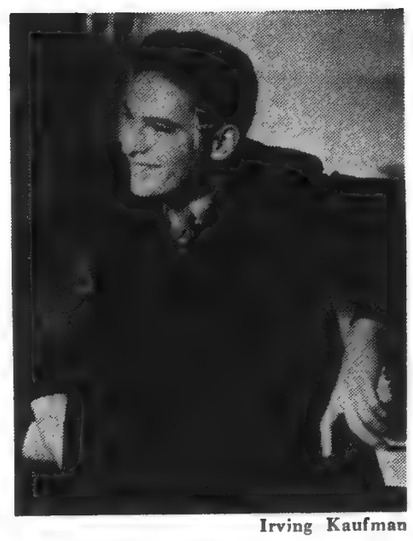
When Mr. Halasz was dismissed the City Center offered the conductor as an alternative $12,000 in exchange for his resignation, which the conductor refused.

During the trial Milton Pollack, attorney for Mr. Halasz, brought fifteen singers and officials of the company to the witness stand to testify to the former director's abilities as an artist and executive. Other members of the company, including Joseph Rosenstock, now general director of the company, and John White, now stage director, were called by Francis J. Bloustein, attorney for the City Center. On the basis of their testimony and the findings of a special committee appointed to study alleged complaints against Mr. Halasz, Mr. Bloustein attempted to show the conductor as "petulant, temperamental and insubordinate to a degree no employer could tolerate."

Since Mr. Halasz's dismissal, there has been severe criticism of the administrative policy of the center's board of directors, and four of the directors resigned: Frederic Umhay, who protested the action regarding Mr. Halasz; Jacob S. Potofsky, who felt that the New York City Ballet, operated by the center, should not have visited Spain during its current European tour; and Howard S. Cullman and Gerald Warburg, who thought the center should have a managing director.

Newbold Morris, chairman of the board, defended its actions in his report to the ninth annual incorporators meeting, on May 20. He noted that the policy had not changed since the center began operations in 1943, that the cost of a managing director is prohibitive, and that the center has always functioned through the board of directors. The report also showed a reduction of operating costs, and this year's deficit amounted to $32,448, as compared to last year's of $68,937. Gross income for the season was estimated at $1,700,000.

The four directors elected to replace those who designed are Mrs. Vincent Astor, Lincoln Kirstein, Dr. Louis Carp, and Thomas J. Todarelli.



Irving Kaufman

Leon Fleisher

American Pianist Wins Belgian Contest

BRUSSELS.—Leon Fleisher, 24-year-old American pianist, won the first prize of 150,000 francs ($3,000) in the 1952 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Musical Competition. Two other Americans received prizes in the piano contest: Lamar Crowson, in sixth place, won 40,000 francs ($800), and Theodore Lettvin, in seventh place, won 35,000 francs ($700).

The remaining nine winners were Karl Engel, of Switzerland; Maria Tipo, of Italy; Frans Brouw, of Belgium; Laurence Davis, of Australia; Yury Boukoff, of Bulgaria; Jacques Coulaud, of France; Philippe Entremont, of France; Hans Graf, of Austria; and Janine Kinet, of Belgium. Seventy-five pianists, representing 21 nations as far apart as Cuba and Australia, competed.

The judges were Olin Downes, Rudolf Firkusny, and Artur Rubinstein, of the United States; Walter Kerschpaumer, of Austria; Eduardo de Pueyo, of Spain; Robert Casadesus, Marguérite Long, and Magda Tagliaferro, of France; Kathleen Long, of Great Britain; Carlo Zecchi, of Italy; Willem Andriessen, of the Netherlands; and Emile Bosquet and René Defossez of Belgium.

In the finals, the contestants were required to play with orchestra a new concerto by the Belgian composer Raymond Chevreuille, which they had been given one week to study, and a concerto of their own choosing.

This was the second Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Musical Competition. Last year's was held among violinists.

Kreisler Retains Post With Veterans Service Group

Fritz Kreisler has been re-elected chairman of the board of the Hospitalized Veterans' Music Service, in New York. Mrs. Lytle Hull remains president and Yolanda Mero-Irion executive director. Vice-presidents are Mrs. Stanley L. Richter, Albert Spalding, and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway. The treasurer is Edwin B. Orcutt.

Three Composers Given Arts and Letters Grants

Three of the fifteen recipients of the annual $1,000 Arts and Letters Grants awarded this spring by the National Institute of Arts and Letters are composers—Robert Kurka, John Lessard, and Howard Swanson. Mr. Kurka and Mr. Swanson were also awarded Guggenheim Fellowships this year.

Sevitzky To Continue With Indianapolis Symphony

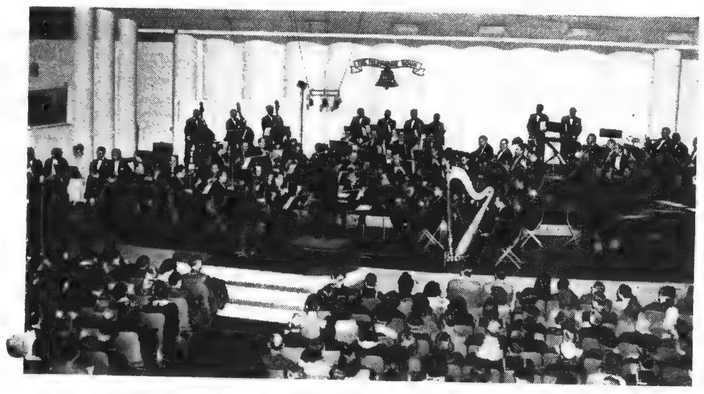
Fabien Sevitzky, who recently completed his fifteenth season as conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony, has signed a contract to continue in that post for another five years, through the 1956-57 season.

New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

NBC Symphony, Arturo Toscanini, conductor, winners in three categories

TV CONCERTS—SPECIAL AWARDS



Telephone Hour, Donald Voorhees, conductor

ORCHESTRA WITH FEATURED ARTISTS

Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera Amahl and the Night Visitors

OUTSTANDING NEW WORK

Jascha Heifetz
VIOLINIST

Artur Rubinstein
PIANIST

E. Power Biggs
ORGANIST

Jussi Bjoerling
MAN SINGER

Kirsten Flagstad
WOMAN SINGER

Fritz Reiner
OPERA CONDUCTOR

wider field, a much broader use of individual expression and consequently a more thorough presentation of interpretive thinking."

"A decided threat," says Earl J. Dias, of the New Bedford (Mass.) Standard-Times, speaking of recorded broadcasts. William McMahon, of the Atlantic City Press Union, goes further: "The biggest threat to production of new concert artists," he calls them. Kenneth Gill, of the Buffalo Courier-Express, believes that the present situation in Buffalo, where there are very few live concerts on the air, could be relieved by eliminating recordings. Alice Pardoe West, of the Ogden (Utah) Standard-Examiner, would not go so far. She believes recordings are "all right, but can't compare with live talent and relying on them is bad for the artist."

Three voters express sentiments to the effect that recordings should be minimized because the quality of live performances is better. Records are "depressingly lack lustre," says J. F. Goossen, of the St. Cloud (Minn.) Daily Times. "Lack the appeal of live performance," believes E. Clyde Whitlock, of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. Eric McLean, of the Montreal Star, called the question "loaded," believing that records should not be discouraged because of the question of employment but because live performances are invariably more interesting. "The preceding program was transcribed" has spoiled many a program for Edgar S. Van Olinda, of the Albany Times Union.

Fred Broomfield, of the North Hollywood San Fernando Valley Times, sums up the anti-record side: "Why put music in cans with the vegetables?," he demands.

Differentiation between network and local programs, in problems of cost and in availability of talent, was made by many correspondents, who tolerate recorded programs because they cannot get live ones, although many recommended the use of live talent whenever possible. These include Lola Hill, of the Piqua (Ohio) Daily Call; Helene Lewis Coffer, of the Ponca City (Okla.) News; Charles D. Perlee, of the Pasadena Star-News; Thomas H. Hamilton, of the Monmouth (Ill.) Daily Review Atlas; Clifford Gessler, of the Oakland Tribune; Ralph Lewando, of the Pittsburgh Press; Al Haugner, of the Port Huron (Mich.) Times Herald; Mary B. Mico, of the Canton (Ohio) Repository; Warner Twyford, of the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot; Frances Griffin, of the Winston-Salem (N. C.) Twin City Sentinel; Anne Norman, of the Hartford Times; Ina B. Wickham, of the Davenport (Ia.) Morning Democrat; Lowell Lehman, of the Chattanooga News-Free Press; Sidney Ives, of the Orlando (Fla.) Sentinel-Star; and Maurine Halliburton, of the Tulsa Daily World.

An even more positive note is sounded by several critics, who, like John Rosenfield, of the Dallas Morning News, point out that "it takes live talent to make records, too." The economics of the matter will settle the problem, Mr. Rosenfield believes, and the main business is to secure good music broadcasts. William L. Doudna, of the Madison Wisconsin State Journal, thinks that there is a good case for recordings helping live talent in the long run. Agreeing with Mr. Rosenfield that live talent should come first, Paul Hume, of the Washington Post, would never give up recorded programs until there is more live music on the air, and perhaps not then.

The elimination of faults by recording is an advantage cited by Toni Child, of the Columbia (S.C.) Record. "What assails the ear is a canned product, whether a broadcast originates live or recorded," comments Maxine Cushing Gray, of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. "It [recorded music] should only supplement actual performances . . . but the advantage of records is their guaranteed technical excellence."

The section of the voters which expresses almost unqualified approval is plentiful and vocal. Its ideas can be summed up by Jay S. Harrison, of the New York Herald Tribune, who writes: "Canned music is cheaper. Therefore more stations can afford it. As a result, more people can hear it. And that's what I'm interested in."

Gratitude that a larger public is being reached in the cause of good music, and belief that more listening brings deeper appreciation and consequent improvement in the musical situation are the themes expressed by this segment of voters, which includes Elmore Bacon, of the Cleveland News; Bruce Campbell, of the Huron (S.D.) Daily Plainsman; William J. Swank, of the Jackson (Mich.) Citizen Patriot; Norman Shavin, of the Louisville Times; James Frankl, of the Cleveland Press; Ernie Salvatore, of the Huntington (W. Va.) Herald-Advertiser; Martin W. Bush, of the Omaha World-Herald; Mildred Norton, of the Los Angeles Daily News; James K. Guthrie, of the San Bernardino (Calif.) Sun-Telegram; Rowena Scott, of the Portsmouth (Ohio) Times; Helen Crooks, of the Meridian (Miss.) Star; Emmy Brady Rogers, of the Denver Rocky Mountain News; Col. L. R. Boals, of the Youngstown (Ohio) Vindicator; Alison M. Lyle, of the Yakima (Wash.) Sunday Herald; and Helen Mary Hayes, of the Lincoln Nebraska State Journal.

A voter who does not [illegible] name used gives an excellent [illegible] of the problem. "Any [illegible] in this situation can only [illegible] help—music. Needless to [illegible] more incentives we have to [illegible] music as a career, the better [illegible] music will be, but the record [illegible] gram is here to stay, if not [illegible] emphasized. The bulk of [illegible] employment in music must [illegible] through work with the [illegible] number of community orchestras [illegible] operas, with only the best [illegible] to record or to play in the 'big time.'"

J. Abnesch, N. Y.

Vol. LXXII, No. 8
June, 1952

(The contents of MUSI[illegible]

[277]

J. Abnesch, N. Y.

Tremendous Audience Appeal Brings Another Busy Year!

SUMMER HIGHLIGHTS
1952

JULY 7	Telephone Hour
27	Standard Oil Hour
18	Ogden, Utah
19	Repeat performance as Brigham Young
20	in the great American pageant "Ali Faces West", by Roland Parry. (Par-Go Records)
29	Hollywood Bowl under Gaetano Merola
AUG. 5	Ohio State University Recital
SEPT. 22	Telephone Hour

WINTER SEASON
1952-53*

RECITALS	Los Angeles, Seattle, Winnipeg, Charleston, W. Va., etc.
SYMPHONY	Indianapolis, Sioux City, Racine, etc.
RADIO-TV	Guest appearances, Firestone Hour

Igor GORIN

BRILLIANT and EXCITING BARITONE

Few availabilities remaining. For en-route engagements

write, wire or phone

COLUMBIA ARTISTS MANAGEMENT, INC.

Personal Direction: Kurt Weinhold

113 West 57th Street, New York 19, N. Y. Circle 7-6900

Vol. LXXII, No. 8
June, 1952

MUSICAL AMERICA. Printed in the U. S. A. Published monthly on the 15th day of February, March, June, July, August, September, October, and semi-monthly on the 1st and 15th in November, December, January and April, by the Musical America Corporation at 34 No. Crystal St. E. Stroudsburg, Pa. Executive and Editorial Offices, 113 W. 57th St., New York. Entered on November 15, 1949 as second class matter at the Post Office at East Stroudsburg, Pa. Subscription Rates: U. S. and Possessions, $5.00 a year; Canadian, $5.50; Foreign, $6.00. Copyright, 1952.

$5.00 per year
Single Copy, 30 Cents

(The contents of MUSICAL AMERICA are indexed in The Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, and are also available in Microfilm)

J. Abnesch, N. Y.

Tremendous Audience Appeal Brings Another Busy Year!

SUMMER HIGHLIGHTS 1952

JULY 7	Telephone Hour
27	Standard Oil Hour
18	Ogden, Utah
19	Repeat performance as Brigham Young
20	in the great American pageant "Ali Faces West", by Roland Parry. (Par-Go Records)
29	Hollywood Bowl under Gaetano Merola
AUG. 5	Ohio State University Recital
SEPT. 22	Telephone Hour

WINTER SEASON 1952-53*

RECITALS	Los Angeles, Seattle, Winnipeg, Charleston, W. Va., etc.
SYMPHONY	Indianapolis, Sioux City, Racine, etc.
RADIO-TV	Guest appearances, Firestone Hour

Igor GORIN

BRILLIANT and EXCITING BARITONE

Few availabilities remaining. For en-route engagements

write, wire or phone

COLUMBIA ARTISTS MANAGEMENT, INC.

Personal Direction: Kurt Weinhold

113 West 57th Street, New York 19, N. Y. Circle 7-6900

Vol. LXXII, No. 8
June, 1952

MUSICAL AMERICA. Printed in the U. S. A. Published monthly on the 15th day of February, March, June, July, August, September, October, and semi-monthly on the 1st and 15th in November, December, January and April, by the Musical America Corporation at 34 No. Crystal St., E. Stroudsburg, Pa. Executive and Editorial Offices, 113 W. 57th St., New York. Entered on November 15, 1949 as second class matter at the Post Office at East Stroudsburg, Pa. Subscription Rates: U. S. and Possessions, $5.00 a year; Canadian, $5.50; Foreign, $6.00. Copyright, 1952.

$5.00 per year
Single Copy, 30 Cents

(The contents of MUSICAL AMERICA are indexed in The Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, and are also available in Microfilm)

Musical Courier
July '52

Paris Festival Of Arts Has Rare Contrasts

By Suzanne Demarquez

PARIS.—Under the auspices of the Congress for the Freedom of Culture, the International Exposition of the Arts devoted to Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century drew visitors from all around the globe. The events were certainly, in part at least, brilliant, and the variety of eminent artists dazzling.

The programs were the object of heated discussion. One was surprised to find names that might have been spared, while missing those of such eminent French composers as Paul Dukas and Florent Schmitt. To such objections, the organizers of the fete replied that "these composers do not represent the spirit of the Twentieth Century." Of course, a good deal of controversy is certain to arise in such matters, but it is rather obvious that much of the fare offered was not representative of today's esthetics.

Nevertheless, the public was attracted en masse by the superb manifestations, and the halls were pretty generally sold out—as soon as the tickets went on sale, in some cases. A debt of gratitude is owing to Nicolas Nabokov, the chairman of the festival committee, upon whom much of the responsibility for the series devolved.

It opened with an evening at the Church of Saint Roch, dedicated to victims of tyranny during this century. In their memory the Chorale Saint Guillaume from Strasbourg and the Lamoureux Orchestra, conducted by Fritz Munch, offered works of Bach and the first Paris hearing of Poulenc's Stabat Mater. The work is rich in invention, of a dolorous sensibility, and ranks among the best scores of this richly endowed composer.

Wozzeck by Vienna Opera

The next evening at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, Alban Berg's Wozzeck was presented by the Vienna State Opera. This remarkable expressionistic music drama had been previously heard here in a memorable radio performance conducted by Jascha Horenstein. The stage presentation was incomparably vivid, and underlined the morbid, even savage and funereal character of the work. One will not soon forget the impact of these short, poignant, haunting scenes, given in appropriate settings designed by Casper Neher. Among the large cast, Christl Goltz as Marie, Josef Hermann in the title role, and Laszlo Szemere as the Drum Major, acted and sang with fascinating verism. The orchestra and chorus of the Vienna Philharmonic, under the direction of Karl Boehm, had a large share in the immense success of these two performances.

Among the early concerts was that of Bruno Walter, who reappeared with the Orchestra of the Opéra, one of the best ensembles in France today. He gave an ardent performance of Don Juan by Strauss, and in contrast Mahler's Song of the Earth, Elsa Cavelti, replacing Kathleen Ferrier, who was indisposed, and Lorenz Fehrenberger were the remarkable soloists. The reading was such as only Dr. Walter, an intimate friend of the composer, could give.

Boston Symphony Triumphs

The first appearance in Europe of the Boston Symphony took place at the Opéra. The concert was conducted by Charles Munch, whom I had the pleasure of hearing with this orchestra on my visit to New York last year. At that time I expressed great admiration for the organization in a review in Musical Courier, and this judgment was shared by all the critics, musicians and others here, who filled the immense auditorium and gave seemingly endless applause to the performances of works by Debussy, Ravel, Honegger, Barber and Piston.

Two days later Pierre Monteux triumphed in Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps with the same orchestra, a work which he had led at the sensational Paris world premiere in 1913. The composer was present and shared the tremendous ovation, embracing the the conductor on the stage to the delirious acclaim. The same list contained a symphonic suite, Protée, by Milhaud, and the Third Symphony by William Schuman. Concerning the latter work, it is my opinion that the Paris press was too severe in its appraisal.

Below, SCENE FROM 'DON PERLIMPLIN, opera by Vittorio Rieti and Garcia Lorca, given its stage premiere. L. to r., Maria Morales, Ana Maria Iriarte and Raimondo Torres.

CONGRATULATIONS . . . Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, felicitates Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of the same, at one of the Paris concerts.

Novelties by Rieti, Sauguet, Auric

A notable premiere for the stage (a previous concert hearing was given in the U. S.) was that of Vittorio Rieti's one-act opera, Don Perlimplin, on a book by Garcia Lorca, in which burlesque elements are mixed with tragedy. The music matches the sultry ond voluptuous atmosphere of the play, as did the voice of Maria Morales, the color and timbre of which were irresistibly evocative of Andalusia. The rather strange setting designed by Antonio Clavé was the object of considerable discussion. The role of Don Perlimplin was sung by Raimondo Torres. The composer received plaudits.

On the same bill, the Grand Ballet du Marquis de Cuevas presented two new works by Sauguet and Auric. Cordelia, by the first-named composer, recaptures the charm which was shown by this musician in his Forains. The décor by Jacques Dupont, the choreography by John Taras, the perfect dancing art and technique of Golovine, were much applauded. The ballet of Auric, titled Coup de Feu (Cup of Fire), has a score that is spirituelle and subtly rhythmic. The imaginative choreography of Aurel Miloss and the immense talent of Rosella Hightower as the chief feminine dancer, assisted by Wladimir Skouratoff as the male lead, were other factors in a most successful premiere bill excellently conducted by Gustave Cloëz.

Stravinsky and Schoenberg Works

The appearances of the New York City Ballet, of which so much had been heard, were awaited with curiosity. Among their productions, this reviewer saw Lilac Garden, choreographed by Antony Tudor; The Cage, by Jerome Robbins; Tyl Eulenspiegel, Orphée, and La Valse, all three staged by Balanchine. When the company has concluded its Paris season in June. I shall have more opportunity to appraise their offerings.

The second half of the festival was dominated by the presence of Stravinsky, conducting his own works, including Orphée and Oedipus Rex. For Oedipus, Jean Cocteau designed a backdrop and seven tableaux vivantes grouped above the choir and the Orchestra of the Radiodiffusion Française on elevated platforms. These "pictures" opened with the plague of Thebes and ended with the departure of the blind Oedipus and his daughters. They were the subject of violent discussion. Evoking strongly the manner of Picasso, they seemed to me dated and more typical of 1925 than 1952. Certain symbols, such as the blood of Oedipus' blinded eyes represented by a bouquet of cherries attached to long stems, were ridiculous. They only distracted attention from the greatness of the ancient myth, and the original spirit and power which are the essence of the music.

The choreography of Orphée was by Balanchine, the costumes and settings were by Isamu Noguchi. They have the cool bareness which is fitting. The mastery of the choreography is austere and impressive. One could, however, not forget the extraordinary moment of Orphée trying to seduce Eurydice; its eroticism shocked some of the spectators. Nicholas Magallanes and Maria Tallchief proved to be first rate dancers.

Creative Arts Fete at Brandeis University

By Dr. Henry W. Levinger

WALTHAM, MASS. — The newly launched Festival of the Creative Arts, given at Brandeis University from June 12 to 15, made its debut with a daring and unorthodox attempt to further the cause of cultural life. As Leonard Bernstein, the director of the department of creative arts at the University, put it: "This is a moment of inquiry for the whole world: a moment when civilization looks at itself appraisingly, seeking a key to the future."

In this spirit the creative arts were examined during the four-day festival, by performances, by asking questions and by answers received. A symposium discussing the present state of the creative arts, preceding the world premiere of Leonard Bernstein's short opera Trouble in Tahiti, united on the discussion platform such luminaries of their respective fields as Mr. Bernstein as moderator and representing music; Ludwig Lewisohn for creative writing; James Johnson Sweeney for art; John Mehegan for jazz; Merce Cunningham, representing the dance; and Hans Heinsheimer, theatre music.

After introductory remarks by the University's president, Dr. Abram L. Sachar, each speaker stated his case and discussed the present situation in his particular domain. In the ten minutes allotted to each, material of thought-provoking impact was offered to an audience of 3,100. The endeavor was summed up in Mr. Bernstein's words: "We cannot pretend to wisdom; but through performance we can provoke thought and free discussion; through discussion we can learn; and through learning we can rediscover our culture and ourselves."

Trouble in Tahiti Premiered

The little opera in seven scenes, Trouble in Tahiti, music and libretto by Leonard Bernstein, premiered on June 12 in the Adolph Ullman Amphitheatre, is a novel and provocative approach to the operatic problem. The action concerns the troubles of an average married couple. The universal applicability of their situation is commented upon by The Trio, ably composed of Constance Brigham, Robert Kole and Claude Heater, who, like a Greek chorus in modern evening attire, intersperse the action with their comments, proving that what happens on stage can occur everywhere. The quarreling concerns little, unimportant things, the household bills, daily occurrences, while Mr. and Mrs.—Sam and Dinah—try to solve the problems in their own way. He does this by forgetting them through his work at his office, through a casual and very insignificant affair with his secretary, by going to the gym; she by visiting a psychoanalyst and the movies. In the course of their daily activities, they meet on the street, but neither has the courage really to talk frankly with the other. They fortify themselves behind white lies. In the evening they meet again at dinner time, continue their petty altercations, but then resolve the situation by agreeing to go to the movies, to see Trouble in Tahiti. In the dark theatre they are able to immerse themselves in watching the screen, not having any need to face each other and their problems.

This libretto could be a quite acid and bitter story, were it not treated with lightness which eases the almost Strindbergean atmosphere and makes it a farcical theatrical sketch. The work is greatly helped in this respect by the music, which is light and charming, drawing freely on jazz elements. A small orchestra gives delicate instrumental support. The score, though it avoids a sequence of separate numbers, is basically a succession of rhythmical and lyrical units. Two of the lyric scenes stand out in memory, the two monologues of the leading characters and their warm and moving duet. Nell Tangeman and David Atkinson as the protagonists did excellent work, even overcoming the pitfalls of a public address system which sometimes showed individualistic tendencies. All the participants and the composer were called on stage repeatedly.

SCENE AT THE BRANDEIS FESTIVAL . . . Partial view of the new Adolph Ullman Amphitheatre during a symposium. The stage is at the further end.

The performance was directed by Elliot Silverstein, the charming settings and costumes were designed by Ariel Ballif. Lighting was by John Ransford Watts; the production manager was Tharin Musser; the stage manager, Alice Kraus.

Symposium on Jazz

After a showing of art films in the morning of June 13, the afternoon presented a symposium on Jazz, followed by a concert in which the participants were Lenny Tristano, John Mehegan, Miles Davis, Alan Eager, Percy Heath, John Lewis, Max Roach, Ruby Braff, Al Drootin, John Field, Roy Haines, John Hammond, Dick LeFavre and George Wein. Those heard in the symposium, under the chairmanship of Leonard Bernstein, were Mehegan, Tristano, Wein, Leonard Feather, and Nat Hentoff.

Moderator Bernstein, after introducing the participants of the forum, gave a short outline of the history of Jazz from the days when it was an offspring of Southern folklore to today's bebop. Two bands, George Wein's ensemble and the Five New Yorkers, shared in a musical program which illustrated the points made in the talk. This was an authoritative résumé of a musical manifestation which, due to its wide audience appeal, is of considerable importance. One felt that the best jazz is a musical endeavor which, though completely different in direction, calls for as much thought as is given to the works of great concert music. Unforgettable were Lenny Tristano's pianistic exhibits.

On the morning of June 13, art films were shown and discussed at a gathering which was so well attended that a repetition of the event was scheduled for the following day.

"Musique Concrete" Demonstrated

The offerings on June 14 opened in the afternoon with a seance devoted to poetry. Ludwig Lewisohn was the chief speaker, Peter Viereck, Carl Shapiro and William Carlos Williams participated and gave characteristic readings from their work.

The main event, however, was the evening concert. Hans W. Heinsheimer was the moderator and his enlightening and lucid comments proved an integral part of thr proceedings.

The first number, Symphonie Pour un Homme Seul (excerpts) by Pierre Schaeffer with the collaboration of Pierre Henry, and choreographed by Merce Cunningham, constituted the first performance of Musique Concrete in this country. This is a novel and, in the opinion of this reporter, not a very convincing attempt to enlarge the limits of musical expression. First presented in Paris in 1950 by the Radio Diffusion Française, the medium uses sound as nature and machines produce and transform it by their manipulations. Musique Concrete aims at "the liberation of music inherent in concrete objects." It is a misnomer, for there is no music in the first place—only sound, and the sound itself certainly is not concrete but an abstraction cut out of its natural surroundings. The piece was played twice, interpreted first by Mr. Cunningham alone and then, at its second hearing, by him and a dance group formed by students of Brandeis University. They were Natanya Neuman, Joan Skinner, Annliese Widman, Joanne Finkelor, Jo Ann Melsher, Marianne Preger, Greta Rosenzweig, Remy Charlip, Ben Garber and Donald McKayle. A rather bewildered audience, of which (a personal inquiry indicated) not all were in favor of the experiment, applauded the self-effacing dancers.

(Continued on page 15)

University

...ls for as much thought as ...he works of great concert ...gettable were Lenny Tris...tic exhibits.

...rning of June 13, art films ...nd discussed at a gathering ... well attended that a repe... event was scheduled for the ...y.

...Concrete" Demonstrated

...ngs on June 14 opened in ...n with a seance devoted to ...vig Lewisohn was the chief ...er Viereck, Carl Shapiro ... Carlos Williams partici... ...ve characteristic readings ...ork.

...event, however, was the ...rt. Hans W. Heinsheimer ...rator and his enlightening ...ments proved an integral ...roceedings.

...mber, Symphonie Pour un ...excerpts) by Pierre Schaef... collaboration of Pierre ...choreographed by Merce ...constituted the first per... Musique Concrete in this ... is a novel and, in the ... reporter, not a very con... ...pt to enlarge the limits of ...ession. First presented in ... by the Radio Diffusion ... medium uses sound as na... ...chines produce and trans... ...eir manipulations. Musique ... at "the liberation of mu... ... concrete objects." It is a ... there is no music in the ...ly sound, and the sound ... is not concrete but an ...t out of its natural sur... ...e piece was played twice, ...rst by Mr. Cunningham ..., at its second hearing, by ...nce group formed by stu...deis University. They were ...man, Joan Skinner, Ann... Joanne Finkelor, Jo Ann ...anne Preger, Greta Rosen... Charlip, Ben Garber and ...yle. A rather bewildered ...which (a personal inquiry ...t all were in favor of the ...pplauded the self-effacing

...inued on page 15)

Three appearances of Stravinsky took place at an orchestral concert at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, where he conducted the Orchestra of the Société des Concerts in his Symphony in C, Symphony in Three Movements, and Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra interpreted ideally by the notable French pianist, Monique Haas. The success was considerable for composer and soloist. As to the symphonies, with their linear, sober and marvellously balanced music, they were greeted with a long ovation. Stravinsky also conducted his Scenes de Ballet for orchestra.

Another great moment of the festival was the performance of Schoenberg's monodrama, Erwartung. Here everything centers around the anguish of expectation; the voice of the woman, the language of the orchestra, all this plunges us into an atmosphere of dreamlike abandon. The Orchestra National under Hans Rosbaud and Irma Colassi as soloist gave Erwartung a magical interpretation.

We regretted the absence of Patricia Neway, who was to have sung in Oedipus Rex with the excellent Leopold Simoneau. She was replaced by Eugenia Zareska, whose work we shall not soon forget.

Operas by Britten and Thomson Staged

It embarrasses one a bit to talk about Billy Budd, which was presented by the Royal Opera from Covent Garden. It was performed under the direction of the composer, Benjamin Britten, greatly admired hereabouts since the success of his Peter Grimes at the Opéra. The Parisians thronged the theatre, but were unfortunately disappointed. Nothing struck them favorably in this over-long work, which alas, spreads a deadly boredom. Neither the subject or the music could hold the interest of the audience. In spite of the ingenuity of the mise-en-scène, the efforts of the excellent artists including Peter Pears and Theodor Uppman (title role), the perfect discipline of the chorus, one has to confess the complete failure of this evening.

The last theatrical offering of the festival was Four Saints in Three Acts, opera by Virgil Thomson on a book by Gertrude Stein. The eminent composer had assembled the press to present his work, which was in spots unintelligible but enchanting in others. This imagery benefited by the originality of its presentation; by the well-staged movements of William Dollar's choreography, and the stage direction of Maurice Grosser. Other assets were the discipline of the chorus, the excellent voices of Inez and Edward Matthews among the many others, the unpretentious simplicity and the naïveté of the music. If some of the critics were quite severe, the public gave a big hand to Thomson and his interpreters.

Several foreign orchestras visited us during the festival. At the helm of the Orchestre de la Suisse-Romande, Ansermet presented the first performance of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Frank Martin, a poetical and strong work which was well interpreted by Szigeti. The RIAS Orchestra of West Berlin, under Ferenc Fricsay, was heard in two events, including an excellent all-Bartok list; the orchestra of the Augusteo of Rome with the Choir of the Academy of Santa Cecilia were conducted by Igor Markevitch. The last concert gave us Pierre Monteux at the helm of the Orchestra Lamoureux in a program of works by Sibelius, d'Indy and Fauré. Nicole Henriot played the Ballade of the latter.

To complete this report one must mention the chamber music concerts, the forum in which one heard writers such as Faulkner, Malraux and Madriaga, and the admirable exhibition of paintings sponsored by James Johnson Sweeney. All these events were attended by big crowds. Their appreciation was a compensation for the tireless efforts of Nicolas Nabokov, Julius Fleischmann, Herve Dugardin and Mme. Denise Tual, the organizers.

Apart from the festival program, there were some excellent concerts given during the period. Bruno Walter directed the Orchestre of the Société des Concerts and Furtwaengler had his usual triumphs with the Berlin Philharmonic.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes London Bow

By Arthur Notcutt

LONDON.—After sundry mishaps, the Boston Symphony made its London bow. The players arrived here via France but owing to a midnight cycle race on the road from Bordeaux to Paris, lorries which were carrying their dress clothes and some of their instruments could not get through in time to catch the boat train. There were other delays in consequence of which these vital necessities did not reach London until shortly before the concert. The Royal Festival Hall, seating some 3,500, was sold out. It was decided to postpone the opening until 9 o'clock. The public and press were informed, and the B.B.C. (carrying the entire concert) broadcast this fact.

It did not affect the playing. The program will long remain in the memory of those who were fortunate to be present. It was regrettable that only one London concert could be given, and that of 20th century music—Barber's School for Scandal Overture, Honegger's Fifth Symphony, Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2, Piston's Toccata, Debussy's La Mer, and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2. Undoubtedly, this is one of the greatest orchestras that has ever appeared in London—the richness and mellowness of the strings, the exquisite quality of the woodwind and the sonority of the brass were all outstanding.

Charles Munch is no stranger to us, having conducted here on several occasions a few years ago. He directed the entire program without score, and was at his finest in the Debussy and Ravel—particularly the latter.

American Ambassador Walter S. Gifford was in a party in the Royal Box. This concert was a momentous occasion.

Other recent orchestral concerts have included a few of outstanding excellence. Among them were those of the Philharmonia Concert Society, sometimes known as the Mysore series, being sponsored by the Maharaja of Mysore. Two were conducted by Herbert von Karajan, who had only appeared two or three times in England, but whose fame has been spread abroad by his Bayreuth recordings. At the first, the program included a Mozart Divertimento, Strauss' Don Juan and Beethoven No. 7; at the second the Handel-Harty Water Music, Stravinsky's Jeu de Cartes and Brahms' First Symphony. Karajan is a conductor of high eminence abroad, and these two concerts have set a seal on his reputation here. The Philharmonia Orchestra had just returned from a very successful tour of the continent under his direction.

At a Royal Philharmonic Orchestra concert, the conductor was Walter Susskind and the soloist Claudio Arrau in two concertos, the Brahms D minor and the Tchaikovsky B flat minor. This great player was in superlative form.

The London Philharmonic Orchestra is giving a summer series. At the second concert Dame Myra Hess offered the first performance in England of Howard Ferguson's Concerto for Piano and String Orchestra. This is in the usual three movements, the first Allegro, the second Mesto, a theme with six variations, and the last a captivating Rondo. The work made an immediate appeal and was acclaimed. Dame Myra was a sensitive and romantic interpreter; she is to introduce this concerto next January with the New York Philharmonic.

Stokowski paid us a flying visit, conducting the B.B.C. Symphony in a studio broadcast concert and honoring British music with a Purcell suite arranged by himself, and the elaborate and complex Fifth Symphony by Edmund Rubbra—a work of which he is an enthusiastic admirer. He has already conducted it in Canada and will later do so in the U. S. It is said that there were only two rehearsals, but the playing was of the utmost technical brilliance.

The Boyd Neel Orchestra, under the conductorship of its founder, played four Brandenburg Concertos during one eveing at the Festival Hall. All were interpreted with sympathetic insight and clarity, especially the sixth.

Covent Garden's Tristan

At Covent Garden, Kleiber returned from his continental engagements and was welcomed with enthusiasm by the public, the orchestra and the company. He conducted three performances of Tristan that, with the exception of one of the cast, were of high rank. The Isolde was Helena Braun, who has been heard at the "Met." She is a good artist, though the quality of her singing varies. It was a difficult task to have to follow Flagstad, who has sung the role here for the past four years; that she succeeded as well as she did is a matter for congratulation. Constance Shacklock's Brangäne is now such an accomplished study, both vocally and dramatically, as to be worthy of a place in any company. Svanholm's Tristan is well known, but Dalberg's Marke was new here; he sang with poetic sensitiveness and emotional insight. The representative of Kurwenal was below the necessary standard. Kleiber obtained a magnificent orchestral performance, with playing of the utmost warmth and sensitivity, though to some ears it lacked the intense dramatic power with which Beecham imbued it in pre-war days. The production was by Heinz Tietjen, and there were some new effects of particular interest, though placing the fight in the third act offstage—one heard only the clashing of steel—was by no means effective.

[238]

Artists Join European Exodus

Among those prominent in the music world who are overseas this summer are Rudolf Bing, general manager of the Metropolitan, who sailed June 4 on the SS. Ile de France for a three months' stay in Europe, during which he will hear performers and performances in Milan, Florence, Rome, Munich and Berlin. Astrid Varnay, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera, was a passenger on the SS. America, leaving New York on May 29. Miss Varnay's European schedule includes a re-engagement at the Bayreuth Festival, and concerts and recording sessions in London, as well as guest appearances at the Berlin State Opera in September. The SS. Ile de France, on June 4, carried Zinka Milanov, soprano of the Metropolitan, journeying to Europe to join her husband, the Yugoslav Ambassador to Norway. With her was her brother and accompanist, Bozidar Kunc, Yugoslav composer.

Albert Morini, New York manager, left by air in June for a trip including Italy and Africa.

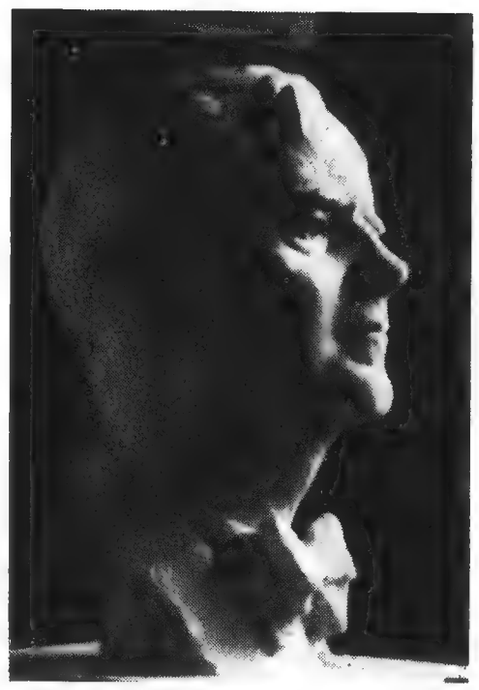
Virgil Fox, American organist, who has played in Berne Cathedral as a representative of the United States (selected by the State Departemnt) at the International Congress of Church Music, will go to Europe again for concerts in August and September. Dr Enzo Pascerella, president and director of the Southern California Institute of Music, sailed on June 12 for a tour of Italy, Switzerland, France and England. A traveler by air [illegible] monica player, who flew to London in May en route to four recitals in Lisbon. He returned to London in June to give the premiere of a concerto written for him by Graham Whetten with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, and the local introduction of the Vaughan Williams' Romance for Harmonica and Orchestra, in Liverpool with the Philharmonic Orchestra there. He came back to America the end of June.

Artists bound for Australia included Michael Rabin, violinist, who on June 11 left for a three monthss' tour there.

Huss Honored on 90th Birthday

Henry Holden Huss, American composer, pianist and teacher, was honored on his 90th birthday, June 21, by a special radio broadcast of his works over WNYC. Intermezzo "Brahmsianer" and Joy of Autumn were played by Gwendolyn Haber, pianist. Carl Tollefsen, violinist, with Augusta Tollefsen at the piano, was heard in Romanza in E major for violin and piano and Northern Melody from the Violin Sonata in G minor. Helen Field, pianist, played Rhapsodie "Life's Vicissitudes" (dedicated to Isidor Philipp). On June 24, Harvey Shapiro, cellist of the WQXR Quartet, performed the Huss Cello Romanza with Leonid Hambro, pianist, preceded by a Beethoven sonata over WQXR. The Violin Sonata was played by Eugene Ysaye in Carnegie Hall in 1913, and Mr. Huss has played his own Piano Concerto with the New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony and other orchestras. His latest string quartet will be programmed in the 1952-53 chamber music series in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

During nearly 75 years (Mr. Huss began teaching at 16) he has trained many teachers and young artists. He gave lecture-recitals at Hunter College for seven years on the Wagnerian Operatic Trilogy. He and Mrs. Huss still teach in a studio in Steinway Hall.



TAUNO HANNIKAINEN as sculptured by A. Aaltonen.

Hannikainen in Chicago

Tauno Hannikainen returned to his home in Chicago last month, after a season in Europe. Current engagements on this side of the Atlantic include two appearances in Toronto and the Promenade Symphony Concerts on June 26 and July 3.

Among the works in which the Finnish conductor led the Helsinki Symphony in 1951-52 were Verdi Requiem, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Stravinsky's Petrushka, Gliere's Ilya Murometz, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's La Mer, Ravel's Daphnis and Cloe, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, as well as several Finnish novelties. Soloists included Isaac Stern, Joseph Schuster, Bronislav Gimpel, Monique de la Bruchollerie. At the last concert, members of the audience, radio listeners and other music lovers presented Mr. Hannikainen with a portrait of his head in bronze by A. Aaltonen, one of Finland's foremost sculptors.

During the conductor's winter vacation, he was on the podium for several concerts in Sweden, Norway, Vienna and Belgrade. As guest conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic, he included the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Mr. Hannikainen begins his second season in Helsinki in September, and will also fill engagements as guest conductor in several European countries.

UNESCO Plans Music Exchange

Members of the panel on music of the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO met in New York on May 27, under the chairmanship of Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music. The purpose of the meeting was to study the work of the International Music Council, and to examine methods of obtaining cooperation of music organizations in this country in such UNESCO programs as the compilation of catalogues of recorded works, and the encouragement of contemporary music.

Friedberg Scholarship Awarded

The Carl Friedberg Alumni Association has awarded three scholarship grants for study with Carl Friedberg during 1952-53 to Betty June Cooper of Great Falls, Mon., Juliana McLean of Wichita, Kan., and Lois Whiteman of Great Neck, N. Y.

Sigma Alpha Iota Competition

The annual Chamber Music Composition Contest of Sigma Alpha Iota has been announced by Mrs. Jane Alderman, of the Syracuse, N. Y., Alumnae Chapter. It is open to all composers between 17 and 30 who live in New York State at the time the work is submitted. It may be scored for strings alone, for strings and piano or for a combination of strings and winds. Total number of players used should not be more than eight and the performing time should be from 10 to 15 minutes. A prize of $50 will be awarded for the winning composition, which will be performed at the annual S.A.I. concert to be held in Crouse College in January, 1953. Co-chairmen for the concert are Alice Shields and Mrs. Grace Keller. The winning composition will be considered for publication by G. Schirmer.

The judges, all from Syracuse University department of music, are as follows: Dr. Alexander Capurso, director of music; Dr. Harwood Simmons, professor of music; Louis Krasner, professor of violin and chamber music; George Mulfinger, professor of piano; and Kirk Ridge, professor of piano.

All inquiries and requests for instruction blanks may be addressed to Mrs. Edith Holmes, 317 Furman Street, Syracuse, N. Y.

Juilliard Summer Concerts

The Juilliard Summer School on July 1 opens a series of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday afternoon concerts at four o'clock in its Concert Hall, continuing until Aug. 7. The Juilliard String Quartet is giving the first program. Other artists to be presented include Appleton and Field, duo-pianists; Fernando Valenti, harpsichordist; Lonny Epstein, in a Mozart program played on a reproduction of that master's piano; Winifred Cecil, soprano, with Gibner King, pianist; Maria Kurenko, soprano, with Robert Hufstader at the piano; and recitals by Katherine Bacon and Carl Friedberg, pianists; Luigi Silva, cellist, with Emanuel Balaban at the piano; and Vernon de Tar, organist. Teddy Wilson, jazz pianist, will take part in a program on July 31, with Leonard Feather as narrator. On Aug. 6, the Juilliard Summer Chorus will be heard in its annual concert. The final event of the series will be a recital by student artists chosen through competition. Coenraad V. Bos will serve as pianist at this event.

A series of six concerts composing a Chamber Music Cycle will be presented by the Juilliard String Quartet during the 1952 Summer School on six consecutive Tuesday afternoons at 4 p.m. in the Juilliard Concert Hall from July 1 through Aug. 5. Accompanying lecture demonstrations will be given on the preceding Monday afternoons from June 30 through Aug. 4 at 4 p m. in the School's Recital Hall. These lectures will trace the development of chamber music repertoire, style and technique during the past 250 years and will deal specifically with the works to be performed by the Quartet at the Tuesday concerts.

Pilotto Singing in Europe

Angelo Pilotto, baritone, is in Europe this summer, fulfilling concert and opera engagements in Italy. He also will go to Venice, his home, for a vacation and to visit his father. Mr. Pilotto will return to New York the latter part of September to begin his winter engagements in the United States.

TRIUMPH of the BOSTON

under the auspices of the CONGRESS FOR CULTURAL FREEDOM

Concerts in Paris, 1952
May 6, Charles Munch conducting
May 8, Pierre Monteux conducting

Réalités

LA PLASTIQUE harmonieuse et l'originalité des gestes de Charles Munch sont dues à une formation physique combinant la danse hindoue, le sport, les massages et la pratique durant vingt années d'un instrument à archet. Indépendance des bras, mobilité du visage, intensité du regard, toutes les ressources d'expression sont mises en œuvre pour obtenir le maximum de rendement et la sonorité optimum des instrumentistes. Sur ces images, prises au cours d'une répétition de travail, on remarquera la diversité très grande d'attitudes plastiques commandée par l'interprétation des différents passages de l'œuvre musicale en lecture.

Photos from double-page spread in "Réalités," May Issue

Avec sa carrosserie de grand lux
LE "BOSTON SYMPHO
A EBLOUI LES PARIS

L E seul aspect du Boston symphony orchest géant, ses « bois » touffus et ses riche quelque chose de satisfaisant pour l'œil en présence d'une usine sonore pourvue d'un Mais lorsque tout ce mécanisme entre en act puissance, de sa souplesse et de sa précision.

Nous a sélection

Le président Vincent Auriol ti à féliciter Charles Munch.

12. — LE MONDE. — 8 mai 1952.

LA MUSIQUE

CHARLES MUNCH
et l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston

Bien qu'il n'eût jamais encore franchi l'Océan, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston était loin d'être inconnu de ce côté-ci de l'Atlantique. Sa réputation s'étendait grâce à ses enregistrements (l'un des plus célèbres est celui de Harold en Italie, sous la direction de Serge Koussevitzki, avec l'altiste William Primrose en soliste), mais aussi grâce au renom des chefs qui l'eurent successivement appelés à le diriger, et qui tous avaient acquis au préalable en Europe, et particulièrement à Paris, une véritable popularité.

Fondé en 1881 par Henry Lee Higginson, le Boston Symphony Orchestra donna son premier concert le 22 octobre 1881. Il accueillit toujours avec empressement les ouvrages et les artistes français: en 1919 Pierre Monteux en devenait le chef et le demeura pendant cinq ans, jusqu'à ce qu'il revînt parmi nous et prît la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Paris. Nous le retrouverons en second concert. Serge Koussevitzki, lorsqu'il quitta Paris où il avait pendant trois ans conduit les concerts de l'Opéra, succéda à Pierre Monteux. Il créa à Boston quantité d'œuvres françaises, commandées pour la plupart en souvenir de sa femme Natalie, et c'est ainsi que Florent Schmitt, Albert Roussel, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, ont écrit pour Boston quelques-uns des ouvrages les plus marquants de la production contemporaine. Koussevitzki, qui allait mourir le 3 juin 1951, se retira en 1949, et conserva le titre de directeur honoraire du Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Münch, mis en vedette en Amérique par ses brillantes tournées, recueillit ce lourd héritage, et l'on sait quel est aujourd'hui son prestige, étendu au monde entier.

Les débuts en Europe de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, en présence de M. Vincent Auriol, avaient naturellement attiré à l'Opéra un public aussi enthousiaste que nombreux. L'enthousiasme se manifesta dès la fin du premier morceau, une ouverture de The School for Scandal de Samuel Barber, composition fort sage, agréable aussi, mais sans trop d'originalité. Après la Symphonie n° 2, pour cordes et trompettes, d'Arthur Honegger, ce fut du délire, et il fallut que l'auteur parût auprès de Charles Münch pour recueillir l'hommage de la foule. C'est que l'œuvre possède une vertu qu'elle doit à la vigueur de ses accents, à leur sincérité : c'est que le finale entraînant, l'admirable choral qui lui sert de conclusion, constituent une des pages maîtresses de la musique de ce temps. La deuxième suite de Bacchus et Ariane d'Albert Roussel — revanche de l'échec du ballet à l'Opéra, dû à une malencontreuse mise en scène et à une chorégraphie non moins malheureuse — fut elle aussi saluée d'applaudissements interminables.

La seconde partie du concert débutait par une Passacaille de Walter Piston [illegible]

After the Symphony No. 2 for Strings and Trumpets by Honegger the audience was delirious and the composer had to be brought forward to receive the homage of the audience. The virtue of this work is due to the vigor and sincerity of its accents. The Finale with the admirable chorale which concludes it constitutes one of the most masterly pages in the music of the present time. The Second Suite "Bacchus et Ariane" became a vindication of the ballet which failed at the Opera House on account of an unfortunate production and a choreography no less so. This too was greated with endless applause.

René Dumesnil

Le Monde

LE MONDE. — 10 mai 1952.

LA MUSIQUE
— PAR RENÉ DUMESNIL —

Pierre Monteux dirige l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston aux Champs-Elysées

Nous avons retrouvé en Pierre Monteux tout pareil à celui que nous rejoignions tous les dimanches, au temps de l'O.S.P. Et même, en le regardant, en l'écoutant mettre au point le matin, à la répétition, le Sacre du Printemps, c'est plus loin encore que remontaient les souvenirs. En ce beau Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, alors un peu nouveauté, naissait dans le tumulte, sous la baguette du même chef, cette musique de ballet qui allait provoquer tant de discussions. C'était le 29 mai 1913, soir mémorable entre tous ; puis, les passions calmées, sinon complètement éteintes, ce fut en avril de l'année suivante que Pierre Monteux, à ses concerts du Casino de Paris, put enfin faire entendre l'œuvre nouvelle. Souvenirs lointains, mais si bien ineffaçables que deux guerres ont passé sans les amoindrir. Aujourd'hui, le ciel en soit loué ! le Sacre ne soulèvera qu'une tempête de bravos. Et Protée, de Darius Milhaud, qui fut si copieusement sifflé lorsque Pierné eut l'audace de faire entendre au public de Colonne la suite tirée du ballet en 1921, Protée, que Paul Claudel et Milhaud montrent dans l'île de Naxos avec la nymphe Braïdosier, ou mieux de leur cour de phoques, Protée, qui le temps a rendu enfin méfiensif, provoquera ce soir les applaudissements les plus que n'épouvantent plus les dissonances et qui serait même déçu s'il en écrit sevré.

Deux ouvrages américains devaient figurer au programme de ce concert. L'un, la Symphonie n° 3, de William Pyper, fut remplacé au dernier moment par la Fantaisie sur un thème de Thomas Tallys, de Ralph Vaughan Williams. Tallys fut le maître de Byrd et l'organiste de la cour d'Henry VIII. Ralph Vaughan Williams est un des musiciens les plus représentatifs de l'école anglaise de la période d'entre les deux guerres, l'un de ceux qui, comme le dit M. Norman Demuth dans ses Musical Trends of the 20th Century, ont le mieux contribué à former un style proprement anglais. Williams, qui étudia avec Max Bruch à Berlin, travailla aussi l'orchestration avec Maurice Ravel. Il en reçut certes d'utiles conseils, mais sut rester lui-même. Sa Fantaisie garde du thème de Tallys toute sa noblesse et le vêt d'une instrumentation raffinée. La Symphonie n° 3 du compositeur américain Williams Schumm, présentée à Boston, de Milhaud, et suivie du Sacre de Stravinsky, n'a pas supporté sans quelque dommage ce dangereux voisinage. Le compositeur ne manque pas d'adresse, et s'il substitue aux mouvements classiques de la symphonie une passacaille et une fugue, un choral et toccata, la hardiesse est sans grands périls. Mais peut-être l'auteur avait-on apprécié davantage si l'auteur avait montré plus d'originalité.

Pierre Monteux fit preuve, lui, d'une vaillance peu commune, et l'Orchestre de Boston montra les qualités les plus solides.

Studio 28 : Monsieur Verdoux (A.).
Studio 43 : Monsieur Verdoux (R.). Trois-ème Coup (R.).
St. Bertrand: les Trente-neuf Marches (A.).
Trianon : [illegible]

THEATRE NATIONAL DE L'OPERA

EXPOSITION INTERN
L'ŒUVRE DU
SOUS LES AUSPICES DU CONGRES

III' Concert
Premier concert
BOSTON SYMPH
sous la
CHARLE

Ouverture "The School for Scan Symphonie n° 2 (pour orchestre
I. - Molto moderato
II. - Adagio mesto
III. - Vivace non troppo
Bacchus et Ariane. .. ..
Toccata. .. ..
La Mer .. ..
I. - De l'aube à midi sur la mer
II. - Jeux de vagues
III. - Dialogue du vent et de la
Daphnis et Chloé. Suite n° 2
I. - Lever du jour
II. - Pantomime
III. - Danse générale

LE FIGARO

7 MAI 1952

Dernière minute parisienne

CHARLES MUNCH CONDUIT A LA VICTOIRE L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON

La place de l'Opéra en état de siège. Les malheureux automobilistes sans coupe-file, refoulés impitoyablement par le service d'ordre des grands jours : place aux voitures officielles !

Dans la salle, le président Auriol, le corps diplomatique, toutes les vedettes. La foule — naturellement...

L'orchestre est sur la scène ; cent deux musiciens, parmi lesquels on dénombre vingt-trois Français : celui-ci, sûrement ; celui-là, peut-être ; mais les autres ? Au sommet de la pyramide, le trompettiste Roger Voisin, né en Amérique. Mais fils de France, tout de même. Ansermet se penche à mon oreille : « Voisin parle français avec l'accent français, américain avec l'accent américain ; mais il peut aussi parler français avec l'accent de New-York et américain avec l'accent de Pantin... » Par là-dessus, il joue de la trompette incomparablement!

Münch est, ce soir, dans une forme extraordinaire. Il dirige deux ouvrages agréables de Barber et de Piston ; puis Honegger, Roussel, Debussy et Ravel, galamment offerts au public parisien par le plus beau des orchestres d'outre-Atlantique.

Apothéose, bis. Münch salue, triomphant et harassé. Les troupes américaines ont débarqué. N'ayons pas la pudeur à nous avouer conquis : c'est un général français qui les commande...

CL.

And so we have rediscovered the conductor, but for the first time we are introduced to the orchestra. Celebrated throughout America, how is this impressive assemblage to be judged? It must be said that it is an extraordinary ensemble. Our national orchestras will not take umbrage at this enthusiasm, for among its 102 musicians, the orchestra includes 23 Frenchmen; its dominant quality is surely ardour and even fanaticism.

CHARLES MUNCH LEADS THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO VICTORY - "The Climax---an encore! Munch bows, triumphant and harassed. The American forces have invaded us. But let us not be ashamed to admit that we have been conquered. A French general was in command."

LE FIGARO — 8 MAI 1952
« L'ŒUVRE DU VINGTIEME SIECLE »

CHARLES MUNCH et l'orchestre de Boston à l'Opera

Ce visage musical du XX[e] siècle, qu'on entreprend de peindre, commence à se préciser. Voyons de quels traits nouveaux Charles Münch et l'orchestre de Boston l'ont enrichi mardi soir.

Münch est lui-même, et pas un autre : plein d'appréhensions, mais confiant dans la solidarité de son orchestre, épuisé, mais jamais las, frénétique, heureux de faire de la musique, soutenu par l'amour de son beau métier, gravissant les crescendos au pas d'un jeune homme. Le public aperçoit une silhouette séduisante, racée, les coudes au corps, sauf dans les péripéties ; quand il s'anime, on volt danser le chrysanthème de sa chevelure grise, et s'il se tourne, c'est Le Barty jouant de profil. L'orchestre a, comme il se doit, la meilleure part. Pour avoir joué une fois sous sa direction, je sais que le regard de Münch, quand il conduit, est le plus éloquent du monde. Certains chefs règnent par l'autorité calme, d'autres se font craindre, celui-là agit par osmose ; rien de plus contagieux que le visage de Münch, illuminé par le chef-d'œuvre qu'il aime. Nul ne résiste à cette foi véhémente qui soulève les orchestres, à défaut des montagnes.

Le chef, nous le retrouvons ; quant à la troupe, nous faisons sa connaissance. Célèbre dans l'Amérique entière, comment juger cet orchestre prestigieux ? C'est un ensemble extraordinaire, il faut le dire. Nos orchestres nationaux ne prendront pas ombrage de cet enthousiasme, car sur cent deux musiciens, l'orchestre de Boston compte vingt-trois Français ! Sa qualité dominante, c'est assurément l'ardeur, et même le fanatisme.

Chacun joue si bien de son instrument, cet instrument est de si belle qualité, la confiance dans le chef est si totale, les œuvres ont été si minutieusement répétées que l'exécution est absolument parfaite. Il y a, de surcroît, un élan, une jeunesse, un dynamisme, quelque chose de vigoureux, de clair, de percutant à quoi l'on n'est pas habitué. Je fais ici surtout allusion [illegible] trompettiste Roger- [illegible] super-vedette de [illegible] trom-

Nettoyée de son halo, de sa brume, de ses vapeurs, de sa féerie, La Mer n'était plus orchestre, même splendide, un changement de registre aussi brusque ? Autant demander à Michel-Ange de peindre une aquarelle après le plafond de la Sixtine !

Une Ouverture sympathique de Samuel Barber, une [illegible] veuse de Walter Piston mettaient une note américaine dans ce concert gracieusement voué au génie français. L'Orchestre de Boston et son chef l'ont bien servi.

Clarendon.

Quand Charles Münch mène à la victoire son bataillon de choc

Claude Baignères.

Il n'est guère, dans le monde musical, de silhouette plus connue que celle de Charles Münch ! Deux longs bras qui retombent après un ultime sursaut de désespoir, au terme d'un chant où se concentre toute la douleur de la terre, deux épaules qui se haussent tandis que les poings serrés et frémissants viennent essuyer les larmes qui coulent des yeux, deux mains grandes ouvertes vers le ciel en signe de triomphe : voilà trois attitudes de Charles Münch fixées sur l'écran de toutes les mémoires, de Boston à Paris, de Londres à Rome.

Un chef d'orchestre est une sorte de condottiere qui a pour mission d'entraîner les troupes les plus diverses à la [illegible] Boston Symphonic

Does there exist anywhere an orchestra that can interpret in so brilliant a fashion a program of contemporary music? From the rich sonority of the basses to the incisive one of the trumpets, every stand gives proof of a most individual quality.

L'AURORE

L'ŒUVRE DU XX

L'Orchestre sy de Boston à

Parmi les reproches que certains mu du XX[e] siècle, il en était un de mérité de trois musiciens de premier ordre : MM. Charles Munch, réparation est

Sa suite d'orchestre Bacchus et minute en supplément dans le progra l'Opéra par l'Orchestre de Boston, est oubliée, et apprendre à ceux qui ignor le plus grand musicien français du de Daphnis et Chloé, mais plus sensible habile sans doute, mais sans génie. teurs d'avoir rendu hommage à Rous et nos théâtres se montrent moins de qualité bien inférieure. Berlioz, les symphonies et quand comptant leurs mesures, hasard ne dans le finale, écrivait à ses amis Aucun mot ne traduirait mi Bacchus et Daphnis. Entièrement irrésistible, les 102 instrumentistes sonore d'une couleur éblouissante. Est-ce-t-il au monde orchestre manière aussi brillante, aussi pro mais depuis la sonorité sompt des trompettes, tous les pupitre ne souvient pas d'avoir jamais complet. Quant à M. Munch, non ch'ais-d'œuvre, mais il a même vis à des morceaux assez fins de Piston qui exigeaient le sp Il était impossible en l'ente musicien prestigieux qui a enthousiaste ? Interminable of the BOSTON SYMPHONY O

RESS FOR CULTURAL FREEDOM

CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

rts in Paris, 1952
y 6, Charles Munch conducting y 8, Pierre Monteux conducting

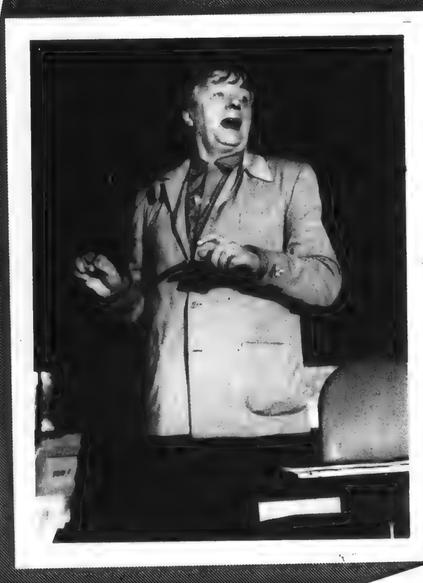
Since 1493 Europeans have had few kind words for American ventures in the arts, and since 1945 few kind words on any score. Last week, however, they had a great many. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Paris for an arts festival, gave two performances which left listeners dazed with awe. Critics unanimously used the word "extraordinary," and phrases like, "Is there another orchestra which could interpret modern music with such brilliance?" "Performance unparalleled in finesse and dynamism."

LIFE May 19, 1952

from double-page spread
"Réalités," May Issue



Avec sa carrosserie de grand luxe

LE "BOSTON SYMPHONY" A EBLOUI LES PARISIENS

L'E seul aspect du Boston symphony orchestra, avec son quatuor géant, ses « bois » touffus et ses riches mines de cuivre a quelque chose de satisfaisant pour l'œil et l'esprit. On se sent en présence d'une usine sonore pourvue d'un outillage exceptionnel. Mais lorsque tout ce mécanisme entre en action, on est ravi de sa puissance, de sa souplesse et de sa précision.

Nous avons là une admirable sélection de virtuoses appartenant à des nations différentes, et dont la musique et une ferveur passionnée, a été apprécié à sa juste valeur.

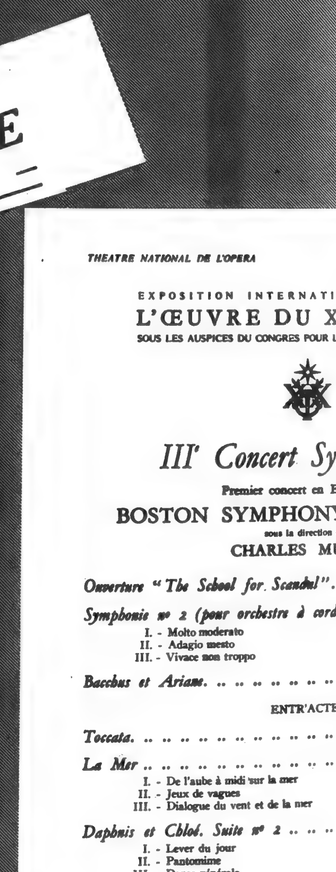
Le programme nous était, en grande partie familier mais Charles Münch a donné de Bacchus et Ariane de Roussel et de la 2me Symphonie, d'Honegger, une interprétation transcendante. Moins heureux dans Debussy et Ravel, il nous a révélé une Toccata, de Walter Piston, écrite avec la savante application d'un bon élève de Nadia Boulanger et une Ouverture, de Samuel Barber qui révèle chez son auteur une grande distinction de pensée et de goût, une excellente culture artistique et une clairvoyante pondération.

Emile VUILLERMOZ.

The very aspect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its great quartet (of strings), with its opulent winds, and the rich treasure of its brass, at once satisfies the eye and the spirit. One feels oneself in the presence of a factory of sound beautifully equipped, and when this entire mechanism enters into action one is overwhelmed by its power, its subtlety and its precision.

We have in this orchestra an admirable selection of virtuosos from many nations of the earth. Our compatriots are numerous and their high quality does us honor. The music itself had an equally perfect integration.

Le président Vincent Auriol tint à féliciter Charles Munch.



Le Monde

LA MUSIQUE
PAR RENÉ DUMESNIL

NDE. — 19 mai 1952.

Pierre Monteux dirige l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston aux Champs-Elysées

Nous avons retrouvé en Pierre Monteux tout pareil à celui que nous rejoignons tous les dimanches, au temps de l'O.S.P. Et même, en le regardant, en l'écoutant mettre au point le matin, à la répétition, le Sacre du Printemps, c'est plus loin encore que remontaient les souvenirs. En ce beau Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, alors un ouvreuse, naissait dans le tumulte, sous la baguette du même chef, cette musique de ballet qui allait provoquer tant de discussions. C'était le 29 mai 1913, soir mémorable entre tous ; puis, les passions calmées, sinon complètement éteintes, ce fut en avril de l'année suivante que Pierre Monteux, à ses concerts du Casino de Paris, put enfin faire entendre l'œuvre nouvelle. Souvenirs lointains, mais si bien ineffaçables que deux guerres ont passé sans les amoindrir. Aujourd'hui, le ciel est soit loué ! le Sacre ne soulèvera qu'une tempête de bravos. Et Protée, de Darius Milhaud, qui fut également stifié lorsque Pierné eut l'audace de la suite tirée tendre au public de Colonne la suite du ballet en 1921, Protée, que Paul Claudel et Milhaud montrent dans l'île de Naxos avec la nymphe Bzindosier, au lieu de leur cour de phoques, Protée, que le temps a rendu enfin inoffensif, provequera ce soir les applaudissements d'un auditoire que n'épouvantent plus les dissonances et qui serait même déçu s'il en était servi.

Deux ouvrages américains devaient figurer au programme de ce concert. L'un, la Symphonie n° 3, de William Pyper, fut remplacé au dernier moment par la Fantaisie sur un thème de Thomas Tallys, de Ralph Vaughan Williams. Tallys fut le maître de Byrd et l'organiste de la cour d'Henry VIII. Ralph Vaughan Williams est un des musiciens les plus représentatifs de l'école anglaise de la période d'entre les deux guerres. Une de ceux qui, comme le dit M. Norman Demuth dans son Musical Trends of the 20th Century, ont le mieux contribué à former un style proprement anglais. Williams, qui étudia avec Max Bruch à Berlin, travailla aussi l'orchestration avec Maurice Ravel. Il en reçut certes d'utiles conseils, mais sut rester lui-même. Sa Fantaisie garde du thème dû Tallys toute sa noblesse et le vêt d'une instrumentation raffinée. La Symphonie n° 3 du compositeur américain Williams Schumm, présentée du Prytée, de Milhaud, et suivie du Sacre de Stravinsky, n'a pas supporté sans quelque dommage ce dangereux voisinage. Le compositeur ne manque pas d'adresse, et s'il substitue aux mouvements classiques de la symphonie une passacaille et une fugue, un chorol et toccata, la hardiesse est sans grands périls. Mais peut-être l'auteur avait-on apprécies davantage s'il en avait montré plus d'originalité.

Pierre Monteux fit preuve, lui, d'une vaillance peu commune, et l'Orchestre de Boston montra les qualités les plus solides.

THEATRE NATIONAL DE L'OPERA — MARDI 6 MAI 1952

EXPOSITION INTERNATIONALE DES ARTS
L'ŒUVRE DU XX' SIÈCLE
SOUS LES AUSPICES DU CONGRES POUR LA LIBERTE DE LA CULTURE

III' Concert Symphonique

Premier concert en Europe du
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
sous la direction de
CHARLES MUNCH

Ouverture "The School for Scandal" ... SAMUEL BARBER

Symphonie n° 2 (pour orchestre à cordes) ... ARTHUR HONEGGER
I. - Molto moderato
II. - Adagio mesto
III. - Vivace non troppo

Bacchus et Ariane. ... ALBERT ROUSSEL

ENTR'ACTE

Toccata. ... WALTER PISTON

La Mer ... CLAUDE DEBUSSY
I. - De l'aube à midi sur la mer
II. - Jeux de vagues
III. - Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Daphnis et Chloé. Suite n° 2 ... MAURICE RAVEL
I. - Lever du jour
II. - Pantomime
III. - Danse générale

The New York Times

AMUSEMENTS

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Boston Symphony Captivates Paris As It Makes Bow at Festival There

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 6—What must have been one of the most brilliant occasions that the Paris Opera, the scene of many a brilliant occasion, has witnessed in this century was the first appearance in Europe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, which took place in that famous theatre this evening.

As a gala event, this one had all the outward trappings of pomp and ceremony and brilliant festivity. President Vincent Auriol and Mme. Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and United States Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn were among those who attended.

But the performances given by the superb orchestra were by far the highest honor that the evening could invoke. The musicians were obviously on the qui vive to give their utmost. The audience was in an equally tense and expectant vein.

Excitement and enthusiasm were such that when a long program of modern French and American music had ended, it became necessary for Mr. Munch and the orchestra to play the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite over again.

This program had several special features appropriate to the purposes of the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" of which it was a feature. One was the presence in the audience of the composer, Arthur Honegger, who could not have failed to be profoundly moved by the reception given his tragical and heroic Second Symphony for Strings with solo trumpet.

Mr. Munch had introduced this work in America when he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 1946. The slow movement is an elegy of a simplicity yet profundity of thought that grows upon one with its every hearing.

The finale—resolute, militant, indomitable—reaches its climax when the solo trumpet, against stressful counterpoint of the strings, flings out the chorale theme that is like unto a hymn of faith. This symphony was composed by Honegger in Paris during the German occupation of the second World War.

It was Schumann who said that revolution could be concealed within the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. The symphony sounded strange and recondite to many who heard its first performances. Hitler's crew was unaware of its existence. Tonight's audience heard the symphony with unrestrainable enthusiasm, and understood well its cry for liberty.

Two American composers were on this program, Samuel Barber, with his early, gay, adroit overture, "School for Scandal," and Walter Piston, whose brilliant toccata Mr. Munch first presented on the French National Radio in 1948 and introduced in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 14 of the same year.

The Boston Symphony gave the first American performances of DeBussy's "La Mer" in 1907 and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" in 1917. These were, indeed, interchanges of the arts and culture of nations of democratic traditio and achievement memorably pe formed.

The program contained a fitti tribute to the late Serge Kous vitzky, whose indefatigable lat and genius of more than a qua of a century had done so muc bring the Boston Symphony chestra to its present pre-emi among the greatest orchest the world and whose record forming new music and di ing young composers of t matched by no other maste baton.

The Boston Symphony C was not only playing m for the first time in F was also the first Am chestra in twenty years vited to perform at Opera, which, with all gewgaws, has a nati cence and old-style addition to exceptiona acoustics for the pe symphony music.

After the concer was held backstage and his men.

THE CHRISTIAN

Boston

By Emile Vuil

The musical Boston won a Paris. The tech quality of this ment" has been Its sonorous ri and resplenden make of it the chestra of the w

Ne

THE MAG

Boston in Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra h never been heard before in Paris or, fo that matter, anywhere else in Europe But for the two conductors who led the 104 men of the Boston Symphony in their first two triumphal concerts in France last week the Parisian concerts were a gala homecoming. Charles Münch, musical director of the orchestra, went to Boston in 1949 from the Paris Conservatory orchestra. Pierre Monteux, Münch's associate conductor for the symphony's fifteen European concerts, was born in Paris and helped make musical history there in 1912 and 1913 when, as conductor for the Diaghileff ballet, he conducted the premières of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Monteux, who retired this season as musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, is also closely associated with the Boston Symphony, for he was its conductor from 1919 to 1924.

Paris homecoming: Münch (left) and Monteux return wi

As the symphony's regular head, Münch quite naturally conducted the opening "gala" at the Paris Opera last week. According to Olin Downes of The New York Times, who was present, the orchestra played "matchlessly." The program included both French and American music by Arthur Honegger, Debussy, Ravel, Samuel Barber, and Walter Piston. Final applause was such that Münch and the orchestra had to encore the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" suite.

Monteux conducted the symphony two nights later at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, and included on his program was a work which brought back many memories. It was the historic "Le Sacre last time," commen a different tonality! This first Europea Symphony is being n pices of the Congress dom, which is curr international exposition Paris (NEWSWEEK, M playing in the French ca tra's schedule also includ in The Hague, Amster Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbou deaux, Lyons, and London appearances are sponsored of the United States High C for Germany, and the one in Münch's birthplace, by the P University in Exile.

Newsweek, May 19, 1952

Further appearances in Eu have been arranged, but the has to be back home in time opening of the Boston Pops se June 3. While all concerned ho most of the $150,000 to $175,000 the tour can be made back th ticket sales and possible radio broad the American Committee of the Co has guaranteed to defray any de

Quand Charles Münch mène à la victoire son bataillon de choc

Claude Baignères.

IL n'est guère, dans le monde musical, de silhouette plus connue que celle de Charles Münch : Deux longs bras qui retombent après un ultime sursaut de désespoir, au terme d'un chant où se concentre toute la douleur de la terre, deux épaules qui se haussent tandis que les poings serrés et frémissants viennent essuyer les larmes qui coulent des yeux, deux mains grandes ouvertes vers le ciel en signe de triomphe : voilà trois attitudes de Charles Münch fixées sur l'écran de toutes les mémoires, de Boston à Paris, de Londres à Rome.

Un chef d'orchestre est une sorte de condottiere qui a pour mission d'entraîner les troupes les plus diverses à la

Does there exist anywhere an orchestra that can interpret in so brilliant a fashion a program of contemporary music? From the rich sonority of the basses to the incisive one of the trumpets, every stand gives proof of a most individual quality.

L'AURORE

L'ŒUVRE DU XX' SIÈCLE
L'Orchestre symphonique de Boston à l'Opéra

Parmi les reproches que certains critiques ont adressés au festival du XX' siècle, il en était un de justifié, l'omission dans les programmes de trois musiciens de premier rang : Roussel, Dukas, Schmitt. Grâce à M. Charles Munch, réparation est faite au moins en ce qui concerne Roussel.

Sa suite d'orchestre Bacchus et Ariane, introduite à la dernière minute en supplément dans le programme du concert donné mardi à l'Opéra par l'Orchestre de Boston, est venue rappeler à ceux qui l'avaient oublié, et apprendre à ceux qui l'ignoraient, que Roussel est probablement le plus grand musicien français du demi-siècle. Placé à côté de la Mer de Debussy et de Daphnis et Chloé, son Bacchus apparaît comme une autre merveille, habile sans doute, mais plus sensible, plus forte. Remercions donc M. Munch d'avoir rendu hommage à Roussel et souhaitons que nos visiteurs d'outre-Atlantique se montrent moins oublieux à l'égard d'un autre maître dont les théâtres se montrent moins oublieux à l'égard d'un autre maître dont les symphonies et les ballets sont injustement sacrifiés à des ouvrages de qualité bien inférieure.

Berlioz, quand par hasard ses cors ne s'étaient pas embrouillés en comptant leurs mesures, et quand ses trombones étaient partis à temps dans le finale, écrivait à ses amis : « Exécution foudroyante !... Aucun mot ne traduirait mieux Exécution foudroyante, que nos visiteurs Bacchus et de Daphnis. Entraînés par ce qu'ont été les explications de irrésistible, les 102 instrumentistes et d'une intensité extraordinaire. sonore d'une couleur éblouissante et d'une Charles Munch dans un presto Existe-t-il au monde un programme aussi extraordinaire ? manière aussi brillante un orchestre qui puisse interpréter d'une mais depuis la sonorité somptueuse des contrebasses jusqu'au mordant des trompettes, tous les pupitres de Boston ont tracé une fresque me souviens pas d'avoir entendu d'une intensité et d'une beauté comparables. complet.

Quant à M. Munch, non seulement il a magnifiquement traduit les chefs-d'œuvre, mais il a même réussi par la qualité des timbres, à donner vie à des morceaux assez insignifiants, comme les pièces de Barber et de Piston qui ouvraient le premier et la seconde partie de son concert. Il était impossible en l'entendant de ne pas songer à Koussevitzky, le musicien prestigieux qui a forgé l'incomparable ensemble qu'une salle enthousiaste a interminablement acclamé l'autre soir.

Jean MISTLER.

ANDRE LAMY

L'AURORE

France libre

SIXTE QUI

Samedi 10 et Dimanche 11 mai 1952

Tumultuous Greeting for BSO In Its First European Concert

PARIS (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance in Europe last night won the tumultuous applause of an audience studded with celebrities.

Charles Munch directed the 71-year-old orchestra at the famed Paris Opera House, playing a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," introduced to the U.S. in 1907, and Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

French President and Madame Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and U.S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present.

The performance was a gala event of the "masterpieces of the 20th century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of Western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

Last night's performance marked the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the Paris Opera House.

THE BOS

"We Were Conquered

Paris Acclaim Surpasses Wilde

By RUDOLPH E

PARIS, May 7—Music critics of the Paris press went all out today European debut of the Boston Sym under Charles Munch at the Opera a triumph of the first category.

The concer dent and Mada heading the list celebrities atten ously a tremendou cess. Cheers and throughout the ma and gold Opera Ho than 10 minutes whil took six recalls to the

Continued on P

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ARLES MUNCH, Music Director

Since 1493 Europeans have had few kind words for American ventures in the arts, and since 1945 few kind words on any score. Last week, however, they had a great many. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Paris for an arts festival, gave two performances which left listeners dazed with awe. Critics unanimously used the word "extraordinary," and phrases like, "Is there another orchestra which could interpret modern music with such brilliance?" "Performance unparalleled in finesse and dynamism."

LIFE May 19, 1952

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1952

Boston Symphony Acclaimed

By Emile Vuillermoz

Paris

The musical ambassadors from Boston won a real victory in Paris. The technical and artistic quality of this splendid "instrument" has been a revelation to us. Its sonorous richness, discipline, and resplendent virtuosity truly make of it the outstanding orchestra of the world.

LE FIGARO — 10-11 MAI 1952

« L'ŒUVRE DU XX• SIECLE »

En présence de Strawinsky Pierre Monteux fait triompher « Le Sacre du Printemps »

La première partie du concert avait été morne. On n'en avait pas voulu sérieusement à Ralph Vaughan Williams, car sa Fantaisie sur un thème de Thomas Tallis, outre qu'elle est sérieusément écrite, dans un style d'école très sage, avait permis à l'Orchestre de Boston de faire admirer la splendeur de son quatuor : l'école russe du violon y a laissé sa trace. Les soixante-trois « cordes » ont des profondeurs d'orgue ; quant aux solistes, je vous les recommande... Mais je proteste si l'on inscrit cette page estimable sous le signe de « l'esprit du vingtième siècle ». Bannir Dukas et Schmitt sous prétexte que leur esthétique est « du siècle dernier » et admettre Vaughan Williams dont l'écriture est celle d'un élève de Mendelssohn, quelle aberration ! Au reste, les protestations ne sont point demeurées absolument vaines, puisque, depuis le début du festival, les organisateurs ont entr'ouvert la porte à Enesco et à d'Indy, puis accordé à Fauré une place plus importante. Malgré les courageuses lettres d'Enesco et de Honegger, qui s'étalent dans une vitrine des Champs-Elysées, Florent Schmitt sera-t-il exclu jusqu'à la fin ? Ce serait fâcheux, non pour lui, mais pour ses contempteurs.

Jadis sifflée aux concerts Co- la suite symphonique de ...cueillie avec sympa- ...clamations sa-

Silhouette massive de Pierre Monteux, boulonné sur l'estrade comme une statue sur son socle, l'autorité magistrale du grand chef, l'économie de ses gestes (il se contente, prosaïquement, de battre la mesure !), la couleur de l'orchestre, cette musique, surtout...

J'ai rarement vu de plus folle ovation ! Monteux dans les bras de Strawinsky, l'orchestre debout, l'archet au poing, une salle crépitante, le glorieux chef-d'œuvre rayonnant de toutes ses flammes — c'était vraiment, en ce soir de mai, le sacre du printemps, l'apothéose du génie et l'anniversaire de la gratitude.

Clarendon.

Newsweek
THE MAGAZINE OF NEWS SIGNIFICANCE

MUSIC

Boston in Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had never been heard before in Paris or, for that matter, anywhere else in Europe. But for the two conductors who led the 104 men of the Boston Symphony in their first two triumphal concerts in France last week the Parisian concerts were a gala homecoming. Charles Münch, musical director of the orchestra, went to Boston in 1949 from the Paris Conservatory orchestra. Pierre Monteux, Münch's associate conductor for the symphony's fifteen European concerts, was born in Paris and helped make musical history there in 1912 and 1913 when, as conductor for the Diaghileff ballet, he conducted the premières of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Monteux, who retired this season as musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, is also closely associated with the Boston Symphony, for he was its conductor from 1919 to 1924.

As the symphony's regular head, Münch quite naturally conducted the opening "gala" at the Paris Opera last week. According to Olin Downes of The New York Times, who was present, the orchestra played "matchlessly." The program included both French and American music by Arthur Honegger, Debussy, Ravel, Samuel Barber, and Walter Piston. Final applause was such that Münch and the orchestra had to encore the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" suite.

Monteux conducted the symphony two nights later at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, and included on his program was a work which brought back many memories. It was the historic "Le Sacre du Printemps," first performed at the opening of the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 29, 1913. On that occasion, the audience greeted Stravinsky's violent modernism with an uproar of disapproval. Fist fights broke out, and at times the music could not be heard, although no less a figure than Claude Debussy pleaded for silence and attention. Now, 39 years later, Monteux could once again stand on that same podium and hear an uproar of another kind—a wild ovation which he shared with Stravinsky himself, who was in the audience. "There was just as much noise the last time," commented Monteux, "but of a different tonality!"

This first European tour of the Boston Symphony is being made under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which is currently staging an international exposition of the arts in Paris (Newsweek, May 12). Besides playing in the French capital, the orchestra's schedule also includes performances in The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfurt, Berlin, Strasbourg, Metz, Bordeaux, Lyons, and London. The German appearances are sponsored by the office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany, and the one in Strasbourg, Münch's birthplace, by the Free Europe University in Exile.

Further appearances in Europe could have been arranged, but the orchestra has to be back home in time for the opening of the Boston Pops season on June 3. While all concerned hope that most of the $150,000 to $175,000 cost of the tour can be made back through ticket sales and possible radio broadcasts, the American Committee of the Congress has guaranteed to defray any deficit.

Paris homecoming: Münch (left) and Monteux return with Boston Symphony

The New York Times

AMUSEMENTS

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

Boston Symphony Captivates Paris As It Makes Bow at Festival There

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, May 6—What must have been one of the most brilliant occasions that the Paris Opera, the scene of many a brilliant occasion, has witnessed in this century was the first appearance in Europe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, which took place in that famous theatre this evening.

As a gala event, this one had all the outward trappings of pomp and ceremony and brilliant festivity. President Vincent Auriol and Mme. Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and United States Ambassador James C. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn were among those who attended.

But the performances given by the superb orchestra were by far the highest honor that the evening could invoke. The musicians were obviously on the qui vive to give their utmost. The audience was in an equally tense and expectant vein.

Excitement and enthusiasm were such that when a long program of modern French and American music had ended, it became necessary for Mr. Munch and the orchestra to play the finale of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite over again.

This program had several special features appropriate to the purposes of the "Twentieth Century Exposition of the Arts of Democratic Nations" of which it was a feature. One was the presence in the audience of the composer, Arthur Honegger, who could not have failed to be profoundly moved by the reception given his tragical and heroic Second Symphony for Strings with solo trumpet.

Mr. Munch had introduced this work in America when he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 1946. The slow movement is an elegy of a simplicity yet profundity of thought that grows upon one with its every hearing.

The finale—resolute, militant, indomitable—reaches its climax when the solo trumpet, against stressful counterpoint of the strings, flings out the chorale theme that is like unto a hymn of faith. This symphony was composed by Honegger in Paris during the German occupation of the second World War.

It was Schumann who said that revolution could be concealed within the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. The symphony sounded strange and recondite to many who heard its first performances. Hitler's crew was unaware of its existence. Tonight's audience heard the symphony with unrestrainable enthusiasm, and understood well its cry for liberty.

Two American composers were on this program, Samuel Barber, with his early, gay, adroit overture, "School for Scandal," and Walter Piston, whose brilliant toccata Mr. Munch first presented on the French National Radio in 1948 and introduced in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 14 of the same year.

The Boston Symphony gave the first American performances of DeBussy's "La Mer" in 1907 and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" in 1917. These were, indeed, interchanges of the arts and culture of nations of democratic traditio and achievement memorably pe formed.

The program contained a fitti tribute to the late Serge Kous vitzky, whose indefatigable lab and genius of more than a qua of a century had done so muc bring the Boston Symphony chestra to its present pre-emi among the greatest orchest the world and whose record forming new music and di ing young composers of t matched by no other maste baton.

The Boston Symphony C was not only playing m for the first time in F was also the first Am chestra in twenty years vited to perform at Opera, which, with all gewgaws, has a nati cence and old-style addition to exceptiona acoustics for the pe symphony music.

After the concer was held backstage and his men.

Newsweek, May 19, 1952

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1952.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

STRAVINSKY SCORES A HIT AT PARIS FETE

Boston Symphony's Reading of 'Sacre du Printemps,' Under Monteux, Real Triumph

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, May 8—Igor Stravinsky enjoyed a triumph of literally epochal significance tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, performed his "Sacre du Printemps" before a wildly cheering audience in the Champs-Elysées Theatre. For this was the same Igor Stravinsky who fled the violence of a Paris audience that denounced his music and actually came to blows in a disturbance near mob violence at the première of "Sacre du Printemps" in Chatelet Theatre on May 26, almost thirty-nine years ago.

On that turbulent occasion man stayed in his place at the of the orchestra, which coul heard in the din, cond without a superfluous gest expression on a face that only his intentness on the That man was Monteux. S producer of the "Sacre" a of the Ballet Russe, wa box, and did not emerge

Monteux Retains P

Monteux, his short, st keeping its customary command of the orches and unflinching, saw through to the end, ar made no more signs of agitation of any sort this evening. Turnin brilliant performance the audience and he in response to its ov looking through th for Stravinsky.

After minutes of vinsky, a small, qu ue in an everyday a place at the back the audience we They could not him, and at last stage, where Mor ing him.

What the old must have felt crashing acclamation, whit they must have been remembering as they faced the roaring crowd can be imagined but not described. The work that affronted the public and aroused its violent indignation in a previous decade was now a classic monument deemed by many the most important symphonic creation of the twentieth century.

"There was just as much noise the last time," said Monteux after the show, "but of a different tonality!"

But Stravinsky was not the only composer of the evening whose score was especially eloquent of the purposes of the International Exposition of the Arts of the Twentieth Century, of which this concert was a part. Darius Milhaud was seated quietly in a corner of the hall, his health not permitting him to rise and acknowledge the enthusiastic reception for his early suite from the ballet "Protee"—a score that this writer has long considered one of his best.

This impression was borne out this evening. With no books or ref- at hand, it is nevertheless a first American in the new polytonality, tion and rhythmic

Touch of Brazi

Milhaud had been the French Legation Brazilian rhythms, so akin to American jazz, score. The music had t and a Rabelais gency. What is more importan the same youth, brilliа gusto today.

There were two other im first, which opened the evenin was Vaughan Williams' pro evocation of the Tudor past. "Fantasy on the Theme of Ta a work that has familiarity never prives of its unique beauty atmosphere.

The other work, by a compose of America's young generation— Symphony, a virile and splendidly constructed achievement. The sym- phony's forms are those of the eighteenth century; the content is very modern, with a fine tension and bite of counterpoint, and a confidence and zest in the writing that are contagious. Nor is the work one-sided in its character. There are passages of introspec- and self-communion.

TIME
THE WEEKLY NEWSMAGAZINE
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF ..... Henry R. Luce
PRESIDENT ..... Roy E. Larsen
EDITORIAL DIRECTOR ..... John Shaw Billings

The audience remained quiet for the first two minutes. Then came boos and catcalls . . . Neighbors began to hit each other over the head with fists, canes or whatever came to hand . . . Everything available was tossed in our direction, but we continued to play on . . . Stravinsky had disappeared through a window backstage, to wander disconsolately along the streets of Paris.

—Pierre Monteux in Dance Index

Last week the scene—Paris' Théatre des Champs-Elysées—and the principals were the same as at that uproarious première of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring in 1913, and again there was bedlam. But this time the composer stood in his box bathed in spotlight glare and the audience's acclaim, clasping his hands together like a victorious boxer. The tohu-bohu did not abate until Stravinsky marched onstage to buss Conductor Monteux on both cheeks. Said beaming Pierre Monteux: "There was just as much noise the last time, but of a different tonality."

A good share of the applause belonged to the orchestra that played the work—the Boston Symphony. The 104 musicians of the Boston had started their first European visit in a muddle over housing arrangements. The men wanted to shift for themselves, rebelled against a plan to billet them all in one hotel. Their conductor, Charles Munch, solved the problem in a hurry: "I don't care whether you gentlemen sleep together. What matters to me is that you play together." They did. In their first appearance at Paris' international Festival of the Arts, they offered modern French (Roussel, Honegger) and American (Barber, Piston) music, and left the audience (including President Auriol) shouting itself hoarse. In courtly appreciation, the orchestra and Conductor Munch broke a long-standing symphonic rule and played an encore. Two nights later came the success of Monteux, Stravinsky and The Rite of Spring.

Paris' critics came out gasping superlatives. Said Le Figaro: "An extraordinary ensemble, playing with an assurance and ardor that bordered on fanaticism." L'Aurore's critic said, "Never before have we heard anything comparable to the

STRAVINSKY IN PARIS From boos to cheers in 39 years.

Louis Hecklin

sumptuous sonority of the strings and mordant quality of the trumpets." Said one Boston musician: "We did our best because we realized what it meant to Munch and Monteux to play in Paris."

Ahead for the Boston: The Hague, Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfort, Berlin, Strasbourg (Munch's home town), Lyons, Bordeaux and London.

• • •

L'AURORE
France libre
9, rue Louis-le-Grand - PARIS-2e
SIXTE QUI
SAINT-MAURICE - SEINE - 7

Tumultuous Greeting for BSO In Its First European Concert

PARIS (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance in Europe last night won the tumultuous applause of an audience studded with celebrities.

Charles Munch directed the 71-year-old orchestra at the famed Paris Opera House, playing a program of musical firsts it introduced to the United States, including two compositions dear to the hearts of French music lovers. These were Debussy's "La Mer," Suite No. 2 of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," first played in America in 1917.

French President and Madame Vincent Auriol, Foreign Minister Robert Schuman and U.S. Ambassador and Mrs. James C. Dunn were among the socialites present.

The performance was a gala event of the "masterpieces of the 20th century" festival sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Made up of Western intellectuals, its objective is to celebrate the accomplishments of art in a free world.

Last night's performance marked the first time in history that an American orchestra has played under the gold and gilt roof of the Paris Opera House.

THE BOSTON HERALD

"We Were Conquered," Critic Says

Paris Acclaim of Symphony Surpasses Wildest Dreams

By RUDOLPH ELIE

PARIS, May 7—Music critics and feature writers of the Paris press went all out today in proclaiming the European debut of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch at the Opera House last night a triumph of the first category.

The concert itself, with President and Madame Vincent Auriol heading the list of dignitaaries and celebrities attending, was obviously a tremendous audience success. Cheers and bravos echoed throughout the magnificient red and gold Opera House for more than 10 minutes while Dr. Mu took six recalls to the sta

Continued on P

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 13 1952

BATTLEGROUND: Paris was scene of opening of West's cold war cultural offensive

BATTLE OF

by Emily Genauer

Herald Tribune Art Critic

PARIS

A NEW kind of battle is being fought in Europe this summer. It is part of the old cold war, but it is on a new front — the cultural front.

The offensive opened here in April with a month-long festival of arts entitled "Masterpieces of the XXth Century." At the end of August the battle will be carried right into the shadow of the Iron Curtain with a "Berlin Festival."

The plan for the Paris festival was to assemble the best of the Free World's output in all the arts, not to preach and indoctrinate, but merely to show through the works themselves how fresh and vital are creative talents functioning in a free society.

Into the fray went such contemporaries as Igor Stravinsky, Jean Cocteau, Henri Matisse, Georges Rouault, Henry Moore, Aaron Copland, Virgil Thomson, Samuel Barber, William Faulkner, W. H. Auden and a host of other musicians, writers, artists. Represented, too, were immortals like Van Gogh, Schoenberg, Gertrude Stein. And brought up as reserves were the New York City Ballet Company and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well the Covent Garden and Vienna State operas and several European symphony orchestras.

Who Pays the Bill?

BETWEEN August 31 and September 30, Berliners will see similar music, ballet, theater and art presentations, provided by the United States, Great Britain, France, and West Berlin itself. This festival, unlike the Paris one, however, will have official government sponsorship. The U.S. State Department's contribution will be in the neighborhood of $50,000.

A group of American philanthropists, convinced that a cultural campaign can have practical — even though only long-range — results, put up well over half a million dollars to finance the Paris festival under the sponsorship of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The Congress is a world-wide organization of artists, educators, writers and scientists whose purpose is the defense of intellectual liberties against all encroachments on the creative spirit.

Critical Success

THAT the festival in almost all its aspects was a great artistic success there can be no question. All Paris flocked to the events, including a thousand students a day who occupied free or extremely cheap seats at performances or especially arranged dress rehearsals.

Most critics agreed: That the Boston Symphony, which played under the direction of Charles Münch and Pierre Monteux, either equalled or surpassed any symphonic concerts heard in Paris in years. That Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck," as presented by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and State Opera, was a high spot in opera history. That the New York City Ballet was infinitely superior to that of the Paris Opera.

That Stravinsky conducting his own opera-oratorio

TW - 7-13-52

[239]

TLE OF THE ARTS

Till the Paris festival, Russia's appeal to the European intellectual was uncontested. Now the West has launched a cultural counterattack. Berlin will see the next round

OBSERVERS: Students discuss arts and the man in front of a festival theater

"Oedipus Rex," with narrative written and recited by the poet Jean Cocteau, and the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," were events of unique quality and interest. That the festival art exhibition was highly rewarding even though regrettably weak in American art.

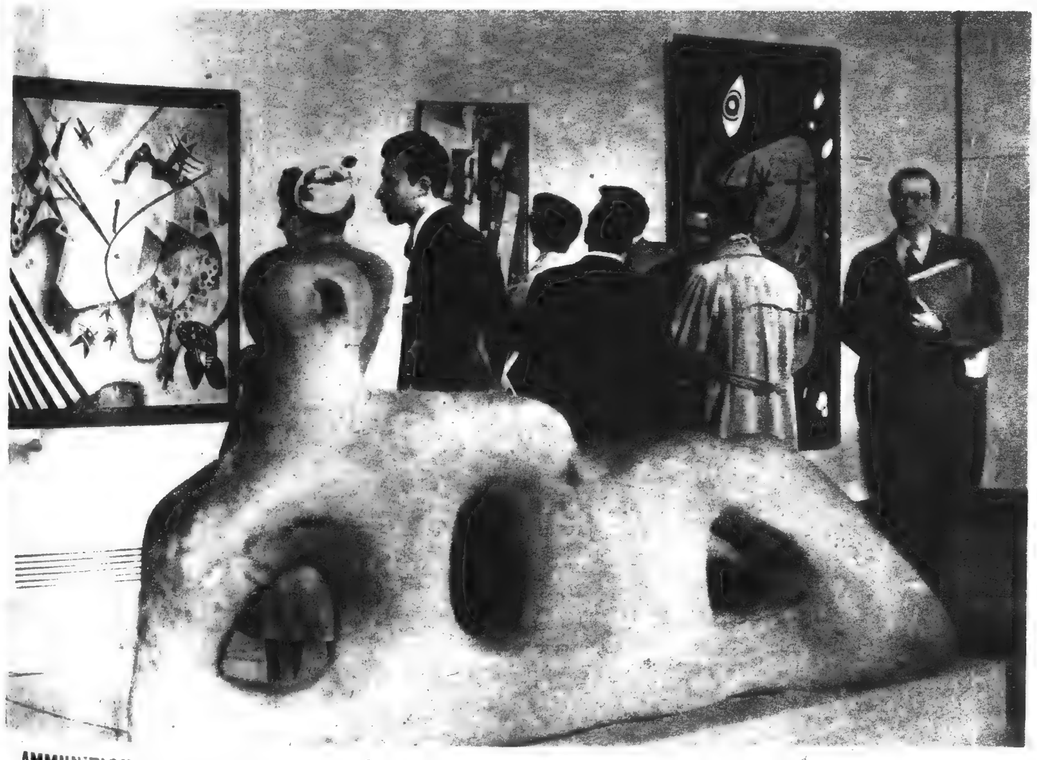
United in Spirit

THE art show included only one work by an American among 126 paintings and sculptures selected as outstanding products of the past 75 years — a mobile by Alexander Calder. But there was no attempt by the American sponsors to exploit any national supremacy. American works and performers were given their place among orchestras, performers and pictures of free Europe to prove how the same spirit, the same ideals of free expression, animate and unite us all.

We wanted, in short, to attract Europe's influential intellectuals to ourselves, not our "camp." Europeans were already aware of our political, economic and military ties to Europe through the Mutual Security program and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The festival was to show we were mindful of the cultural bonds that have existed for centuries without the formality of treaties.

The attitude of many Americans on this score is "So what?" It is necessary to remind these people that in most European countries cultural and intellectual matters play a much larger role in the consciousness of the general public than in America. Paris alone has over 20,000 enrolled students and countless others studying on their own, all of whom have a lively interest in cultural matters. Here, too, intellectuals play leading roles in national life. Prime ministers and politicians are apt to be writers like Clemenceau, Blum and Claudel.

The Communists are more aware of the European intellectual than we have been. They have made him a main target for their so-called "peace offensive." Last year, according to a report of our State Department, the Soviets spent more than $150,000,000 on propaganda, most of it cultural in nature, in France alone. This was more than we spent on our information and educational exchange around the world.



AMMUNITION: Show at Musee d'Art Moderne had international scope. Here visitors view works by Russian Kandinsky, Spaniards Miro and Picasso and British Sculptor Moore. One American was in exhibit

It was in 1950, or co-incident with the emergence of Russia's propaganda theme of "peaceful co-existence," that the new emphasis on cultural propaganda became apparent in Soviet tactics. That year, although previously she had participated in only limited degree in international festivals or any events outside her satellite countries, Russia sent, by State Department estimate, some 39,000 carefully screened writers, artists and musicians abroad to participate in events in Europe and Asia.

A year ago, at an international music competition held in Brussels, Russian musicians walked off with first and second places, while two young American artists, there on their own, took, ninth and eleventh. To us this may seem an unimportant occurrence. But to the Belgians and the millions who heard the performances on the radio and read the criticisms in the press, Russia had made an important point — that it is a peace-loving country which believes enough in such peaceful cultural occupations to encourage, train and finance the travels of musical talents.

Soviet Weak Spot

AT THE Milan Fair in 1950 the 16 Russian exhibits were, according to our State Department observers, the largest and most lavish represented. We weren't in the show at all, and the Soviet press made much of the idea that Americans were too materialistic to be concerned with such things.

In New Delhi this spring Russia exhibited the art work of 28 Stalin Prize winners who glorified the abundant life and peaceful intentions of the Soviet Union. By contrast, the Russian pavilion at the international Biennale exhibition, now on in Venice, is dark and empty.

The Russians don't dare show their painting to Western European intellectuals. For on canvas it is most apparent that the Russians just don't use art, they control it utterly. They do not recognize it, as we do in allegedly uncultured America, as an ornament of living, a means of expression through which one sensitive, imaginative human being can deepen the perceptions of others to new experiences, new meanings, new beauty. For them it is tool to extoll the state and its heroes, to propagate unquestioning faith in the dictator.

The Communist Objective

FOR all of the Soviet Union's intense cultural campaign, the fact remains that the Communist vote, here in France for example, has not skyrocketed. Has she, then, accomplished more than to present a peaceful sideshow in the hope of diverting attention from her more aggressive activity in other parts of the world?

Political observers feel that Russia's aim at the moment is not necessarily to win recruits for the Communist party, but rather to foster among non-Communists an attitude of what is called here "neutralism," thereby paralyzing them into fatal inactivity and sleep. To this extent the Communist cultural program in France and has not been unsuccessful.

Our own counteroffensive in Paris cannot be counted an

Continued on page 42

The End

[240]

LEFTY AN

FICTION DON'T get me wrong — I've got nothing against science. All I say is that a left-handed pitcher has no more business with it than a monkey with a stick of dynamite.

We were rolling along in fourth place as we came into New York for our last Eastern stand. That was as high as we could hope to get, but fourth place was as important to the Bluejays as the pennant for somebody else.

Callahan, our manager, had been told that we would finish in the first division or he could look for a new job during the winter, and for most of the rest of us, fourth place would mean the difference between a nice little raise and that up-to-25-per cent cut the major leagues allow. So, as I say, we were all happy the night we pulled into New York, and thankful for Lefty Gillenwater.

Probably it was because I've been catching pitchers, right-handed and left-handed, for 10 years in this league that Callahan picked me to watch out for Lefty, room with him and

RANDI WAS A CUTE LITTLE '

SCIENCE TO BASEBA

keep him out of harm's way. Not that the kid was timid. Fresh up from the Saginaw Jackrabbits, he had a beautiful curve that killed the left-hand hitters and nerve enough to address everybody on the team, including Callahan, as "Buster." When Musial hit a home run off him in St. Louis, Lefty swore Stan had swung with his eyes shut. No, it wasn't nerve Lefty lacked. It was good sense.

I guess I pulled a rock when I let him loose in New York by himself, but there was a poker game going, and I just suggested that the kid go out and look at the neon signs. That was the last I saw of him until one in the morning, by which time I was getting worried.

The I were pla due to s game ha room — with a b
"How

"ALL shoes of was hal baseball
I blin
"I sai
"Wha
your be

NEW YORKERS IN PARIS: Dancers Brown, Hayden and Reed of City Ballet chat with Director Balanchine and Conductor Barzin after festival debut

BATTLE OF THE ARTS

Continued from page nine

unqualified success. Our cultural offensive was the subject of counterattacks. There were skirmishes at the symposiums and debates of the festival, at the café tables on the Boulevard St. Germain, in the studios of Montparnasse.

It was argued, for example, that our artists have liberty only to starve, because there is so little need for art in our materialistic culture. In Russia at least he eats.

If one answered that starving artists are pretty much of an anachronism in America today, that artists who cannot live by their works teach or do commercial assignments and still create exactly as they wish, the argument took another tack.

Why is control by the Politburo, went the new line, any worse than control by the standards of Hollywood, advertising, radio and television?

The big point here is that U.S. artists don't work under the threat of Politburo liquidation. Also, one can cite good examples of art patronage by the Standard Oil Co., Abbott Laboratories, the National Broadcasting Company, the Guggenheim Fellowships and the Ford Foundation.

More Questions

HARDEST to answer were questions raised by the festival itself:

Didn't the art exhibition, with only a single work by an American artist among scores from public and private U.S. collections, prove what the Russians say — that America produces not artists but capitalists rich enough to buy up the art of other countries?

And (Next question!) do cultural events in America always cost $5 a seat?

Some intellectuals honestly sought out answers at the festival. Some were aloof — like Picasso, long a Communist, though his nonconformist art would unquestionably be outlawed in the Soviet Union.

Specific Liberties

SEEN entering another part of the Musee d'Art Moderne, the day the festival exhibit opened there, Picasso was asked by a photographer to pose beside one of his eight pictures in the show.

He refused. "I know my own work. I don't have to see it again. There is no need for me to visit the exhibition."

Jean-Paul Sartre, invited to take part in the festival's roundtables, also refused, according to Nicolas Nabokov, president of the organizing committee. His explanation: "I'm not that much of an anti-Communist."

Ignazio Silone, the distinguished Italian writer and ex-Communist, did participate. He made the point that festivals of this type have meaning only when everyone stops talking vaguely about "liberty" and makes clear what specific "liberties" the free world offers — the right to leave one's country, to listen to the radio, to read the books one prefers, all without risking prison.

W. H. Auden, the poet, made another point:

"It is a weakness of the artist's position today in the free societies," he said, "that he does not more closely associate himself with his community."

A well-known French poet, who insisted on being nameless, said, "I remain neutral. It is a confused state perhaps, but it is a gentle one."

Amid reservations and skepticism evoked by the festival, the reaction of the French Communist press was both revealing and encouraging.

For the first week it ignored the doings. Later, when the artistic quality of the presentations was apparent from the tremendous audience and critical acclaim, it let fly with a barrage of violent denunciations.

The festival, it charged, was a campaign "to enroll French intellectuals in the cause of war and Yankee imperialism."

Reds Hit and Hurt

AND: "There are only two cultures today, those of peace and those of war. This is the culture of war."

And: "Behind such smoke screens the assassins of democratic culture hope to intensify their attacks on freedom at home."

To judge from the outcries, the West's new offensive had hit the Communists where it hurt. The assemblage of simon-pure art and music was free of any inherent propaganda message, but for the Reds it was loaded, a weapon they couldn't spike.

It may yet turn out — for Frenchmen, for West Germans next month, and for the world eventually — to be more convincing than the blatant propaganda of the Communists. The End

[240]

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
JUN 8 - 1952

Cultural Counteroffensive

All too often, painters, musical artists and creative writers have been used by the Communist party for its own degrading purposes. Making the most of the fact that many artists are highly individualistic persons and sometimes at odds with the economic mores of Western society, the Communists have been tireless in gathering intellectuals together in shrewdly planned enterprises. The effort has been to make it appear that Communist societies, while opposing capitalism, have been the patrons of free and fruitful arts. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In a brilliant counteroffensive of this cold war of the arts, staged in Paris, various orchestras, ballet companies, painters and philosophers of the free world, and especially from America, have concluded a month-long festival of the arts. To the extent that it had a propaganda purpose, this great gathering of artistic and intellectual talent was planned simply to show the whole world that the arts flourish best among free men, and that artistic and intellectual freedom go hand in hand with political freedom.

That principle ought to be obvious. But since it has been obscured by unremitting propaganda to the contrary, the Paris festival was something the free peoples needed. It was especially wise to send the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Ballet to Europe. They made an extraordinarily good impression. And they must have done a lot to combat the notion—widespread in France and fanned steadily by the leftists—that America is merely the home of a money-grubbing bourgeoisie, devoid of culture and interested only in capitalist imperialism.

Not least of the triumphs of the festival of the free world was that of the RIAS orchestra, developed with American funds and guidance in West Berlin. Its superb performance, against the backdrop of the embattled Western zone of Berlin, dramatizes powerfully the courage of the people in that outpost of freedom, surrounded by Communist oppression.

It should be a matter of especial satisfaction to Cincinnatians that this spectacular parade of artistic talent in the cause of freedom was made possible by the generosity of and vision of their fellow-townsman, Julius Fleischmann. Mr. Fleischmann has done much, in his unostentatious way, to encourage the arts here and in Europe. He also has done much, even more quietly, in the Committee for Free Europe, to strengthen the counteroffensive of the free world against Communist inroads.

In the festival at Paris, he and his associates have combined the showmanship of the arts and the purposeful techniques of political propaganda to do a first-class job for the free world.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JUN 8 - 1952

Americans In Paris

THE MOST remarkable thing about reports from Paris—one by Associated Press, the other by the New Yorker magazine's Paris writer, who signs herself Genet—concerning a mammoth artistic festival just completed there is that there's nothing in the one which actually contradicts the other. Yet they present substantially different pictures of the event, which was entitled "Masterpieces of the 20th Century."

With the AP man, everything is rosy. A "glittering concert" has "climaxed a month-long program designed to prove that art thrives on freedom and is crushed by totalitarian regimes." An enthusiastic Parisian declared that "American orchestras, ballet, and conductors can stand up to or even eclipse most of those in Europe." Brightest of all the gems in the American diadem is the Boston Orchestra, making its first European appearance, which had the audience "on its feet, shouting, yelling and applauding as never before."

None of this is denied by the New Yorker's Mlle. Genet. The music was wonderful, the crowds enthusiastic. Indeed, she suggests, the festival was an "extremely popular fiasco." In what sense a fiasco?

Well, none who consider themselves the guardians of Parisian critical taste was asked to serve on festival committees; worse, none received the "customary first-night invitations."

Then there was trouble over tickets for the Paris critics, "and therefore many of the critics criticized with a jaundiced eye."

Also, the asking price for tickets to the first-night ballet was outrageously high. One newspaper observed that "nobody was there—except the anonymous holders of five-thousand franc seats."

A further complication was the story which got around Paris to the effect that the festival was promoted and financed by one man, Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, who made his money in—of all things—yeast and gin. Actually, several Americans were involved, but the Fleischmann story prevailed.

Finally, although Pierre Monteux, Igor Stravinsky and Charles Munch all were received enthusiastically, many Parisians couldn't help remembering that each of them had been "howled at in contempt at various times in the past" by other Paris audiences.

Mlle. Genet writes like one who has been around in musical circles, with a knowledge of how its devotees and critics behave. That knowledge, we suspect, gave her an edge over the AP writer, who only reported what he saw and heard.

Take two pounds of small or medium squids (easily obtainable in the Boston market). Clean and skin (which is, he says, the worst part of the job). Cut up in fine slices, like cucumbers, tentacles and all.

Saute in olive oil slowly for ten minutes with four or five garlic cloves to taste, fine ground fresh parsely, one half onion cut fine and a touch of oregano.

Add squid. Salt and pepper to taste. Saute ten minutes.

Add one half cup of sherry and simmer five minutes.

Add one large can of best plum tomatoes, Italian style.

Boil hard, then simmer while stirring occasionally for half hour.

Spread over bread or spaghetti with a glass of dry red Chianti on the side.

[241]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Doubling in Brass Easy for These Men

Of the 104 members [illegible] phony orchestra [illegible] tive on the interests and [illegible] men—the largest national after the United States [illegible] French papers made much [illegible] you got the idea in Paris [illegible] phony consisted [illegible] mented for the occasion [illegible] cians.

Actually, there are [illegible] musicians in the orchestra [illegible] born in Belgium. Russian [illegible] next most numerous, with eight [illegible] sian-born musicians in the [illegible] one critic, on a pro-Communist [illegible] it was why the orchestra had [illegible] tone. There are [illegible] Italians in the orchestra [illegible] mans, two or three [illegible] Dutchmen, a couple [illegible] Portuguese, a Hungarian [illegible] Finn. Nearly all [illegible] and, like American [illegible] their names reflect [illegible] ground. And the [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] born: they look and [illegible] think like Americans. [illegible] diverse elements [illegible] play like Americans [illegible] after having heard as [illegible] orchestras in their own [illegible] to be instantly aware of [illegible] drive, their mingled [illegible] and unanminity [illegible] Europeans, leaving [illegible] heard to say they [illegible] like it, not because it [illegible] better than the European [illegible] though it does), but because [illegible] ing spirit and technique [illegible] them off their feet.

Varied Interests

Diverse as the national elements are, they are no more diverse than the interests of the men themselves. As noted yesterday, nearly all of them are proficient at instruments other than the ones they use professionally. Alfred Zighera, for example, whose instrument is the cello, also performs exquisitely on the viola da gamba. Though it looks something like a cello, the viola da gamba has six strings and is fingered in an entirely different way—which is harder for a cellist to do than to play a quite different instrument.

Bernard Zig[illegible] orchestra, is also [illegible] pianist, and a conductor [illegible] Bryant, violin, is also [illegible] celestra player, while [illegible] base, began his career as [illegible] conductor of a famous [illegible] band. Henry Portnoi, bass [illegible] violin, while John Barwicki bass [illegible] piano and tuba.

The musicians [illegible] every direction. [illegible] professional photog[illegible] lection of photos [illegible] action. Leo Pan[illegible] youngest member [illegible] knocked out a chair [illegible] ing his service [illegible] Cioffi, clarinet [illegible] orchestra under [illegible] Metropolitan [illegible] Rolland Tapley, [illegible] phone for the [illegible] of the North Sh[illegible] Stoneham high [illegible] Wellesley Commun[illegible] ing and camping [illegible] achievement so[illegible] in New Hampshire.

Boaz Piller's [illegible] graphs and musical [illegible] composers is one [illegible] collections in the [illegible] tion of Delfft [illegible] George Zazofsky [illegible] with the Zimbler [illegible] with George Madsen [illegible] tion of being the champion [illegible] Rosario Mazzeo, bass clar[illegible] advanced ornithologist. [illegible] naturalist, mountain [illegible] besides being the personnel [illegible] orchestra.

Expert on Squid

Pasquale Cardillo [illegible] orchestra's leading [illegible] James Stagliano, in Italian dis[illegible] having related to him a disastrous [illegible] ture in eating squids in a San [illegible] restaurant once, Mr. Cardillo [illegible] reconsider my opinion that squid [illegible] flavor like an elastic band. He [illegible] tated the following recipe, which he claims makes squid one of the more delicious items in the whole repertoire of sea foods.

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Glowing Tribute To Anti-Snafu Dept.

(... tour of Europe.)

... play a little inspiring ... have a few extrava- ... for the firm of Judd, ... reux and Sanchez, Inc. ... isn't Inc., but it ought ... words aren't extravag..., ... gentlemen d'l to ... tion ... of the Boston ... such a success every- ... cannot be fully related. ... beginning to end, a ... tribution to the anti-snafu ...

Long Cherished

... partner in all this is a man ... all those who come in ... professionally and social- ... Judd, manager of the ... man of so unruffled a ... not even the news that ... hicks carrying the baggage ... and missed the boat for ... n't possibly arrive in time ... concert shook him up. ... reported to have said with- ... his voice, "this promises to be ...

(The truck containing the orchestra's dress suits, and some of the instruments got caught behind the great Bordeaux to Paris bicycle race, which could no more be interfered with than a Boston marathon race, and just barely made the last boat to Dover. The men were warming and tuning up in their underclothes when the baggage arrived a half hour before the concert, which had to be delayed an hour).

In late middle years, tall, blue-eyed, white-haired, soft spoken, graceful in his speech and attitude, Mr. Judd worked endlessly at the infinite number of details in the planning of a tour that took an orchestra of 104 men on an 8000 mile journey for virtual one-night stands in no less than 11 cities. The problems that were his, however, will never really be known to the press: so discreet and wary is he in dealing with its members that if he were asked if it were raining out when it was raining out, he'd doubtless reply "Well, I think you might say so."

For four fifths of the trip Mr. Judd rode along in the same train with the men of the orchestra, patiently listening to the problems, the complaints, the ideas and the suggestions of all comers. Nobody ever saw him ruffled, irritated, annoyed, or weary. And nobody ever saw him baffled, either.

Solves Everything

His first lieutenant a relative newcomer to the organization, is Thomas Perry, Jr., a crew-cut sort of a blond in his early 30's with a positive genius for subduing what are known far and wide as "the papers." Sharing with Mr. Judd that imperturbability required for coping with the unexpected, he would emerge from under a mass of tickets, passport data, manifests, memoranda, American express checks, letters of credit, official orders and railroad schedules, and solve all difficulties.

At the Dutch border the customs men discovered the manifest didn't list the amount of money everyone carried. To have interviewed all the men and get this information would have delayed the train at least an hour. Why not get the dope en route, asked Mr. Perry, and submit it to the authorities in Amsterdam? The customs men were bowled over; this ... and tape never occurred to ... leaving a country at the border ... discovered a member didn't have ... and a man in Europe without ... is in a far more delicate posi- ... man without his pants. Mr. ... the day. Obviously, he said, ... didn't really have a passport, ... got by the same border guards going in? Of course not, said the border guards that is very true. They let the man out with handshakes all around.

But the imperturbable Mr. Perry had other problems to solve, too. One night, when a stage hand wouldn't move the tympanis because his job restricted him to moving the lights, he marched onto the stage and moved the bulky instruments himself.

However, the whole operation of moving ... instruments and the baggage from one ... to another was the responsibility of ... Gonreux, baggage master of the ... Largely saved from one disas- ... by another by the fact he could ... clouded in French than the French- ... themselves, and certainly saved from ... disaster by the fact he could sleep ... top of a trunk, as he often had to, Mr. Gonreux and his assistant, Al Robison, shunted $200,000 worth of baggage all around Europe and had only one real scare: the hour's delay of the London concert. (Mr. Robison had his own personal scare: he missed the train in Brussels and commandeered a taxi for a $15 race with the train to Aachen).

This Clipping From
SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN-REVIEW
JUN 15 1952

Bostonians Keep Critics Quite Busy

AN I-WITNESS REPORT
By CYRUS DURGIN
Music Critic, Boston Globe
Special to Spokesman-Review Music Service

HOMEWARD BOUND WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The overall impression of the Boston Symphony orchestra derived from press "cuttings" (or clips, as we call them) on its European tour, seems strikingly like the legendary opinion of New York: "Wonderful for a visit, but no place to live."

The European summation seems to be that the Boston symphony is wonderful for a visit, but not an orchestra to live with.

Of course, the fact that Europeans aren't offered the opportunity to live with it may have a bearing on the judgment. At the last report London was still disgruntled because provision had been made for only one concert in the Royal Festival hall, rather than the three the critics felt the public would patronize.

The London press was not overly enthusiastic, all told, but without exception it did praise the marvellous virtuosity and the uncanny ensemble of the orchestra. They objected to the lack of even a single classical work, which is, by personal experience, a useful touchstone in judging an unfamiliar ensemble. Here I think Charles Munch was at fault; he had given the Brahms No. 4 a few times on the continent, and I think he would have been well-advised to repeat it in London.

The Times seemed impressed by the way "in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unkown to us. This is not pure gain, as it approximates what should be a corporation to a machine, and it was not until Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe' that we found humanity and poetry." The same critic likened the tone to something between the "suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the New York Philharmonic."

Capell Gets in Act

The eminent Richard Capell, evidently squeezed into three short paragraphs of the Daily Telegraph (though the paper carried more than a column on "holiday hair styles" and "foolproof ways to make a meringue"), spoke of "an evening of splendid music-making. Mr. Munch evidently fancies himself an exponent of the exciting and the picturesque, and his men responded to him with a sound and a furry that were always of fine musical qualities."

A candid opinion of Charles Reid in the Evening Standard read: "English orchestras are now playing better than for 15 years or so. But after the Bostonians, their best will sound pretty drab."

Left at that, it would seem high praise. But the report continues: "Not that the Bostonians' taste is always perfect . . . their brass behaved with bounce and slickness that smelled faintly of Sousa and symphonic jazz." Since the Boston brass is largely French, that should doubtless read Jean Phillippe Sousa.

Nonetheless the London critical response was far more meaningful than that on the continent, where only the reviews in the Paris Le Mond and in the Frankfurt and Bordeaux papers seemed reasoned and analytical.

All the rest, for my money, were words, words, words, laudatory in the main, but not significant. I return to the United States with an enhanced respect for many things, the Boston Symphony included—but not least, for the consistently competent product of its hard-worked music reviewers.

Intricate Rules

Though tormented by hopelessly intricate union rules (they once had to break out a wall to move a piano off stage as none of the 20 stage hands standing around were allowed to), by cramped space (they once had to rescue a man who got locked in his own trunk because of the crowding) and by lack of facilities (one concert hall had no toilets at all for the men), they set up and took down no less than 16 stage seatings, not including rehearsals and concerts on ship board, without incident save one slightly dented French horn.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JUN 15 1952

Boston Symphony Rated No. 1

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is certainly not my intention to keep plucking away at the Boston-Symphony-orchestra-in-Europe-string, but now that the tour is over and most of the comment and most of the results are in, I must give the string one final pluck, as follows: After 50 years of living on its reputation, Boston, with its symphony orchestra alone, has achieved international repute as the home of the ranking culture in the United States.

It is hard to convey what this means to the average American or to convey how important it is both for Boston and for the United States. It is hard to convey because the average American cannot conceive, until he encounters it personally, the low regard the average European has for American culture. It is only the exceptional European who is aware that there is any culture in the United States at all. I shall not forget for some time chatting with a highly educated but haughty girl in Amsterdam. I mentioned that I had just visited the Rijksmuseum and had found it most impressive. "Well," she said, "after all, you haven't anything like that in the United States." I informed her, and rather crisply, too, that we could put the whole Rijksmuseum in one wing of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, which we could. This, of course, comes under the childish category of My Father Can Lick Yours, but it is galling in the extreme to find this attitude among people who should know better.

The average European view of the United States is hopelessly uninformed and distorted in nearly every regard, in fact. Sometimes this stems from deliberate distortion, as in London where the foulest and cheapest sex books are publicly displayed everywhere as having sold one million copies in the U. S. when these books, if indeed they are available in America at all, are only obtainable through illicit channels. Sometimes it stems from combined ignorance and chauvinism, as in the case of a noted minister who stated that the American wives, in contrast to the wives of his countrymen, are all nervous wrecks from constant fear of losing their husbands. Meaningless generalities of such sweeping character on every phase of American life, inevitably condemnatory, are everywhere encountered in Europe.

So far as the average European is concerned, America consists of New York, Hollywood and Texas. New York is conceived to be a towering hell - hole of iniquitous money - grubbing, Hollywood is a gram with an I.Q., a forum with serious intent and a people with a conversational capacity beyond the nursery.

Science, yes; American science is highly regarded, especially as it relates to the production line. In medical circles American medicine is highly regarded, too, and the initiates are well aware of Boston's special eminence in this field. Generally speaking, however, the European man-in-the-street, who may envy the American washing machine and electric refrigerator, holds the determined view that America is otherwise one vast materialistic society devoid of morals, of principles, of family integrity and of culture.

Thus to have the Boston Symphony orchestra descend upon him, and to have it demonstrate itself to be so vastly superior to anything Europe has to offer from the point of view of technical capacity, unity of ensemble and tonal opulence, proved to be not less than a revelation. It might have been argued — though it wasn't—that the orchestra's esthetic, its spiritual quality, so to speak, was not superior to one or two European orchestras; the programs offered by the Boston Symphony on its tour offered little room for comparison. I have no doubt that some members of the audiences may have held secret reservations about the orchestra in this regard; after all, you can't get to an orchestra's soul in one largely ill - advised program designed for little but display.

Yet audiences everywhere, even in the highly musical, highly critical cities like Amsterdam, were all but bowled over by the Boston Symphony. Ten minute ovations with audiences stamping, clapping, cheering and yelling for more occurred everywhere; there were no exceptions. Only in London, where one of the loudest ovations occurred, were the music critics even decently restrained in their notices, and the London critics, as was expected, gallantly brushed the orchestra off in national chauvinism. (One, a comedian by the name of Leonard Mosly, referred to the orchestra as "The Boys' Town Band.")

Science Regarded

In all this there is no room for any notion that America may have a museum or two, a couple of writers, an artist of sorts, a composer of standing, an educational institution that ranks, an orchestra that can make music, a poet with literacy, a journal with distinction, a newspaper with integrity, a drama with verity, a radio pro-

Spares Confusion

But there was no doubt anywhere that the orchestra had come as a complete and profound surprise. The attitude, an unflattering one, was "Do you mean to tell us this sort of thing goes on in Boston?" They could hardly believe their senses—and I speak as one who made it a particular point to talk to the musical people who are influenced little either by ovations or musical notices and sound them out privately. There were occasional reservations along the esthetic lines mentioned above: could the orchestra, for example, play Beethoven? And what could it do with Mahler or Handel? Yet the genuine astonishment, the universal admiration for the orchestra, was profoundly gratifying to me.

For the extension of their remarks was that if Boston can produce and support an orchestra like this, then Boston must truly be a cultured city. A thing like this, after all, doesn't spring from some barren desert devoid of the artistic impulse entirely; there must be some well-spring of culture in Boston and perhaps even the United States after all. I did not have the heart to tell them that Boston, officially, is hardly aware of the existence of the orchestra at all and does nothing whatever for it. Nor could I confess that cultural matters, in point of fact, are largely ignored by the city, its people and its press. It would do nothing but confuse them.

But the orchestra itself did not confuse them; this is the sort of thing the European really understands, and this is the sort of thing that really impresses him. Far be it from me to venture too far into the sweeping generality department about Europe, as the Europeans so recklessly do about America, yet from the overpowering evidence offered during the first European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a tour that took it into the major European capitals, I can not but agree with an American general who, at a reception given the orchestra in Metz, stated that the visit of the orchestra had done more to stimulate goodwill toward and appreciation of America than any event in the seven years since the war.

"The European," he added, "judges a nation by the advanced quality of its culture and not by its washing machines or its politics."

If this is so, the Boston Symphony orchestra's feat was no less than prodigious.

B-4 II 6/13/52

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Glowing Tribute To Anti-Snafu Dept.

(My [illegible] tour of Europe.)

[illegible] will play a little inspiring band music, shall have a few extravagant words of praise for the firm of Judd, Perry, Rowe, Genereux and Sanchez, Inc.

Actually the firm isn't Inc., but it ought to be. All these words aren't extravagant, either, for these gentlemen did to make the European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra such a success everywhere simply cannot be fully related. Theirs was from beginning to end, a magnificent contribution to the anti-snafu department.

Long Cherished

The senior partner in all this is a man long cherished by all those who come in contact with him professionally and socially. He is George Judd, manager of the orchestra, and a man of so unruffled a temperament that not even the news that one of the two trucks carrying the baggage of the orchestra had missed the boat for London and couldn't possibly arrive in time for the scheduled concert shook him up. "Hmmm," he is reported to have said without a change in his voice, "this promises to be interesting."

(The truck, containing the orchestra's dress suits, and some of the instruments got caught behind the great Bordeaux to Paris bicycle race, which could no more be interfered with than a Boston marathon race, and just barely made the last boat to Dover. The men were warming and tuning up in their underclothes when the baggage arrived a half hour before the concert, which had to be delayed an hour).

In late middle years, tall, blue-eyed, white-haired, soft spoken, graceful in his speech and attitude, Mr. Judd worked endlessly at the infinite number of details in the planning of a tour that took an orchestra of 104 men on an 8000 mile journey for virtual one-night stands in no less than 11 cities. The problems that were his, however, will never really be known to the press; so discreet and wary is he in dealing with its members that if he were asked if it were raining out when it was raining out, he'd doubtless reply "Well, I think you might say so."

For four fifths of the trip Mr. Judd rode along in the same train with the men of the orchestra, patiently listening to the problems, the complaints, the ideas and the suggestions of all comers. Nobody ever saw him ruffled, irritated, annoyed, or weary. And nobody ever saw him baffled, either.

Solves Everything

His first lieutenant a relative newcomer to the organization, is Thomas Perry, Jr., a crew-cut sort of a blond in his early 30's with a positive genius for subduing what are known far and wide as "the papers." Sharing with Mr. Judd that imperturbability required for coping with the unexpected, he would emerge from under a mass of tickets, passport data, manifests, memoranda, American express checks, letters of credit, official orders and railroad schedules, and solve all difficulties.

At the Dutch border the customs men discovered the manifest didn't list the amount of money everyone carried. To have interviewed all the men and get this information would have delayed the train at least an hour. Why not get the dope en route, asked Mr. Perry, and submit it to the authorities in Amsterdam? The custom's men were bowled over; this severing of red tape never occurred to them. Leaving a country at the border it was discovered a member didn't have his passport, and a man in Europe without his passport is in a far more delicate position than a man without his pants. Mr. Perry saved the day. Obviously, he said, if the man didn't really have a passport, would he have got by the same border guards going in? Of course not, said the border guards that is very true. They let the man out with handshakes all around.

But the imperturbable Mr. Perry had other problems to solve, too. One night, when a stage hand wouldn't move the tympanis because his job restricted him to moving the lights, he marched onto the stage and moved the bulky instruments himself.

However, the whole operation of moving the instruments and the baggage from one place to another was the responsibility of Harry Genereux, baggage master of the orchestra. Largely saved from one disaster after another by the fact he could swear louder in French than the Frenchmen themselves, and certainly saved from personal disaster by the fact he could sleep on the top of a trunk, as he often had to, Mr. Genereux and his assistant, Al Robison, shunted $200,000 worth of baggage all around Europe and had only one real scare: the hour's delay of the London concert. (Mr. Robison had his own personal scare: he missed the train in Brussels and comandeered a taxi for a $15 race with the train to Aachen).

Intricate Rules

Though tormented by hopelessly intricate union rules (they once had to break out a wall to move a piano off stage as none of the 20 stage hands standing around were allowed to), by cramped space (they once had to rescue a man who got locked in his own trunk because of the crowding) and by lack of facilities (one concert hall had no toilets at all for the men), they set up and took down no less than 16 stage seatings, not including rehearsals and concerts on ship board, without incident save one slightly dented French horn.

[242]

This Clipping From
SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN-REVIEW
JUN 15 1952

Bostonians Keep Critics Quite Busy

AN I-WITNESS REPORT
By CYRUS DURGIN

Music Critic, Boston Globe
Special to Spokesman-Review Music Service

HOMEWARD BOUND WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The overall impression of the Boston Symphony orchestra derived from press "cuttings" (or clips, as we call them) on its European tour, seems strikingly like the legendary opinion of New York: "Wonderful for a visit, but no place to live."

The European summation seems to be that the Boston symphony is wonderful for a visit, but not an orchestra to live with.

Of course, the fact that Europeans aren't offered the opportunity to live with it may have a bearing on the judgment. At the last report London was still disgruntled because provision had been made for only one concert in the Royal Festival hall, rather than the three the critics felt the public would patronize.

The London press was not overly enthusiastic, all told, but without exception it did praise the marvellous virtuosity and the uncanny ensemble of the orchestra. They objected to the lack of even a single classical work, which is, by personal experience, a useful touchstone in judging an unfamiliar ensemble. Here I think Charles Munch was at fault; he had given the Brahms No. 4 a few times on the continent, and I think he would have been well-advised to repeat it in London.

The Times seemed impressed by the way "in which the orchestra act and react as one man to an extent unkown to us. This is not pure gain, as it approximates what should be a corporation to a machine, and it was not until Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe' that we found humanity and poetry." The same critic likened the tone to something between the "suavity of the Philadelphia and the chromium-plated glitter of the New York Philharmonic."

Capell Gets in Act

The eminent Richard Capell, evidently squeezed into three short paragraphs of the Daily Telegraph (though the paper carried more than a column on "holiday hair styles" and "foolproof ways to make a meringue"), spoke of "an evening of splendid music-making. Mr. Munch evidently fancies himself an exponent of the exciting and the picturesque, and his men responded to him with a sound and a furry that were always of fine musical qualities."

A candid opinion of Charles Reid in the Evening Standard read: "English orchestras are now playing better than for 15 years or so. But after the Bostonians, their best will sound pretty drab."

Left at that, it would seem high praise. But the report continues: "Not that the Bostonians' taste is always perfect . . . their brass behaved with bounce and slickness that smelled faintly of Sousa and symphonic jazz." Since the Boston brass is largely French, that should doubtless read Jean Phillippe Sousa.

Nonetheless the London critical response was far more meaningful than that on the continent, where only the reviews in the Paris Le Mond and in the Frankfurt and Bordeaux papers seemed reasoned and analytical.

All the rest, for my money, were words, words, words, laudatory in the main, but not significant. I return to the United States with an enhanced respect for many things, the Boston Symphony included—but not least, for the consistently competent product of its hard-worked music reviewers.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JUN 15 1952

Boston Symphony Rated No. 1

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is certainly not my intention to keep plucking away at the Boston-Symphony-orchestra-in-Europe-string, but now that the tour is over and most of the comment and most of the results are in, I must give the string one final pluck, as follows: After 50 years of living on its reputation, Boston, with its symphony orchestra alone, has achieved international repute as the home of the ranking culture in the United States.

It is hard to convey what this means to the average American or to convey how important it is both for Boston and for the United States. It is hard to convey because the average American cannot conceive, until he encounters it personally, the low regard the average European has for American culture. It is only the exceptional European who is aware that there is any culture in the United States at all. I shall not forget for some time chatting with a highly educated but haughty girl in Amsterdam. I mentioned that I had just visited the Rijksmuseum and had found it most impressive. "Well," she said, "after all, you haven't anything like that in the United States." I informed her, and rather crisply, too, that we could put the whole Rijksmuseum in one wing of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, which we could. This, of course, comes under the childish category of My Father Can Lick Yours, but it is galling in the extreme to find this attitude among people who should know better.

The average European view of the United States is hopelessly uninformed and distorted in nearly every regard, in fact. Sometimes this stems from deliberate distortion, as in London where the foulest and cheapest sex books are publicly displayed everywhere as having sold one million copies in the U. S. when these books, if indeed they are available in America at all, are only obtainable through illicit channels. Sometimes it stems from combined ignorance and chauvinism, as in the case of a noted minister who stated that the American wives, in contrast to the wives of his countrymen, are all nervous wrecks from constant fear of losing their husbands. Meaningless generalities of such sweeping character on every phase of American life, inevitably condemnatory, are everywhere encountered in Europe.

So far as the average European is concerned, America consists of New York, Hollywood and Texas. New York is conceived to be a towering hell - hole of iniquitous money - grubbing, Hollywood is staunchly referred to as the naughtiest city in the world (though what goes on in three blocks in Amsterdam, the place Pigalle in Paris, Piccadilly Circus in London and the Kurfurstendam of Berlin would make Hollywood look like a Methodist camp meeting ground), and Texas is where cowboys and millionaire play-boys come from. There isn't any other America, save perhaps Chicago, where Tommy guns are believed to be as common an accessory as umbrellas, and The South, which is where, they fancy, black and white are pitted against one another in an inexorable war of extermination. (No discussion of America by an American in Europe ever ends save with the question "Yes, but how about the South?").

Science Regarded

In all this there is no room for any notion that America may have a museum or two, a couple of writers, an artist of sorts, a composer of standing, an educational institution that ranks, an orchestra that can make music, a poet with literacy, a journal with distinction, a newpaper with integrity, a drama with verity, a radio program with an I.Q., a forum with serious intent and a people with a conversational capacity beyond the nursery.

Science, yes; American science is highly regarded, especially as it relates to the production line. In medical circles American medicine is highly regarded, too, and the initiates are well aware of Boston's special eminence in this field. Generally speaking, however, the European man-in-the-street, who may envy the American washing machine and electric refrigerator, holds the determined view that America is otherwise one vast materialistic society devoid of morals, of principles, of family integrity and of culture.

Thus to have the Boston Symphony orchestra descend upon him, and to have it demonstrate itself to be so vastly superior to anything Europe has to offer from the point of view of technical capacity, unity of ensemble and tonal opulence, proved to be not less than a revelation. It might have been argued — though it wasn't—that the orchestra's esthetic, its spiritual quality, so to speak, was not superior to one or two European orchestras; the programs offered by the Boston Symphony on its tour offered little room for comparison. I have no doubt that some members of the audiences may have held secret reservations about the orchestra in this regard; after all, you can't get to an orchestra's soul in one largely ill - advised program designed for little but display.

Yet audiences everywhere, even in the highly musical, highly critical cities like Amsterdam, were all but bowled over by the Boston Symphony. Ten minute ovations with audiences stamping, clapping, cheering and yelling for more occurred everywhere; there were no exceptions. Only in London, where one of the loudest ovations occurred, were the music critics even decently restrained in their notices, and the London critics, as was expected, gallantly brushed the orchestra off in national chauvinism. (One, a comedian by the name of Leonard Mosly, referred to the orchestra as "The Boys' Town Band.")

Spares Confusion

But there was no doubt anywhere that the orchestra had come as a complete and profound surprise. The attitude, an unflattering one, was "Do you mean to tell us this sort of thing goes on in Boston?" They could hardly believe their senses—and I speak as one who made it a particular point to talk to the musical people who are influenced little either by ovations or musical notices and sound them out privately. There were occasional reservations along the esthetic lines mentioned above: could the orchestra, for example, play Beethoven? And what could it do with Mahler or Handel? Yet the genuine astonishment, the universal admiration for the orchestra, was profoundly gratifying to me.

For the extension of their remarks was that if Boston can produce and support a orchestra like this, then Boston must truly be a cultured city. A thing like this, after all, doesn't spring from some barren desert devoid of the artistic impulse entirely; there must be some well-spring of culture in Boston and perhaps even the United States after all. I did not have the heart to tell them that Boston, officially, is hardly aware of the existence of the orchestra at all and does nothing whatever for it. Nor could I confess that cultural matters, in point of fact, are largely ignored by the city, its people and its press. It would do nothing but confuse them.

But the orchestra itself did not confuse them; this is the sort of thing the European really understands, and this is the sort of thing that really impresses him. Far be it from me to venture too far into the sweeping generality department about Europe, as the Europeans so recklessly do about America, yet from the overpowering evidence offered during the first European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a tour that took it into the major European capitals, I can not but agree with an American general who, at a reception given the orchestra in Metz, stated that the visit of the orchestra had done more to stimulate goodwill toward and appreciation of America than any event in the seven years since the war.

"The European," he added, "judges a nation by the advanced quality of its culture and not by its washing machines or its politics."

If this is so, the Boston Symphony orchestra's feat was no less than prodigious.

Boston Herald
June 26 '52

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Last Roundup Of the Symphony Tour

If somebody were to take me aside and ask me, as often happens to a newspaperman who has covered a story of one kind or another, what really happened during the first European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, I think I would say that what really happened was so interesting and so important that the real story wouldn't sound believable.

I have tried, in this series, to convey some of that unbelievable flavor but I see now, on looking over the dispatches, that the results are routine; they just do not convey the extent of the impact of the orchestra on Europe or the extent of the favorable reflection it all had on Boston and on the United States in general. Nor do they tell many of the most colorful little odds and ends of the tour.

Never Miss Note

They do not tell, for example, of the night in Lyon when, in the middle of a Brahms symphony, the lights in the house went out leaving audience and orchestra in total darkness for what was estimated to be eight seconds. It seemed like eight minutes before the electrician got the lights back on again—but the orchestra didn't miss a note, continuing on from memory.

The men said later that in two or three more seconds their memories would have given out and they'd have had to stop, but the point is they didn't. And the audience, which had already given the orchestra a tremendous ovation, refused to leave the hall but began clapping in a strange unanimous beat. Monteux, who had never encountered this Lyonnaise reception, which is very rarely produced anyway, thought the noise was an expression of disapproval until a stage hand told him it was, on the contrary, the supreme bestowal of approval.

They do not tell of the night in Berlin when the audience, much of it from the then open Russian sector, remained to applaud after the orchestra had left the stage, bringing Monteux back all wrapped up in his coat to appear on the deserted stage. Nor of the night in Bordeaux after the concert when Munch appeared at a sidewalk cafe, his black homburg crunched down over his head. The crowd of perhaps 400 people, mostly people who had not gone to the concert at all, instantly recognized him and gave him an ovation on the sidewalk. Nor of the morning in Paris when 1000 students were allowed to attend a rehearsal and wouldn't stop applauding to let the rehearsal continue.

Strange Return

There were countless other events, adventures and misadventures, too. One of the strangest was the return to Berlin of Alfred Krips, the assistant first violinist of the orchestra. One of the most popular men in the Berlin Philharmonic on the advent of Hitler, Mr. Krips was horrified to find that the men had turned against him almost overnight. He was Jewish and as such reviled by his closest colleagues who refused at length to speak to him. He fled to America, and just in time, for other Jewish members of the orchestra were not so fortunate. On his return to Berlin he was staggered to be met, feted and entertained by the very men who had repudiated him. He could not but accept their attention, but with feelings of mingled horror and sadness; they acted, he said, as if nothing had ever happened.

There was, in Frankfurt, a touching episode when there appeared at the concert there an 82-year old retired member of the orchestra, a man named Johannes Warnke. He had retired in 1938 and, with his nest-egg and his pension had returned to Germany. He could not have picked a more inopportune moment. He lost most of his family and his house in the fighting, and had the terrible luck to end up in the Russian zone after the war where his pension could not reach him. He had just escaped into the western zone and there he was, backstage after the Frankfurt concert, weeping with joy. The members took up a collection . . . and he's back on the pension list.

(Unlike Mr. Warnke, very few if any members of the Boston Symphony ever plan to return to their native countries on their own retirement. Many, in fact, had planned to before this trip, but what they saw, or rather the different way of life they saw, changed their minds. I'll not forget one member in whose compartment I was sitting when the train passed through his home town. He had always intended to return to it and had never ceased talking about it, the members said. He sat at the window, his face intense with emotion, urging the engineer to slow down, slow down. The train did pass through the town slowly, and his eyes devoured the scene, but he kept saying, "No, no, no, I don't know it, I don't know it." He sat silently for an hour afterward, then he got up and left the compartment. "Not for me," he said).

(Series concluded tomorrow)

[illegible]

June 27, Globe

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Last Roundup of Symphony on Tour (2)

There were some little accidents and maybe a couple of incidents (to bring this narrative of the Boston Symphony orchestra's tour to an over-due end), but I didn't hear of any arguments. Indeed, I never encountered such a happy family of men anywhere.

As for the accidents, one member collided with a door one night and broke his glasses. He couldn't play the whole concert, but by borrowing another member's glasses of similar power, he did play the one piece he would have been missed in. Another member, putting his faith in a desk clerk who was supposed to wake him from a pre-concert nap, arrived breathlessly at the intermission.

Only two serious events occurred, one when all the baggage didn't arrive in London in time for the concert, which had to be postponed for an hour and played without any rehearsal at all (a very tricky thing for such a sensitive music hall as London's Festival Hall), and the other when the Ile de France had to postpone its sailing date from Southampton by one day.

Came as Surprise

This was serious mainly for the fact that the postponement wasn't known until most of the men had checked out of their hotels. Thomas Perry, the orchestra's assistant manager, finally got most of them into one hotel. (They learned, the next day, it was the first time in many years anyone had checked into that hotel with any luggage). But the men, recalling the celebrated "couchette" or sleeping train from Bordeaux to Paris, took it all in stride. After all, one night on a sleeper in which each tiny compartment sleeps six people with all the intimacy of stacked sardines mingled and interwoven with suitcases, bags, box lunches and clothing shed for the night, hardens anyone for all eventualities.

